curious hunting-piece, in which Semiramis on horseback was throwing her javelin at a leopard, and her husband Ninus piercing a lion. In this last palace were the hanging gardens, so celebrated among the Greeks. They contained a square of 400 feet on every side, and were carried up in the manner of several large terraces, one above another, till the height equalled that of the walls of the city. The ascent was from terrace to terrace by stairs ten feet wide. The whole pile was sustained by vast arches raised upon other arches, one above another, and strengthened by a wall, surrounding it on every side, of twenty-two feet in thickness. On the top of the arches were first laid large flat stones, sixteen feet long and four broad; over these was a layer of reeds, mixed with a great quantity of bitumen, upon which were two rows of bricks closely cemented together. The whole was covered with thick sheets of lead, upon which lay the mould of the garden. And all this flooring was contrived to keep the moisture of the mould from running away through the arches. The earth laid thereon was so deep that large trees might take root in it; and with such the terraces were covered, as well as with all other plants and flowers that were proper to adorn a pleasure-garden. In the upper terrace there was an engine, or kind of pump, by which water was drawn up out of the river, and from thence the whole garden was watered. In the spaces between the several arches upon which this whole structure rested, were large and magnificent apartments, that were very light, and had the advantage of a beautiful prospect. Amyitis, the wife of Nebuchadnezzar, having been bred in Media (for she was the daughter of Astyages, the king of that country), desired to have something in imitation of her native hills and forests; and the monarch, in order to gratify her, is said to have raised this prodigious structure.—Babylon was probably in the zenith of its glory and dominion just before the death of Nebuchadnezzar. The spoils of Nineveh, Jerusalem, and Egypt had enriched it; its armies had swept like a torrent over the finest countries of the East, and had at this time no longer an enemy to contend with; the arts and sciences, driven from Phœnicia and Egypt, were centred here; and hither the philosophers of the West came to imbibe instruction. The fall of Babylon, before the victorious arms of Cyrus, occurred B.C. 538. The height and strength of the walls had long baffled every effort of the invader. Having understood at length, that on a certain day, then near approaching, a great annual festival was to be kept at Babylon, when it was customary for the Babylonians to spend the night in revelling and drunkenness, he thought this a fit opportunity for executing a scheme which he had planned. This was no other than to surprise the city by turning the course of the river; a mode of capture of which the Babylonians, who looked upon the river as one of their greatest protections, had not the smallest apprehension. Accordingly, on the night of the feast, he sent a party of his men to the head of the canal, which led to the great lake made by Nebuchadnezzar to receive the waters of the Euphrates while he was facing the banks of the river with walls of brick and bitumen. This party had directions, as soon as it was dark, to commence breaking down the great bank or dam which kept the waters of the river in their place, and separated them from the canal above mentioned: while Cyrus, in the mean time, dividing the rest of his army, stationed one part at the place where the river entered the city, and the other where it came out, with orders to enter the channel of the river as soon as they should find it fordable. This happened by midnight; for, by cutting down the bank leading to the great lake, and making besides openings into the trenches, which, in the course of the two years' siege, had been dug round the city, the river was so drained of its water that it became nearly dry. When the army of Cyrus entered the channel from their respective stations on each side of the city, they rushed onward towards the centre of the place; and finding the gates leading towards the river left open, in the drunkenness and negligence of the night, they entered them, and met by concert at the palace before any alarm had been given: here the guards, partaking, no doubt, in the negligence and disorder of the night, were surprised and killed. While all this was going on without, a remarkable scene of widely different character was transacting within. Daniel was deciphering the writing on the wall; and, soon after, the soldiers of Cyrus, having killed the guard, and meeting with no resistance, advanced towards the banqueting-hall, where they encountered Belshazzar, the ill-fated monarch, and slew him, with his armed followers.—Babylon had suffered much when carried by the troops of Cyrus; but other sufferings were to come. Cyrus having established his court at Susa, Babylon, formerly the seat of empire, was thus reduced to the rank of a provincial city; and the inhabitants, who, grown wealthy and proud during their empire over the East, could ill brook this change of fortune, resolved to make an effort towards regaining their former power and grandeur. Accordingly, in the fifth year of Darius Hystaspis, and twelve years after the death of Cyrus, having for several years covertly laid in great stores of provisions, and every necessary, they openly revolted; which, as they might have expected, soon brought upon them the armies of Darius. The city a second time was taken by stratagem (vid. Zopyrus), and Darius, when he again became possessed of it, gave it up to the plunder of his soldiers. He impaled 3000 of those who were supposed to have been most active in the revolt; took away the gates, and pulled down the walls to the height of fifty cubits. During the remainder of the reign of Darius, Babylon continued in much the same state in which it was left after the siege. But in the succeeding reign another blow was struck towards her downfall. Xerxes, in his return from his Grecian expedition, partly to indemnify himself for his losses, and partly out of zeal for the Magian religion, which held every kind of image-worship in abhorrence, destroyed the temples and plundered them of their vast wealth, which appears to have been hitherto spared, and which must have been indeed prodigious; that in the temple of Belus alone amounting, according to Diodorus, to above 6000 talents of gold, or about 21 millions sterling. From this period, Babylon, depleted of her wealth, her strength, and her various resources, was in no condition for any more revolts; and it is reasonable to suppose, that, with the decay of her power and local advantages, the population also must decline. We hear, in fact, no more of Babylon until the coming of Alexander, 150 years after; when the terror of his name, or the weakness of the place, was such, that it made not the slightest pretensions to resistance. Alexander, after a short visit to Babylon, proceeded on his expedition to India; and, at his return from thence, finding Babylon more suitable in its situation and resources for the capital of his empire than any other place in the East, he resolved to fix his residence there, and to restore it to its former strength and magnificence. For this purpose, having examined the breach which Cyrus had made in the river, and the possibility of bringing it back to its former channel through the city, he employed 10,000 men in the work, and, at the same time, an equal number in rebuilding the temple of Belus. An entire stop, however, was put to these great undertakings by the death of Alexander, who here terminated together his mighty projects and his life. After the death of Alexander, Babylon and the East fell to the lot of Seleucus, one of the generals who divided his empire among them. Seleucus, for several years, was too much engaged in contention with his rivals to pay much attention to Babylon; which, still labouring under accumulated evils, continued to decline. But what completed its downfall was the building of Seleucia by Seleucus, about 40 miles distant, on a spot more favourable for commercial intercourse; the restoration of Babylon to its ancient natural advantages appearing perhaps hopeless. This, together with the removal of the court, soon exhausted Babylon of the little that remained of its ancient trade and population. It never after revived, but continued, through each succeeding age, to make farther advances in its progress of depopulation and decay, until nothing but the ruins of this once famous city were to be found. It will be interesting to trace the successive accounts of those who have made mention of Babylon during this latter period: that is, from the building of Seleucia to its entire destruction. The first of these is Diodorus Siculus, who wrote about 45 years before the Christian era. He relates, that Babylon having fallen into the hands of the Parthians, the temples were burned; much of the remaining part of the city demolished; and many of the inhabitants sold into slavery. This was about 130 B.C.: and, in his own time, 85 years after, he says, that the public buildings were destroyed or fallen to decay; that a very small part of the city was inhabited; and that the greater part of the space within the walls was tilled. Strabo, who wrote about 70 years after Diodorus, says, that the city was nearly deserted; and that the same might be applied to it which was said of Megalopolis in Arcadia, that the great city was becoming a great desert. Quintus Curtius, the next in order, and who wrote about 60 A.D., is cited by Dr. Wells to show that Babylon "was lessened a fourth part in his time;" who immediately after says, that it was reduced to desolation in the time of Pliny. Now, besides that this account of Quintus Curtius is perfectly inconsistent with preceding ones, the city must have undergone a prodigious decline, and that without any assignable cause, in the short space of 20 years, which was about the time that intervened between Curtius and Pliny. The truth is, that Dr. Wells has mistaken the period referred to by Quintus Curtius, which was that of the arrival of Alexander at Babylon, whose history he was writing, for that in which the historian himself lived. Pliny, who lived, as we have seen, about 20 years after Quintus Curtius, and 70 after Christ, declares, that Babylon was at that time "decayed, unpeopled, and lying waste." From this time may be said to have commenced the ruin of the ruins; which has been so complete, that they are with difficulty traced: and, indeed, their exact position has become a matter of learned dispute. Pausanias, about the middle of the second century, says, that of Babylon, the greatest city the sun ever saw, there was remaining but the walls. And Lucian, about the end of the same century, says, that in a little time it would be sought for, and not be found, like Nineveh. Jerome, in the fourth century, gives the account of a monk, at that time living in Jerusalem, who had been at Babylon, and who says that the space occupied by the city was converted into a chase for wild beasts, for the kings of Persia to hunt in; the walls having been repaired for that purpose. Among more recent travellers, the best accounts of the ruins of Babylon are given by Kinneir, Rich, Porter, and Buckingham. The ancient city is supposed to have been situated in what is now the Turkish pachalic of Bagdad, near the village of Hill or Hella, on the Euphrates. Ruins of various kinds are found for many miles around this place. Of these, one of the most interesting is that which is thought to be the remains of the tower of Belus. Mr. Rich, after refuting the opinion of Rennell, who places it on the eastern side of the river, gives the following account of this stupendous ruin, or, as it is called by the natives, Birs Nemroud ("The hill of Nimrod"). "If any building," says he, "may be supposed to have left any considerable traces, it is certainly the pyramid or tower of Belus; which, by its form, dimensions, and the solidity of its construction, was well calculated to resist the ravages of time; and, if human force had not been employed, would in all probability have remained to the present day in nearly as perfect a state as the pyramids of Egypt. Even under the dilapidations which we know it to have undergone at a very early period, we might reasonably look for traces of it after every other vestige of Babylon had vanished from the face of the earth. The whole height of the Birs Nemroud above the plain, to the summit of the brick wall on its top, is 235 feet. The brick wall itself, which stands on the edge of the summit, and was undoubtedly the face of another stage, is 37 feet high. In the side of the pile, a little below the summit, is very clearly to be seen part of another brick wall, precisely resembling the fragment which crowns the summit, but which still encases and supports its part of the mound. This is clearly indicative of another stage, of greater extent. The masonry is infinitely superior to anything of the kind I have ever seen; and, leaving out of the question any conjecture relative to the original destination of this ruin, the first impression made by the sight of it, is that it was a solid pile, composed in the interior of unburned brick, and perhaps earth or rubbish; that it was constructed in preceding stages, and faced with fine burned bricks, having inscriptions on them, laid in a very thin layer of lime cement; and that it was reduced by violence to its present ruinous condition. The upper stories have been forcibly broken down, and fire has been employed as an instrument of destruction, though it is not easy to say precisely how or why. The facing of fine bricks has partly been removed, and partly covered by the falling down of the mass which it supported and kept together. The Birs Nemroud is in all likelihood at present pretty nearly in the state in which Alexander saw it; if we give any credit to the report that 10,000 men could only remove the rubbish, preparatory to repairing it, in two months. If indeed it required one half of that number to disencumber it, the state of dilapidation must have been complete. The immense masses of vitrified brick which are seen on the top of the mound, appear to have marked its summit since the time of its destruction. The rubbish about its base was probably in much greater quantities, the weather having dissipated much of it in the course of so many revolving ages; and possibly portions of the exterior facing of fine brick may have disappeared at different periods." (Second Memoir on the Ruins of Babylon, p. 165, seqq., Lond., 1839).—The account of Sir Robert Ker Porter is also exceedingly interesting.—As regards the opinion generally entertained, that all traces of the walls of Babylon had disappeared, it may be remarked, that Buckingham considers the hill or mound of Al Hheimar to be a portion of the ancient wall. This mound is about ten miles east of Hillah. It appears to consist of a solid mass of brickwork, and is of an oval form, its length being from north to south. It is from 80 to 100 feet thick at the bottom, and from 70 to 80 high. On the summit is a mass of solid wall, about 30 feet in length by 12 to 15 in thickness, bearing marks of being broken and incomplete on every side.—The bricks obtained from the ruins of Babylon are celebrated among antiquaries for the inscriptions stamped upon them. These inscriptions are in the cuneiform or Babylonian character: some four, and even seven lines. Grotfend, Burnouf, and Lassen have done much towards deciphering these. (Heeren, Hecen, vol. 2, pt. 2, p. 325, seqq.—Mansford's Script. Gazetteer, p. 58, seqq.)—II. A city of Egypt, north of Memphis, supposed to have been founded by the Persians during the reign of Cambyses. A quarter, retaining the name of Baboul or Babilon, in the town of Old Cairo, marks its position. (Ptol., 4, 5.—Strab., 555.—Joseph., Ant. Jud., 2, 5.)

BABYLONIA, a large province of Upper Asia, of which Babylon was the capital. It was bounded on the north by Mesopotamia and Assyria; on the west by Arabia Deserta; on the south by the Sinus Persicus; and on the east by the Tigris. According to Ptolemy (5, 20), it comprised Chaldea, Amordacia, and, at the most flourishing period, a part of Mesopotamia and Assyria. The modern name is Irak Arabi, or Babeli. Babylonia is a dry steppe or tableland, but enjoys a delightful climate. It was and still is one of the most fruitful lands in the world. Herodotus (1, 193) gives the following account of its fertility. "All the country about Babylon is, like Egypt, divided by frequent canals; of which the largest is navigable, and, beginning at the Euphrates, has a southeastern direction, and falls into the river Tigris, on which the city of Nineveh formerly stood. No part of the known world produces so good wheat; but the vine, the olive, and the fig-tree, they do not even attempt to cultivate. Yet, in recompense, it abounds so much in corn, as to yield at all times two hundred fold, and even three hundred fold when it is most fruitful. Wheat and barley carry a blade full four digits in breadth; and though I well know to what a surprising height millet and sesame grow in those parts, I shall be silent in that particular; because I am well assured that what has already been related concerning other fruits, is far more credible to those who have never been at Babylon. They use no other oil than such as is drawn from sesame. The palm-tree grows over all the plain; and the greater part bears fruit, with which they make bread, wine, and honey." The products are nearly the same now as they were in ancient times. The southwestern part of Babylonia was called Chaldea. In the more extensive sense of the word, Babylonia was the most important satrapy of the Persian empire, and comprised both Assyria and Mesopotamia. BACCHANALIA, festivals in honour of Bacchus at Rome, the same as the Dionysia of the Greeks. (Vid. Dionysia.)

BACCHANTES. The worship of Bacchus prevailed in almost all parts of Greece. Men and women joined in his festivals dressed in Asiatic robes and bonnets; their heads, wreathed with vine and ivy leaves, with fawn-skins (verberides) flung over their shoulders, and thyrsi, or blunt spears twined with vine-leaves, in their hands, they ran through the country, shouting Io Bacche! Euoi! Iacche! &c., swinging their thyrsi, beating on drums, and sounding various instruments. Indecent emblems were carried in procession, and the ceremonies often assumed a most immoral character and tendency. The women, who bore a chief part in these frantic revels, were called Baccha, Mænades, Thyades, Enades, &c. (Knightley's Mythology, p. 216.)

BACCHUS and BITHUS, two celebrated gladiators of equal age and strength, who, after conquering many competitors, engaged with each other and died of mutual wounds; whence the proverb to express equality, Bithus contra Bacchum. (Horat., Serm., 1, 7, 20.—Porphyrion, Schol. ad Horat., l. c.)

BACCHUS, son of Jupiter and Semele daughter of Cadmus. Jupiter, enamoured of the beauty of Semele, visited her in secret. Juno's jealousy took the alarm, and, under the form of an old woman, she came to

Semele, and, by exciting doubts of the real character of her lover, induced her, when next he came, to exact a promise that he would visit her as he was wont to visit Juno. An unwary promise was thus drawn from the god before he knew what he was required to perform; and he therefore entered the bower of Semele, with the lightning and thunder flaming, flashing, and roaring around him. Overcome with terror, Semele, who was now six months gone with child, expired in the flames, and Jupiter, taking the babe, thus prematurely born, sewed it up in his thigh. In due time it came forth, and Jupiter, then naming it Bacchus (in Greek Dionysus), gave it to Mercury to convey to Ino, the sister of Semele, with directions to rear it. Juno, whose revenge was not yet satiated, caused Athamas, the husband of Ino, to go mad; and Jupiter, to save Bacchus from the machinations of his spouse, changed him into a kid, under which form Mercury conveyed him to the Nymphs of Nysa, by whom he was reared. When he grew up, he discovered the culture of the vine, and the mode of extracting its precious liquor; but Juno struck him with madness, and he roamed through great part of Asia. In Phrygia Rhea cured him, and taught him her religious rites, which he now resolved to introduce into Greece. While passing through Thrace, he was so furiously attacked by Lycurgus, a prince of that country, that he was obliged to take refuge with Thetis, in the sea. But he inflicted on the monarch severe retaliation. (Vid. Lycurgus.) When Bacchus reached Thebes, the women readily received the new rites, and ran wildly through the woods of Cithæron. Pentheus, the ruler of Thebes, however, set himself against them; and Bacchus caused him to be torn to pieces by his mother and his aunts. He next proceeded to Attica, where he taught Icarius the culture of the vine. (Vid. Icarius, Erigone.) At Argos the rites of Bacchus were received, as at Thebes, by the women, and opposed by Perseus, son of Jupiter and Danaë. Jove, however, reduced his two sons to amity, and Bacchus thence passed over to Naxos, where he met Ariadne. On his way to this island he fell into the hands of Tyrrhenian pirates, who bound him with cords, intending to sell him as a slave. But the cords fell from his limbs, vines with clustering grapes spread over the sail, and ivy, laden with berries, ran up the masts and sides of the vessel. The god, thereupon assuming the form of a lion, seized the captain of the ship, and the terrified crew, to escape him, leaped into the sea and became dolphins. The pilot alone, who had taken the part of Bacchus, remained on board; the god then declared to him who he was, and took him under his protection. The expedition of Bacchus into the East is also celebrated. In the Bacchæ of Euripides the god describes himself as having gone through Lydia, Phrygia, Persia, Bactria, Media, Arabia, and the coast of Asia, inhabited by mingled Greeks and barbarians, throughout all which he had established his dances and religious rites. India, in particular, was the scene of his conquests. He marched at the head of an army composed of both men and women, all inspired with divine fury, and armed with thyrsi, clashing cymbals, and other musical instruments, and uttering the wildest cries. His conquests were easy and without bloodshed; the nations readily submitted, and the god taught them the use of the vine, the cultivation of the earth, and the art of making honey. Bacchus was also fabled to have assisted the gods in their wars against the giants, having assumed on that occasion the form of a lion. He afterward descended to Erebus, whence he brought his mother, whom he now named Thyone, and ascended with her to the abode of the gods. (Apollod., 3, 5, 3.—Diod. Sic., 3, 62.—Id., 4, 25.—Horat., Od., 2, 19, 29.)—Like every other portion of the Grecian mythology, the history of the vine-god was pragmatized when infidelity became prevalent. Thus, Diodorus gives us, probably from the cyclograph Dionysius, the following narrative. Ammon, a monarch of Libya, was married to Rhea, a daughter of Manus; but meeting, near the Ceraunian mountains, a beautiful maiden named Amalthea, he became enamoured of her. He made her mistress of the adjacent fruitful country, which, from its resembling a bull's horn in form, was named the Western horn, and then Amalthea's horn, which last name was afterward given to places similar to it in fertility. Amalthea here bore him a son, whom, fearing the jealousy of Rhea, he conveyed to a town named Nysa, situated not far from the Horn, in an island formed by the river Triton. He committed the care of him to Nysa, one of the daughters of Aristæus, while Minerva was appointed to keep guard against the assaults of Rhea. This delicious isle, which was precipitous on all sides, with a single entrance, through a narrow glen thickly shaded with trees, is described in a similar manner with Panchaia and other happy retreats of the same name. It had verdant meads, abundant springs, trees of every kind, flowers of all hues, and evermore resounded with the melody of birds. (Compare Milton, P. L., 4, 275, seqq.) After he grew up, Bacchus became a mighty conqueror, according to this legend, and a benefactor of mankind, by whom he was finally deified.—Though the adventures of Bacchus were occasionally the theme of poets, especially of the dramatists, they do not appear to have been narrated in continuity, like those of Hercules, until after the decline of Grecian poetry. It was in the fifth century of the Christian era that Nonnus, a native of Panopolis, in Egypt, made the history of Bacchus the subject of a poem, containing forty-eight books, the wildest and strangest that can well be conceived, more resembling the Ramayuna of India than anything to be found in ancient or modern occidental literature. It forms a vast repertory of Bacchic fable. (Vid. Nonnus.)—Bacchus was represented in a variety of modes and characters by the ancient artists. The Theban Bacchus appears with the delicate lineaments of a maiden rather than those of a young man; his whole air and gait are effeminate; his long, flowing hair is, like that of Apollo, collected behind his head, wreathed with ivy or a fillet; he is either naked or wrapped in a large cloak, and the nebris, or fawn's skin, is sometimes flung over his shoulders; he carries a thyrsus, and a panther generally lies at his feet. In some monuments Bacchus appears bearded, in others horned (the Bacchus-Sebazius), whence in the mysteries he was identified with Osiris, and regarded as the Sun. For another legend relative to the horns with which he is depicted, consult the article Ammon. He is sometimes alone, at other times in company with Ariadne or the youth Ampelus. His triumph over the Indians is represented in great pomp. The captives are chained, and placed on wagons or elephants, and among them is carried a large crater full of wine. The god himself is in a chariot drawn by elephants or panthers, leaning on Ampelus, preceded by Pan, and followed by Silenus, the satyrs, and Menades, on foot or on horseback, who make the air resound with their cries and the clash of their instruments. The Indian Bacchus is always bearded.—It is with reason that Sophocles styles Bacchus many named (πολλώνυμος, Antig., 1115), for in the Orphic hymns alone we meet with upward of forty of his appellations. The etymology of the most common one, Bacchus, has been variously given; it appears, however, to be only another form for Iacchus. (Vid. Iacchus.) Some make it the same with Bagis, one of the names of the Hindu deity Schiva. (Keightley's Mythology, p. 212, seqq.)—Modern writers are much divided in opinion respecting the origin of the worship of Bacchus, and many arguments have been urged in support of its having come from a Grecian source. A dispassionate view of the subject, however, will lead, we think, to the conviction that the religious system of this deity is of Indian origin. In order, however, to reach the soil of Greece, it had to traverse other countries, Upper Asia, Phœnicia, Egypt, and Thrace; and, in its march, its fabulous legends became enlarged and variously modified. It is impossible to deny the identity of Bacchus with Osiris. The birth of Bacchus, drawn living from the womb of Semele, after she had perished beneath the fires of Jove, and his strange translation to the thigh of the monarch of Olympus, bear the impress of Oriental imagery. When he escapes from his mother's womb, an ivy-branch springs forth from a column to cover him with its shade (Eurip., Phœn., 658, seqq.), and the ivy was in Egypt the plant of Osiris. (Plut., de Is. et Os., p. 365.—Op., ed. Reiske, vol. 7, p. 442.) In like manner, the coffin of the Egyptian deity is shaded by the plant erica, which springs suddenly from the ground and envelops it. (Plut., ibid.) Bacchus and Osiris both float upon the waters in a chest or ark. They have both for their symbols the head of a bull; and hence Bacchus is styled Bougenes by Plutarch.—It is equally impossible not to recognise in Bacchus the Schiva of India, as well as the Lingam his symbol. (Compare Rhode, Religiöse Bildung, &c., der Hindus, vol. 2, p. 232.) If we wish to call etymology to our aid, we shall be struck with the remembrance which Dionysus (Διόνυσος), the Greek name of Bacchus, bears to Dionichi (Devā-Nichā), a surname of Schiva. (Langlès, Recherches Asiatiques, vol. 1, p. 278.—Creuzer's Symbolik, par Guignaut, vol. 1, p. 148, in notis.) An analogy may also be traced between the Greek term ἄρπᾱς, "thigh," and the Indian Merou, the mountain of the gods. One of the symbols of Bacchus is an equilateral triangle; this is also one of Schiva's. The two systems of worship have the same obscenities, and the same emblems of the generative power. (Asiatic Researches, vol. 8, p. 50.) Schiva is represented, in the Hindu mythology, as assuming the form of a lion during the great battle of the gods. He seizes the monster that attacks him, and assails him with his teeth and fangs, while Dourga pierces him with his lance. The same exploit is attributed, in the Grecian mythology, to Bacchus, under the same form, against the giant Rhetus. (Hor., Carm., 2, 19, 23.) The manner in which the worship of Bacchus came into Greece, probably by means of several successive migrations, through regions widely remote, will ever remain an enigma of difficult solution. The Greeks, indeed, made Thebes the birthplace of this deity; but this proves nothing for the fact of his Grecian origin. Thebes, in Bœotia, was the centre of the Cadmean-Asiatic mythology: a god, whose worship came to the rest of the Greeks out of Thebes, was for them a deity born in Thebes; and hence arose the legend of the Theban origin of Bacchus. (Böttmann's Mythologus, vol. 1, p. 5.) So, when the Greek mythology makes Bacchus to have gone on an expedition to Asia, and to have conquered India, it merely reverses the order of events, and describes, as the victorious progress of a Grecian deity, what was in reality the course which the religion of an Oriental deity took, from the East to the West. (Kanne, Mythologie der Griechen, § 31.) In the Anti-Symbolik of Voss (p. 65, seqq.), we have an excellent history of the introduction of the worship of Bacchus into Greece, and its progress in that country, from the 20th to the 60th Olympiad. We find this worship making its first appearance in the mysteries of Samothrace; furnishing to the Ionian school Phœnician elements; enriching itself with ideas of Asiatic origin by means of the extension of commerce; mingling with the elements of Grecian philosophy in their very cradle; presenting Lydian and Phrygian additions as a primitive basis; giving an occult meaning to the public games at Olympia; carrying back into Egypt, under the reign of Psammetichus, along with Milesian colonies, and enriched with immense developments, what the Egyptian colonies had once carried into Greece; identifying itself with the Orphic doctrine; but remaining always an object of suspicion and aversion, and condemned by the wise in the days of Xenophanes and Heraclitus, as it had been a long time before proscribed by kings and rejected by communities. The fables of which Bacchus is made the hero, the rites which these fables elucidated, rites bearing at one time the impress of profound sadness, at another of frantic joy, and by turns bloody and licentious, mournful and frantic, never became part of the Grecian system of religion. Wherever they announced themselves, they excited only horror and dread. The sufferings and the destruction of various dynasties attach themselves to their frightful and sudden appearance. Agave rends in pieces her son Pentheus. Ino precipitates herself into the sea, with Melicerta in her arms. The daughters of Minyas, becoming furious, commit horrible murder, and undergo a hideous metamorphosis. The language of the poets who relate to us these fearful traditions, is sombre and mysterious in its character, and bears evident marks of a sacerdotal origin. The philosophic Euripides, as well as Ovid, who expresses himself with so much lightness in reference to other legends, appear, in describing the death of Pentheus, to partake of the sanguinary joy, the ferocious irony, and the fanaticism of the Bacchantes. One would feel tempted to say, that the sacerdotal spirit had triumphed over these incredulous poets, and that, after the lapse of ten centuries, the phrensy of the ancient orgies had affected their senses and troubled their reason. In the age of Homer these mournful recitals were either unknown or treated with disdain; for he speaks only once of Bacchus, on occasion of the victory which he gained over Lycurgus (Il., 6, 130.—Compare Od., 21, 74), and the scholiasts express their surprise, that the poet, after having thus placed Bacchus among the divinities of Olympus, makes him take no part in the subjects that divide them. The Grecian spirit, therefore, renounced, at an early period, every attempt to modify this so heterogeneous a conception. (Constant, de la Religion, vol. 2, p. 419, seqq.)

BACCHYLIDES, a lyric poet of Ceos, nephew to Simonides. He flourished about 450 B.C. and was regarded as one of the most celebrated poets of his day. Bacchylides shared with Pindar the favour of King Hiero at the court of Syracuse. That his poetry was but an imitation of one branch of that of Simonides, cultivated with great delicacy and finish, is proved by the opinion of ancient critics; among whom Dionysius adduces perfect correctness and uniform elegance as the characteristics of Bacchylides. His genius and art were chiefly devoted to the pleasures of private life, love, and wine; and, when compared with those of Simonides, appear marked by greater sensual grace and less moral elevation. Among the kinds of choral songs which he employed, besides those of which he had examples in Simonides and Pindar, we find erotic ones. The elaborate and brilliant execution which is peculiar to the school of Simonides, appears also in the productions of Bacchylides, especially in the beautiful fragment in praise of peace. The structure of Bacchylides' verses is generally very simple; nine tenths of his odes, to judge from the fragments, consisted of dactylic series and trochaic dipodias, as we see in those odes of Pindar, which were written in the Doric mode. We find in his poems trochaic verses of great elegance; as, for example, a fragment, preserved by Athenæus, of a religious poem, in which the Dioscuri are invited to a feast. (Athen., 11, p. 590, b.) Bacchylides wrote in the Doric dialect. Many fragments of his pieces occur in Plutarch, Dionysius of Halicarnassus, Athenæus, Clemens of Alexandria, and particularly in Stobæus. The fragments of Baccaylides are found in the collections of Neander, H. Stephens, Orsini, and Brunck. A more complete edition of them appeared in 1822, from the Berlin press, by C. F. Neue, in 8vo. (Scholl, Hist. Lit. Gr., vol. 1, p. 287.—Mohrke, Lit. der Gr. und R., p. 336.—Lit. Anc. Gr., c. 14, § 13, in Libr. Us. Knoll.)

BACENIS, a wood in Germany, generally supposed to be a part of the Hercynia Silva, and to have been situate in the vicinity of the Fulda, or Vol, which flows into the Visurgis. It separated the territories of the Catti from those of the Cherusi, and appears to be the same with the Buchonia of later writers. (Cæs., B. G., 6, 10.—Mannert, Geogr., vol. 3, p. 183, 417.)

BACTRA, the capital of Bactria, situate on the river Bactrus, a tributary of the Oxus. It is now Balkh, in the country of the Usbeck Tatars. It was likewise called Zariaspe and Zariaspa. (Plin., 6, 16.) This place has been a rendezvous of caravans from the remotest antiquity, and at this point it is probable that commerce united Eastern and Western Asia. To this place the natives of Little Thibet, which Herodotus and Ctesias call Northern India, brought the valuable woollens of their country, and likewise the gold which they procured from the great desert of Cobi. The tales which they told to the Western Asiatics of these wonderful regions might be a little exaggerated, or perverted through the medium of an interpreter. (Long's Anc. Geogr., p. 13.—Compare Heeren, Ideen, vol. 1, pt. 3, p. 408, seqq.)—On the origin of the Bactrians and their connexion with the great Zend race, consult the remarks of Rhode, in his Heilige Sage der Baktrer, &c., p. 60, seqq.

BACTRIA and BACTRIANA, a country of Asia, bounded by Aria on the west, the mountains of Paropamisus on the south; the Emodi Montes on the east; and Sogdiana on the north. Bactriana now belongs to the kingdom of the Afghans, or Caubulistan. Its proximity to Northern India, and the possession of a large river, the Oxus, with fertile lands, made it, in very remote ages, the centre of Asiatic commerce, and the point of union for all the natives of this vast continent. (Vid. Bactra.) It would seem also, in very early times, to have been the seat of a powerful empire long prior to that of the Medes or Persians. (Compare Bähr, ad Ctes., p. 93.)—This country became remarkable at a later age for the Greek kingdom which was founded in it. The Bactrian kingdom arose almost at the same time with the Parthian, B.C. 254; yet the mode of its origin was not only different (for it was here the Grecian governor himself, who made himself independent, and therefore had Grecians for his successors), but also the duration, which was much less. Solitary fragments of the history of this kingdom have only been preserved, and yet it seems at one time to have extended to the banks of the Ganges and the borders of China. The founder of this kingdom was Diodatus or Theodotus I. (B.C. 254), as he broke from the Syrian sway in the time of Antiochus II. He appears to have been master of Sogdiana as well as Bactria. He also threatened Parthia, but after his death (B.C. 243) his son and successor, Theodotus II., closed a peace and alliance with Arsaces II., but was deprived of his throne by Euthydemus of Magnesia, about B.C. 221. The attack of Antiochus the Great, after the termination of the Parthian war, was directed against him, but ended in a peace, in which Euthydemus, on giving up his elephants, retained his crown, and a marriage between his son Demetrius and a daughter of Antiochus was agreed upon. Demetrius, although he was a great conqueror, appears not to have been king of Bactria, but of Northern India and Malabar, of which countries the history is now closely connected with that of Bactria, although all the accounts are but fragmentary. To the throne of Bactria, Menander succeeded, who extended his conquests to Serica, as Demetrius established his dominion in India, where, about this time (perhaps as a consequence of the expedition of Antiochus III., B.C. 205), there appear to have been several Greek states. Menander was followed, about B.C. 181, by Eucratidas, under whom the Bactrian kingdom acquired its greatest extent; for, after defeating the Indian king Demetrius, who had attacked him, he, with the assistance of the Parthian conqueror Mithradates (Arsaces VI.), took India from Demetrius and annexed it to the Bactrian kingdom, B.C. 148. He was, however, on his return, murdered by his son, who is probably the Eucratidas who is afterward named. This latter was the ally and chief adviser of the expedition of Demetrius II. of Syria against the Parthians, B.C. 142; and therefore, on the victorious resistance of Arsaces VI., robbed of a part of his territory, and soon after overpowered by the nomadic nations of Middle Asia; upon which the Bactrian kingdom became, as such, extinct, and Bactria itself, with the other countries on this side the Oxus, became a booty to the Parthians. (Compare Bayer, Historia regni Græcorum Bactriani, Petrop. 1738, 4to.—Heeren's Anc. History, p. 315, seqq., Bancroft's transl.)

BACTRUS, a river of Bactria, running into the Oxus. It flowed by the capital Bactra, and is supposed to be the same with the modern Anderab. (Curt., 7, 4.—Polyæn., Strat., 7, 11.)

BACUNTIUS, a river of Pannonia, in the immediate vicinity of Sirmium. It fell into the Savus or Sava. The modern name is Bosset or Bossut. (Plin., 3, 25.)

BADIA, a town of Hispania Bætica, supposed to be the present Badajoz. (Mannert, Geogr., vol. 1, p. 447.—Cellarius, Geogr. Antiq., vol. 1, p. 67.)

BADUENNÆ LUCUS, a grove in the country of the Frisii, where 900 Romans were killed. (Tacit., Ann., 4, 73.) It is thought to have been situated in modern West Friesland. The name is supposed to be derived from that of the goddess Pada, and the modern name is given by some as Holt Pade. (Alting, Not. Batav. et Fris. Ant., vol. 1, p. 14.)

BÆBIA LEX, I. was enacted for the election of six pretors and four during alternate years. (Liv., 40, 44.)—II. Another law by M. Bæbius, a tribune of the people, against largesses and bribery. (Non. Marcell., de propr. Serm., c. 7, n. 19, p. 749.—Liv., 40, 19.)

BÆTICA. Vid. Hispania.

BÆTIS, a river of Spain, from which a part of the country received the name of Bætica. (Vid. Hispania.) Its sources were surrounded by the chain of Mons Oropæda. At its mouth was the island of Tartessus, the name of which was anciently also applied to the river, previous to that of Bætis. (Strab., 148.) According to Steph. Byz., the natives called this river Perkes (Πέρκης); but according to Livy (28, 22), Certis. Bochart derives the name Bætis from the Punic Bisî, "marshy." So also Perkes is deduced by him from Berca, "a marsh," in the same language. In illustration of these etymologies, he states that the Bætis forms marshes three times in its course. The appellation Certis, as found in Livy, he considers a mere corruption from Perkes. (Bochart, Geogr. Sacr., 1, 34.) Others, however, derive Certis from the Oriental Kiriath, "a town," from the great number which it watered in its course. (Consult Oehlerlin, ad Vib. Sequest., p. 15.—Teschucke, ad Mel., 3, 1, vol. 3, pt. 3, p. 15.) The modern name of the Bætis is the Guadalquivir, which is a corruption from the Arabic Waddi-al-Kiber, or "the Great River." (Plin., 3, 1.—Lucan, Phars., 2, 589.—Stat. Sylv., 7, 34, &c.)

BAGISTANUS, a mountain of Media, southwest of Ecbatana, and sacred to Jupiter. Here Semiramis formed a park or garden of twelve stadia in circumference, and cut her image on the face of the rock. (Diod. Sic., 2, 13.—Isid., Charac., p. 6.) Alexander is said to have visited the spot. (Diod. Sic., 17, 110.) It will be observed that the first part of the name, Bagis, is an appellation of the Hindoo Schiva, and is also regarded by some as the source whence the Greek name Bacchus is derived. (Mannert, Geogr., vol. 5, pt. 2, p. 165, seq.)

BAGOAS, I. an Egyptian eunuch at the court of Artaxerxes Ochus, remarkable for his bravery and military talents. In concert with Memnon, he brought Egypt, which had revolted, under the Persian sway again. Ochus, however, having shocked his religious prejudices by his conduct towards the deified animals of Egypt, Bagoas destroyed him (vid. Artaxerxes III.), and placed Arsēs, the monarch's youngest son, on the throne. He, however, soon destroyed this young prince also. He then called to the throne Darius Codomanus, whom he attempted to poison not long after. But Darius, discovering the artifice, made him drink the poison himself.—It is believed that this is the same Bagoas who, during the reign of Ochus, entered the temple of Jerusalem, to avenge the brother of John, whom the latter had slain in the temple, as a competitor for the high-priesthood. The name Bagoas is said to be equivalent to "eunuch." (Biogr. Univ., vol. 3, p. 216.)—II. A favourite eunuch of Alexander's. (Curt., 6, 5, 23.—Plut., Vit. Alex., c. 67.—Lemaire, ad Curt., l. c.)

BAGRĀDAS, I. a river of Africa, flowing between Utica and Carthage in former days, though at present their situation as regards it is materially altered. It makes encroachments on the sea like the Nile, and hence its ancient mouth is now circumscribed by mud, and become a large navigable pond. (Vid. Carthago and Utica.) The genuine form of the ancient name is thought to be found in Polybius, namely, Μακάρας, Μάκαρ, or Μάκαρ (Schweigh., ad Polyb., 1, 75, 5); and with this, in a measure, the Βουκάρας of Strabo coincides. The origin of the name is to be traced to the Punic Macar, "Hercules," so that Macaras will mean "the river of Hercules." Gesenius condemns Bochart's derivation from Barca or Berca, "a marsh." (Gesen., Monum. Phœn., p. 420.) The modern name of the river is the Mejerda. (Ptol., 6, 4.)

BAIÆ, a city of Campania, on a small bay west of Neapolis, and opposite Puteoli. It was originally a village, but the numerous advantages of its situation soon rendered it much frequented and famous. Its foundation is ascribed in mythology to Baius, one of the companions of Ulysses. The cause of the rapid increase of Baiæ lay in the fruitfulness of the surrounding country, in the beauty of its own situation, in the rich supply of shell and other fish which the adjacent waters afforded, and, above all, in the hot mineral springs which flowed from the neighbouring mountains, and formed a chief source of attraction to invalids. (Compare Florus, 1, 16.—Plin., 31, 2.—Senec., Ep., 51.—Josephus, Ant. Jud., 18, 14.—Cassiod., 9, cp. 6.) Baiæ was first called Aqua Cumanæ. Numerous villas graced the surrounding country, and many were likewise built on artificial moles extending a great distance into the sea. It is now, owing to earthquakes and inundations of the sea, a mere waste compared with what it once was. The modern name is Baia. Many remains of ancient villas may be seen under the water. "The bay of Baiæ," observes Eustace, "is a semicircular recess, just opposite the harbour of Pozzuolo, and about three miles distant from it. It is lined with ruins, the remains of the villas and the baths of the Romans; some advance a considerable way out, and, though now under the waves, are easily distinguishable in fine weather. The taste for building in the waters and encroaching on the sea, to which Horace alludes, is exemplified in a very striking manner all along this coast." (Classical Tour, vol. 2, p. 406.) The same traveller, in commenting on the insalubrity of Baiæ at the present day, remarks as follows: "The present unwholesomeness of Baiæ and its bay, if real, must be ascribed partly to the streams and sources once collected on the hills behind it in aqueducts and reservoirs, now spreading and oozing down the declivities, and settling in the hollows below. In a warm climate all stagnant water becomes putrid during the hot months. (Vol. 3, p. 14, in notis.)

BALANEA, a town of Syria, north of Aradus, now Belnias. (Plin., 5, 20.)

BALBINUS, I. a Roman alluded to by Horace, who speaks of his singular taste in admiring a female named Agna, deformed by a polypus in the nostrils. (Horat., Serm., 1, 3, 40.)—II. Decimus Cælius, a Roman, proclaimed emperor by the senate with Pupienus, on the death of the Gordians, A.D. 237. He was murdered by his own soldiers after a year's reign. (Jul. Capitol. in Gord.—Herodian, 7, 10, 6, &c.)

BALEĀRES, a name applied anciently to the islands of Majorea and Minorea, off the coast of Spain. The name Baleares is of Greek origin, derived from βάλλειν, "to throw" or "cast," and it alludes to the remarkable skill of the inhabitants in using the sling. According to Florus (3, 8), this was their only weapon, and they were taught to use it from early boyhood, their daily food being withheld from the young until they had hit a certain mark pointed out to them. The same writer describes them as an uncivilized race, addicted to piratical habits. The Romans drew from these islands their best slingers. Each Balearian went to battle supplied with three slings. (Flor., l. c.—Id., 3, 22.—Liv., Epit., 60.) The Greeks also called these islands Gymnesia (Γυμνησία), either because, according to Diodorus, the inhabitants were γυμνοί, naked, in summer, or because, according to Hesychius, they went to battle armed only with a sling, γυμνήτες being used in Greek to denote light-armed troops. By many, Ebusus, now Ivica, is ranked with the Baleares, according to the authority of Vitruvius. The larger of these islands was called Balearis Major, hence Majorea, and the smaller Balearis Minor, hence Minorea. In the former was Palma, which still retains the name. In the latter was Portus Magonis, so called by the Carthaginians from Mago, one of their generals, now slightly corrupted into Port Mahon. (Strab., 450.—Diod. Sic., 5, 17.—Pliny, 3, 5.) Q. Cæcilius Metellus conquered these islands for the Romans, and hence obtained the surname of Balearius. They were thereafter considered as forming part of Hispania Tarraconensis. (Flor., 3, 8.)

BALICS, a horse of Achilles. (Hom., Il., 16, 146.) Vid. Achilles.

BALNEA (baths) were very numerous at Rome, private as well as public. It was under Augustus that baths first began to assume an air of magnificence, and were called Thermæ, or "hot baths," although they also contained cold ones. An incredible number of these were built throughout the city. Authors reckon above 800, many of them built by the emperors with the greatest splendour. The chief were those of Agrippa, near the Pantheon, of Nero, of Titus, of Domitian, of Caracalla, Antoninus, Dioclesian, &c. Of these splendid vestiges still remain. The Romans began their bathing with hot water, and ended with cold. The cold bath was in great repute after Antoninus Musa restored Augustus to health by its means, when he was attacked by a dangerous malady; but it fell into discredit after the death of the young Marcellus, which was occasioned by the very injudicious application of the same remedy. (Sueton., Aug., 59.—Id. ib., 81.—Plin., 29, 1.—Dio Cass., 63, 30.)—In the magnificent Thermæ erected by the emperors, not only were accommodations provided for hundreds of bathers at once, but spacious porticoes, rooms for athletic games and playing at ball, and halls for the public lectures of philosophers, for rhetoricians and poets, were added one to another, to an extent which has caused them, by a strong figure, to be compared to provinces, and at an expense which could only be supported by the inexhaustible treasures which Rome drew from a conquered world. The general time for bathing was from two o'clock in the afternoon until the dusk of evening, at which time the baths were shut until two o'clock the next afternoon. This practice, however, occasionally varied. Notice was given when the baths were ready by ringing a bell; the people then left the exercise of the sphaeristerium, and hastened to the warm bath, lest the water should cool. Hadrian forbade any one but those who were sick to enter the public baths before two o'clock. Alexander Severus, to gratify the people in their passion for bathing, not only suffered the Thermæ to be opened before break of day, which had never been permitted before, but also furnished the lamps with oil for the convenience of the people. (Adams's Rom. Ant., p. 377, ed. Boyd.)

BANTIA, a town of Apulia, southeast of Venusia. This town derived some interest from the death of the brave Marcellus, who fell in its vicinity, a victim to the stratagem of his more cool and wily antagonist, Hannibal. (Liv., 27, 25.—Plut., Vit. Marcell.—Cic., Tusc. Disp., 1, 37.)

BAPTÆ, I. the priests of Cottyto, the goddess of lewdness. (Vid. Cottyto.) The name is derived from βαπτω, "to tinge" or "dye," from their painting their cheeks, and staining the parts around the eye, like women. They were notorious for the profligacy of their manners. (Juv., Sat., 2, 9, 2)—II. A Greek comedy, written by Eupolis. (Vid. Eupolis.)

BARBARI, a name applied by the Greeks to all nations but their own. The term is derived by Danm from βαρβαρ, but with the ρ inserted, and the initial consonant repeated, in order to express to the ear the harsh pronunciation of a foreigner. Others derive it from the harsh sound βαρ βαρ. We are informed by Drusus, that the Syriac bar means without, extra. The word signified, in general, with the Greeks, no more than foreigner. The Romans sometimes imitate, in this respect, the Grecian usage. Plautus, who introduces Greek characters into his pieces, has Barbaria for Italia, Barbarice urbes for Italæ, and styles Nævius, the Latin poet, poëta Barbarus.—As regards the term Barbarus (Βάρβαρος), it may not be amiss to remark, that, notwithstanding the etymologies already adduced, the true root must very probably be looked for in the language of Egypt. The natives of this country gave the appellation of Barbar to the rude and uncivilized tribes in their vicinity (compare Herodotus, 2, 158); and the Greeks would seem to have borrowed it from them in a similar sense, and with the appendage of a Greek termination. The Sinus Barbaricus occurs on the coast of ancient Africa, a little below the mouth of the Sinus Arabicus, and in this same quarter, extending as far as the promontory of Rhapon, we find a tract of country called Barbaria. (Compare Berkel, ad Steph. Byz., s. v. Βάρβαρος.) So also the root obtained from this quarter was styled Rha Barbaricum (Rhubarb), in contradistinction to the Rha Ponticum, obtained by the commerce of the Euxine. These names, in so remote a part of the ancient world, could never have been more generally applied. They must be traced to Meroë and Egypt. Nor should it be omitted, that this very point furnishes us with an argument for the early communication between the Egyptians and the natives of India. In the oldest Hindu works, the appellation of Barbara (in Sanscrit Varuara) is given to a race in southern Asia who were subdued by Wiswamitra. (Compare Ritter, Erskunde, vol. 1, p. 555, 2d ed.)

BARBARIA, the name given in the Periplus of the Erythræan Sea to a part of the coast of Africa; now

Ajan. It was otherwise called Azania. (Vid. remarks under the article Barbari.)

BARBARICUS SINUS, a gulf on the coast of Africa, below the mouth of the Sinus Arabicus. (Vid. remarks under the article Barbari.)

BARCÆI or BARCITÆ, a warlike nation of Africa, in the western part of Cyrenæa. (Virg., Æn., 4, 43.—Strab., 7, 28.—Æn., Poliorect., c. 37.)

BARCÆ, the nurse of Sichæus. (Virg., Æn., 4, 632.)

BARCÆ or BARCA, I. a desert country, containing only a few fertile spots, on the northern coast of Africa, from the Syrtis Major as far as Egypt. Its modern name is still Barca. The country is at present a Turkish province, under a sandgiak in the town of Barca. The ancient Cyrenæa formed, strictly speaking, a part of this region.—II. A city of Cyrenæa in Africa, erroneously confounded with Ptolemais by many writers, both ancient and modern. Mamert, Thinge, and others have fully refuted this erroneous position; and the matter is now placed beyond all doubt by the ocular testimony of Della Cella and Pachio. (Voyage dans la Marmarique et la Cyrénaique, par Pachio, p. 175.) According to Herodotus (4, 160), the city of Barca was founded by the brothers of Arcesilaus, the fourth king of Cyrene; while, on the other hand, Stephanus Byzantinus makes it to have been built by Perseus, Zacynthus, Aristomedon, and Lycus. These two contradictory traditions are perhaps only so in reality, since the founders named by Stephanus may be none other than the brothers of Arcesilaus to whom Herodotus alludes. St. Jerome affirms (Epist. ad Dardan.), that Barca was the ancient capital of a Libyan tribe. From this latter authority and some others, the opinion has been formed, and perhaps correctly enough, that the Greeks were not the founders of Barca, but only enlarged it by a colony, and that the place was of Libyan origin. (Compare Pachio, Voyage, &c., p. 176.) Barca suffered severely for the death of Arcesilaus IV., of Cyrene, who was slain here, and the cruelties inflicted by Pheretima are mentioned by Herodotus (4, 162). The Barcæan captives were sent to Egypt, and from thence to King Darius, and by his command were settled in a district of Bactria, which they afterward called by the name of their native country. (Herodot., 4, 204.) A more severe blow, however, was struck by the Ptolemies in a later age, when they became masters of Pentapolis or Cyrenæa. They founded a new city on the spot where the port of Barca had stood, and called it Ptolemais. The increase of this place caused the city of Barca to decline, and its inhabitants became at length only noted for their robberies. III. A district of Bactria, where the Barcæan captives were settled by Darius. (Vid. No. II.)

BARCIA, the surname of a noble family at Carthage, to which Annibal and Amilcar belonged. They became, by their influence, the head of a powerful party in the state, known as the "Barcea party." (Liv., 21, 2.) The name is derived by Gesenius from the Hebrew (Punic) Barak, "a flash of lightning," "a thunderbolt." (Gesen., Monum. Phœn., p. 403.—Id., Gesch. Hebr. Spr., p. 229.)

BARDI, a celebrated poetico-sacerdotal order among the ancient Gauls. They roused their countrymen to martial fury by their strains, and for this purpose were accustomed to follow the camp. (Diod. Sic., 5, 31.—Valer., ad Amm. Marcell., 15, 9.) From the language of Tacitus (Germ., 3), some have supposed, that a similar order existed among the ancient Germans. The passage in question, however, involves a doubtful reading. They who adopt barditus as the true lection, make it signify "a bard's song." The reading generally adopted, however, is barritus, "a war-cry." Probability, nevertheless, is strongly in favour of the Germans having also had their bards, like the Gallic tribes. Festus makes Bardus equivalent to cantor, "a singer." The German etymologists deduce it from baren, "to cry aloud," "to sing in a loud strain." (Adelung, Gloss. Med. et Inf. Lat., vol. 1, p. 584.)

BARIIUM, a town of Apulia, on the Adriatic, in the district of Peucetii, famed for its fisheries. It is now Bari. (Strab., 283.—Horat., Serm., 1, 5, 97.) According to Tacitus, it was a municipium. (Ann., 16, 9.)

BARSINE or BARSÈNE, a daughter of Darius Codomanus, who married Alexander the Great, and had by him a son named Hercules. She was secretly put to death by Cassander, along with her son, when the latter had reached his fourteenth year. (Justin, 15, 2.) According, however, to Diodorus Siculus (20, 28), he was slain by Polysperchon, who had agreed with Cassander that he would commit the deed. Plutarch says that Polysperchon promised to slay him for 100 talents. (De vit. pud., p. 530.—Op., ed. Riske, vol. 8, p. 102.—Consult Wesseling, ad Diod., l. c.) We have followed Arrian (7, 1) in making Barsine the daughter of Darius. According to Plutarch (vit. Alex., et Eum.), she was the daughter of Artabazus; while another authority makes her father to have been named Pharnabazus. (Porph., ap. Euseb.)

BASILIA, I. an island famous for its amber, in the Northern Ocean. It is supposed by Mannert to have been the southern extremity of Sueden, mistaken by the ancients for an island, on account of their ignorance of the country to the north. According to Pliny (37, 2), Pytheas gave this island the name of Ahalus; and yet, in another place (4, 13), he contradicts himself, and makes it to have been called Basilia by the same Pytheas. (Compare the remarks of Mannert, Geogr., vol. 3, p. 301, seqq.)—II. A city on the Rhenus, in the territory of the Rauraci, now Baste. It appears to have been originally a fortress erected by the Emperor Valentinian, and to have increased in the course of time to a large city. By the writers of the middle ages it is called Basula. (Amm. Marcell., 30, 8.—Itin. Anton.)

BASILIVS, I. an eminent father of the church, born at Cæsarea in Cappadocia, A.D. 326. He is called the Great, to distinguish him from other patriarchs of the same name. His father had him instructed in the principles of polite literature, and he seems, in the first instance, to have been a professor of rhetoric and a pleader. Induced to visit the monasteries in the deserts of Egypt, the austerities of these misguided solitaires so impressed his imagination, that he himself sought a similar retreat in the province of Pontus. He was ordained priest by Eusebius, the bishop of his native city, upon whose death he succeeded to the same dignity. He is the most distinguished ecclesiastic among the Greek patriarchs. His efforts for the regulation of clerical discipline, of the divine service, and of the standing of the clergy; the number of his sermons; the success of his mild treatment of the Arians; and, above all, his endeavours for the promotion of monastic life, for which he himself prepared vows and rules, observed by him, and still remaining in force, prove the merits of this holy man. The Greek church honours him as one of its most illustrious patron saints, and celebrates his festival Jan. 1.—In point of literary and intellectual qualifications, Basil excels most of the fathers, his style being pure, elegant, and dignified; and, independently of his extensive erudition, he argues with more force and closeness, and interprets scripture more naturally, than other writers of his class.—The best edition of his works is that of the Benedictines, Garnier and Morand, Paris, 3 vols. folio, 1721–30.—II. An archbishop of Seleucia, confounded by some with the preceding. He was elevated to the archiepiscopal dignity about A.D. 440, and assisted at the council of Constantinople in 448, and in the year following at the council of Ephesus. Here he had the weakness to side with the heterodox party, in denying the union of the two natures in Christ; a fault for which he afterward made full apology to the council of Chalcedon, which, in consequence, readmitted him to the communion of the orthodox. History preserves silence respecting the rest of his life, which ended in 458 A.D. Some few productions remain that are generally ascribed to him, though there are not wanting those who deny their authenticity. (Biogr. Univ., vol. 3, p. 478.)

BASSAREUS, a surname of Bacchus. The epithet is derived by Sainte-Croix (Mysteres du Paganisme, vol. 2, p. 93) from the Bessi (Βησσοί) mentioned by Herodotus (7, 111) as the priests of the oracle of Bacchus, among the Satrae, a nation of Thrace. Other etymologists deduce the term from Βασσαρίς, a particular kind of garment worn in Asia Minor by the females who celebrated the rites of this same god. Bochart makes it come from the Hebrew basar, "to gather the grapes for the vintage;" of which De Sacy approves. We are inclined, however, to follow Creuzer (Symbolik, vol. 3, p. 363), who states the root to be Βάσσοτος or Βασσαρία, a word signifying "a fox," and found in the Coptic at the present day. (Ignat. Rossi, Etymol. Egypt., p. 35.) Creuzer thinks, that the garment called Βασσαρίς, mentioned above, derived its name from its having superseded the skins of foxes which the Bacchantes previously wore when celebrating the orgies. Compare Suidas: Βάσσαρος ἡ ἄλσπις, κατὰ Ἡρόδοτον. Hesychius, Βασσαρίς ἡ ἄλσπις, and the author of the Etymol. Mag., λέγεται Βάσσαρος ἡ ἄλσπις ὑπὸ Κυρηναίων. Consult also Herodotus (4, 192). The epithet Βάσσαρος occurs twice in the Orphic hymns (44, 3, and 51, 12.)

BASSUS AUFIDIUS. Vid. Aufidius.

BASTARNÆ, a people who first inhabited that part of European Sarmatia which corresponds with a part of Poland and Prussia, and who afterward established themselves in the south, to the left and right of the Tyras. They are supposed to have been the ancestors of the Russians. (Liv., 40, 58.—Ovid, Trist., 2, 198.)

BATÄVI, an old German nation, which inhabited a part of the present Holland, especially the island called Batavorum Insula, formed by that branch of the Rhine which empties into the sea near Leyden (Lugdunum Batavorum), together with the Waal (Vahalus) and Meuse (Mosa). Their territories, however, extended much beyond the Waal. Tacitus commends their bravery. According to him, they were originally the same as the Catti, a German tribe, which had emigrated from their country on account of domestic troubles. This must have happened before the time of Cæsar. When Germanicus was about to invade Germany from the sea, he made their island the rendezvous of his fleet. Being subjected by the Romans, they served them with such courage and fidelity as to obtain the title of friends and brethren. They were exempted from tributes and taxes, and permitted to choose their leaders among themselves. Their cavalry was particularly excellent. During the reign of Vespasian they revolted, under the command of Civilis, from the Romans, and extorted from them favourable terms of peace. Trajan and Hadrian subjected them again. At the end of the third century the Salian Franks obtained possession of the Insula Batavorum. The capital of the nation was Lugdunum Batavorum, now Leyden. (Tacit., Hist., 4, 12.—Id. ib., 19, 32.—Dio Cass., 55, 00.—Phin., 4, 17.—Lucan, Phars., 1, 431, &c.)

BATHYCLES, a celebrated artist, supposed to have been a native of Magnesia on the Mæander. (Heyne, Antiq. Aufss., vol. 1, p. 108.) The period when he flourished has given rise to much discussion. It was probably in the age of Cræsus. (Consult Sillig, Dict. Art., s. v.)

BATHYLLUS, I. a youth of Samos, a favourite of Polycrates. He is often alluded to by Anacreon.—II. A youth of Alexandria, a favourite of Mæcenæus. He came to Rome in the age of Augustus, and obtained great celebrity as a dancer in pantomimes.—III. A dancer alluded to by Juvenal (6. 63). As this was in the time of Domitian, the Bathyllus mentioned under No. II. cannot, of course, be meant here. Salmasius thinks, that the name had become a general one for any famous dancer, in consequence of the skill that had been displayed by the Bathyllus who lived in the time of Augustus. (Salmas. ad Vopisc. Carin., vol. 2, p. 833, ed. Hack.)

BATRACHOMACHIA, a serio-comic poem, ascribed to Homer, and describing the battle between the frogs and mice. It consists of 294 hexameters. Whether Homer actually wrote this poem or not is still an unsettled point among modern critics. The majority, however, incline to the opinion that he was not the author. The piece would seem to be in reality a parody on the manner and language of Homer, and perhaps a satire upon one of the feuds that were so common among the petty republics of Greece. Some ascribe it to Pigres of Caria. Knight, in his Prolegomena to Homer (ed. Lips., p. 6), remarks, that in the third verse mention is made of tablets (δέλτοι), on which the poet writes: whence he concludes that the author of the piece in question was an Athenian, and not of Asiatic origin, because in Asia they wrote on skins, ἐν δελφαις. In proof of his assertion, he cites Herodotus (5, 58). He makes also another ingenious observation. At verse 291, the morning cry of a cock is alluded to as a thing generally known. This circumstance proves, according to Knight, that the poem under consideration is not as old as the time of Homer, for it is not credible, that the ancient poets would never have spoken of this instinct on the part of the cock if it had been known to them, and it would have been known to them if the cock had been found at that period in Greece. This fowl is a native of India, and does not appear to have been introduced into Greece prior to the sixth century B.C. It is then found on the money of Samothrace and Himera.—The best editions of the Batrachomyomachia are that of Ernesti, in the works of Homer, 5 vols. 8vo, Lips., 1759, reprinted at Glasgow, 1814; and that of Matthiæ, Lips., 1805, 8vo.—There is also the edition of Maittaire, 8vo, Lond., 1721.

BATTIÆDES, I. a patronymic of Callimachus, from his father Battus. (Orud. Ib., 53.) Some think the name was given him from his having been a native of Cyrene. (Vid. No. II.)—II. A name given to the people of Cyrene from King Battus, the founder of the settlement. (Pind., Pyth., 5, 73.—Callim., H. in Apoll., 96.—Sil. Ital., 2, 61.)

BATTUS, I. a Lacedæmonian, who built the town of Cyrene, B.C. 630, with a colony from the island of Thera. (Vid. Cyrene.) His proper name was Aristotle, according to Callimachus (H. in Apoll., 76.—Schol. ad loc.—Schol. ad Pind., Pyth., 4, 10), but he was called Battus, according to the tradition of the Theraeans and people of Cyrene, from an impediment in his speech. Herodotus, however (4, 155), opposes this explanation, and conjectures that the name was obtained from the Libyan tongue, where it signified, as he informs us, "a king." Battus reigned forty years, and left the kingdom to his son Arcepsilaus. (Herod., 4, 159.—Compare Bähr, ad Herod., 4, 155.)—II. The second of that name was grandson to Battus I., by Arcepsilaus. He succeeded his father on the throne of Cyrene, and was surnamed Felix, and died 554 B.C. (Herod., 4, 159.)—III. A shepherd of Pylus, who promised Mercury that he would not discover his having stolen the flocks of Admetus, which Apollo tended. He violated his promise, and was turned into a stone. (Orud. Met., 2, 702.—Compare the remarks of Gierig, ad loc.)

BATŪLUM, a town of Campania, alluded to by Virgil (Æn., 7, 739) and Silius Italicus (8, 566). The site of this place is fixed, with some diffidence, by Romanelli at Paduli, a few miles to the east of Benevento (vol. 2, p. 463).

BATŪS, an aged woman, who dwelt in a small town of Phrygia along with her husband Philemon. They were both extremely poor, and inhabited a humble cottage. Jupiter and Mercury came, on one occasion, in the form of men, to this same town. It was evening; they sought for hospitality, but every door was closed against them. At length they approached the abode of the aged pair, by whom they were gladly received. The quality of the guests was eventually revealed by the miracle of the wine-bowl being spontaneously replenished as fast as it was drained. They told their hosts that it was their intention to destroy the godless town, and desired them to leave their dwelling and ascend the adjacent hill. The aged couple obeyed: ere they reached the summit they turned round to look, and beheld a lake where the town had stood. Their own house remained, and, as they gazed and deplored the fate of their neighbours, it became a temple. On being desired by Jupiter to express their wishes, they prayed that they might be appointed to officiate in that temple, and that they might be united in death as in life. Their prayer was granted; and as they were one day standing before the temple, they were suddenly changed into an oak and a lime tree. (Orud. Met., 8, 620.)—The reader will not fail to be struck with the resemblance between a part of this legend and the scripture account of the destruction of the cities of the plains. (Keightley's Mythology, p. 83.)

BAVIUS and MÆVIUS, two stupid and malevolent poets in the age of Augustus, who attacked Virgil, Horace, and others of their contemporaries. (Virg., Eclog., 3, 90.—Voss, ad loc.—Serv. ad Virg., Georg., 1, 210.—Horat., Epod., 10, 2.—Weichert, de oblect. Horatii, p. 12, seqq.)

BEERYCES, the aboriginal inhabitants of Bithynia. (Vid. Bithynia.)

BEERYCIA, the primitive name of Bithynia. It was so called from the Beeryces, the original inhabitants of the land. (Vid. Bithynia.)

BEBRICIUM, a small town of Italy, between Mantua and Cremona; according to Cluverius, it is the modern Caneto, a large village on the left of the Oglio. D'Anville, however, makes it correspond to the modern Cividale, on the right side of that river. Mannert places it about a mile west of the modern town of Bozzolo. This place was famous for two battles fought within a month of each other. In the first Otho was defeated by the generals of Vitellius; and in the second, Vitellius by Vespasian, A.D. 69. Tacitus and Suetonius call the name of this place Betricium; and Pliny, Juvenal, and later writers, Bebricum. (Tacit., Hist., 2, 23, seqq.—Id., Hist., 3, 15.—Plut., Vit. Oth.—Plin., 10, 49.—Sueton., Oth., 9.—Cramer's Anc. Italy, vol. 1, p. 66.)

BELESIS, a priest of Babylon, who conspired with Arbaces against Sardanapalus, king of Assyria. Arbaces promised Belesis, in case of success, the government of Babylon, which the latter, after the overthrow of Sardanapalus, accordingly obtained. (Vid. Arbaces.)

BELGÆ, a warlike people of ancient Gaul, separated from the Celtae in the time of Cæsar by the rivers Matrona and Sequana. In the new division of Gallia made by Augustus, whose object was to render the provinces more equal in extent, the countries of the Helvetii and Sequani, which till that time were included in Gallia Celtica, were added to Gallia Bel-gica. The Belgæ were of German extraction, and, according to Cæsar, the most warlike of the Gauls. The name Belgæ belongs to the Kymric idiom, in which, under the form Belgiadd, the radical of which is Belg, it signifies "warlike." (Compare Thierry, Histoire des Gaulois, vol. 1, p. xxxvii., Introd.)

BELGICA, one of the four provinces of Gaul near the Rhine. (Vid. Gallia.)

BELGIUM, a canton of Gallia Belgica, from which it is distinguished by Cæsar (B. G., 5, 24), as a part from the whole, and to which he assigns the Bellovaci, to whom Hirtius adds the Atrebatæ. As the Ambiani were situated between the other two, they must also be included. These three tribes were the genuine Belgæ. (Cæs., B. G., 5, 24.—Hirt., 8, 46.)

BELIDES, a surname given to the daughters of Belus. (Ovid, Met., 4, 463.)

BELIDES, a name applied to Palamedes, as descended from Belus. (Virg., Æn., 2, 82.)

BELISANA, a Gallic deity, analogous to the Minerva of the Romans. (Compare Mone, Geschichte der Heidenthums im Nordlichen Europa, vol. 2, p. 419, in notis.)

BELISARIUS, one of the greatest generals of his time, to whom the Emperor Justinian chiefly owed the splendour of his reign. Sprung from an obscure family in Thrace, Belisarius first served in the body-guard of the emperor, but soon obtained the chief command of an army of 25,000 men, stationed on the Persian frontiers, and, A.D. 530, gained a complete victory over a Persian army not less than 40,000 strong. The next year, however, he lost a battle against the same enemy, who had forced their way into Syria; the only battle which he lost during his whole career. He was recalled from the army, and soon became, at home, the support of his master. In the year 532, civil commotions, proceeding from two rival parties, who called themselves the green and the blue, and who caused great disorders in Constantinople, brought the life and reign of Justinian in the utmost peril, and Hypatius was already chosen emperor, when Belisarius, with a small body of faithful adherents, restored order. Justinian, with a view of conquering the dominions of Gelimer, king of the Vandals, sent Belisarius, with an army of 15,000 men, to Africa. After two victories, he secured the person and the treasures of the Vandal king. Gelimer was led in triumph through the streets of Constantinople, and Justinian ordered a medal to be struck, with the inscription Belisarius Gloria Romanorum, which has descended to our times. By the dissensions existing in the royal family of the Ostrogoths in Italy, Justinian was induced to attempt the reduction of Italy and Rome under his sceptre. Belisarius vanquished Vitiges, king of the Goths, made him prisoner at Ravenna (A.D. 540), and conducted him, together with many other Goths, to Constantinople. The war in Italy against the Goths continued; but Belisarius, not being sufficiently supplied with money and troops by the emperor, demanded his recall (A.D. 548). He afterward commanded in the war against the Bulgarians, whom he conquered in the year 559. Upon his return to Constantinople, he was accused of having taken part in a conspiracy. But Justinian was convinced of his innocence, and is said to have restored to him his property and dignities, of which he had been deprived. Belisarius died A.D. 565. His history has been much coloured by the poets, and particularly by Marmontel, in his otherwise admirable politico-philosophical romance. According to his narrative, the emperor caused the eyes of the hero to be struck out, and Belisarius was compelled to beg his bread in the streets of Constantinople. Other writers say, that Justinian had him thrown into a prison, which is still shown under the appellation of the tower of Belisarius. From this tower he is reported to have let down a bag fastened to a rope, and to have addressed the passengers in these words: "Give an obolus to Belisarius, whom virtue exalted, and envy has oppressed." Of this, however, no contemporary writer makes any mention. Tzetzes, a slightly-esteemed writer of the 12th century, was the first who related this fable. Certain it is, that, through too great indulgence towards his wife Antonia, Belisarius was impelled to many acts of injustice, and that he evinced a servile submissiveness to the detestable Theodora, the wife of Justinian. BELLEROPHON (Greek form BELLEROPHONTES), son of Glaucus and grandson of Sisyphus. His adventures form a pleasing episode in the Iliad (6, 144, seqq.), where they are related to Diomedes by Glaucus the grandson of Bellerophon. The gods had endowed this hero with manly vigour and beauty. Antea, the wife of Prætus, king of Argos, fixed her love upon him, and sought a corresponding return. But the virtuous youth rejecting all her advances, hate occupied the place of love in the bosom of the disappointed queen. She accused him to Prætus of an attempt on her honour. The credulous king gave ear to her falsehood, but would not incur the reproach of putting to death a guest. He therefore sent Bellerophon to Lycia, to his father-in-law, the king of that country, giving him "deadly characters," written in a sealed package, which he was to present to the king of Lycia, and which were to cause his death. Beneath the potent guidance of the gods, Bellerophon came to Lycia and the flowing Xanthus. Nine days the king entertained him, and slew nine oxen; and on the tenth he asked to see the token (σῆμα) which he had received from his son-in-law. When he had seen this, he resolved to comply with the desire of Prætus; and he first sent his guest to slay the Chimæra, a monster, with the upper part a lion, the lower a serpent, the middle a goat (χίμαιρα), and which breathed forth flaming fire. Depending on the aid of the gods, Bellerophon slew this monster, and then was ordered to go and fight the Solymi, and this, he said, was the severest combat he ever fought. He lastly slew the "manlike Amazons," and, as he was returning, the king laid an ambush for him, composed of the bravest men of Lycia, of whom not one returned home, for Bellerophon slew them all. The king, now perceiving him to be of the race of the gods, kept him in Lycia, giving him his daughter and half the royal dignity, and the people bestowed upon him an ample temenos (τέμενος) of arable and plantation land. Falling at length under the displeasure of all the gods, he wandered alone in "the Plain of Wandering" (πεδίον ἀλγίων), "consuming his soul, shunning the path of men."—Later authorities tell us, that Bellerophon was at first named Hippionōs; but, having accidentally killed one of his relatives, some say a brother, named Bellerus, he thence derived his second name, which meant "Slayer of Bellerus." He was purified of the bloodshed by Prætus, whose wife is also called Sthenobæa, and the king of Lycia is named Iobates. By the aid of the winged steed Pegasus, Bellerophon gained the victory over all whom Iobates sent him to encounter. Sthenobæa, hearing of his success, hung herself. Bellerophon at last attempted, by means of Pegasus, to ascend to heaven; but Jupiter, incensed at his boldness, sent an insect to sting the steed, which flung its rider to earth, where he wandered in solitude and melancholy until his death. (Apollod., 2, 3, 1, seqq.—Pind., Isthm., 7, 63, seqq.—Hygin., fab., 57.—Id., Pœt. Astron., 2, 18.—Schol. ad Il., 6, 155.—Tzet., ad Lycophr., 17.)—Though Homer makes no mention of Pegasus, this steed forms an essential part of the legend of Bellerophon. In the Theogony (v. 325) it is said of the Chimæra, that she was killed by Pegasus and the "good" (εὐστός),

i. e., brave Bellerophon. But though all seem agreed in giving the winged steed to the hero, none tell us how he obtained him. Here, however, Pindar comes to our aid with a very remarkable legend, which connects Bellerophon with Corinth. According to this poet (Ol., 13, 85, seqq.), Bellerophon, who reigned at Corinth, being about to undertake the three adventures mentioned above, wished to possess the winged steed Pegasus, who used to come to drink at the fountain of Pirene on the Acrocorinthus. After many fruitless efforts to catch him, he applied for advice to the sooth-sayer Polyeidus, and was directed by him to go and sleep at the altar of Minerva. He obeyed the prophet, and, in the dead of the night, the goddess appeared to him in a dream, and, giving him a bridle, bade him sacrifice a bull to his sire Neptune-Damæus (the Tamer) and present the bridle to the steed. On awaking, Bellerophon found the bridle lying beside him. He obeyed the injunctions of the goddess, and raised an altar to herself as Hippeia (Of-the-Horse). Pegasus at once yielded his mouth to the magic bit, and the hero, mounting him, achieved his adventures.—The best explanation that has been given of the myth of Bellerophon is that which sees in this individual only one of the forms of Neptune, namely, as Hippius (Equesteris). This god is his father (Pind., ut sup., 99), and he is the sire of Pegasus, and in the two combined we have a Neptune Hippius, the rider of the waves, a symbol of the navigation of the ancient Ephyra or Corinth. The adventures of the hero may have signified the real or imaginary perils to be encountered in voyages to distant countries; and, when the original sense of the myth was lost, the King (Proetus, πρότος), and his Pœ (Antea, ἄντρα), and the common love-tale were introduced, to assign a cause for the adventure. In this myth, too, we find the mysterious connexion between Neptune and Pallas-Minerva and the horse more fully revealed than elsewhere. (Keightley's Mythology, p. 401, seqq.)

BELLERUS, a brother of Hipponoïs. (Vid. Bellerophon.)

BELLŌNA, the goddess of war, daughter of Phoræys and Ceto. (Apollod., 2, 4, 2.) According to some authorities, however, she was the sister of Mars. Others, again, make her his spouse. The earlier form of her Latin name, Bellona, was Duellona, from Duellum, the old form for bellum, from which last the later appellation of Bellona arose. Her Greek name was Enyo (Ἔνυ). The temple of Bellona at Rome was without the city, near the Carmental gate. Audience was given there by the senate to foreign ambassadors. Before it stood a pillar, over which a spear was thrown on the declaration of war against any people. (Oril. Fast., 6, 199, seqq.) The priests of Bellona used to gash their thighs in a terrific manner, and offer to her the blood which flowed from the wounds. (Juv., 4, 124.—Varro, L. L., 5.—Virg., Æn., 8, 703.—Stat., Theb., 2, 718.—Id. ib., 7, 73.)

BELLONARI, the priests of Bellona.

BELLŌVÆI, a numerous and powerful tribe of the Belgæ, adjoining the Vellocasses, Calæti, Ambiani, Veromandui, and Silvanectes. They correspond in position to the present people of Beaurais. (Cæs., Bel., 2, 4.)

BELLOVÆSUS, a king of the Celtæ, who, in the reign of Tarchinius Priscus, was sent at the head of a colony to Italy by his uncle Ambigatus. (Liv., 5, 34.)

BELON, I. a city and river of Hispania Bætica, the usual place of embarkation for Tingis in Africa. The modern name Balonia marks the spot, though now uninhabited. The name is sometimes written Bælon. (Mannert, Geogr., vol. 1, p. 301.)—II. A small stream to the west of the city of Belon just named. It answers to that which flows at the present day from the Laguna de la Ianda into the sea. (Mannert, l. c.)

BELUS, I. a name given to several kings of the East, whose existence appears extremely doubtful. The most ancient is Belus, king of Assyria, father of Ninus, whose epoch it is impossible to determine.—II. A son of Libya, and father of Ægyptus, Danaus, and Cepheus. He is fabled to have reigned in Phœnicia, 1500 B.C.—III. A king of Lydia, father of Ninus. (Herod., 1, 7.)—The Belus of Assyria, or the remote East, is thought by some to be the same with the Great Bali of Hindu mythology (Bartolomeo, Viaggio alle Indie Orientali, p. 241), as well as the Baal of Oriental worship. A curious analogy in form is said to exist between the temple of Belus, as described by the ancient writers (vid. Babylon), and the Mexican Teocallis or pyramid-temples, especially that of Cholula. (Consult, on this interesting subject, the remarks of Humboldt, Monuments Americains, vol. 1, p. 117, seqq.)

BENĀCUS, a lake of Italy, from which the Mincius flows into the Po. Pliny (9, 22) makes this lake to be formed by the Mincius. It is stated by Strabo (209), on the authority of Polybius, to be 500 stadia long and 150 broad; that is, 62 miles by 18: but the real dimensions, according to the best maps, do not appear to exceed 30 modern Italian miles in length, and 9 in breadth; which, according to the ancient Roman scale, would be nearly 35 by 12. The modern name is Lago di Garda, and the appellation is derived from the small town of Garda on the northeast shore of the lake. The Benacus is twice noticed by Virgil. (Georg., 2, 153.—Æn., 10, 204.) Its principal promontory, Sirmium, has been commemorated by Catullus as his favourite residence. Virgil speaks of it as subject to sudden storms. (Georg., 2, 160.) In explanation of this, compare the following remarks of Eustace: "We left Sirmione (Sirmium), and, lighted by the moon, glided smoothly over the lake to Desensa-no, four miles distant, where, about eight, we stepped from the boat into a very good inn. So far the appearance of the Benacus was very different from the description which Virgil has given of its stormy character. Before we retired to rest, about midnight, from our windows, we observed it still calm and untroubled. About three in the morning, I was roused from sleep by the door and windows bursting open at once, and the wind roaring round the room. I started up, and, looking out, observed by the light of the moon the lake in the most dreadful agitation, and the waves dashing against the walls of the inn, and resembling the swelling of the ocean more than the petty agitation of inland waters. Shortly after, the landlord entered with a lantern, closed the outward shutters, expressed some apprehensions, but, at the same time, assured me that their house was built to resist such sudden tempests, and that I might repose with confidence under a roof which had withstood full many a storm as terrible as that which occasioned our present alarm. Next morning, the lake, so tranquil and serene the evening before, presented a surface covered with foam, and swelling into mountain-billows that burst in breakers every instant at the very door of the inn, and covered the whole house with spray. Virgil's description now seemed nature itself." (Classical Tour, vol. 1, p. 203, seqq.)

BENDIS, the name of a Thracian goddess, the same with Diana or Artemis. (Compare Ruhnken, ad Tim., p. 62.—Fischer, Index in Palæphat., s. v. Bérédicia.) This name, and the festival of this deity, spread even to Attica and Bithynia. Bendis had a temple in the Munychium at Athens, and a festival, called Bendideia, was celebrated in honour of her at the Piræus. (Creuzer, Symbolik, vol. 2, p. 129, seqq.)

BENEVENTUM, a city of Samnium, about ten miles beyond Caudium, on the Apian Way. (Strabo, 249.) Its more ancient name, as we are informed by several writers, was Maleventum. (Liv., 9, 27.—Plin., 3, 11.—Festus, s. v. Benevent.) The name of Malcoven- tum is said to have been given it on account of its unhealthy atmosphere. The more auspicious appellation of Beneventum was substituted when the Romans sent a colony thither (A.U.C. 483). Tradition ascribed the foundation of this city to Diomedes (Solinus, c. 8.—Steph. Byz., s. v.), but other accounts would lead us to believe that it was first possessed by the Ausones. (Festus, s. v. Auson.) It remained in the possession of the Romans during the whole of the second Punic war, and obtained the thanks of the senate for its firm attachment to the republic at that critical period. (Liv., 27, 10.) We subsequently hear of its being a second time colonized by the veteran soldiers of Augustus, and also a third time under Nero. (Front. de Col.—Compare Tacitus, Ann., 15, 34.—Ptol., p. 66.) The account which Horace gives of the fare he there met with in his journey to Brundisium, will occur to every reader. Beneventum was situated near the junction of the Sabatus and Calor, now Sabbato and Calore. Its position was a very important one, since here the main roads intersected each other from Latium into Southern Italy, and from Samnium into Campania. Under the Lombards Beneventum became the capital of a powerful dukedom. It abounds in remains of ancient sculpture above any other town in Italy. The most beautiful relic of former days, at this place, is the arch of Trajan, which forms one of the entrances into the city. Near Beneventum Pyrrhus was defeated by Dentatus, A.U.C. 479. It is now Benevento. (Cramer's Ancient Italy, vol. 2, p. 246.—Munnert, Geogr., vol. 9, pt. 1, p. 791, seqq.)

BERECYNTIA, a surname of Cybele, from Mount Berecynthus in Phrygia, where she was particularly worshipped. (Stat., Theb., 4, 782.—Virg., Æn., 9, 82.)

BERECYNTHI, a Phrygian tribe, celebrated by the poets in connexion with Cybele, so often styled "Berecynthia Mater." Pliny places the Berecynthian district on the borders of Caria, about the Glaucus and Mæander. (Plin., 5, 29.)

BERECYNTHUS, a mountain in Phrygia Major, on the banks of the river Sangarius. It was sacred to Cybele, who is hence styled Berecynthia Mater, "The Berecynthian mother." (Serv., ad Æn., 9, 82.)

BERENICE (less correctly BERONICE), a name common to several females of antiquity. It is of Greek origin, and means "victory-bringing," or "bearer of victory," the initial β being written, according to Macedonian usage, for the letter ϕ , or, in other words, Berevinkh being put for Φερεvinkh, just as the Macedonians said Βιλππος for Φιλππος. (Maittaire, Dial., p. 184, cd. Sturz)—The most remarkable of this name were the following: I. the granddaughter of Cassander, brother of Antipater. She married Philip, a Macedonian, probably one of the officers of Alexander, and became by him the mother of many children, among whom were Magas, king of Cyrene, and Antigone, whom she married to Pyrrhus, king of Epirus. She followed into Egypt Eurydice, daughter of Antipater, who returned to that country to rejoin her husband Ptolemy I. Berenice inspired this prince with so strong a passion that he put away Eurydice, although he had children by her, and married the former. He also gave the preference, in the succession to the throne, to her son Ptolemy, notwithstanding the better claims of his offspring by Eurydice. Berenice was remarkable for her beauty, and her portrait often appears on the medals of Ptolemy I., along with that of the latter.—II. Daughter of Ptolemy Philadelphus and Arsinoë. She followed her mother into exile, and retired with her to the court of Magas, at Cyrene, who married Arsinoë, and adopted Berenice. This will serve to explain why Polybius and Justin make Berenice to have been the daughter of Magas, while Callimachus gives Ptolemy Philadelphus and Arsinoë as her parents. After the death of Magas, Arsinoë engaged her daughter in marriage to Demetrius, son of

Demetrius Poliorcetes; but, on the young prince's having come from Macedonia to Cyrene, she became attached to him herself. Demetrius, conducting himself insolently, was slain in a conspiracy, at the head of which was Berenice. The latter thereupon married her brother Ptolemy (Euergetes) III. A short time after the nuptials, Ptolemy was obliged to go on an expedition into Syria, and Berenice made a vow that she would consecrate her beautiful head of hair to Venus if her husband returned safe to Egypt. Upon his return she fulfilled her vow in the temple of Venus Zephyrites. On the following day, however, the hair was not to be found. As both the monarch and his queen were greatly disquieted at the loss, Conon the Samaritan, an eminent astronomer of the day, in order to conciliate the royal favour, declared that the locks of Berenice had been removed by divine interposition, and translated to the skies in the form of a constellation. Hence the cluster of stars near the tail of the Lion is called Coma Berenices ("Berenice's hair"). Callimachus wrote a piece on this subject, now lost, but a translation of which into Latin verse by Catullus has reached our time. (Catull., Carm., 66.—Compare Hygin., Poet. Astron., 2, 24.—Doering, ad Catull., l. c.—Heyne, de genio sæculi Ptolemæorum, Opusc., vol. 1, p. 177.) Berenice was put to death B.C. 216, by the orders of Ptolemy Philopator, her son.—III. A daughter of Ptolemy Philadelphus, given by him in marriage to Antiochus Theos, king of Syria, in order to cement a peace between the two countries. After the death of her father, Antiochus put her aside and recalled his former wife Laodice. This last, having taken off Antiochus by poison, sought to destroy Berenice also as well as her son. This son was surprised and carried off by an emissary of Laodice's, and shortly after put to death; and Berenice, in searching for him, was entrapped and slain, B.C. 246.—IV. Called by some authors Cleopatra, was the only legitimate child of Ptolemy Lathurus, and ascended the throne after the death of her father, B.C. 81. Sylla, who was at that time dictator, compelled her to marry, and share her throne with, her cousin, who took the name of Ptolemy Alexander. She was poisoned by the latter only nineteen days after the marriage.—V. Daughter of Ptolemy Auletes. The people of Alexandria having revolted against this prince, B.C. 58, drove him out, and placed upon the throne his two daughters, Tryphena and Berenice. The former died soon after, and Berenice was given in marriage to Seleucus, surnamed Cybiosactes. His personal deformity, however, and vicious character, soon rendered him so odious to the queen, that she caused him to be strangled. Berenice then married Archelaus; but, Ptolemy Auletes having been restored by Gabinius, the Roman commander, she was put to death by her own father, B.C. 55.—VI. A native of Chios, and one of the wives of Mithradates of Pontus. On the overthrow of this monarch's power by Lucullus, Berenice, in obedience to an order from her husband, took poison along with his other wives; but this not proving effectual, she was strangled by the eunuch Bacchus, B.C. 71.—VII. Daughter of Agrippa I., king of Judæa, and born A.D. 28. She was at first affianced to Marcus, son of Alexander; but this young man having died, Agrippa gave her in marriage to his brother Herod, king of Chalcis, by whom she became the mother of two sons, Berenicianus and Hircanus. Having lost her husband when she was at the age of twenty, she went to live with her brother Agrippa, a circumstance which gave rise to reports injurious to her character. To put an end to these rumours, she made proposals to Polemo, king of Cilicia, and offered to become his wife if he would embrace Judaism. Polemo consented, but she soon left him, and returned, in all probability, to her brother, for she was with the latter when St. Paul was arrested at Jerusalem, A.D. 63. The commerce between the guilty pair became now so public, that the rumour even reached Rome, and we find Juvenal alluding to the affair in one of his satires (6, 155). She followed Agrippa when he went to join Vespasian, whom Nero had charged to reduce the Jews to obedience. A new scene now opened for her; she won the affections of Titus, and, at a subsequent period, when Vespasian was established on the throne, and Titus returned home after terminating the Jewish war, she accompanied him to Rome along with her brother Agrippa. At Rome she lived openly with Titus, and took up her abode in the imperial palace, as we learn from Dio Cassius, who states also that she was then in the flower of her age. Titus, it is said, intended even to acknowledge her as his wife; but he was compelled by the murmurs of his subjects to abandon this idea, and he sent her away from the city soon after his accession to the throne. Such, at least, is the account given by Suetonius (Tit. 7), who appears more entitled to belief than Dio Cassius, according to whom Titus sent Berenice away before his accession to the throne, and refused to receive her again, when she had returned to Rome a short time after the commencement of his reign. (Dio Cass. 66, 15 et 18.)—There is a great difficulty attending the history of this Berenice as regards her intimacy with Titus. She must, at least, have been forty-two years of age when she first became acquainted with the Roman prince, and fifty-one years old at the period of the celebrated scene which forms the subject of Racine's tragedy. Many are inclined to believe, therefore, that the Berenice to whom Titus was attached was the daughter of Mariamne and Archelaus, and, consequently, the niece of the Berenice of whom we have been speaking; she would be twenty-five years old when Titus came into Judæa. (Clavier, in Biogr. Univ., vol. 4, p. 241, seqq.)—VIII. A city of Egypt, on the coast of the Sinus Arabicus, from which a road was made across the intervening desert to Coptos on the Nile, by Ptolemy Philadelphus, 258 miles in length. From this harbour the vessels of Egypt took their departure for Arabia Felix and India. It was through the medium of Berenice also, and the caravan route to Coptos, that the principal trade of the Romans with India was conducted. By this line of communication, it is said that a sum not less than what would be now £400,000, was remitted by the Roman traders to their correspondents in the East, in payment of merchandise which ultimately sold for a hundred times as much. (Plin. 6, 23.—Id. 6, 29.—Strab. 560.—Agathemer. 2, 5.) The ruins of the ancient Berenice are found at the modern port of Habest. (Murray, Hist. Account, &c., vol. 2, p. 187.)—IX. A city of Cyrenaica, called also Hesperis. In its vicinity the ancients placed the gardens of the Hesperides. It is now Bengazi, a poor and filthy town. Few traces of the ancient city remain above ground, although much might be brought to light by excavation. "When we reflect," remarks Capt. Beechey, "that Berenice flourished under Justinian, and that its walls underwent a thorough repair in the reign of that emperor, it will be thought somewhat singular, that both the town and its walls should have disappeared so completely as they have done." Of the latter, scarcely a vestige remains above the surface of the plain. (Modern Traveller, part 49, p. 98.)

BERŌE, I. an old woman of Epidaurus, nurse to Semele. Juno assumed her shape, when she persuaded Semele not to receive the visits of Jupiter if he did not appear in the majesty of a god. (Ovid, Met. 3, 278.)—II. The wife of Doryclaus, whose form was assumed by Iris at the instigation of Juno, when she advised the Trojan women to burn the fleet of Æneas in Sicily. (Virg., Æn. 5, 620.)

BERŌA or BERRHŌA, a large and populous city of Macedonia, south of Edessa. It was a place of great antiquity, and is often mentioned by the early writers. Its situation, as is generally agreed, answers to that of the present Kara Veria. Some interesting circumstances respecting Berœa are to be found in the Acts of the Apostles (17, 11.—Cramer's Ancient Greece, vol. 1, p. 232).

BERŌSUS, a Babylonian historian, rendered much more famous by the mention of others than from anything which is known of his own performances. He was priest of the temple of Belus in the time of Alexander, and, having learned the Greek language from the Macedonians, he removed to Greece, and opened a school of astronomy and astrology in the island of Cos, where his productions acquired him great fame with the Athenians. The ancients mention three books of his, relative to the history of the Chaldeans, of which Josephus and Eusebius have preserved fragments. As a priest of Belus, he possessed every advantage which the records of the temple, and the learning and traditions of the Chaldeans, could afford, and seems to have composed his work with a serious regard for truth. Annianus of Viterbo published a work under the name of Berosus, which was soon discovered to be a forgery. (Cory's Ancient Fragments, p. viii., Prof.)

BERŪTUS (Beröth, Ezek. 47, 16.—Βηροῦθι, Joseph., Ant. Jud. 5, 1.—Beröthai, 2 Sam. 8, 8), an ancient town of Phenicia, about twenty-four miles south of Byblus, famous in the age of Justinian for the study of law, and styled by the emperor "the mother and nurse of the laws." The civil law was taught there in Greek, as it was at Rome in Latin. It had also the name of Colonia Felix Julia, from Augustus Cæsar, who made it a Roman colony, and named it in honour of his daughter. (Plin. 5, 20.) The modern appellation is Beirut. The adjacent plain is renowned as the place where St. George, the patron saint of England, slew the dragon; in memory of which, a small chapel was built upon the spot, dedicated at first to that Christian hero, but now changed to a mosque. It was frequently captured and recaptured during the crusades. It is now the seat of one of the most interesting missionary stations in the world, and possesses many important advantages for such a purpose. It is situated on the Mediterranean, at the foot of Mount Lebanon, within three days of Damascus, two days' sail of Cyprus, two from Tyre, and three from Tripoli. Its present population is about 10,000. (For interesting notices of this place, consult Jenett's Researches, vols. 1 and 2.—Life of Rev. Pliny Fisk.—Missionary Herald, &c.)

BESIPPO, a seaport town of Hispania Bætica, east of Junonis Promontorium, where Mela was born. Its ruins lie in the neighbourhood of the modern Porto Barbato. (Philos. Transact., vol. 30, p. 922.) The town of Vejer de la Frontera, which many think represents the ancient Besippo (Hardouin, ad Plin. 3, 3), lies too far from the sea. (Ukert, Geog., vol. 2, p. 343.)

BESSI, a people of Thrace, occupying a district called Bessica, between Mons Rhodope and the northern part of the Hebrus. The Bessi belonged to the powerful nation of the Satra, the only Thracian tribe which had never been subjugated. (Herod. 7, 110.) According to Strabo (318), they were a very lawless and predatory race, and were not conquered finally till the reign of Augustus. (Dio Cass. 54.—Flor. 4, 12.)

BESSUS, a governor of Bactriana, who, after the battle of Arbela, seized Darius, his sovereign, with the intention of carrying him off prisoner to his captivity; but, being hotly pursued by the Macedonians, he left the monarch wounded and dying in the way, and effected his own escape. Being subsequently delivered into the hands of Alexander, that monarch, according to one account (Justin. 12, 5), gave him up for punishment to the brother of Darius. (Compare Curt. 5, 12, seqq.—Id. 7, 5.) Plutarch, however, states, that Alexander himself punished the offender in the following manner: he caused two straight trees to be bent, and one of his legs to be made fast to each; then suffering the trees to return to their former posture, his body was torn asunder by the violence of the recoil. (Plut., Vit. Alex.) Arrian makes Alexander to have caused his nostrils to be slit, the tips of his ears to be cut off, and the offender, after this, to have been sent to Ecbatana, and put to death in the sight of all the inhabitants of the capital of Media. (Arrian, Exp. Al., 4, 7.)

BIANOR, a son of the river-god Tiber, and of Manto daughter of Tiresias. Servius makes him the founder of Mantua, and identical with Ocnus. (Serv. ad Virg., Eclog., 9, 60.—Id. ad En., 10, 198.) The allusion in Virgil's ninth Eclogue is thought to be to this same Bianor, but consult the remarks of Heyne, ad loc.

BIAS, I. son of Amythaon and Idomeneus, was king of Argos, and brother to the famous soothsayer Melampus. (Vid. Melampus.)—II. One of the seven wise men of Greece. He was son of Teutamius, and was born at Priene, in Ionia, about 570 B.C. Bias was a practical philosopher, studied the laws of his country, and employed his knowledge in the service of his friends, defending them in the courts of justice, settling their disputes. He made a noble use of his wealth. His advice, that the Ionians should fly before the victorious Cyrus to Sardinia, was not followed, and the victory of the army of Cyrus confirmed the correctness of his opinion. The inhabitants of Priene, when besieged by Mazares, resolved to abandon the city with their property. On this occasion Bias replied to one of his fellow-citizens, who expressed his astonishment that he made no preparations for his departure, "I carry everything with me." He remained in his native country, where he died at a very advanced age. His countrymen buried him with splendour, and honoured his memory. Some of his apophthegms are still preserved. (Biogr. Univ., vol. 4, p. 455.—Encyclop. Americ., vol. 2, p. 89, seq.)

BIBACULUS (M. Furius), a Latin poet, born at Cremona about 103 B.C. He appears to have composed a turgid poem entitled Æthiopia, on the legend, very probably, of the Æthiopian Menmon; and also another on the mouths of the Rhine. This last is thought to have formed part of an epic poem on Cæsar's wars in Gaul. (Burmans, Anthol. Lat., lib. 2, ep. 238.) Both works are lost, and we have only a couple of fragments remaining. (Bähr, Gesch. Röm. Lit., vol. 1, p. 124.) Horace (Serm., 2, 5, 40) ridicules a laughable verse of his, in which Jupiter is represented as spitting snow upon the Alps: "Jupiter hibernas cana nive conspuet Alpes." This line occurred in the beginning of a poem which he had composed on the Gallic war. Quintilian (10, 1, 96) enumerates Bibaculus among the Roman Iambic poets, and, in another part of his work (8, 6, 18), gives this same line, citing it as an instance of harsh metaphor. It is surprising that the critic did not carry his censure farther than this, and therefore Spalding well remarks of the omission, "Debet autem noster sordium quoque incusare hanc metaphoram." To render his parody more severe, Horace substitutes Furius himself for the monarch of the skies, and, to prevent all mistake, applies to the former a laughable species of designation, drawn directly from his personal appearance, "pinguentius omo." "distended with his fat paunch." (Horat., l. c.)

BIBRACTE, a large town of the Ædui in Gaul, upon the Arrois, one of the branches of the Ligeris or Loire. It was afterward called Augustodunum, and is now Aulun. (Cæs., B. G., 7, 55, &c.)

BIBULUS, a son of M. Calpurnius Bibulus, by Portia, Cato's daughter. He was Cæsar's colleague in the consulship, but, finding it impossible to thwart the measures of the former, he retired from public affairs in a great degree, and during eight months (the period that remained for his holding the consulship) contented himself with publishing edicts. This conduct placed his colleague in an odious light, and Cæsar endeavoured, by means of the populace, whom he had excited for this purpose, to force Bibulus to leave his dwelling, and come forth and take an active part in public affairs. The attempt, however, proved unsuccessful. Bibulus was not very conspicuous for military talents. In the war between Cæsar and Pompey, however, he had the chief command of the fleet of the latter. He died at sea in the course of the civil contest. (Biogr. Univ., vol. 4, p. 463.)

BIFRONS, a surname of Janus, because he was represented with two faces. (Vid. Janus)

BILBILIS, I. a city of the Celtiberi, in Hispania Tarraconensis, southeast of Numantia, and southwest of Nertobriga. It lay on the western bank of the river Bilbilis, and was a Roman municipium. The poet Martial was born here. Bilbilis was famed for the temper of the weapons manufactured in it. The ruins of the ancient city lie not far from the modern Calatayud, at a place called Bambola. (Plin., 34, 14.—Mart., 10, 103.—Id., 4, 55.)—II. A river of Hispania Tarraconensis, running by Bilbilis, in the country of the Celtiberi, and falling into the Iberus. It is now the Xalon. Its waters were famous for tempering iron. (Hieron., Paul. de Flum. Hisp.—Martial, 10, 103, et ult.—Justin, 44, 8.)

BIMATER, a surname of Bacchus, which signifies that he had two mothers, because, when taken from his mother's womb, he was placed in the thigh of his father Jupiter. (Ovid, Met., 4, 12.)

BINGIUM, a town of Gaul, in Germania Prima, west of Moguntiacum. It lay upon the Rhine, and is now Bingen. (Tacit., Hist., 4, 70.)

BION, I. a native of Borysthenes, of low extraction. When young he was sold as a slave to an orator, who afterward gave him his freedom, and left him large possessions. Upon this he went to Athens, and applied himself to the study of philosophy. He had several preceptors; but chiefly attached himself to the doctrine of Theodorus, of the Cyrenaic sect, of which he was a professed advocate. He flourished about the 120th Olympiad. (Diog. Laert., 4, 46, seqq.)—II. An Athenian tragic poet, a son of Æschylus.—III. A Greek poet, born near Smyrna, in the district of Phlosa. He appears to have lived in Sicily, and to have died there of poison, as his pupil Moschus informs us in an elegy on his death. Some make him contemporary with Theocritus, while others suppose that he flourished a century later, about 187 B.C. He is ranked, along with Moschus, among the bucolic poets, less on account of the subjects of his pieces, which are for the most part of a lyric or philosophical character, than by reason of the manner in which he treats them. He is far inferior to Theocritus in simplicity and naïveté. His productions are in general too laboured; but in description he succeeds perfectly, and his writings are not wanting in elegance, and in correct and pleasing imagery. There are many good editions of this poet's works, generally printed with those of Moschus, the best of which is that of Valckenaer, Lugd. Bat., 1810, 8vo, reprinted at Oxford in 1816, by Gaisford, in the Poete Minores Græci.

BISALTÆ, a people of Macedonia, situate between the lake Bolbe and the Strymon. They were of Thracian origin. (Herodotus, 7, 115.) Theopompus, who is cited by Steph. Byz. (s. v. Bisaltia), affirmed, that almost all the hares in the country occupied by this people were found to have two livers. (Cramer's Anc. Græce, vol. 1, p. 266.)

BISANTHE, a town on the Propontis, northwest of Perinthus. It was called also Rødestus, and is now Rodosto. (Herod., 7, 137.)

BISTONIS, a lake of Thrace, near Abdera. It derived its name from the Bistones, who inhabited its shores, and held dominion over the surrounding district. (Herod., 7, 110.—Scymn., Ch., 673.)

BITHYNIA, a country of Asia Minor, bounded by the Euxine on the north, on the south by Phrygia and Galatia, on the east by Paphlagonia, and on the west by the Propontis and Mysia. One of the earlier names of this region, more particularly along the shores of the Propontis and Euxine, was Bebyrcia, derived from the Bebyrces, who are said to have been the primitive settlers in the land. Homer nowhere mentions the people of this country by the appellation of Bithynians, but invariably designates them as Mysians and Phrygians. (Il., 2, 862.—Ib., 13, 792.—Strab., 565.) Strabo has also proved, that the Mysians not only occupied the shores of the Lake Ascanius and the plains of Nicæa, but that they extended as far as Chalcedon and the Thracian Bosphorus. (Strab., 566.) Though we cannot precisely fix the period at which the Bithyni settled in the fertile district to which they communicated their name, we can have no doubt as to the country whence they came, since the testimony of antiquity is unanimous in ascribing to them a Thracian origin. Herodotus, in particular, asserts that, according to their own traditions, they came from the banks of the Strymon, and, having been driven from their country by the Teucri and Mysi, crossed over into Asia. (Herod., 7, 75.) Thucydides also and Xenophon expressly style them Bithynian Thracians. (Thucyd., 4, 75.—Xen., Hist. Gr., 1, 3, 2.—Id. ib., 3, 2, 2.) Some geographers have noticed a distinction to be observed in regard to this people, namely, that the appellation of Bithyni was properly applicable to the inland population, while that of the coast took the name of Thyni. (Apollod. Rhod., 2, 462.—Eustath. ad Dionys. Perieg., 793.—Plin., 5, 32.) But, historically speaking, it is of little value.—The Bithynians, as Herodotus informs us (1, 28), were first subjected by Cresus. On the dissolution of the Lydian empire they passed under that of Persia, and their country became the seat of a satrapy sometimes known in history by the title of Dascylium, sometimes of the Hellespont, but more commonly of Bithynia. The people lived principally in villages; the only considerable towns being situate on the coast, and inhabited by Greek colonists. This state of things lasted till the death of Alexander, who had taken military possession of the country after the defeat and expulsion of the Persians from the peninsula. On the decease of the King of Macedon, we find Botirus, the son of Dydalsus, a Thracian chief, seizing upon Astacus, a Greek town on the seacoast, and, after defeating Calantus, the officer who commanded the Grecian forces in that country, establishing an independent principality, which he transmitted, through his lineal descendants Bas and Xipertes, to Nicomedes, son of the latter, who, after the death of Lysimachus, first assumed the title of King of Bithynia. He gave his name to the city of Astacus, which from henceforth was called Nicomedia, and became the capital of the new kingdom. (Mém. excerpt. ap. Phot., p. 720, seq.—Pausan., 5, 12.) An account of the succession in this family will be found under the articles Nicomedes and Prusias.—Like other Asiatic sovereigns, the kings of Bithynia are said to have been sensual and effeminate. (Polyb., 37, 2.—Cic., Verr., 5, 11.) The interior of the country was mountainous and woody (Xen., Anab., 6, 15.—Nicet., Chon., p. 128), but near the sea it was covered with rich and fertile plains, thickly spread with towns and villages. The produce consisted in grain of every sort; in wine, cheese, figs, and various kinds of wood. (Xen., Anab., 6, 4.—Strab., 565.—Plin., 11, 42.) The western portion of Bithynia has received from the Turks the name of Khodavendhiar; and that situated on the Euxine and around the Bosphorus they call Ko djaili. (Cramer's Asia Minor, vol. 1, p. 167, seq.)

BITON. Vid. Cleobis.

BITURICUM. Vid. Avaricum.

BITURIGES, a people of Gaul. There were two tribes of this name, the Bituriges Cubi and the Bituriges Vivisci. The former were in Gallia Celtica, to the west of the Ædui. Their capital was Avaricum, now Bourges. The Vivisci were in Aquitania, on the Atlantic coast, below the mouth of the Garumna. Their chief city was Burdigala, now Bordeaux. (Cæs., B. G., 8, 5, &c.—Lemaire, Index Geogr. ad Cæs., s. v., p. 210, seq.)

BIZYA, a city in Thrace, on the shores of the Euxine, above Halmydessus, and northwest of Byzantium. It is now Vyzia. The poets fabled that it was shunned by swallows, on account of the crimes of Tereus. (Plin., 4, 11.—Solin., c. 10.—Ovid, Met., 6, 424, seq.)

BLANDUSIA, or, more properly, Bandusia, a fountain in the immediate vicinity of Horace's Sabine farm. It is supposed to be the modern Ponte Bello. (Compare the remarks of the commentators on Horace, Ode 3, 13, 1.)

BLASTOPHÆNICES, a people of Lusitania. (Appian, de reb. Hisp., 6, 56.) Ukert maintains the identity of this people with the Bastuli Pœni. (Geogr., vol. 2, p. 309.)

BLENNÏES, a people of Æthiopia supra Ægyptum, dwelling, according to Strabo and Ptolemy, to the southeast of the Astaboras, towards the Sinus Aivalites. They were fabled to be without heads, and to have the eyes and mouth placed in the breast. This fable is supposed to owe its origin to a custom prevailing among this people, of depressing their heads between their shoulders, which they forced upward, so that their necks became very short, and their heads were concealed partly by their shoulders, and partly by their long and thick hair. (Strab., 563.—Mela, 1, 4, 8.—Plin., 5, 8.—Amm. Marcell., 14, 4.—Vopisc. in Prob., c. 17.—Procop., Bell. Pers., c. 19.—Claudian, Carm. de Nil., v. 19.—Nonn. Dionys., 17, extr.)

BOADICÆA. Vid. Boudicca.

BOAGRIUS, a river of the Locri Epienemidii, watering the town of Thronium. Strabo asserts that it was known likewise by the name of Manes, and was nothing more than a torrent, which was sometimes entirely dry, though occasionally it was swollen so as to be two plethra in breadth. (Compare Lycophron, v. 1145.)

Bocchus, a king of Getulia, in alliance with Rome, who perfidiously delivered Jugurtha to Sylla, the lieutenant of Marius. Many of the old editions of Sallust read Jugurthæ filiâ Boccho nupserat (Jug. Bell., 80), instead of Bocchi, &c., thereby making Bocchus to have been Jugurtha's son-in-law. The Abbé Brotier, relying upon his reading and some of Sylla's medals, proposes to substitute in Plutarch's life of Marius, where mention is made of Bocchus, the term "son-in-law" for "father-in-law;" but M. Vauvilliers more judiciously contends, from six MSS. of Sallust, and in conformity with Florus (3, 1), for the expression "father-in-law" of Jugurtha. Bocchus obtained, as the reward of his treachery, the western part of Numidia, which was afterward, in the reign of Claudius, named Mauritania Cæsariensis, now Fec. (Sallust, Jug.—Pater., c. 12.)

BOBAGNĀRUS, a leader of the Nervii, when Cæsar made war against them. (Cæs., B. G., 2, 23.)

BOEDROMIA, an Athenian festival, sacred to Apollo Patroüs, and instituted in commemoration of the assistance which the people of Athens received in the reign of Erechtheus, from Ion, son of Xuthus, when their country was invaded by Eunolpus, son of Neptune. It was celebrated in the month Boedromion, which took its name from this circumstance. The appellation given to the festival is derived ἀπὸ τοῦ βοη-δρῶν, from coming to help. (Etymol. Mag., s. v.—Suid., s. v.—Callim., H. in Apoll., v. 69.—Plut., Thes., c. 27.—Wachsmuth, Hellen. Alt., vol. 4, p. 143.)

BOEDEMION, the name of one of the Attic months. It was the third in the order of the Attic year, and corresponded nearly to our September. It derived its name from the festival called Boedromia being celebrated during it. (Vid. Boedromia.)

BOEOTARCHÆ, the chief magistrates in Bœotia. They presided in the national councils, and commanded the forces. They were, in later times at least, elected annually, and rigidly restricted to their term of office. Their number is supposed to have been originally fourteen, the primitive number of the confederate Bœotian states. It was afterward reduced, and underwent many variations. Thebes appears to have had the privilege of appointing two, one of whom was superior in authority to the rest, and probably acted as president of the board. (Thucyd., 2, 2.—Id., 4, 91.—Arnold, ad Thucyd., l. c.—Thirlwall's Hist. Gr., vol. 1, p. 434.—Liv., 42, 43.)

BŒOTIA, a country of Greece Proper, lying to the northwest of Attica, and shut in by the chains of Helicon, Citharôn, Parnassus, and, towards the sea, Ptoüs; which mountains enclosed a large plain, constituting the chief part of the country. Numerous rivers, of which the Cephissus was the most important, descending from the heights, had probably stagnated for a long time, and formed lakes, of which the Copais was the largest. These same rivers appear to have formed the soil of Bœotia, which is among the most fruitful in Greece. Bœotia was also perhaps the most thickly settled part of Greece; for no other could show an equal number of important cities. This country, as we learn from the concurrent testimony of Strabo, Pausanias, and other ancient writers, was first occupied by several barbarous clans, under the various names of Aones, Ectenes, Temmices, and Hyantes. (Strabo, 401.—Pausan., 9, 5.) To these succeeded, according to the common account, Cadmus and his followers, who, after expelling some of the indigenous tribes above mentioned, and conciliating others, founded a city, which became afterward so celebrated under the name of Thebes, and to which he gave the name of Cadmea. The descendants of Cadmus were compelled, subsequently, to evacuate Bœotia, after the capture of Thebes by the Epigoni, and to seek refuge in the country of the Illyrian Enchelees. (Herodotus, 5, 61.—Pausanias, 9, 5.) They regained, however, possession of their former territory, but were once more expelled, as we learn from Strabo, by a numerous horde of Thracians and others. On this occasion, having withdrawn into Thessaly, they united themselves with the people of Arne, a district of that province, and for the first time assumed the name of Bœotians. (Strabo, 401.) After a lapse of some years, they were compelled to abandon Thessaly, when they once more succeeded in re-establishing themselves in their original abode, to which they now communicated the name of Bœotia. This event, according to Thucydides, occurred about sixty years after the capture of Troy; but, in order to reconcile this account with the statement of Homer, who distinctly names the Bœotians among the Grecian forces assembled at that memorable siege, the historian admits that a Bœotian division (ἀποδακνὸς) had already settled in this province prior to the migration of the great body of the nation (1, 12). The government of Bœotia remained under the monarchical form till the death of Xanthus, who fell in single combat with Melanthus the Messenian, when it was determined to adopt a republican constitution. This, though imperfectly known to us, appears to have been a compound of aristocratic and democratic principles; the former being apparent in the appointment of eleven annual magistrates named

Bœotarchs, who presided over the military as well as civil departments (Thucyd., 2, 2.—Id., 4, 92.—Id., 5, 37); the latter in the establishment of four councils, which were possessed, in fact, of the sovereign authority, since all measures of importance were to be submitted to their deliberation. The general assembly of the Bœotian republic was held in the temple of the Itionian Minerva. (Pausan., 9, 34.) From the extent and population of their territory, the Bœotians might have played the first part in Greece, if they had not been prevented by the bad government of the cities, by the jealousy of Thebes, and the consequent want of union. And yet the example of Epaminondas and Pelopidas afterward showed that the genius of two men could outweigh all these defects.—The Bœotians were regarded by their neighbours, the Athenians, as naturally a stupid race. Much of this, however, was wilful exaggeration, and must be ascribed to the national enmity, which seems to have existed from the earliest times between these two nations. Besides, this country produced, in fact, many illustrious men, such as Hesiod, Pindar, Plutarch, Epaminondas, Pelopidas, &c. In Bœotia, too, Mount Helicon was sacred to the Muses, to whom also many of the fountains and rivers of the country were consecrated.—The modern name of Bœotia is Stramulipa, in Livadia, which last comprehends within its limits the ancient Bœotia, as one of its component parts.—In Bœotia are several celebrated ancient battle-fields, the former glory of which has been increased by late events; namely, Plataea (now the village Kokla), where Pausanias and Aristides established the liberty of Greece by their victory over Mardonius; Leuctra (now the village Parapogia), where Epaminondas triumphed over the Spartans; Coronea, where the Spartan Agesilaus defeated the Thebans; and Chæronea, where Philip founded the Macedonian greatness on the ruins of Grecian freedom.—Near Tanagra, the birthplace of Corinna, the best wine was produced: here also cocks were bred, of remarkable size, beauty, and courage, with which the Grecian cities, passionately fond of cock-fighting, were supplied.—The Bœotians were particularly fond of music, and excelled in it. (Cramer's Ancient Greece, vol. 2, p. 189, seq.—Hecren's Politics of Anc. Greece, p. 32, Bancroft's transl.—Encyclop. Americ., vol. 2, p. 151, seq.)

BOETHIUS, Anicius Manlius Torquatus Severinus, a man celebrated for his virtues, services, honours, and tragical end. He was born about A.D. 470, in Rome or Milan, of a rich, ancient, and respectable family; was educated in Rome, in a manner well calculated to develop his extraordinary abilities; afterward went to Athens, which was still the centre of taste and science, and studied philosophy under Proclus and others. Returning to Rome, he was graciously received by Theodoric, king of the Ostrogoths, then master of Italy, loaded with marks of favour and esteem, and soon raised to the first offices of the empire. He exerted the best influence on the administration of this monarch, so that the dominion of the Goths promoted the welfare and happiness of the people who were subject to them. He was long the oracle of his sovereign and the idol of the people. The highest honours were thought inadequate to reward his virtue and his services. But Theodoric, as he grew old, became irritable, jealous, and distrustful of those around him. The Goths now indulged in all sorts of oppression and extortion, while Boëthius exerted himself in vain to restrain them. He had already made many enemies by his strict integrity and vigilant justice. These at last succeeded in prejudicing the king against him, and rendering him suspicious of Boëthius. The opposition of Boëthius to their unjust measures was construed into a rebellious temper, and he was even accused of a treasonable correspondence with the court of Constantinople. He was arrested, imprisoned, and executed, A.D. 524 or 526.—While he was at the helm of state, he found recreation from his toilsome occupations in the construction of mathematical and musical instruments, some of which he sent to Clothaire, king of France. He was also much given to the study of the old Greek philosophers and mathematicians, and wrote Latin translations of several of them. His most celebrated work is that composed during his imprisonment, "On the consolation afforded by Philosophy." It is written in prose and verse intermixed. The elevation of thought, the nobleness of feeling, the ease and distinctness of style which it exhibits, make this composition, short as it is, far superior to any of the age. The principal edition is that of Basle, 1570, fol. A more modern one, of some value, appeared at Glasgow, 1751, 4to. (Encyclop. Americ., vol. 2, p. 153, seqq.)

BOËTHIUS, I. A Stoic philosopher, referred to by Diogenes Laertius and Cicero. (Diog. L., 7, 143.—Cic. de Div., 1, 8.—Id. ib., 2, 20.) His opinions differed so far from those of his school, in that he did not regard the world as animated, and in his admitting four principles as the basis of judgment; namely, thought, sensation, appetite, and participation. (Menag. ad Diog., l. c.)—II. A peripatetic philosopher, a native of Sidon. He acquired so high a reputation, that Strabo, who had been his fellow-disciple, ranks him among the most illustrious philosophers of his time, and Simplicius styles him θαυμάσιος, "the wonderful." (Menag. ad Diog. Laert., 7, 143.)—III. A statuary, and engraver on plate, born at Carthage. (Pausan., 5, 17.) He appears to have flourished before the destruction of the city by the Romans, but we cannot, with any certainty, ascertain the age in which he lived. (Silbg. Dict. Art., s. v.)

BOII, a people of Celtic Gaul, who inhabited the country watered by the river Sigmanus, Signatus, or Igmanus, now the Sollac. From Gaul they passed into Germany, and settled in the present Bohemia (Boierheim, i. e., the residence of the Boii), until they were expelled by the Marcomanni. Abandoning this quarter, they carried their name with them into Boiaria, Bayaria, or Bavaria. The name Boii is thought to denote "the terrible ones," and to be derived from the Celtic Bo, "fear." (Thierry. Histoire des Gaulois, vol. 1, p. 48.—Cæs., B. G., 1, 28; 7, 17.)

BOLA, a town of the Æqui in Italy. It is thought to correspond with the small town of Poli, situate in the mountains between Tivoli and Palatrina, the ancient Tibur and Præneste. It was a colony of Alba. (Virg. Æn., 1, 675.)

BOLBE, I. a lake of Macedonia, in the territory of Mygdonia, and emptying into the sea near Aulon and Bormiscus. (Thucyd., 1, 58.) Dr. Clarke, who visited the shores of this lake in his travels, observes, "it is now called Beshek; it is about 12 miles in length, and 6 or 8 in breadth. We can find no notice that has been taken of this magnificent piece of water by any modern writer." (Travels, vol. 8, p. 6.)—II. A town near the Lake Bolbe. (Steph. Byz., s. v. Βόλβα.)

BOLBITRUM, one of the mouths of the Nile, in the vicinity of what is now the town of Rosetta. (Vid. Nilus.)

BOLINE, a town of Achaia, between Drepanum and Patræ, which no longer existed in the time of Pausanias (7, 23). Near it ran a river called Bolinæus. (Steph. Byz., s. v.)

BOLISSUS, a town in the island of Chios, situate on the coast, and the site of which is occupied by the modern village of Polisso. The ancient place is noticed by Thucydides (8, 24), and is mentioned also in the life of Homer (c. 23.—Compare Steph. Byz., s. v. Βολισσός.)

BOLLANUS, a man whom Horace represents as of the most irascible temper, and most inimical to loquacity. (Serm., 1, 9, 11.)

BOMILCAR, I. a Carthaginian general, son of Hamilcar. He attempted to seize, by force of arms, upon the government, but was overcome and put to death. (Diod. Sic., 20, 43.)—II. A Carthaginian admiral, sent to relieve Syracuse when besieged by the Romans. He fled, however, before the fleet of Marcellus, and the city fell.—III. A native of Numidia, a secret agent of Jugurtha's, by whose means that monarch effected the assassination of Massiva at Rome. He afterward, at the instigation of Metellus, the Roman commander, conspired with Nabdalsa against Jugurtha, but the plot was discovered, and he was put to death. (Sallust, Jug., 35, 61, 70.)

ΒΟΜΟΝΙΞ, a name applied to the youths who were whipped at the altar of Diana Orthia at Sparta, in honour of that goddess. The festival was called Διαμαστιγώσεις, and was so named ἀπὸ τοῦ μαστιγῶν, i. e., from whipping. These boys were, at first, freeborn Spartans, but afterward of meaner birth, being frequently the offspring of slaves. They were called Bomonice (Βομονικαί) from the scourging they underwent at the altar, and which was very severe and cruel; and, lest the officer should, out of compassion, remit any of its rigour, Diana's priestess stood by all the time holding in her hand the goddess's image, which, say the ancients, was light and easy to be borne, but if the boys were spared, became so ponderous that the priestess was scarcely able to support its weight. The parents of the boys were also present, and exhorted their sons to bear their sufferings with patience and firmness. He who showed the most firmness was highly honoured. Some of the boys even died under the lash; these they buried by a public funeral, with garlands on their heads, in token of joy and victory. The origin of this cruel custom is variously accounted for by the ancient writers. Some ascribe it to a wish on the part of Lycurgus to inure the Lacedæmonian youth to labour and fatigue, and to render them insensible to pain or wounds. Others maintain that it was a mitigation of an oracle, which ordered that human blood should be shed on Diana's altar. Another tradition mentions that Pausanias, at the battle of Platæa, being disturbed at the preparatory sacrifices by a party of Lydians, and his attendants having repelled them with staves and stones, the only weapons they had at the moment, instituted this custom subsequently in commemoration of the event. (Pausan., 3, 16.—Phyl., Vit. Lycurg.)

BONA DEA ("the Good Goddess"), a name given by the Romans to Ops or Tellus, or, in other words, to the goddess Earth. The first of May was the time for celebrating her festival, and it was also the anniversary of the dedication of her temple on the Aventine Hill. (Ovid, Fast., 5, 148, seq.) She was worshipped by the Roman matrons in the house of the chief pontiff, and everything relating to the other sex was carefully excluded. (Vid. Clodius.) As the most probable derivation of the name of the month of May is from Maia, it has been inferred that this goddess and Bona Dea were the same deities. The Romans had a legend among them, that Bona Dea was Fauna or Fatua, the daughter of Faunus, who, out of modesty, never left her bower, or let herself be seen of men; for which she was deified, and no man entered her temple. (Macrobi., 1, 12.)

ΒΟΝΟΝΙΑ, a city of Pannonia, on the Danube, north of Sirmium. Its site corresponds with the modern Illock or Ujlak. (Anton., Itin.—Notit. Imp.)—II. A city of Italy. (Vid. Felsina.)—III. A city of Gaul. (Vid. Gesoriacum.)

BONUS EVENTUS, a Roman deity, whose worship was first introduced by the peasants. He was represented holding a patera or cup in his right hand, and in his left ears of corn. (Varro, de R. R., 1, 1.—Plin., 34, 8.)

BOOSŪRA (boris cauda), a town of Cyprus, on the southwestern coast. Venus had an ancient temple here.

BOÖTES, a northern constellation, near the Ursa Major. The name is Greek, Βοώτης, and means "the Oxen-driver," Boötes being regarded in this sense as the driver of the Wain (Ἄρμα). another appellation for the "Greater Bear." (Aratus, 91.—Manilius, 1, 313.) The Greeks generally saw in Boötes, Arcas son of Callisto. Ovid, however, calls him on one occasion Lycaon, after the father of Callisto. (Past., 6, 235.) Others regarded him as Icarus, the father of Erigone. (Vid. Icarus.) Propertius hence calls the seven stars of the Greater Bear, "boves Icarii." (El., 2, 24, 24.)

BORÉAS, the North wind, regarded in the Grecian mythology as a deity. According to the poets, he was the son of Astræus and Aurora, but others make him the son of the Strymon. He loved Orithyia, the daughter of Erechtheus, king of Athens, and carried her off to Thrace, where she bore him the winged youths Zetes and Calais; and two daughters, Chione and Cleopatra. (Plut., Phædr., 229—Apollod., 3, 15, 2.—Apoll. Rhod., 1, 211.) The Athenians ascribed the destruction of the fleet of Xerxes by a storm to the partiality of Boreas for the country of Orithyia, and built a temple to him after that event. (Herod., 7, 189.) Boreas is also said by Homer to have turned himself into a horse, out of love to the mares of Erichthonius, and to have begotten on them twelve foals remarkable for their fleetness. (Il., 20, 223.—Keightley's Mythology, p. 255, seqq.)

BORYSTHENES, I. a large river of Scythia, falling into the Euxine Sea, now called the Dnieper. Herodotus considers it the greatest of the Scythian rivers after the Ister, and as surpassing all others except the Nile. He does not appear, however, to have known much about its course, and seems not to have been apprized of the famous cataracts of this river, which occur at the height of 200 miles above its mouth, and are said to extend 40 miles, being 13 in number. (Vid. Danaparis.)—II. There was a city on the banks of this river called Borysthenis, and also Olbia. (Vid. Olbia.)—III. A favourite steed of the Emperor Hadrian's, to whom he erected a monument after death.

BOSPORUS, I. a name applied to a strait of the sea. There were two straits known in antiquity by this appellation, namely, the Thracian and the Cimmerian Bosphorus; the former now known by the name of the Straits of Constantinople, the latter the Straits of Caffa or Theodosia, or, according to a later denomination, the Straits of Zabache. By the Russians, however, it is commonly called the Bosporus. Various reasons have been assigned for the name. The best is that which makes the appellation refer to the early passage of agricultural knowledge from East to West (βοῦς, an ox, and πόρος, a passage). Nymphis tells us, on the authority of Accarion, that the Phrygians, desiring to pass the Thracian strait, built a vessel, on whose prow was the figure of an ox, calling the strait over which it carried them, βοῦς πόρος, Bosporus, or the ox's passage. Dionysius of Halicarnassus, Valerius Flaccus, and others of the ancient writers, refer the name to the history of Io, who, when transformed into a cow (βοῦς) by Juno, swam across this strait to avoid her tormentor. Arrian says that the Phrygians were directed by an oracle to follow the route which an ox would point out to them, and that one being roused by them for this purpose, it swam across the strait.—The strait of the Thracian Bosphorus properly extended from the Cyanean rocks to the harbour of Byzantium or Constantinople. It is said to be 16 miles in length, including the windings of its course, and its ordinary breadth about 1½ miles. In several places, however, it is very narrow; and the ancients relate that a person might hear birds sing on the opposite side, and that two persons might converse across with one another. Herodotus, Polybius, and Arrian make its length 120 stadia, from the Cyanean rocks to Byzantium. The new castles of Europe and Asia are erected on either coast, on the site of the ancient temples of Serapis and Jupiter. The old ones, raised by the Greek emperors, command the narrowest part of the strait, where it is not more than 500 paces across. Here Darius is said to have crossed, on his expedition against the Scythians.—For some remarks on the kings of Bosphorus, as they are styled in history, consult Clinton's Fasti Hellenici, p. 281, seqq., 2d ed.—II. A city in the Chersonesus Taurica, the same as Panticapæum. (Vid. Panticapæum.)

BOTTIÆA, or BOTTIÆIS, a name anciently given to a narrow space of country in Macedonia, situated between the Haliacmon and Lydias, as Herodotus informs us (7, 127); but in another passage he extends it beyond the Lydias as far as the Axius. The Bottiari had been, however, early expelled from this district by the Macedonian princes, and had retired to the other side of the Axius, about Therme and Olynthus (Herodot., 8, 127), where they formed a new settlement with the Chalcidians, another people of Thracian origin, occupying the country of Chalcidice. (Cramer's Anc. Greece, vol. 1, p. 220.)

BOUDICÆA or BOADICÆA, queen of the Iceni, in Britain, during the reign of Nero. Having been treated in the most ignominious manner by the Romans, she headed a general insurrection of the Britons, attacked the Roman settlements, reduced London to ashes, and put to the sword all strangers to the number of 70,000. Suetonius, the Roman general, defeated her in a decisive battle, and Boudicæa, rather than fall into the hands of her enemies, put an end to her own life by poison. (Tacit., Ann., 14, 31.)

BOVILLÆ, I. an ancient town of Latium, on the Appian Way, between the ninth and tenth mile-stones; and answering, according to the opinion of Holstenius, to the situation of the inn called l'Osteria delle Frattocchie. It is distinguished from another town of the same name in Novum Latium by the title of Suburbanæ. Bovilla was one of the first towns conquered by the Romans, according to Florus (1, 11). We learn from Cicero that it was a municipium (Orat. pro Planicio), but he represents it as almost deserted.—II. A town of Novum Latium; its precise situation has not been ascertained. Vulpus says, that some vestiges of this town may be traced near a place called Bauco, not far from Veroli. (Vet. Lat., p. 120.)

BRACHMĀNES, Indian philosophers. (Vid. Gymnosophistæ.)

BRANCHIÆDES, a surname of Apollo. (Vid. Branchidæ.)

BRANCHIDÆ, I. the inhabitants of a small town in Sogdiana, on the river Oxus, put to the sword by Alexander. They were descended from the Branchidæ, a family who held the priesthood of the temple of Apollo Didymæus at Didymi near Miletus. The Persians under Xerxes plundered and burned the temple, and the Branchidæ, who had betrayed it into their hands, became, on the defeat of Xerxes, the voluntary companions of his flight, in order to avoid the justice of their countrymen. They settled on the Oxus, and grew up into a small state. Alexander's motive in the cruel massacre of this people was retaliation for the sacrilege of their ancestors. (Curt., 7, 5.)—II. The priests of Apollo Didymæus, who gave oracles in Caria. (Vid. Didymi.)

BRANCHUS, a youth of Miletus, beloved by Apollo, who gave him the power of prophecy. He gave oracles at Didymi. (Vid. Didymi.)

BRASIDAS, son of Tellis, was a celebrated Spartan commander during the Peloponnesian war, and gained many successes over the Athenians. The principal scene of his operations was in the north, in that part of Thrace, or, rather, Macedonia, which was so numerously settled by Greek colonies, a large number of which he brought under the control of Sparta by his arms or personal influence. He lost his life at the taking of Amphipolis. (Vid. Amphipolis.) The virtues of his private character were worthy of the best days of Sparta. (Thucyd., 2, 25.—Id., 4, 11.—Id., 4, 78.—Id., 4, 81.—Id., 4, 102, &c.—Id., 5, 10.)

BRASIDÆA, festivals at Lacedæmon, in honour of Brasidas. None but freemen born Spartans were permitted to enter the lists, and such as were absent were fined.

BRAURON, a town of Attica, celebrated in mythology as the place where Iphigenia first landed after her escape from Tauris with the statue of Diana. From this circumstance, the goddess was here held in peculiar veneration, under the title of Brauronia. (Pausan., 1, 33.—Steph. Byz., s. v. Βραυρών.—Strabo, 398.) The ruins of Brauron are pointed out by modern travellers near the spot called Palæo Braona. Chandler calls the modern site Vronna. (Travels, vol. 2, ch. 34.—Compare Gell's Itinerary, p. 77.)—Diana had three festivals here, called Brauronia, celebrated once every fifth year by ten men who were called ἱεροποιοί. They sacrificed a goat to the goddess, and it was usual to sing one of the books of Homer's Iliad. The most remarkable that attended were young virgins in yellow gowns, consecrated to Diana. They were about ten years of age, and not under five, and therefore their consecration was called δεκατένειν, from δέκα, decem; and sometimes ἀρκτηνέειν, as the virgins themselves bore the name of ἄρκτοι, bears, from this circumstance. There was a bear in one of the villages of Attica so tame, that he ate with the inhabitants, and played harmlessly with them. This familiarity lasted long, till a young virgin treated the animal too roughly, and was killed by it. The virgin's brother killed the bear, and the country was soon after visited by a pestilence. The oracle was consulted, and the plague removed by consecrating virgins to the service of Diana. This was so faithfully observed, that no woman in Athens was ever married before a previous consecration to the goddess. The statue of Diana of Tauris, which had been brought into Greece by Iphigenia, was preserved in the town of Brauron. Xerxes carried it away when he invaded Greece. (Cramer's Ancient Greece, vol. 2, p. 382.)

BRENNI and BREUNI, a people of Italy, occupying, together with the Genuani, the present Val d'Agno and Val Braunia, to the east and northeast of the Lacus Verbanus (Lago Maggiore). They, together with the Genuani, were subdued by Drusus, whose victory Horace celebrates. Strabo calls them Brenici and Genani; others term the former Breuni. (Horat., Od., 4, 14, 16.)

BRENNUS, I. a general of the Galli Senones, who entered Italy, defeated the Romans at the river Allia, and entered their city without opposition. The Romans fled into the capitol, and left the whole city in the possession of their enemies. The Gauls climbed the Tarpeian rock in the night, and the capitol would have been taken, had not the Romans been awakened by the noise of the sacred geese in the temple of Juno, and immediately repelled the enemy. (Vid. Manlius.) Camillus, who was in banishment, marched to the relief of his country, and so totally defeated the Gauls, that not one remained to carry home the news of their destruction.—The destruction of the Gauls by Camillus is the national account given by the Roman writers, and is replete with error and exaggeration. (Consult remarks under the article Camillus.)—As regards the name Brennus, it may be remarked, that it is nothing more than the Cymric word Brenhin, which signifies "king" or "leader," converted into a Latin form. The Romans mistook it for a proper name. (Thierry, Hist. des Gauls, vol. 1, p. 57.—Arnold's Rome, vol. 1, p. 524.) Pritchard, however, maintains that it is rather the proper name Bran, which occurs in Welsh history. (Arnold, l. c.)—II. Another Gallic leader, who made an irruption into Greece at the head of an army of his countrymen, consisting of 152,000 foot and 20,000 horse. After ravaging various parts of Northern Greece, they marched against Delphi, and endeavoured to plunder the temple. But the army of the invaders, according to the Grecian account, were seized with a panic terror during the night, and being attacked at daybreak by the Delphians and others of the Greeks, retreated in the utmost confusion. Large numbers perished, the Greeks continually hanging on the skirts of the retreating foe; and Brennus, wounded, and dispirited by his overthrow, killed himself in a fit of intoxication, B.C. 278. (Pausan., 10, 19.—Id., 10, 23.—Justin, 24, 6, &c.) It would appear, that besides the Gauls mentioned here, another body of the same race were ravaging Thrace and Macedonia; and these latter were they who crossed over into Asia, not the remains of the army of Brennus. (Consult Siebelis, ad Pausan., 10, 23, 8.)

BRIAREUS, I. a giant famous in early fable. He and his two brothers Cottus and Gyes, were the offspring of Uranus and Gê (Cælus and Terra), and had each a hundred hands. According to Homer, he was called of men ἄγρων, and by the gods alone Briareus. When Juno, Neptune, and Minerva conspired to dethrone Jupiter, Briareus, being brought by Thetis to the aid of Jupiter, ascended the heavens, and seated himself next to him, and so terrified the conspirators by his fierce and threatening looks, that they shrunk from their purpose. (Hom., Il., 1, 403.) Briareus also appears in fable as one of the Cyclopes. (Vid. Cyclopes.) The name Βριάρεως appears to be akin to βρίω, βριάρος, βρίθω, βρίθωρ, all denoting weight and strength. (Keightley's Mythology, p. 46.)—II. A Cyclop, made judge between Apollo and Neptune, in their dispute about the isthmus and promontory of Corinth. He gave the former to Neptune, and the latter to Apollo. He is probably the same fabulous personage with the preceding. (Pausan., 2, 1.)

BRIGANTES, a people in the northern parts of Britain, regarded as the greatest, most powerful, and most ancient of the British tribes. They possessed the country from sea to sea, comprising the counties of York, Durham, Lancaster, Westmoreland, and Cumberland. Their capital was Eboracum, York. The Brigantes (Briges, Bryges) would seem to have been originally of Thracian origin, and to have wandered forth from their mountain homes, between Macedonia and Thrace, over various parts of Europe, such as Gaul, Spain, Britain, &c. They also penetrated into Asia Minor, and were there called Phryges (Phrygians). Consult, as regards the root of the name, the remarks under the article Mesembria.

BRIGANTINUS LACUS, a lake in Vindelicia, separating the Helvetii from the Vindelici and other German tribes. Another name for it was Bodamicus Lacus. It is now the Lake of Constance (Constanzer-See), as the Germans call it, who have likewise another appellation for it, resembling one of the ancient names, i. e., Bodén-See. (Plin., 9, 17.—Mela, 3, 2.—Anm. Marcell., 15, 6.)

BRIGANTIUM, I. called also Brigantia, a city of Vindelicia, near the southeastern extremity of the Lacus Brigantinus. It was the station of a force in the time of the Antonines, for the purpose of watching the movements of the Alemanni. The modern name is Bregenoz.—II. A city of Hispania Tarraconensis, now Corunna. Some erroneously identify Abobriga with this place. (Dio Cass., 37, 53.)

BRILESSUS, a name given to the range of hills that united Mount Pentelicus with Anchesmus. (Strab., 399.) The modern name is Turko vouni. (Gell's Itin., p. 68 and 77.)

BRIMO (from βρέω, "to roar," "to rage"), a name given to Hecate, and chiefly employed to denote her terrific appearance, especially when she came summoned by magic arts. Apollonius describes her as having her head surrounded by serpents twining through branches of oak, while torches flamed in her hands, and the infernal dogs howled around her. (Apoll. R., 3, 1214, seqq.)

BRISËIS, a patronymic of Hippodamia, or Lynne-seis, daughter of Brises, high-priest of Jupiter at Pedasus in Troas. She was remarkable for her beauty, and was the wife of Mines, who was killed in the siege carried on by Achilles against Lyrnessus. From Lyrnessus the Grecian warrior brought her away captive. She was taken from him by Agamemnon, during the quarrel occasioned by the restoration of Chryseis, but she was given back to him, when a reconciliation took place. (Hom., Il., 1, 336, &c.—Ovid, A. A., 3, 2.—Propert., 2, 8, 20, &c.)

BRISËUS, a surname of Bacchus, said to signify "the discoverer of honey." Some derive the appellation from the nymphs called Brisæ, the nurses of the god. Cornutus, the interpreter of Persius, deduces it from bris, equivalent, as he informs us, to juvundus. Bouchart gives a Syriac derivation, briz dousa, "a lake of honey." (Rolle, Recherches, &c., vol. 3, p. 390.)

BRITANNI, the inhabitants of Britain. (Vid. Britannia.)

BRITANNIA, called also Albion. (Vid. Albion.) An island in the Atlantic Ocean, and the largest in Europe. The Phœnicians appear to have been early acquainted with it, and to have carried on here a traffic for tin. (Vid. Cassiterides.) Commercial jealousy, however, induced them to keep their discoveries a profound secret. The Carthaginians succeeded to the Phœnicians, but were equally mysterious. Avienus, in his small poem entitled Ora Maritima, v. 412, makes mention of the voyages of a certain Himilco in this quarter, and professes to draw his information from the long-concealed Punic Annals. Little was known of Britain until Cæsar's time, who invaded and endeavoured, although ineffectually, to conquer the island. After a long interval, Ostorius, in the reign of Claudius, reduced the southern part of the island, and Agricola, subsequently, in the reign of Domitian, extended the Roman dominion to the Frith of Forth and the Clyde. The whole force of the empire, although exerted to the utmost under Severus, could not, however, reduce to subjection the hardy natives of the highlands. Britain continued a Roman province until A.D. 426, when the troops were in a great measure withdrawn, to assist Valentinian the Third against the Huns, and never returned. The Britons had become so enervated under the Roman yoke as to be unable to repel the incursions of the inhabitants of the north. They invoked, therefore, the aid of the Saxons, by whom they were themselves subjugated, and at length obliged to take refuge in the mountains of Wales.—The name of Britain was unknown to the Romans before the time of Cæsar. Bouchart derives it from the Phœnician or Hebrew term Baratanac, "the land of tin." Others deduce the name of Britons from the Gallic Britti, "painted," in allusion to the custom on the part of the inhabitants of painting their bodies. (Adlung, Mithridates, vol. 2, p. 50.) Britain was famous for the Roman walls built in it, of which traces remain at the present day. The first was built by Agricola, A.D. 79, nearly in the situation of the rampart of Hadrian, and wall of Severus mentioned below. In A.D. 81, Agricola built a line of very strong forts from the Frith of Forth to the Frith of Clyde. This, however, was insufficient to check the barbarians after his departure. In A.D. 120, therefore, Hadrian erected a famous wall from Boulness on Sobey Frith, to a spot a little beyond Newcastle upon Tyne. It was sixty-eight English or seventy-four Roman miles long. Twenty years after this, Lollius Urbicus, under the Emperor Antonius, restored the second wall of Agricola, which is commonly called the Vallum Antonini. But the greatest of all was that of Severus, begun A.D. 209, and finished the next year, and which was only a few yards north of Hadrian's wall. It was garrisoned by ten thousand men. (Cæs., B. G., 4, 21, seq.—Id. ib., 5, 2, &c.—Id. ib., 6, 13.—Phin., 4, 16.—Mela, 3, 6.—Vell. Patern., 2, 46, &c.)

BRITANNICUS, CÆSAR (Tiberius Claudius Germanicus), son of the Emperor Claudius and Messalina, was born a few days after the accession of his father to the throne. After the return of the emperor from his expedition to Britain, the surname of Britannicus was bestowed on both the father and son. As the eldest son of the emperor, Britannicus was the lawful heir to the empire; but Claudius was prevailed upon by his second wife, the ambitious Agrippina, to adopt Domitian Nero, her son by a former marriage, who was three years older than Britannicus, and to declare him his successor. The venal senate gave its consent. In the mean time, Agrippina, under the pretext of motherly tenderness, strove to keep Britannicus as much as possible in a state of imbecility. She removed his servants, and substituted her own creatures. Sosibius, his tutor, was murdered by her contrivance. She did not permit him to appear beyond the precincts of the palace, and even kept him out of his father's sight, under the pretence that he was insane and epileptic. Although the weak emperor showed that he penetrated the artifices of Agrippina, yet his death, which she effected by poison, prevented him from retrieving his error. Nero was proclaimed emperor, while Britannicus was kept in close confinement. In a dispute with Nero, Agrippina threatened to place Britannicus, who was then fourteen years of age, on the throne, upon which Nero caused him to be poisoned at a banquet. His funeral took place the same night. His body was burned, without any pomp, in the Campus Martius, amid a violent storm, which the people regarded as announcing the anger of the gods. It is said that Nero had caused the face of his victim, already blackened with the poison, to be painted white, but that the heavy rain washed off this artificial colour, and the gleam of the lightning revealed the crime which had been confided to the bosom of the night. According to some authorities, Britannicus was naturally characterized by the same feebleness of spirit as his father, and Nero corrupted and abused his youth. They also state, that Agrippina advised his death. Racine has immortalized the name of this young prince by one of his finest tragedies. (Tacit., Ann., 11, 11.—Id. ib., 12, 2.—Id. ib., 12, 25, et 41.—Id. ib., 13, 16.—Encyclop. Americ., vol. 2, p. 275, seqq.—Biogr. Univ., vol. 5, p. 627, seqq.)

BRITOMARTIS, a Cretan nymph, daughter of Jupiter and Charme, and a favourite companion of Diana. Minos, falling in love with her, pursued her for the space of nine months, the nymph at times concealing herself from him amid the trees, at times among the reeds and sedge of the marshes. At length, being nearly overtaken by him, she sprang from a cliff into the sea, where she was saved in the nets (δίκτυα) of some fishermen. The Cretans afterward worshipped her as a goddess, under the name of Dictynna, from the above circumstance, which was also assigned as the reason for the cliff from which she threw herself being called Dictæon. At the rites sacred to her, wreaths of pine or lentisk were used instead of myrtle, as a branch of the latter had caught her garments, and impeded her flight. Leaving Crete, Britomartis then sailed for Ægina in a boat: the boatman attempted to offer her violence, but she got to shore and took refuge in a grove on that island, where she became invisible (ἀπαύσις): hence she was worshipped in Ægina under the name of Aphaea. (Callim., H. in Dian., 190, seqq.—Diod. Sic., 5, 76.—Anton., lib. 40.—Pausan., 2, BRIXELLUM, a town of Italy, in Gallia Cispadana, northeast of Parma, where Otho slew himself when defeated. It is now Bresello. (Tacit., Hist., 2, 33.)

BRIXIA, a city of Gallia Cisalpina, to the west of the Lacus Benacus, and southeast of Bergomum. It was the capital of the Cenomanni, as we learn from Livy (32, 30). Brixia is known to have become a Roman colony, but we are not informed at what period this event took place. (Plin., H. N., 3, 19.) Strabo speaks of it as inferior in size to Mediolanum and Verona. (Cramer's Anc. Italy, vol. 1, p. 63.)

BROMIUS, an appellation given to Bacchus, from the noise with which his festivals were celebrated. It is derived from βρέω, “to roar.”

BRONTES, one of the Cyclopes. The name is derived from βροντή, “thunder.” (Virg., Æn., 8, 425.)

BRUCTERI, a people of Germany, between the Amisia or Ems, and Lacus Flevus or Zuyder Zee. (Tacit., Ann., 1, 51.)

BRUNDISIUM, or less correctly BRUNDISIUM, a celebrated city on the coast of Apulia, in the territory of the Calabri. By the Greeks it was called Βρενδίσιον, a word which, in the Messapian language, signified a stag's head, from the resemblance which its different harbours and creeks bore to the antlers of that animal. (Strabo, 282.—Festus, s. v. Brundisium.—Steph., Byz., s. v. Βρενδίσιον.) It is not necessary to repeat the various accounts given by different writers respecting the foundation of this city; its antiquity is evident from the statement of Strabo, that Brundisium was already in existence, and under the government of its own princes, when the Lacedæmonian Phalanx arrived with his colony in this part of Italy. It is recorded also to the honour of the Brundisians, that although this chief had been instrumental in depriving them of a great portion of their territory, they generously afforded him an asylum when he was exiled from Tarentum, and after his death erected a splendid monument to his memory. (Strab., 282.—Aristot., Polit., 5, 3.—Justin, 3, 4.) The situation of its harbour, so advantageous for communicating with the opposite coast of Greece, naturally rendered Brundisium a place of great resort, from the time that the colonies of that country had fixed themselves on the shores of Italy. Herodotus speaks of it as a place generally well known, when he compares the Tauric Chersonese to the Iapygian peninsula, which might be considered as included between the harbours of Brundisium and Tarentum (4, 99). Brundisium soon became a formidable rival to Tarentum, which had hitherto engrossed all the commerce of this part of Italy (Polyb., frag., 11); nor did the facilities which it afforded for extending their conquests out of that country, escape the penetrating views of the Romans. Under the pretence that several towns on this coast had favoured the invasion of Pyrrhus, they declared war against them, and soon possessed themselves of Brundisium (Zonar., Ann., 3), whither a colony was sent A.U.C. 508. (Flor., 1, 20.—Liv., Epit., 19.—Vell. Paterc., 1, 14.) From this period the prosperity of this port continued to increase in proportion with the greatness of the Roman empire. Large fleets were always stationed there for the conveyance of troops into Macedonia, Greece, or Asia; and from the convenience of its harbour, and its facility of access from every other part of Italy, it became a place of general thoroughfare for travellers visiting those countries. When the rapid advance of Cæsar forced Pompey to remove the seat of war into Epirus, he was for some time blockaded by his successful adversary in Brundisium, before the return of his fleet enabled him to evacuate the place, and carry his troops over to the opposite coast. Cæsar describes accurately the works undertaken there by his orders for preventing the escape of his enemy. From his account we learn that the city possessed two harbours, one called the inner, and the other the outer, communicating by a very narrow passage. (Cæs., Bell. Civ., 1, 25.—Appian, B. C., 2, 49.—Cic., Ep. ad Att., 9, 12, seqq.) Strabo considers the harbour of Brundisium as superior to that of Tarentum, for the latter was not free from shoals. (Strab., 282.—Compare Pigonati, Mem. del riapimento del port. di Brindisi, Nap., 4to, 1781.) It was at Brundisium that a convention was held for the purpose of arranging the existing differences between Augustus and Marc Antony. (Dio Cassius, 48.) Among the commissioners appointed by the former was Mæcenas, who was accompanied on the occasion by Horace. It was this journey which produced the humorous satire of Horace (1, 5), and which terminates with the poet's arrival at the place of his destination. Brundisium is now Brindisi. Here the Appian Way ended. (Vid. Appia Via.—Cramer's Ancient Italy, vol. 2, p. 303, seqq.)

BRUTII, a people of Magna Græcia, in Italy, below Lucania. The origin which ancient historians have ascribed to the Brutii, or, as they are called by the Greeks, Βέρριοι, is neither remote nor illustrious: they are generally looked upon as descended from some refugee slaves and shepherds of the Lucanians, who, having concealed themselves from pursuit in the forests and mountains with which this part of Italy abounds, became, in process of time, powerful from their numbers and ferocity. Their very name is said to indicate that they were revolted slaves; Βερρίων γὰρ καλοῦσι ἀποστράτας, says Strabo, speaking of the Lucanians. This appellation the insurgents are supposed to have accepted as a term of defiance. (Niebuhr, Rom. Hist., vol. 1, p. 51, Cambridge transl.) This savage race is represented as pouring forth to attack their Lucanian masters, and to molest the Grecian settlers on the coast of either sea; and so formidable had they at length rendered themselves, that the Lucani were compelled to acknowledge their independence, and to cede to them all the country south of the rivers Laus and Crathis. This advancement of the Brutii to the rank of an independent nation is supposed by Diodorus Siculus to have taken place about 397 years after the foundation of Rome. Dion, the Syracusan, was at this time prosecuting his undertaking against the younger Dionysius; and it is conceived that the hostilities of the Brutii were fomented by his means, in order to prevent the tyrant from deriving any aid from his Lucanian allies. (Diod. Sic., 16, 15.—Strabo, 255.) The enterprising and turbulent spirit of this people was next directed against the Greek colonies; and, in proportion as these were rapidly declining, from jealousies and internal dissensions, and still more from luxury and indolence, their antagonists were acquiring a degree of vigour and stability which soon enabled them to accomplish their downfall. The Greek towns on the western coast, from being weaker and more detached from the main body of the Italiot confederacy, first fell into the hands of the Brutii. The principal cities of which this league was composed now became alarmed for their own security, and sought the aid of the Molossian Alexander against these dangerous enemies, with whom the Lucanians also had learned to make common cause. This prince, by his talents and valour, for a time checked the progress of these barbarians, and even succeeded in penetrating into the heart of their country; but after his death they again advanced, like a resistless torrent, and soon reduced the whole of the peninsula between the Laus and Crathis, with the exception of Crotona, Locri, and Rhegium. At this period, Rome, the universal foe of all, put an end at once to their conquests and independence. After sustaining several defeats, both the Lucanians and Brutii are said to have finally submitted to L. Papirius Cursor,

A.U.C. 430, which was two years after Pyrrhus had withdrawn his troops from Italy. (Liv., Epit., 14.—Polyb., 1, 6.) The arrival of Hannibal once more, however, roused the Brutii to exertion; they flocked eagerly to the victorious standard of that general, who was by their aid enabled to maintain his ground in this corner of Italy, when all hope of final success seemed to be extinguished. But the consequences of this protracted warfare proved fatal to the country in which it was carried on; many of the Brutian towns being totally destroyed, and others so much impoverished as to retain scarcely a vestige of their former prosperity. To these misfortunes was added the weight of Roman vengeance; for that power, when freed from her formidable enemy, too well remembered the support he had derived from the Brutii for so many years to allow their defection to pass unheeded. A decree was therefore passed, reducing this people to a most abject state of dependance: they were pronounced incapable of being employed in a military capacity, and their services were confined to the menial offices of couriers and letter-carriers. (Strabo, 251.—Id., 253.)

BRUTIUM, or BRUTIORUM AGER, the country occupied by the Brutii. (Vid. Brutii.)

BRUTUS, L. L. JUNIUS, a celebrated Roman, the author, according to the Roman legends, of the great revolution which drove Tarquin the Proud from his throne, and which substituted the consular for the regal government. He was the son of Marcus Junius and of Tarquinia the second daughter of Tarquin. While yet young in years, he saw his father and brother slain by the order of Tarquin, and having no means of avenging them, and fearing the same fate for himself, he affected a stupid air, in order not to appear at all formidable in the eyes of a suspicious and cruel tyrant. This artifice proved successful, and he so far deceived Tarquin, and the other members of the royal family, that they gave him, in derision, the surname of Brutus, as indicative of his supposed mental imbecility. At length, when Lucretia had been outraged by Sextus Tarquinius, Brutus, amid the indignation that pervaded all orders, threw off the mask, and, snatching the dagger from the bosom of the victim, swore upon it eternal exile to the family of Tarquin. Wearing out with the tyranny of this monarch, and exasperated by the spectacle of the funeral solemnities of Lucretia, the people abolished royalty, and confided the chief authority to the senate and two magistrates, named at first prætors, but subsequently consuls. Brutus and the husband of Lucretia were first invested with this important office. They signalized their entrance upon its duties by making all the people take a solemn oath never again to have a king of Rome. Efforts nevertheless were soon made in favour of the Tarquins: an ambassador sent from Etruria, under the pretext of procuring a restoration of the property of Tarquin and his family, formed a secret plot for the overthrow of the new government, and the sons of Brutus became connected with the conspiracy. A discovery having been made, the sons of the consul and their accomplices were tried, condemned, and executed by the orders of their father, although the people were willing that he should pardon them. From this time Brutus sought only to die himself, and some months after, a battle between the Romans and the troops of Tarquin enabled him to gratify his wish. He encountered, in the fight, Aruns, the son of the exiled monarch; and with so much impetuosity did they rush to the attack, that both fell dead on the spot, pierced to the heart, each by the weapon of the other. The corpse of Brutus was carried to Rome in triumph. The consul Valerius pronounced a funeral eulogy over it, a statue of bronze was raised to the memory of the deceased in the capitol, and the Roman females were mourning for an entire year. (Liv., 1, 56.—Id., 2, 1, &c.—Dion. Hal., 4, 15.—Id., 6, 1, &c.—Virg., Æn., 6, 822, seqq.)—

Such is the legend of Brutus. "That Brutus procured the banishment of the Tarquins, in his capacity of Tribune of the Celeres, is demonstrated," observes Niebuhr, "by the Lex tribunicia. (Pomponius, l. 2, D. de origine juris.) From this source came the information that he bore that office: the lay which spoke of his feigned idiocy cannot have known anything of this, and was incompatible with it; the annalists combined the two. That poetical tale may have been occasioned by his surname: which yet may have had a very different meaning from the one there affixed to it. Brutus, in Oscan, meant a runaway slave: now it is easy enough to understand, that the partisans of the Tarquins may have called him such, and that, on the other hand, he and the Romans might not be sorry to let the nickname pass into vogue." (Rom. Hist., vol. 1, p. 453, Cambridge transl.)—II. D. Junius, master of the horse A.U.C. 418, and consul A.U.C. 429. (Liv., 8, 12, et 29.)—III. D. Junius, consul A.U.C. 615, obtained a triumph for his successes in Spain.—IV. M. Junius, father of the Brutus who was concerned in the assassination of Cæsar. He embraced the party of Marius, and was overcome by Pompey. After the death of Sylla, and the renewal of hostilities, he was besieged by Pompey in Mutina, who compelled him to surrender after a long resistance, and caused him to be put to death. He was brother-in-law to Cato by his wife Servilia. Brutus was an able lawyer, and wrote on the Civil Wars. (Cic., Brut., 62.—Id., Or., 2, 32.—Id., pro Cluent., 51.)—V. Marcus Junius, son of the preceding, was by the mother's side nephew of M. Cato (Uticensis). He accompanied his uncle to Cyprus, A.U.C. 695, where the latter was sent by Clodius to annex that island to the Roman empire. It appears, however, that he did not copy the example of Cato's integrity; for, having become the creditor of the citizens of Salamis to a large amount, he employed one Scaptius, a man of infamous character, to enforce the payment of the debt, together with an interest four times exceeding the rate allowed by law. (Cic., ad Att., 5, 21.—Id. ib., 6, 1, seqq.) And when Cicero governed the province of Cilicia, to which Cyprus seems to have been annexed, Brutus wrote to him, and was supported by Atticus in his request, entreating him to give Scaptius a commission as an officer of the Roman government, and to allow him to employ a military force, to exact from the Salaminians the usurious interest which he illegally demanded. Cicero was too upright a magistrate to comply with such requests, but they were so agreeable to the practice of the times, that he continued to live on intimate terms with the man who could prefer them; and the literary tastes of Brutus were a recommendation which he could not resist; so that he appears soon to have forgotten the affair of Scaptius, and to have spoken and thought of Brutus with great regard. They both, indeed, were of the same party in politics, and Brutus actively exerted himself in the service of Pompey, although his own father had been put to death by the orders of that commander. Being taken prisoner in the battle of Pharsalia, he received his life from the conqueror. Before Cæsar set out for Africa to carry on war against Scipio and Juba, he conferred on Brutus the government of Cisalpine Gaul, and in that province Brutus accordingly remained, and was actually holding an office under Cæsar, while his uncle Cato was maintaining the contest in Africa and committed suicide rather than fall alive into the hands of the enemy. His character, however, seems to have been greatly improved since his treatment of the Salaminians, for he is said to have governed Cisalpine Gaul with great integrity and humanity. In the year 708 he returned to Rome, but afterward set out to meet Cæsar on his return from Spain, and in an interview which he had with him, at Nicæa, pleaded the cause of Deiotarus, tetrarch of Galatia, with such warmth and freedom, that Cæsar was struck by it, and was reminded of what he used frequently to say of Brutus, that, what his inclinations might be, made a very great difference; but that, whatever they were, they would be nothing lukewarm. It was about this time also that Brutus divorced his first wife, Appia, daughter of Appius Claudius, and married the famous Porcia, his cousin, the daughter of Cato. Soon after he received another mark of Cæsar's favour (Plut., Vit. Brut., c. 7.—Dio Cass., 44, 12), in being appointed Prætor Urbanus, A.U.C. 709; and he was holding that office when he resolved to become the assassin of the man whose government he had twice acknowledged by consenting to act in a public station under it. He was led into the conspiracy, it is said, by Cassius, who sought at first by writing, and afterward by means of his wife Junia, the sister of Brutus, to obtain his consent to become an accomplice; and Plutarch informs us, that when the attack was made on Cæsar in the senate-house, the latter resisted and endeavoured to escape, until he saw the dagger of Brutus pointed against him, when he covered his head with his robe and resigned himself to his fate. After the assassination of Cæsar, the conspirators endeavoured to stir up the feelings of the people in favour of liberty; but Antony, by reading the will of the dictator, excited against them so violent a storm of odium, that they were compelled to flee from the city. Brutus retired to Athens, and used every exertion to raise a party there among the Roman nobility. Obtaining possession, at the same time, of a large sum of the public money, he was enabled to bring to his standard many of the old soldiers of Pompey who were scattered about Thessaly. His forces daily increasing, he soon saw himself surrounded by a considerable army, and Hortensius, the governor of Macedonia, aiding him, Brutus became master in this way of all Greece and Macedonia. He went now to Asia and joined Cassius, whose efforts had been equally successful. In Rome, on the other hand, the triumvirs were all powerful; the conspirators had been condemned, and the people had taken up arms against them. Brutus and Cassius returned to Europe to oppose the triumvirs, and Octavius and Antony met them on the plains of Philippi. In this memorable conflict Brutus commanded the right wing of the republican army, and defeated the division of the enemy opposed to him, and would in all probability have gained the day, if, instead of pursuing the fugitives, he had brought succours to his left wing, commanded by Cassius, which was hard pressed, and eventually beaten by Antony. Cassius, upon this, believing everything lost, slew himself in despair. Brutus bitterly deplored his fate, styling him, with tears of the sincerest sorrow, "the last of the Romans." On the following day, induced by the ardour of the soldiers, Brutus again drew up his forces in line of battle, but no action took place, and he then took possession of an advantageous post, where it was difficult for an attack to be made upon him. His true policy was to have remained in this state, without hazarding an engagement, for his opponents were distressed for provisions, and the fleet that was bringing them supplies had been totally defeated by the vessels of Brutus. This state of things, however, was unknown to the latter, and, after an interval of twenty days, he hazarded a second battle. Where he himself fought in person, he was still successful; but the rest of his army was soon overcome, and the conflict ended in a total defeat of the republican army. Escaping with only a few friends, he passed the night in a cave, and, as he saw his cause irretrievably ruined, ordered Strato, one of his attendants, to kill him. Strato refused for a long time to perform the painful office; but, seeing Brutus resolved, he turned away his face, and held his sword while Brutus fell upon it. He died in the forty-third year of his age, B.C. 42.—A great deal of false glare has been thrown round the character of Brutus. That he was a stern and consistent patriot throughout the whole of his career, the sketch which we have given of his movements prior to the assassination of Cæsar most clearly disproves. Why hold office under one who was trampling upon the liberties of his country? Why require so much solicitation before engaging in the conspiracy? Was he not aware that Cæsar was a usurper!—this would show a miserable want of penetration. Or did he prefer security to danger!—where was the Roman patriot in this? The truth is, Brutus, notwithstanding all that has been said of him, was but a tardy patriot. His motives towards the close of his career were no doubt pure enough, but he ought to have had nothing to do with Cæsar the moment that general began to act with treason towards his country.—As a student and man of letters, the character of Brutus appears to more advantage than as a patriot. He was remarkable for literary application, usually rising with this view long before day, and it is said that, on the evening previous to a battle, while his army was in a state of anxious suspense and alarm, he calmly occupied himself in his tent with writing an abridgment of the history of Polybius.—One of the most singular circumstances in the life of Brutus is that of the so-called apparition, which it is said appeared to him, on one occasion, in his tent at midnight. "Who art thou?" inquired Brutus. "Thy evil genius," replied the phantom; "we will meet again at Philippi." And so it happened. The spirit re-appeared on the eve of the second battle of Philippi! We have here either an illusion on the part of Brutus, or a trick played off by some partisan of Antony's, in order to discourage and depress the republican commander, or, what is most likely of all, a tale utterly untrue. (Plut., Vit. Brut.—Encyclop. Metrop., Div. 3, vol. 2, p. 274, seqq.)

BYGES, a people of Thracian origin, living at one time in Macedonia. They afterward crossed into Asia, where their name was changed to Phryges. (Vid. Phrygia.)

BUBASTICUS FLUVIUS (Βουβαστικός ποταμός, Ptol.), a name sometimes given to the easternmost arm of the Nile, from the circumstance of its passing by the city of Bubastis. (Vid. Bubastis.)

BUBASTIS (or BUBASTUS), a city of Egypt, in the eastern part of the Delta, and the capital of the Bubastitic nome. This city is called in scripture Phi-Beseth, which is now altered into Basta. It was situated on a canal leading from the Pelusiac mouth of the Nile to the canal of Trajan. The Pelusiac branch was sometimes called, from this city, the Bubastic. Bubastis was remarkable also as being the place where great numbers assembled to celebrate the festival of the goddess Bubastis, who had a splendid temple here. More than 70,000 persons were accustomed to meet here on these occasions. The custom had ceased, however, in the time of Herodotus. This was the place, also, where the sacred cats were interred. Jablonski (Panth. Ægypt., 3, 3.—Voc. Ægypt., p. 53) explains the name Bubastis to mean, "she who bares," or "uncovers," or "she who multiplies her aspects." This appellation suited very well, therefore, the goddess of the new or increasing moon, for such Bubastis, the Egyptian deity, in reality was. Hence, too, we see why Herodotus says, that the name "Bubastis," in the Egyptian tongue, was equivalent to "Artemis," or Diana, in Greek (ἡ δὲ Βουβαστις, κατὰ Ἑλλήδας γλῶσσαν, ἐστὶ Ἀρτεμις. Herod., 2, 127).

BUCEPHALA, a city of India, near the Hydaspes, built by Alexander in honour of his favourite horse Bucephalus. It is supposed to have been situated somewhere on the road between Attock and Lahaur. (Curt., 9, 3.—Justin, 12, 8.)

BUCEPHALUS, a horse of Alexander's, so called either because his head resembled that of an ox (βοῦς κεφαλῇ), or because he had the mark of an ox's head impressed upon his flank; or, according to another account, because he had a black mark upon his head resembling that of an ox, the rest of his body being white. Plutarch gives an account of the mode in which Bucephalus came into the hands of Alexander. The horse had been offered for sale to Philip, the prince's father, by a Thessalian, but had proved so unmanageable that the monarch refused to purchase, and ordered it to be taken away. Alexander thereupon expressing his regret that they were losing so fine a horse for want of skill and spirit to manage it, Philip agreed to pay the price of the steed if his son would ride it. The prince accepted the offer, and succeeded in the attempt. Bucephalus, after this, would allow no one but Alexander to mount him, and he accompanied the monarch in all his campaigns. In the battle with Porus, he received, according to the same authority, several wounds, of which he died not long after. A writer, however, quoted by the same Plutarch, states that he died of age and fatigue, being thirty years old. Arrian also (Exp. Al., 5, 19) expressly confirms this last account: ἀπέθανεν αὐτοῦ, οὐ βλήθεῖς πρὸς οὐδένος, ἀλλ' ἀπὸ κατάρτου τε καὶ ἡλικίας· ἦν γὰρ ἡμῖν τὰ τριάκοντα ἔτη. Alexander, upon this occasion, showed as much regret as if he had lost a faithful friend and companion. He built a city near the Hydaspes, which he called Bucephala, after the name of his steed. (Plut., Vit. Alex., 61.—Plin., 6, 20.—Ptol., 7, 1.—Diod. Sic., 17, 95.)

BUCOLICUM, one of the mouths of the Nile, situate between the Sebennytic and Mendesian mouths. It is the same with the Phatnetic. (Herod., 2, 17.)

BULIS, I. a town of Phocis, on the shore of the Sinus Corinthiacus, southeast of Anticyra. The town was situate on a hill, only seven stadia from its port, which is doubtless the same as the Mychos of Strabo, and the Naulochus of Pliny (4, 3). Pausanias seems to assign Bulis to Βαοτία (10, 37), but Steph. Byz., Pliny, and Ptolemy (p. 87), to Phocis. (Cramer's Anc. Greece, vol. 2, p. 158.)—II. A Lacedæmonian, given up to Xerxes, along with his countryman Sperthias, to atone for the conduct of the Spartans in putting the king's messengers to death. The king, however, refused to retaliate. (Herod., 7, 134, &c.)

BULLATIUS, a friend of Horace's, who was roaming abroad for the purpose of dispelling his cares. The poet addressed an epistle to him, in which he instructs him that happiness does not depend upon climate or place, but upon the state of one's own mind. (Horat., Epist., 1, 11.)

BUPALUS, a sculptor and architect, born in the island of Chios, and son of Anthermus, or rather Archenus. (Vit. Anthermus.) He encountered the animosity of the poet Hipponax (Callim., fragm., 90, p. 460, ed. Ernest.), the cause of which is said to have been the refusal of Bupalus to give his daughter in marriage to Hipponax, while others inform us that it was owing to a statue made in derision of the poet by Bupalus. (Welcker, fragm. Hippon., 12.) The satire and invective of the bard were so severe, that, according to one account, Bupalus hung himself in despair. (Horat., Epod., 6, 14.—Acron. ad Horat., l. c.—Plin., 36, 5.) As Hipponax flourished in the reign of Darius (Proclus, ad fin. Hephaest., p. 380, ed. Gaisf.), Bupalus must have been living not only in Olymp. 58, but also very probably in Olymp. 64. His brother's name was Athenis. In addition to the statue which Bupalus made in derision of Hipponax, other works are mentioned by Pliny (l. c.) as the joint productions of the two brothers. (Sillig, Dict. Art., s. v.)

BURHŌIA, a festival in honour of Jupiter at Athens. The legend connected with this festival is a singular one. Among the laws given by Triptolemus to the Athenians, three more especially remarkable were: "Reverence your elders.—Honour the gods by offerings of the first fruits.—Hurt not the labouring beast," i. e., the beast employed in agriculture. The first who offended against this last command was a person named Thaulon, who, at the feast of Ζεύς Ποσειδών, observing a steer eating the sacred πόνταρον on the altar, took up an axe and slew the trespasser. The expiation-feast (Βουβόγυια), instituted for the purpose of atoning for this involuntary offence, it was found afterward expedient to continue. The ceremonies observed in it are not a little amusing. First was brought water by females appointed for the office, for the purpose of sharpening the axe and knife, with which the slaughter was to be committed. One of these females having handed the axe to the proper functionary, the latter felled the beast and then took to flight. To slay the beast outright was the office of a third person. All present then partook of the flesh. The meal finished, the hide was stuffed, and the beast, apparently restored to life, was put to the plough. Now commenced the steer-trial. A judicial assembly was held in the Prytaneum, to which all were summoned who had been partakers in the above transaction. Each lays the blame upon the other. The water bearers throw the guilt upon the sharpener of the axe and knife: the sharpener of the knife casts it upon the person delivering it to the feller of the beast: the feller of the beast upon the actual slaughterer, while this last ascribes the whole guilt to the knife itself. The knife, unable to speak, is found guilty and thrown into the sea. (Aristoph., Nub., 945.—Mitchell, ad Aristoph., l. c.—Creuzer, Symbolik, vol. 4, p. 123, seq.)

BUPRASĪUM, a city of Elis. It was the first town on the Elean side of the Larissus, and is often mentioned by Homer as one of the chief cities of the Epeans. (Il., 2, 615.—Il., 11, 755.)

BURA, one of the twelve original Achæan cities, as we learn from Herodotus (1, 146), which stood at first close to the sea; but having been destroyed, with the neighbouring town of Helice, by a terrible earthquake and inundation, the surviving inhabitants rebuilt it afterward, about forty stadia from the coast, and near the small river Buraicus. (Paus., 7, 25.—Strabo, 386.)

BURÆUS, I. an epithet applied to Hercules, from his temple near Bura.—II. A river of Achaia, near the town of Bura. (Pausan., 7, 25.)

BURGUNDI, a German nation, one of the principal branches of the Vandals. They can be traced back to the country between the Viadrus (Oder) and the Vistula, in what is now the New Mark, and the southern part of West Prussia. They were distinguished from the other Germans by living together in villages, burgen, whence, according to some, they received the name of Burgundi. Others, however, derive the name from Gunt, "combat," as alluding to the warlike character of the race, and make Burgundi mean "the lance of war." (Maltz-Brun, Dict. Geogr., p. xiii., Vocab. de mots generiques.) Their dwelling in villages, and not leading, like the rest of the Germans, a wandering life, is the reason why they retained possession of their country much longer than the neighbouring Goths and Vandals, till, at length, they were no longer able to withstand the Gepidæ, who pressed in upon them from the mouths of the Vistula. In consequence of the loss of a great battle with the Gepidæ, they emigrated to Germany, where they advanced to the region of the Upper Rhine, and settled near the Alemanni. From these they took a considerable tract of country, and lived in almost continual war with them. In the beginning of the fifth century, with other German nations, they passed over into Gaul. After a long struggle, and many losses, they succeeded in possessing themselves of the southeastern part of this country by a contract with the Romans. A part of Switzerland, Savoy, Dauphiny, Lionnais, and Franche-Comté, belonged to their new kingdom, which, even in the year 470, was known by the name of Burgundy. The seat of government seems to have been sometimes Lyons (Lugdunum), and sometimes Geneva.—By their old constitution, they had kings, called hendinos, whom they chose and deposed at their pleasure. If any great calamity befell them, as a failure of the crops, a pestilence, or a defeat, the king was made responsible for it, and his throne was given to another, from whom they hoped for better times. Before their conversion to Christianity (which happened after their settlement in Gaul), they had a high-priest called Sinestus, whose person was sacred, and whose office was for life. The trial by combat even then existed among them, and was regarded as an appeal to the judgment of God.—Continually endeavouring to extend their limits, they became engaged in a war with the Franks, by whom they were at last completely subdued, under the son of Clovis, after Clovis himself had taken Lyons. They still preserved their constitution, laws, and customs for a time. But the dignity of king was soon abolished, and, under the Carolingians, the kingdom was divided into provinces, which, from time to time, shook off their dependance. Their later movements belong to modern history. (Claud. Mamert. Paneg. Maximian., c. 5.—Hadrian. Vales. Rer. Franc., l. p. 50.—Jornand. de Regnor. Success., p. 54.—Id. de reb. Get., p. 98.—Paul. Warnefr. de gest. Longob., 3, 3.—Encyclop. Americ., vol. 2, p. 329.)

BUSIRIS, a king of Egypt, son of Neptune and Lysianassa daughter of Epaphus, or (as Plutarch states, from the Samian Agatho), of Neptune and Anippe, daughter of the Nile. (Plut., Parall., p. 317.) This king, in consequence of an oracle, offered up strangers on the altar of Jupiter: for Egypt having been afflicted with a dearth for nine years, a native of Cyprus, named Thrasius, a great soothsayer, came thither, and said that it would cease if they sacrificed a stranger every year to Jupiter. Busiris sacrificed the prophet himself first of all, and then continued the practice. When Hercules, in the course of his wanderings, came into Egypt, he was seized and dragged to the altar; but he burst his bonds, and slew Busiris, his son Amphidamas, and his herald Chabes. (Apollod., 2, 5, 11.)—Now who was this Busiris?—We have here a question to which the ancients themselves gave very different answers. Isocrates, in defending the memory of the Egyptian monarch, pretends that he lived two centuries before Persens, and, consequently, long anterior to Hercules. (Isocr., Busir., c. 15.) Other writers have made mention of from three to five kings of Egypt bearing this same name. (Heyne, ad Apollod., l. c.—Sturz., ad Pherecyd., p. 141.—Compare Theon. Progygn., c. 6.—Synce., Chron., p. 152.—Interpret. ad Diod., 1, 88.) Herodotus contradicts the common tradition, and seeks to free the Egyptians from the reproach of having offered up human victims. He may be right as regards the times immediately preceding the period when he himself flourished, since it is well known that king Amasis abolished human sacrifices at Heliopolis, and great changes took place also after the Persian conquest. Still, however, numerous scenes and images delineated in the temples and sepulchres of Egypt, speak but too plainly for the existence of this frightful custom in earlier times. (Costaz, Descript. de l'Eg., vol. 1, c. 9, p. 401.—Guignaut, planche xlv.—Compare Manetho, ap. Porphy. de Abstin., 2, 55.—Plut., de Is. et Os., p. 556, ed. Wytenb.—Plut., de Malign. Herod., p. 857.) According to Eratosthenes, as cited by Strabo (802), Egypt never had a king named Busiris, but the whole superstructure of fable erected upon this name has no other origin than the odious inhospitality of the inhabitants of the Busiritic nome. We have here, without doubt, a glimpse of the truth, which is fully revealed to us by Diodorus Siculus. According to this writer, or, rather, the tradition collected by him, the kings of Egypt immolated in earlier times, on the tomb of Osiris, men of the same colour with Typhon, that is, red-haired. (Diod. Sic., 1, 88.) They sacrificed also cattle of this same hue, a circumstance that reminds us of the red heifer mentioned in scripture (Numb., 19, 2.—Compare Spencer, de Legibus Hebr. ritual., 15, p. 489, ed. Pfaff.—Walsius, Egyptiac., 2, 8.) Now, continues Diodorus, these red-haired persons were almost always strangers, few of the Egyptians being found with hair of that colour; and hence arose the fable of human sacrifices by Busiris. In fact, expressly adds this writer, Busiris is not the name of a king, but means, in the Egyptian language, “the tomb of Osiris.” We have here, then, a solution of the whole legend. The fettered Hercules is the sun in the winter season, enfeebled and in the hands of his enemy. He is about to become the prey of the tomb (the victim of Busiris); but, on a sudden, resumes his strength, breaks his fetters, and triumphs over gloom and darkness.—But why sacrifice victims of the peculiar colour mentioned above? Possibly we have here a traditionary allusion to the shepherd race, the red-haired, blue-eyed strangers, who once overran the land, and whose cruel devastations well entitled them to be identified, in a degree, with Typhon, the spirit of all evil.—Jablonski (Voc. Egypt., p. 54) and Zoega (de Obelisc., p. 288) explain the word Busiris through the Coptic Be-Ousiri, i. e., “the tomb of Osiris,” in accordance with the remark of Diodorus, mentioned above. Champollion, on the other hand, writes the word Pousiri, and sees in it only the name of Osiris, preceded by the article. He condemns, at the same time, as altogether absurd, the etymology given by many of the Greeks, namely, Βούς and Ὀσίρις. (Compare Steph. Byz., s. v.) Agreeing with him on this latter point, we must nevertheless regard the explanation of Diodorus, which he also rejects, as entitled to great weight. Plutarch, moreover (de Is. et Os., c. 21), says expressly, that Βούσιρις is the same as Ταφούσιρις, which he derives, in consequence, from τάφος, “a tomb,” and Ὀσίρις. (Cruzer, Symbolik, vol. 1, p. 353, seqq.—Guignaut, vol. 1, pt. 2, p. 848, seqq.)—II. There were three or four cities of this name in ancient Egypt, the most celebrated of which is placed by Herodotus in the centre of the Delta. It had a magnificent temple of Isis. (Herod., 2, 59.—Compare Strab., 802.—Diod. Sic., 1, 85, et 88.—Wesseling, ad Diod., l. c.—Champollion, l'Egypte sous les Pharaons, vol. 1, p. 365; vol. 2, p. 42, &c.) It is worthy of remark, that these were all sepulchral cities. (Guignaut, l. c.)

BUTES, I. one of the descendants of Amyceus, king of the Bebryces, very expert in the combat of the cestus. He was one of the Argonauts, and leaped overboard in order to swim to the island of the Sirens, but Venus caught him up and conveyed him to Lilybæum in Sicily. Here she became by him the mother of Eryx. (Apoll. R., 4, 912.—Virg., Æn., 5, 372.)—II. A son of Pandion king of Athens, and brother of Erechtheus. The father divided his offices between his two sons, giving Erechtheus his kingdom, and Botes the priesthood of Minerva and Neptune Erichthonius. Botes married Chthonia, the daughter of his brother, and the sacerdotal family of the Butadæ deduced their lineage from him. (Apollod., 3, 15, 1.)—III. An armour-bearer to Anchises, and afterward to Ascanius. Apollo assumed his shape when he descended from heaven to encourage Ascanius to fight. Botes was killed by Turnus. (Virg., Æn., 9, 647; 12, 632.)

BUTHRŌTUM, a town of Epirus, opposite Corcyra. It was originally a small village, but was subsequently fortified by the Romans, in order to keep in subjection the inhabitants of the interior, and became a place of great consequence. Virgil makes Helenus to have reigned here. (Æn., 3, 295, seqq.) Stephanus Byzantinus derives the name from an ox (βοῦς) having broken loose at this place when about being sacrificed. (Cramer's Anc. Greece, vol. 1, p. 107.)

BUTUS, a city of Egypt, at the Sebennytic mouth of the Nile, or, rather, on the southern shore of the Butus Lacus, the outlet from which into the sea is formed by the Ostium Sebennyticum. It was famed for its temples of Apollo, Diana, and Latona, that is, of Egyptian deities supposed to coincide with these. The temple of Latona had a celebrated oracle connected with it, and the goddess had also an annual festival here, which was one of the most numerous attended in Egypt. The shrine of the goddess, according to Herodotus, was of one solid stone, having equal sides, each side forty cubits long. It was brought from a quarry in the isle of Philæ, near the cataracts, on rafts, for the distance of 200 leagues, to its destined station, and seems to have been the heaviest weight ever moved by human power. It employed many thousand men for three years in its transportation. The modern Kom-Kasir is thought to correspond to the ancient city. Schlichthorst, however, gives the modern name of the ancient site as El-Bueib. (Herod., 2, 59, et 63.—Plin., 5, 10.)

BYBLUS, a town of Phœnicia, nearly midway between Tripolis and Berytus. Stephanus of Byzantium calls it a very ancient city, but this expression suits better an earlier place, called Palæobyblus. The name Byblus itself shows very plainly that the founders of the place were Greeks, and merely took the inhabitants of Palæobyblus to reside with them. The influence of Grecian customs here is also shown by the worship of Adonis, to whom a temple was consecrated in this city, and the river called after whom was in the neighbourhood of this place. Byblus did not lie directly on the coast, but on a height at some distance from it. The modern name is Eshile, or, according to the Frank pronunciation, Dschibile. The appellation Zebelet occurs already in Phocas. (Joh. Phoc., c. 5.—Munnert, Geogr., vol. 6, pt. 1, p. 383.)

BYRSA, the citadel of Carthage. The story commonly told about the origin of its name is as follows: When Dido came to Africa she bought of the inhabitants as much land as could be encompassed by a bull's hide. After the agreement, she cut the hide in small thongs, and enclosed a large piece of territory, on which she built a citadel, which she called Byrsa (βίρσα, a hide). This, however, is a mere fable of the Greeks. The name is derived from the Punic term Basra, "a fortification," "a citadel," the sibilant being transposed. (Gesen., Phœn. Mon., p. 420.—Compare Heyne, ad Virg., Æn., 1, 367.—Valck., Opusc., vol. 1, p. 103.)

BYZACIUM, a district of Africa Propria, lying above the Syrtis Minor. The Carthaginians were the possessors of it, and for a long time allowed no Roman vessels to navigate the coast below the Hermean promontory, fearful lest their enemies might be tempted to seize what formed the granary of Carthage. This district was originally distinct from what was termed Emporæ, which lay below it. Afterward, however, they became united into one, and the territory of Byzacium was extended upward as far as the river Bagradas, thus forming the Byzacena Provincia. (Plin., 5, 4.—Liv., 29, 25.—Polyb., 1, 82.—Id., 3, 23.—Id., Excerpt. Leg., 118.)—Gesenius deduces the name Byzacium (Βυζακτίτις, Polyb.) from the Punic Byt saki, "an irrigated region." (Phæn. Mon., p. 420.) Hamaker, less correctly, from Beth saki, "the abode of irrigation." (Miscell. Phæn., p. 234.)

BYZANTIUM, a celebrated city of Thrace, on the shore of the Thracian Bosphorus, called at a later period Constantinopolis, and made the capital of the Eastern empire of the Romans. It was founded by a Dorian colony from Megara, or, rather, by a Megarian colony in conjunction with a Thracian prince. For Byzas, whom the city acknowledged, and celebrated in a festival as its founder, was, according to the legend, a son of Neptune and Ceroessa the daughter of Io, and ruled over all the adjacent country. The meaning of the myth would appear to be, that a Thracian prince, having united himself in marriage with a Grecian female, founded the city, with the aid of a Greek colony, and gave the place a name derived from his own. (Seymn., 715.—Euseb., Chron. Ol., 30, 2.—Steph. Byz., s. v.—Eustath., ad Dion. Perieg., 803.—Dionys. Byzant., p. 5.—Geogr. Gr. Min., vol. 3.) The early commerce of Megara was directed principally to the shores of the Propontis, and this people had founded Chalcedon seventeen years before Byzantium, and Selymbria even prior to Chalcedon. (Herod., 4, 144.—Seymn., 714.) When, however, their trade was extended still farther to the north, and had reached the shores of the Euxine, the harbour of Chalcedon sank in importance, and a commercial station was required on the opposite side of the strait. This station was Byzantium. The appellation of "blind men," given to the Chalcedonians by the Persian general Megabyzus (Herod., 4, 144), for having overlooked the superior site where Byzantium was afterward founded, does not therefore appear to have been well merited. As long as Chalcedon was the northernmost point reached by the commerce of Megara, its situation was preferable to any offered by the opposite side of the Bosphorus, because the current on this latter side runs down from the north more strongly than it does on the side of Chalcedon, and the harbour of this city, therefore, is more accessible to vessels coming from the south. On the other hand Byzantium was far superior to Chalcedon for the northern trade, since the current that set in strongly from the Euxine carried vessels directly into the harbour of Byzantium, but prevented their approach to Chalcedon in a straight course. (Polyb., 4, 43.) The harbour of Byzantium was peculiarly favoured by nature, being deep, capacious, and sheltered from every storm. The current of the Euxine swept vessels into it without the aid of sail or oars, and it also brought thither various kinds of fish that afforded a lucrative article of commerce. From its shape, and the rich advantages thus connected with it, the harbour of Byzantium obtained the name of Chrysocernus, or "the Golden Horn," which was also applied to the promontory or neck of land that contributed to form it. (Plin., 4, 11.—Ann. Marcell., 22, 8.) And yet, notwithstanding all these advantages, Byzantium remained for a long time an inconsiderable place. The declining commerce of Megara, and the character which Byzantium still sustained of being a half-barbarian place, may serve to account for this. At a subsequent period the Milesians sent hither a strong colony, and so altered for the better the aspect of things, that they are regarded by some ancient writers as the founders of the city itself. (Vell. Patere., 2, 15.) When, at a later day, the insurrection of the Asiatic Greeks had been crushed by Darius, and the Persian fleet was reducing to obedience the Greek cities along the Hellespont and Propontis, the Byzantines, together with a body of Chalcedonians, would not wait for the coming of the Persians, but, leaving their habitations, and fleeing to the Euxine, built the city of Mesembria on the upper coast of Thrace. (Herod., 6, 33.) The Persians destroyed the empty city, and no Byzantium for some time thereafter existed. This will explain why Scylax, in his Periplus, passed by Byzantium in silence, while he mentions all the Grecian settlements in this quarter, and among them even Mesembria itself. Byzantium re-appeared after the overthrow of Xerxes, some of the old inhabitants having probably returned, and here Pausanias, the commander of the Grecian forces, took up his headquarters. He gave the city a code of laws, and a government modelled, in some degree, after the Spartan form, and hence he was regarded by some as the true founder of the city. (Justin., 9, 1.) The Athenians succeeding to the hegemony, Byzantium fell under their control, and received so many important additions from them, that Ammianus Marcellinus, in a later age, calls it an Attic colony (22, 8). The city, however, was a Doric one, in language, customs, and laws, and remained so even after the Athenians had the control of it. The maintenance of this military post became of great importance to the Greeks during their warfare with the Persians in subsequent years, and this circumstance, together with the advantages of a lucrative and now continually increasing commerce, gave Byzantium a high rank among Grecian cities. After Athens and Sparta had weakened the power of each other by national rivalry, and neither could lay claim to the empire of the sea, Byzantium became an independent city, and turned its whole attention to commerce. Its strong situation enabled it, at a subsequent period, to resist successfully the arms of Philip of Macedon; nor did Alexander, in his eagerness to march into Asia, make any attempt upon the place. It preserved also a neutral character under his successors. The great evil to which the city of Byzantium was exposed came from the inland country, the Thracian tribes continually making incursions into the fertile territory around the place, and carrying off more or less of the produce of the fields. The city suffered severely also from the Gauls; being compelled to pay a yearly tribute, amounting at least to eighty talents. After the departure of the Gauls it again became a flourishing place, but its most prosperous period was during the Roman sway. It had thrown itself into the arms of the Romans as early as the war against the younger Philip of Macedon, and enjoyed from this people not only complete protection, but also many valuable commercial privileges. It was allowed, moreover, to lay a toll on all vessels passing through the straits, a thing which had been attempted before without success, and this toll it shared with the Romans. (Strabo, 320.—Herodian, 3, 1.) But the day of misfortune at length came. In the contest for the empire between Severus and Niger, Byzantium declared for the latter, and stood a siege in consequence, which continued long after Niger's overthrow and death. After three years of almost incredible exertions, the place surrendered to Severus. The few remaining inhabitants whom famine had spared were sold as slaves, the city was razed to the ground, its territory given to Perinthus, and a small village took the place of the great commercial emporium. Repenting soon after of what he had done, Severus rebuilt Byzantium, and adorned it with numerous and splendid buildings, which in a later age still bore his name, but it never recovered its former rank until the days of Constantine. (Herodian, 3, 6.—Dio Cass., 74, 10.—Spartian., Caracall., c. 1.—Zosimus, 2, 30.—Suidas, s. v. Σεβίσιος.—Treb. Pollio, Gallien., c. 6.—Claud., c. 9.)—Constantine had no great affection for Rome as a city, nor had the inhabitants any great regard for him. He felt the necessity, moreover, of having the capital of the empire in some more central quarter, from which the movements of the German tribes on the one hand, and those of the Persians on the other, might be observed. He long sought for such a locality, and believed at one time that he had found it in the neighbourhood of the Sigæan promontory, on the coast of Troas. He had even commenced building here, when the superior advantages of Byzantium as a centre of empire attracted his attention, and he finally resolved to make this the capital of the Roman world. For a monarchy possessing the western portion of Asia, and the largest part of Europe, together with the whole coast of the Mediterranean Sea, nature herself seemed to have destined Byzantium as a capital. Constantine's plan was carried into rapid execution. The ancient city had possessed a circuit of forty stadia, and covered merely two hills, one close to the water, on which the Seraglio at present stands, and another adjoining it, and extending towards the interior to what is now the Besestan, or great market. The new city, called Constantinopolis, or "City of Constantine," was three times as large, and covered four hills, together with part of a fifth, having a circuit of somewhat less than fourteen geographical miles. Every effort was made to embellish this new capital of the Roman world; the most splendid edifices were erected, an imperial palace, numerous residences for the chief officers of the court, churches, baths, a hippodrome; and inhabitants were procured from every quarter. Its rapid increase called, from time to time, for a corresponding enlargement of the city, until, in the reign of Theodosius II., when the new walls were erected (the previous ones having been thrown down by an earthquake), Constantinople attained to the size which it at present has. (Zonaras, 13, 23.) Chalcondylas supposes the walls of the city to be 111 stadia in circumference; Gyllius, about thirteen Italian miles; but, according to the best modern plans of Constantinople, it is not less than 19,700 yards. The number of gates is twenty-eight; fourteen on the side of the port, seven towards the land, and as many on the Propontis. The city is built on a triangular promontory, and the number of hills which it covers is seven. Besides the name of Constantinopolis, or Constantinou polis (Κωνσταντινου πόλις), this city had also the more imposing one of New Rome (Νέα Ρώμη), which, however, gradually fell into disuse. At the present day, the peasants in the neighbourhood, while they repair to Constantinople, say in vulgar Greek that they are going es tan bolin (i. e., es tan pólwn), "to the city," whence has arisen the Turkish name of the place, namely, Stamboul. The more polished or less barbarous inhabitants, however, frequently call it Constantinia. It is easy to recognise in the vulgar Greek of the peasantry, as just given, the remains of the ancient Doric. (Mannert, Geogr., vol. 7, p. 154, seqq.) For an account of the Byzantine empire consult the succeeding article, at the end of which also will be found some remarks on the Byzantine historians, as they have been denominated.—Constantinople was taken by Mohammed II., on the 29th May, A.D. 1453.

BYZANTIUM IMPERIUM. The Byzantine, or Eastern Roman Empire, comprehended at first, in Asia, the country on this side of the Euphrates, the coasts of the Black Sea, and Asia Minor; in Africa, Egypt; and in Europe, all the countries from the Hellespont to the Adriatic and Danube. This survived the Western Empire 1000 years, and was even increased by the addition of Italy and the coasts of the Mediterranean. It commenced in 395, when Theodosius divided the Roman empire between his two sons, Arcadius and Honorius. The Eastern Empire fell to the elder, Arcadius, through whose weakness it suffered many misfortunes. During his minority Rufinus was his guardian and minister, between whom and Stilicho, the minister of the Western Empire, a fierce rivalry existed. The Goths laid waste Greece. Eutropius, the successor, and Gainas, the murderer, of Rufinus, were ruined by their own crimes. The latter lost his life in a civil war excited by him (A.D. 400). Arcadius and his empire were now ruled by his proud and covetous wife Eudoxia, till her death (A.D. 404). The Isaurians and the Huns wasted the provinces of Asia, and the country along the Danube. Theodosius, the younger, succeeded his father (A.D. 408), under the guardianship of his sister Pulcheria. Naturally of an inferior mind, his education had made him entirely imbecile, and unfit for self-command. Pulcheria, who bore the title of Augusta, administered the kingdom ably. Of the Western Empire, which had been ceded to Valentinian, Theodosius retained Western Illyria. The Greeks fought with success against the King of the Persians, Varanes. The kingdom of Armenia, thrown into confusion by internal dissensions, and claimed at the same time by the Romans and the Persians, became now an apple of contention between the two nations (A.D. 440.) Attila laid waste the dominions of Theodosius, and obliged him to pay tribute. After the death of her brother, Pulcheria was acknowledged empress (A.D. 450). She was the first female who attained this dignity. She gave her hand to the senator Marcian, and raised him to the throne. His wisdom and valour averted the attacks of the Huns from the frontiers, but he did not support the Western Empire in its wars against the Huns and Vandals with sufficient energy. He afforded shelter to a part of the Germans and Sarmatians, who were driven to the Roman frontiers by the incursions of the Huns. Pulcheria died before him in 453. Leo I. (A.D. 457), a prince praised by contemporary authors, was chosen successor of Marcian. His expeditions against the Vandals (A.D. 467) were unsuccessful. His grandson Leo would have succeeded him, but died a minor shortly after him, having named his father Zeno his colleague (A.D. 474). The government of this weak emperor, who was hated by his subjects, was disturbed by rebellions and internal disorders of the empire. The Goths depopulated their provinces till their king, Theodoric, turned his arms against Italy (A.D. 489). Ariadne, widow of Zeno, raised the minister Anastasius, whom she married, to the throne (A.D. 491). The nation, once excited to discontents and tumults, could not be entirely appeased by the alleviation of their burdens and by wise decrees. The forces of the empire, being thus weakened, could not offer an effectual resistance to the Persians and the barbarians along the Danube. To prevent their incursions into the peninsula of Constantinople, Anastasius built the long wall, as it is called. After the death of Anastasius, the soldiers proclaimed Justin emperor (A.D. 518). Notwithstanding his low birth, he maintained possession of the throne. Religious persecutions, which he undertook at the instigation of the clergy, and various crimes into which he was seduced by his nephew Justinian, disgrace his reign. After his early death, in 521, he was succeeded by the same Justinian, to whom, though he deserves not the name of the Great, many virtues of a ruler cannot be denied. He was renowned as a legislator, and his reign was distinguished by the victories of his general Belisarius; but how unable he was to revive the strength of his empire was proved by its rapid decay after his death. Justin II., his successor (A.D. 565), was an avaricious, cruel, weak prince, governed by his wife. The Lombards tore from him part of Italy (A.D. 568). His war with Persia, for the possession of Armenia, was unsuccessful; the Avari plundered the provinces on the Danube, and the violence of his grief at these misfortunes deprived him of reason. Tiberius, his minister, a man of merit, was declared Cæsar, and the general Justinian conducted the war against Persia with success. The Greeks now allied themselves, for the first time, with the Turks. Against his successor, Tiberius II. (A.D. 578), the Empress Sophia and the general Justinian conspired in vain. From the Avari the emperor purchased peace; from the Persians it was extorted by his general Mauritius or Maurice (A.D. 582). This commander Tiberius declared Cæsar in the same year. Mauritius, under other circumstances, would have made an excellent monarch, but for the times he wanted prudence and resolution. He was indebted for the tranquillity of the eastern frontiers to the gratitude of King Chosroes II., whom, in 591, he restored to the throne from which he had been deposed by his subjects. Nevertheless, the war against the Avari was unsuccessful, through the errors of Commentiolus. The army was discontented, and was irritated, now by untimely severity and parsimony, and now by timid indulgence. They finally proclaimed Phocas, one of their officers, emperor. Mauritius was taken in his flight and put to death (A.D. 602). The vices of Phocas, and his incapacity for government, produced the greatest disorders in the empire. Heraclius, son of the governor of Africa, took up arms, conquered Constantinople, and caused Phocas to be executed (A.D. 610). He distinguished himself only in the short period of the Persian war. During the first twelve years of his reign, the Avari, and other nations of the Danube, plundered the European provinces, and the Persians conquered the coasts of Syria and Egypt. Having finally succeeded in pacifying the Avari, he marched against the Persians (A.D. 622), and defeated them; but, during this time, the Avari, who had renewed the war, made an unsuccessful attack on Constantinople in 626. Taking advantage of an insurrection of the subjects of Chosroes, he penetrated into the centre of Persia. By the peace concluded with Siroes (A.D. 628), he recovered the lost provinces and the holy cross. But the Arabians, who, meanwhile, had become powerful under Mohammed and the califs, conquered Phœnicia, the countries on the Euphrates, Judea, Syria, and all Egypt (A.D. 631-641). Among his descendants there was not one able prince. He was succeeded by his son Constantine III., probably in conjunction with his step-brother Heraclionas. The former soon died, and the latter lost his crown and was mutilated. After him, Constant, son of Constantine, obtained the throne (A.D. 642). His sanguinary spirit of persecution, and the murder of his brother Theodosius, made him odious to the nation. The Arabians, pursuing their conquests, took from him part of Africa, Cyprus, and Rhodes, and defeated him at sea (A.D. 653). Internal disturbances obliged him to make peace. After this he left Constantinople (A.D. 659), and, in the following year, carried on an unsuccessful war against the Lombards in Italy, in which he lost his life at Syracuse (A.D. 660). Constantine IV., Pogonatus, son of Constant, vanquished his Syracusan competitor Mezzizius, and, in the beginning of his reign, shared the government with his brothers Tiberius and Heraclius. The Arabians inundated all Africa and Sicily, penetrated through Asia Minor into Thrace, and attacked Constantinople for several successive years by sea (A.D. 669). Nevertheless, he made peace with them on favourable terms. But, on the other hand, the Bulgarians obliged him to pay a tribute (A.D. 680). Justinian II., his son and successor, weakened the power of the Maronites, but fought without success against the Bulgarians and Arabians. Leonitus dethroned this cruel prince, had him mutilated, and sent to the Tauric Chersonese (A.D. 695). Leonitus was dethroned by Apsimar, or Tiberius III. (A.D. 698), who was himself dethroned by Trebelus, king of the Bulgarians, who restored Justinian to the throne (A.D. 705); but Philippicus Bardanes rebelled anew against him. With Justinian II. the race of Heraclius was extinguished. The only care of Philippicus was the spreading of Monotheism, while the Arabians wasted Asia Minor and Thrace. In opposition to this prince, who was universally hated, the different armies proclaimed their leaders emperors, among whom Leo the Isaurian obtained the superiority (A.D. 713-714). Leo repelled the Arabians from Constantinople, which they had attacked for almost two years, and suppressed the rebellion excited by Basilus and the former emperor Anastasius. From 726 the abolition of the worship of images absorbed his attention, and the Italian provinces were allowed to become a prey to the Lombards, while the Arabians plundered the eastern provinces. After his death (A.D. 741) his son Constantine V. ascended the throne, a courageous, active, and noble prince. He vanquished his rebellious brother-in-law Artabasdas, wrested from the Arabians part of Syria and Armenia, and overcame at last the Bulgarians, against whom he had been long unsuccessful. He died (A.D. 775), and was succeeded by his son Leo III., who fought successfully against the Arabians; and this latter, by his son Constantine VI., whose imperious mother Irene, his guardian and associate in the government, raised a powerful party by the restoration of the worship of images. He endeavoured in vain to free himself from dependance on her and her favourite Stauratius, and died in 796, after having had his eyes put out. The war against the Arabians and Bulgarians was long continued; against the former it was unsuccessful. The design of the empress to marry Charlemagne excited the discontent of the patricians, who placed one of their own order, Nicephorus, upon the throne (A.D. 802). Irene died in a monastery. Nicephorus became tributary to the Arabians, and fell in the war against the Bulgarians (A.D. 811). Stauratius, his son, was deprived of the crown by Michael I., and he in turn by Leo IV. (A.D. 813). Leo was dethroned and put to death by Michael II. (A.D. 826). During the reign of the latter, the Arabians conquered Sicily, Lower Italy, Crete, and other countries. Michael prohibited the worship of images; as did also his son Theophilus. Theodora, guardian of his son Michael III., put a stop to the dispute about images (A.D. 841). During a cruel persecution of the Manichæans, the Arabians devastated the Asiatic provinces. The dissolute and extravagant Michael confined his mother in a monastery. The government was administered in his name by Bardas, his uncle, and after the death of Bardas by Basil, who was put to death by Michael (A.D. 867). Basil I., who came to the throne in 867, was not altogether a contemptible monarch. He died A.D. 886. The reign of his learned son, Leo V., was not very happy. He died A.D. 911. His son, Constantine VIII., Porphyrogenitus, a minor when he succeeded his father, was placed under the guardianship of his colleague Alexander, and after Alexander's death in 912, under that of his mother Zoe. Romanus Lakopenus, his general, obliged him, in 919, to share the throne with him and his children. Constantine subsequently took sole possession of it again, and reigned mildly but weakly. His son Romanus II. succeeded him in 959, and fought successfully against the Arabians. To him succeeded, in 963, his general Nicephorus, who was put to death by his own general, John Zimisces (A.D. 970), who carried on a successful war against the Russians. Basil II., son of Romanus, succeeded this good prince. He vanquished the Bulgarians and the Arabians. His brother, Constantine IX. (A.D. 1025), was not equal to him. Romanus III. became emperor (A.D. 1028) by a marriage with Zoe, daughter of Constantine. This dissolute but able princess caused her husband to be executed, and successively raised to the throne Michael IV. (A.D. 1034), Michael V. (A.D. 1041), and Constantine X. (A.D. 1042). Russians and Arabians meanwhile devastated the empire. Her sister Theodora succeeded her on the throne (A.D. 1053). Her successor, Michael VI. (A.D. 1056), was dethroned by Isaac Comnenus in 1057, who became a monk (A.D. 1059). His successor, Constantine XI., Ducas, fought successfully against the Uzes. Eudocia, his wife, guardian of his sons Michael, Andronicus, and Constantine, was intrusted with the administration (A.D. 1067), married Romanus IV., and brought him the crown. He carried on an unsuccessful war against the Turks, who kept him for some time prisoner. Michael VII., son of Constantine, deprived him of the throne (A.D. 1071). Michael was dethroned by Nicephorus III. (A.D. 1078), and the latter by Alexius I., Comnenus (A.D. 1081). Under his reign the crusades commenced. His son, John II., came to the throne in 1118, and fought with great success against the Turks and other barbarians. The reign of his son Manuel I., who succeeded him in 1143, was also not unfortunate. His son, Alexius II., succeeded (A.D. 1180), and was dethroned by his guardian Andronicus, as was the latter by Isaac (A.D. 1185). After a reign disturbed from without and within, Isaac was dethroned by his brother, Alexius III. (A.D. 1195). The crusaders restored him and his son Alexius IV.; but the seditious Constantinopolitans proclaimed Alexius V., Ducas Murzuphlus, emperor, who put Alexius IV. to death. At the same time Isaac II. died. During the last reigns, the kings of Sicily had made many conquests on the coasts of the Adriatic. The Latins now forced their way to Constantinople (A.D. 1204), conquered the city, and retained it, together with most of the European territories of the empire. Baldwin, count of Flanders, was made emperor; Boniface, marquis of Montferrat, obtained Thessalonica as a kingdom, and the Venetians acquired a large extent of territory. In Rhodes, Philadelphia, Corinth, and Epirus, independent sovereigns arose. Theodore Lascaris seized on the Asiatic provinces, bore the title of emperor at Nice, and was, at first, more powerful than Baldwin. A descendant of the Comneni, named Alexius, established a principality at Trebisond, in which his great-grandson John took the title of emperor. Neither Baldwin nor his successors were able to secure the tottering throne. He himself died in captivity among the Bulgarians (1206). To him succeeded Henry, his brother, with Peter, brother-in-law of Henry, and his son Robert (A.D. 1221). With the exception of Constantinople, all the remaining Byzantine territory, including Thessalonica, was conquered by John, emperor of Nice. Baldwin II., brother of Robert, under the guardianship of his colleague, John Brienne, king of Jerusalem, died in 1237. Michael Palæologus, king of Nice, conquered Constantinople in 1261, and Baldwin died in the West a private person. The sovereigns of Nice, up to this period, were Theodore Lascaris (A.D. 1204); John Ducas Patatzes, a good monarch and successful warrior (A.D. 1222); Theodore II., his son (A.D. 1259), who was deprived of the crown by Michael Palæologus (A.D. 1260). In 1261 Michael took Constantinople from the Latins. He laboured to unite himself with the Latin church, but his son Andronicus renounced the connexion. Internal disturbances and foreign wars, particularly with the Turks, threw the exhausted empire into confusion. Andronicus III., his grandson, obliged him to divide the throne (A.D. 1322), and, at length, wrested it entirely from him. Andronicus died a monk (A.D. 1328). Andronicus IV., who ascended the throne in the same year, waged war unsuccessfully against the Turks, and died A.D. 1341. His son John was obliged to share the throne with his guardian, John Cantacuzenus, during ten years. The son of the latter, Matthew, was also made emperor, but John Cantacuzenus resigned the crown, and Matthew was compelled to abdicate (A.D. 1355). Under the reign of John, the Turks first obtained a firm footing in Europe, and conquered Gallipolis (A.D. 1357). The family of Palæologus, from this time, were gradually deprived of their European territories, partly by revolt, and partly by the Turks. The sultan Amurath took Adrianople A.D. 1361. Bajazet conquered almost all the European provinces except Constantinople, and obliged John to pay him tribute. The latter was, some time after, driven out by his own son Manuel (A.D. 1391). Bajazet besieged Constantinople, defeated an army of western warriors under Sigismund, near Nicopolis, and Manuel was obliged to place John, son of Andronicus, on his throne. Timour's invasion of the Turkish provinces saved Constantinople for this time (A.D. 1402). Manuel then recovered his throne, and regained some of the lost provinces from the contending sons of Bajazet. To him succeeded his son John (A.D. 1425), whom Amurath II. stripped of all his territories except Constantinople, and extorted from him a tribute (A.D. 1444). To the emperor John succeeded his brother Constantine. With the assistance of his general, the Genoese Justinian, he withstood the superior forces of the enemy with fruitless courage, and fell in the defence of Constantinople, by the conquest of which, May 29, A.D. 1453, Mohammed II. put an end to the Greek or Byzantine empire. (Encyclop. Americ., vol. 2, p. 359, seqq.)—The events which have just been detailed are recorded by a series of Greek authors, known by the general name of Byzantine historians. Their works relate to the history of the lower empire, from the fourth century to the conquest of Constantinople by the Turks, and to the Turkish history for some period later. They display in their writings the faults of a degenerate age, but are valuable for the information which they furnish, being the principal source from which we obtain the history of the decay of the Eastern empire. The most valuable of the number are Zonarus, Nicetas, Nicephorus, and Chalcondylas. These four form a continued history of the Byzantine empire to the year 1470. Of the remaining authors, who give us histories of detached portions of this same period, the following deserve particular mention, and are given in chronological order: 1. Procopius; 2. Agathias; 3. Theophylactus; 4. Nicephorus, patriarch of Constantinople; 5. Johannes Scylitzes; 6. Anna Comnena; 7. Georgius Acropolita; 8. Georgius Pachymeres; 9. Johannes Cantacuzenus; 10. Georgius Codinus; 11. Constantinus Porphyrogenitus; 12. Ducas; 13. Anselmus Bandurius; 14. Petrus Gyllius; 15. Zosimus; 16. Georgius Phranza.—Besides editions of individual works or of entire authors, we have the united works of these writers in what is called the Corpus Byzantinum, in 27 (counted sometimes as 23) volumes folio. A much more correct edition, however, is that which was published at Paris, under the title of Corpus Scriptorum Historie Byzantine (from the royal press, 23 vols. fol.) This was reprinted at Venice, with a different arrangement of the works, in 1729–1733. These collections, however, are rarely to be found complete. The best edition will undoubtedly be that, now in a course of publication, from the press of Weber, at Bonn in Germany. It was commenced under the editorial care of the celebrated Niebuhr, aided by other eminent scholars, in 1828, and has been continued since his death. It is of the octavo form. (Pierer, Lex. Univ., vol. 4, p. 582.)

CABALĀCA, a town of Albania, on the southeastern declivity of Caucasus, near the Caspian Sea (Plin., 4, 10). Ptolemy calls it Chabala (Χάβαλα). It is thought to correspond to the modern Cabalasvar, in Georgia. (Bischoff und Müller, Wörterb. der Geogr., p. 217.)

CABALLINUM, a town of the Ædui, in Gallia Lugdunensis, southeast of Bibracte, now Châlons-sur-Saône. Ptolemy gives Caballinum (Καβαλλινον), as here written. Cæsar (B. G., 7, 42, et 90) has Cabillonum; the Itin. Ant., Cabillio; and Ammianus Marcellinus, Cabillo (14, 31).

CABIRA, I. a wife of Vulcan. She was one of the Oceanides. Her offspring, according to the Ionian school, were the deities called Cabiri. (Vid. Cabiri).—II. A city of Pontus, in Asia Minor, south of Magnopolis, and at the foot of Mount Paryadres. It was at one time the favourite residence of Mithradates. His palace, park, and preserves were still in existence when Strabo wrote, as well as a water-mill (ὀδραλέτης) erected by him, probably for the use of the mines which were in this vicinity. (Strab., 556.) It was here that Mithradates posted himself with his army, in the campaign which followed the disastrous retreat from Cyzicus, in order that he might afford succours to the neighbouring cities of Amisus and Eupatoria, besieged by Lucullus. (Appian, Bell. Mithrad., c. 78.) On his second defeat, however, it fell into the hands of that general, with several other cities. Pompey afterward enlarged the place, and changed its name to Diopolis. Pythodorus subsequently made farther improvements in this city, and, having finally fixed his residence there, bestowed on it the appellation of Sebaste. (Strab., l. c.) The modern Sireas appears to some to indicate the site of the ancient Sebaste, but belongs rather to Sebastia, at least 120 miles from Magnopolis, whereas Cabira was only 150 stadia from the latter place. We must look rather for the remains of the city of Cabira or Sebaste (Sebastopolis) on the right bank of the Lycus, between Niksar and Tchenikhe, or Magnopolis. (Cramer's Asia Minor, vol. 1, p. 311, seqq.)

CABIRI, certain deities held in the greatest veneration at Thebes and Lemnos, but more particularly in the islands of Samothrace and Imbros. Their number was not fixed, but was commonly given as four, and the names of these four were Axiurus, Aziokersus, Aziokersa, and Casmillus. Their mysteries were celebrated with great solemnity, and, according to some, with much impurity. They were supposed, among other things, to preside over metals, and were represented as small of size, with a hammer on the shoulder, and a half eggshell on the head. They were still farther deformed by projecting bellies and phallic appendages. Creuzer traces the worship of the Cabiri, in the first instance, to the Phœnicians, and makes these deities identical with the Pataeci, or Patæci, of this people. (Herodot., 3, 37.) He then proceeds to find vestiges of these same Cabiri in Upper Asia, in the name of the Pontic city Cabira; in the Mesopotamian Carræ, the medals of which place seem to associate the worship of the Cabiri with that of the god Lunus, and also in the Chaldean river Chobar or Chaboras. He discovers also in Malta, among the remains of Punic preserved in the vulgar dialect of the island, some traces of the name Cabiri in the word Qbir or Kibir, which seems to designate an ancient pagan divinity, and is now taken to denote "the devil." (Creuzer's Symbolik, par Guignaut, vol. 2, p. 286.—Münter, Religion der Carthager, ed. 2, p. 87.) Other writers believe, that they discover traces of the Cabiri in Persia, and refer to the Cabirini, or "strong men," whom the essential ideas of metallurgy and of arms would seem naturally to assimilate, either to the robust forge-men of Vulcan at Lemnos, or to the armed priests of Phrygia, Crete, and different parts of Greece. (Foucher, sur la Religion des Perses.—Mém. de l'Acad. des Inscrip., &c., vol. 29.) Others, again, have recourse to the mythology of India, and find the root of the name Cabiri in the Hindu Cuvera. (Wiford, Asiatic Researches, vol. 5, p. 297, seqq.—Polier, Mythologie des Indous, vol. 2, p. 312, seqq.) The best etymology, no doubt, is that which makes the appellation of these deities a Phœnician one, denoting "powerful," "strong," and hence the titles, Θεοὶ μεγάλοι, δυνατοί, which the Cabiri frequently received among the Greeks. With the Cabiri, viewed in this light, may be compared the Dii Potes of the augural books of the Romans. (Varro, L. L., 4, 10, p. 16, ed. Scalig.) Schelling, however (über die Gottheiten von Samothrace, p. 107, seqq.), gives a new etymology (the Hebrew Chabirim), by which the name Cabiri is made to signify "the associate deities," and he compares these deities with the Dii Consentes or Dii Complices, whose worship the Romans borrowed from the Etruri-

ans. The same learned writer compares the names Káβeipoi, Káβapoi, Kóβaζoi (which, according to him, are identical), with the German Kobold, "goblin," and finds in them all a common idea. His theory respecting the worship of the Cabiri, which he refers exclusively to Phœnician, Hebrew, and Semitic sources, differs in several important points from that of Creuzer, and has excited a great deal of attention on the continent of Europe. It is in following the footsteps of Schelling that Pictet thinks he has found, in the mythology of the ancient Irish, the worship, and even the very names, of the Cabiri of Samothrace. (Du Culte des Cabires chez les anciens Irlandais, Genève, 1824. —Compare Bibliothèque Universelle, vol. 24.) On the other hand, C. O. Müller, in a very remarkable dissertation appended to his work on Orpheus (Orpheum und die Mysterien, Beilage 2, p. 450, seqq. —Gesch. der Hellenischen Stämme, &c., vol. 1), and Welcker (Trilogie der Prometheus, Darmstadt, 1824, 8vo), reject the Phœnician, or, more properly speaking, Oriental origin of the Cabiri. The first of these writers sees in them a worship purely Pelasgic, and, up to a certain point, the primitive religion of the Greeks entire, with a distant relation, at the same time, to the Theogonies of India; the second discovers a mixture of various elements, successively amalgamated, and the most ancient of which would be the Dardan or Trojan Penates, becoming, in process of time, the Dioscuri, or else confounded with them, and at an early period transported to Rome.—According to Constant (de la Religion, vol. 2, p. 430), the Cabiri designated the two grand opposing powers in each department of nature, and represented by turns the earth and the heavens, moisture and dryness, the body and soul, inert matter and vivifying intelligence. Their number was not fixed, but varied according to the necessity under which the priests found themselves of expressing the cosmogonical powers. Their figures were at first excessively deformed; they were represented under the guise of distorted dwarfs, and under these forms were brought to Samothrace. Their worship consisted in orgies closely resembling those of the Phrygian Cybele. The Grecian mythology at length received them, and the poets, in examining their attributes, sought to ascertain which of them were susceptible of the necessary transformation. The statues of the Cabiri were placed in the port of Samothrace. They presided over the winds. Hence, with the Greeks, they became gods favourable to navigators and terrible to pirates (Nigida, ap. Schol. Germ. in imag. Gemin.). They appeared also, according to the Grecian belief, on the tops of masts, under the form of brilliant flames, to announce the end of tempests. (Diod. Sic., 4, 43.) Expressing, as they did, among other things, the opposition between light and darkness, they became with the Greeks two deities, one of whom was hidden beneath the earth, while the other shone in the skies. The Cabiri proceeded from the cosmogonical egg; and hence, with the Greeks, the new deities came forth from an egg, the fruit of the amour of Jupiter with Leda. In order, however, to nationalize them still more, they were made the tutelary heroes of Sparta, and to preside over the Olympic games. (Plut. Olymp., 3, 63, seqq.) They became identified, through Helen, with the family of the Atridae. Warlike adventures were ascribed to them. (Pausan., 3, 13.) Winged coursers were given them by the gods. (Steuch. ap. Tertull. in Spectac., p. 9, seqq.) They received the names of Castor and Pollux; and thus the hideous Cabiri became the beauteous Tyndaridae.—The whole fable of the Cabiri is singularly obscure. In Egypt they were at first five in number, in allusion to the five intercalary days necessary for completing the year. Under this astronomical point of view they had three fathers, the Sun, Hermes, and Saturn. (Plut. de Is. et Os.) In the transition from Egypt to Greece they lost this triple origin: three of them remained hidden powers, sons of the cosmogonical Jove, and of Proserpina, the passive principle of fecundity as well as of destruction: the two others took the Greek names of Castor and Pollux, and had Leda for a mother, the mistress of Olympian Jove. (Cic., N. D., 3, 21.) For, in Egypt, their mother was not Leda, but Nemesis, one of the appellations of Athyr, or the primitive night. The amour of Jupiter also has here a fantastic character, which is sensibly weakened in the Grecian fable. Not only does Jupiter change himself into a swan, but he likewise directs Venus to pursue him under the form of an eagle, and he takes refuge in the bosom of Nemesis, whom slumber seizes, and who offers an easy conquest to her divine lover. Hermes thereupon conveys the egg to Sparta, and Leda incubates it. The Greeks, rejecting altogether the cosmogonical personage Nemesis, made Leda the real mother, and the ancient Cabiri became thus a component part of the national mythology. The Ionian school, however, faithful to the principles of a sacerdotal philosophy, continued to call them the offspring of the eternal fire, Vulcan, and of the nymph Cabira, one of the Oceanides, which recalls the generation by fire and water. When astronomy was introduced into the religion of Greece, they became the star of the morning and the star of evening. It is possible to see an allusion to this idea in Homer. (Il., 3, 243.—Od., 11, 302.) At a later period they became the Twins. (Constant, de la Relig., vol. 2, p. 433, seqq., in notes.) As regards the names of the individual Cabiri, it may be remarked, that they all appear decidedly Oriental. The etymologies given to them are as follows: Axiokers is said to have signified, in Egyptian, "the all-powerful one," and he is supposed by some to be identical with Phtha or Vulcan. Axiokersus is made to denote "the great fecundator," and is thought to have been the same with Mars, the planet named in Egyptian Ertosi, a word which presents the same idea. Aziokersa is consequently "the great fecundatrix," Aphrodite or Venus, the companion of Mars. (Zoega, de Obelisc., p. 220.—Compare Münter, Antiquar. Abhandl., p. 190, seqq.) As to the fourth personage, Casmillus, the name is said to import "the all-wise" by those who trace it to the Egyptian. (Zoega, l. c.) Bochart, however, with more probability, compares it with the Hebrew Casmiel, which signifies "a servant," "a minister of the deity." (Geogr. Sacra, 1, p. 396.) Bochart gives Hebrew derivations also for the other names of the Cabiri. Schelling, more recently, proceeding on the same principle, arrives at a similar result with Bochart, but in a quite different way. (Samothrac. Gottheiten, p. 16, 17, 63, 67, seqq.) His new etymologies, however, as those of Zoega, are not regarded very favourably by De Sacy, in the note to Sainte Croix's work, Mystères du Paganisme, vol. 1, p. 43. Münter defends the explanations of Zoega, and maintains, in general, with Creuzer, the Egyptian origin of the Cabiri. He inclines, however, to consider the last of the four, Casmillus, as of Phœnician origin, and explains it with Schelling, in a more simple manner than Bochart, by the term Cadmiel, "he who stands before the deity," or "who beholds the face of the deity." (Religion der Chathager, 2d ed., p. 89, seqq.) Müller, Welcker, Schwenk, and Völcker have explored the Greek language alone for an elucidation of these mysterious names. And yet the first of these learned writers, in spite of his purely Hellenic system, cannot prevent himself from being struck by the remarkable coincidence, as well real as verbal, between Cama, the Hindu god of love, and Casmillus (Creuzer's Symbolik, par Guigniaut, vol. 2, p. 293, seqq., in notes.)

CABIRIA, I. a surname of Ceres.—II. The festivals of the Cabiri. (Vid. Cabiri.)

CACA, a goddess among the Romans, sister to Ca-

cus, who, according to one version of the fable, became enamoured of Hercules, and showed the hero where her brother had concealed his oxen. For this she was deified. She had a chapel (sacellum) at Rome, with a sacred fire continually burning in it, and vestal virgins to perform her rites. (Lactant., 1, 20, p. 110, ed. Gall.—Serv. ad Virg., Æn., 8, 190.)

CACUS, a famous robber, son of Vulcan, represented in fable as of gigantic size, and vomiting forth smoke and fire. He inhabited the gloomy recesses of the forest on Mount Aventine, and a deep cave there was his dwelling-place, the entrance to which was hung around with human heads and limbs. He plundered and kept in continual alarm the neighbouring country; and, when Hercules returned from the conquest of Geryon, he stole some of his cows, and dragged them backward into his cave to prevent discovery. Hercules, after having enjoyed the hospitality of Evander, was preparing to depart, without being aware of the theft; but his oxen, having lowed, were answered by the cows in the cave of Cacus, and the hero thus became acquainted with the loss he had sustained. He ran to the place, attacked Cacus, and strangled him in his arms, though vomiting fire and smoke. Hercules erected an altar to Jupiter, in commemoration of his victory; and an annual festival was instituted by the inhabitants in honour of the hero who had delivered them from such a pest. (Ovid, Fast., 1, 551.—Virg., Æn., 8, 194.—Propert., 4, 10.—Juv., 5, 125.—Liv., 1, 7.—Dionys. Hal., 1, 9.) The allegorical character of the fable here related is sufficiently indicated by the names of the parties. Thus Evander, who received Hercules on his return from the conquest of Geryon, and Cacus (in Greek Εὐανδρος and Κακός), seem to be nothing more than appellations intended to characterize the individuals to whom they are applied: Evander, therefore, the leader of the Pelasgi, the head and chief of the division of that great sacerdotal caste which passed into Italy, and, consequently, to apply a modern term, the high-priest of the order, is the Good Man (εὐανδρος), and Cacus, his opponent, is the Bad Man (κακός). Hercules destroys Cacus, that is, the solar worship, or some other Oriental system of belief professed by the Pelasgi, was made to supplant some rude and probably cruel form of worship; and as Evander was high-priest of the one, so Cacus, whoever he was, may be regarded as the head of the other. (Compare Ritter, Vorhalle, p. 343, seqq.)

CACETHIS, a river in India; according to Mannert, the Gumty, which falls into the Ganges, to the north of Benares. (Geogr., vol. 5, pt. 1, p. 93.)

CADMEÆ, the citadel of Thebes, fabled to have been built by Cadmus. It represents very evidently the early city, built upon a height, around which the later city of Thebes was subsequently erected, and then the former answered for a citadel, as in the case of the Acropolis of Athens. Of the walls of the Cadmea, a few fragments remain, which are regularly constructed. These were probably erected by the Athenians, when Cassandra restored the city of Thebes. (Dodwell's Travels, vol. 1, p. 264.)

CADMÆIS, an ancient name of Bœotia.

CADMUS, 1. son of Agenor, king of Phœnicia, by Telephassa, was sent by his father, along with his brothers Phenix and Cilix, in quest of their sister Europa, who had been carried off by Jupiter, and they were ordered not to return until they had found her. The brothers were accompanied by their mother, and by Thasus, a son of Neptune. Their search was to no purpose: they could get no intelligence of their sister; and, fearing the indignation of their father, they resolved to settle in various countries. Phenix thereupon established himself in Phœnicia, Cilix in Cilicia, and Cadmus and his mother went to Thrace, where Thasus founded a town also named after himself. (Apollod., 3, 1, 1.)—Compare the somewhat different genealogy given by Pherecydes. (Schol. ad Apoll. R., 3, 1179.) After the death of his mother, Cadmus went to Delphi, to inquire of the oracle respecting Europa. The god desired him to cease from troubling himself about her, but to follow a cow as his guide, and to build a city where she should lie down. On leaving the temple, he went through Phœcis, and meeting a cow belonging to the herds of Pelagon, he followed her. She went through Bœotia till she came to where Thebes afterward stood, and there lay down. Wishing to sacrifice her to Minerva, Cadmus sent his companions to fetch water from the fountain of Mars, but the fount was guarded by a serpent, who killed the greater part of them. Cadmus then engaged and destroyed the serpent. By the direction of Minerva he sowed its teeth, and immediately a crop of armed men sprang up, who slew each other, either quarrelling or through ignorance; for it is said that when Cadmus saw them rising he flung stones at them; and they, thinking it was done by some of themselves, fell upon and slew each other. Five only survived, Echion (Viper), Udaeus (Groundly), Chthonius (Earthly), Hyperenor (Mighty), and Pelor (Huge). These were called the Sown (σπαύροι); and they joined with Cadmus to build the city. For killing the sacred serpent Cadmus was obliged to spend a year in servitude to Mars. At the expiration of that period, Minerva herself prepared for him a palace, and Jupiter gave him Harmonia, the daughter of Mars and Venus, in marriage. All the gods, quitting Olympus, celebrated the nuptials in the Cadmea, the palace of Cadmus. The bridegroom presented his bride with a magnificent robe, and a collar, the work of Vulcan, given to him, it is said, by the divine artist himself. Harmonia became the mother of four daughters, Semele, Autonoe, Ino, and Agave, and one son, Polydorus. After the various misfortunes which befell their children, Cadmus and his wife quitted Thebes, now grown odious to them, and migrated to the country of the Enebelians; who, being harassed by the incursions of the Illyrians, were told by the oracle that, if they made Cadmus and Harmonia their leaders, they should be successful. They obeyed the god, and his prediction was verified. Cadmus became king of the Illyrians, and had a son named Illyrius. Shortly afterward he and Harmonia were changed into serpents, and sent by Jupiter to the Elysian plain, or, as others said, were conveyed thither in a chariot drawn by serpents. (Apollod., 3, 4.—Apoll. R., 4, 517.—Ovid, Met., 4, 563, seqq.—Nonnus, 44, 115.)—The myth of Cadmus is, by its relation to history, one of considerable importance. It is usually regarded as offering a convincing proof of the fact of colonies from the East having come to Greece, and having introduced civilization and the arts. An examination, however, of the legend, in this point of view, will hardly warrant such an opinion. In the Iliad, though the Cadmeans are spoken of more than once, not the slightest allusion is made to Cadmus. In the Odyssey, the sea-goddess Ino-Leucothoe is said to have been a mortal, and daughter to Cadmus. (Od., 5, 333.) Hesiod says that the goddess Harmonia was married to Cadmus in Thebes. (Theog., 937, 975.) Pindar frequently speaks of Cadmus; he places him with the Grecian heroes, Peleus and Achilles, in the island of the blessed (Ol., 2, 132); but it is very remarkable that this Theban poet never hints even at his Phœnician origin. It was an article, however, of general belief in Pindar's time. There is a curious coincidence between the name Cadmus and the Semitic term for the east, Kedem, and this may in reality be the sole foundation for the notion of a Phœnician colony at Thebes; for none of the usual evidences of colonization are to be found. We do not, for example, meet with the slightest trace of Phœnician influence in the language, manners, or institutions of Bœotia. It is farther a thing most incredible, that a seafaring, commercial people like the Phœnicians should have selected, as the site of their very earliest foreign settlement, a place situated in a rich fertile valley, away from the sea, and only adapted for agriculture, without mines, or any of those objects of trade which might tempt a people of that character. It is also strange, that the descendants of these colonists should have so entirely put off the Phœnician character as to become noted in after ages for their dislike of trade of any kind. We may, therefore, now venture to dismiss this theory, and seek a Grecian origin for Cadmus. (Müller, Orchomenus, p. 113, seq.)—Homer and Hesiod call the people of Thebes Cadmeans or Cadmeanians, and the country the Cadmean land; the citadel was at all times named the Cadmea. Cadmus is therefore apparently (like Pelasgus, Dorus, Ion, Thessalus, and so many others) merely a personification of the name of the people. Again, Cadmilos or Cadmus was a name of Mercury in the mysteries of Samothrace, which were instituted by the Tyrrhenian Pelasgi, who, at the time of the Dorian migration, being driven from Bœotia, settled on the islands in the north of the Ægean. The name Cadmus, moreover, occurs only at Thebes and Samothrace; Harmonia also was an object of worship in this last place, and the Cabiri were likewise worshipped at Thebes. Now, as the word Κάδμος may be deduced from κάω, "to adorn" or "order," and answers exactly to Κόσμος, the name of the chief magistrate in Crete, it has been inferred, that Cadmus-Hermes, i. e., Hermes, the Regulator or Disposer, a cosmogonic power, gave name to a portion of the Pelasgic race, and that, in the usual manner, the god was made a mortal king. (Müller, Orchomenus, p. 461, seq.—Id., Prolegom., p. 146, seq.—Keightley's Mythology, p. 325, seq.)

—The ancient tradition was, that Cadmus brought sixteen letters from Phœnicia to Greece, to which Palamedes added subsequently four more, θ, ξ, φ, χ, and Simonides, at a still later period, four others, ζ, η, ψ, ω. The traditional alphabet of Cadmus is supposed to have been the following: A, B, Γ, Δ, E, F, I, K, Λ, M, N, O, Π, P, Σ, T, and the names were, Ἀλφά, Βήτα, Γάμμα, Δέλτα, Εἰ, Φαῦ, Ἰώτα, Κάππα, Λάβδα, Μῦ, Νῦ, Οὐό, Πι, Ρῶ, Σίγμα, Ταῦ. The explanation which has just been given to the myth of Cadmus, and its connexion with the Pelasgi, has an important bearing on the question relative to the existence of an early Pelasgic alphabet in Greece, some remarks on which will be found under the article Pelasgi.—II. A native of Miletus, who flourished about 520 B.C. Pliny (7, 56) calls him the most ancient of the logographi. In another passage (5, 29), he makes him to have been the first prose writer, though elsewhere he attributes this to Pherecydes. According to a remark of Isocrates (in his discourse περὶ ἀντιδόσεως), Cadmus was the first that bore the title of σοφιστής, by which appellation was then meant an eloquent man. He wrote on the antiquities of his native city. His work was abridged by Bion of Proconnesus. (Schöll, Hist. Lit. Gr., vol. 2, p. 134.)

CADUCEUS, the wand of the god Mercury, with which he conducts the souls of the departed to the lower world. In the case of the god it is of gold, hence called by the poets aurea virga, and was said to have been given him by Apollo in exchange for the lyre, which the former had invented. Commonly speaking, however, it was a wand of laurel or olive, with two little wings on the upper end, and with two serpents entwined about this same part, having their heads turned towards each other, the whole serving as a symbol of peace. According to the fable, Mercury, when travelling in Arcadia, saw two serpents fighting with one another, and threw the rod of peace between them, whereupon they instantly ceased from the contest, and wound themselves around the staff in friendly and lasting union. Böttiger, however, gives a much more rational explanation. According to this writer, the caduceus was of Phœnician origin, and what were the serpents in latter days consisted originally of nothing more than a mere knot, skilfully formed, and used to secure the chests and wares of the Phœnician traders. This knot became very probably attached, in the course of time, to a bough adorned with green leaves at the end, and the whole thus formed a symbol of traffic. Here we see also the origin of the wings. The caduceus served Mercury also as a herald's staff, and hence its Greek name κηρυκεῖον, whence, as some think, the Latin caduceus is corrupted. The term caduceus was also applied sometimes to the white wand or rod, which the ancient heralds regarded as the symbol of peace. (Consult Böttiger, Amalthæa, vol. 1, p. 104, seq.)

CADURCI, a people of Gallia Celtica, living between the Oldus or Oltis (the Olt) and the Duranum (Dordogne), two of the northern branches of the Garumna. Their capital was Divona, afterward called from their own name Cadurci, now Cahors. (Cæs., B. G., 7, 4.)

CADYTIS, a town of Syria, mentioned by Herodotus (2, 159). It is supposed by Reland to have been the same with Gath. D'Anville, Rennell, and many others, however, identify it with Jerusalem. This latter opinion is undoubtedly the more correct one, and the name Cadytis would seem to be only a corruption of the Hebrew Kedoshā, i. e., "holy city." With this, too, the present Arabic name El Kads, i. e., "the holy," clearly agrees. (Rennell, Geogr. Herod., vol. 1, p. 324.—Rosenmüller, Bibl. Alterthumsk., vol. 2, pt. 1, p. 487.—Heeren, Ideen, vol. 1, pt. 2, p. 114.—Dahlman, Herod., p. 75.—Valckenær, Opusc., vol. 1, p. 152, seq.—Bähr, Excurs., 11, ad Herod., l. c.)

CÆA, an island of the Ægean Sea, among the Cyclades, called also Ceos and Cea. (Vid. Ceos.)

CÆCILIA CÆIA, or TANAQUIL. Vid. Tanaquil.

CÆCILIA LEX, I. was proposed A.U.C. 693, by Cæcilius Metellus Nepos, to exempt the city and Italy from taxes. (Cic., Ep. ad Att., 2, 9.—Dio Cass., 37, 51.)—II. Another, called also Didia, or Didia et Cæcilia, A.U.C. 654, by the consuls Q. Cæcilius Metellus and T. Didius, that laws should be promulgated for three market-days (17 days), and that several distinct things should not be included in the same law, which practice was called ferre per satum.—III. Another, A.U.C. 701, to restore to the censors their original rights and privileges, which had been lessened by P. Clodius, the tribune.—IV. Another, called also Gabinia, A.U.C. 685, against usury.

CÆCILIA (GENS), a distinguished plebeian family of Rome, the principal branch of which were the Metelli. They pretended to have derived their origin from Cæculus, son of Vulcan.

CÆCILIVS, I. Metellus. (Vid. Metellus.)—II. Statius, a comic poet, originally a Gallic slave. (Aul. Gell., 4, 20.) His productions were held in high estimation by the Romans, and were sometimes ranked on an equality with those of Plautus and Terence, at other times preferred to them. (Horat., Ep., 2, 1, 59.—Cic., de Orat., 2, 10.—Id., ad Attic., 7, 3.—Vulgaribus Sedigitus, ap. Aul. Gell., 15, 24.) He died one year after Ennius. We possess the names and fragments of more than thirty of his comedies, in which he appears to have copied the writers of the New Comedy among the Greeks, especially Menander. (Bähr, Gesch. Rom. Lit., p. 70.)

CÆCINA, ALLIENUS, a celebrated general, a native of Gaul. He commanded at first a legion for Galba, in Germany; then he embraced the party of Vitellius, and gained him the crown by the victory of Bedriacum, where Otho was defeated. Soon after this, however, he abandoned Vitellius and went over to Vespasian. Irritated at not being promoted by the new emperor to the honours at which he aimed, he conspired against him, but was slain by order of Titus at a banquet. Some writers have thrown doubts on this conspiracy, and have pretended that Titus was actuated by a feeling of jealousy in seeing Cæcina regarded with attachment by Berenice. (Tacit., Hist., 1, 61.—Id. ib., 3, 13.—Dio Cass., 66, 16.)

CÆCUBUS AGER, a district in the vicinity of Formiæ and Caieta in Latium, famous for its wines. Pliny (14, 6) informs us, that, before his time, the Cæcuban wine, which came from the poplar marshes of Amyclæ, was most esteemed, but that at the period when he wrote, it had lost its repute, through the negligence of the growers, and partly from the limited extent of the vineyards, which had been nearly destroyed by the navigable canal begun by Nero from the Lake Avernus to Ostia. Galen (Athen., 1, 21) describes the Cæcuban as a generous and durable wine, but apt to affect the head, and ripening only after many years. When new it probably belonged to the class of rough sweet wines. It was Horace's favourite, and scarce after the breaking up of the principal vineyards. The best, and, at the same time, the oldest vintage, was the Opimian. L. Opimius Nepos was consul A. U. 633, in which year the excessive heat of the summer caused all the productions of the earth to attain an uncommon degree of perfection. (Vid. Falernum and Massicus.—Henderson's Hist. Anc. and Mod. Wines, p. 81, seqq.)

CÆCULUS, a son of Vulcan, conceived, as some say, by his mother as she was sitting by the fire, a spark having leaped forth into her bosom. After a life spent in plundering and rapine, he built Præneste; but, being unable to find inhabitants, he implored Vulcan to tell him whether he really was his father. Upon this a flame suddenly shone around a multitude who were assembled to see some spectacle, and they were immediately persuaded to become the subjects of Cæculus. Virgil says, that he was found on the hearth, or, as some less correctly explain it, in the very fire itself, and hence was fabled to be the son of Vulcan. The name Cæculus refers, it is said, to the small size of the pupils of his eyes. (Virg., Æn., 7, 680.—Serv. ad Virg., l. c.)

CÆLES VIBENNA. Vid. Vibenna.

CÆLIA LEX, was enacted A. U. C. 630, by Cælius, a tribune. It ordained, that in judicial proceedings before the people, in cases of treason, the votes should be given by ballot; contrary to the exception of the Cassian law. (Heinecc., Antiq. Rom., ed. Hanbold, p. 250.)

CÆLIUS, I. a young Roman of considerable talents and accomplishments, intrusted to the care of Cicero on his first introduction to the forum. Having imprudently engaged in an intrigue with Clodia, the well-known sister of Clodius, and having afterward deserted her, she accused him of an attempt to poison her, and of having borrowed money from her in order to procure the assassination of Dio, the Alexandrian ambassador. He was defended by Cicero in an oration which is still extant.—II. Aurelianus, a medical writer. (Vid. Aurelianus).—III. Sabinus, a writer in the age of Vespasian, who composed a treatise on the edicts of the curule ediles.—IV. One of the seven hills on which Rome was built. Romulus surrounded it with a ditch and rampart, and it was enclosed by walls by the succeeding kings. It is supposed to have received its name from Cæles Vibenna.

CÆNE, or CÆNEPŌLIS, I. a town of Egypt, in the Panopolitan nome, supposed to be the present Ghené or Kenné.—II. A town near the promontory of Tænarus: its previous name was Tænarum. (Vid. Tænarus.)

CÆNIDES, a patronymic of Eëtion, as descended from Cænus. (Herod., 5, 92.)

CÆNINA, a town of Latium, near Rome, placed by Cluverius on the banks of the Anio. The inhabitants, called Cæninenses, made war against the Romans after the rape of the Sabines. Having been conquered by Romulus, Cænina is said to have received a colony from the victor, together with Antemnæ. (Dion. Hal., 2, 36.) It is thought to have stood on the hill of Sant' Angelo, or Monticelli. (Holsten., Adnot., p. 103.)

CÆNIS, a Thessalian son of Elatus, and one of the Lapithæ. He was, according to the fable, originally a female, and obtained from Neptune the privilege of changing sex, and of becoming a warrior and invulnerable. In this new sex he became celebrated for his valour and his exploits in the war against the Centaurs. He offended Jupiter, and was changed into a bird. Virgil represents Cænis under a female form in the lower world. (Æn., 6, 448.) The name is sometimes, but less correctly, given as Cæneus. (Consult Heyne, ad Æn., l. c.)

CÆNYS, a promontory of Italy, in the country of the Brutii, north of Rhegium. It faced the promontory of Pelorus in Sicily, and formed, by its means, the narrowest part of the Fretum Siculum. (Strabo, 256.) According to Pliny (3, 10), these two promontories were separated by an interval of twelve stadia, or a mile and a half: a statement which accords with that of Polybius (1, 42). Thucydides, on the other hand (6, 1), seems to allow two and a half for the breadth of the strait, but, at the same time, considers this as the utmost amount of the distance. Topographers are divided as to the exact point of the Italian coast which answers to Cape Cænys; the Calabrian geographers say, the Punta del Pezzo, called also Coda del Volpe, in which opinion Cluverius and D'Anville coincide; but Holstenius contends for the Torre del Cavallo. This perhaps may, in fact, be the narrowest point; but it does not apparently answer so well to Strabo's description of the figure and bearing of Cape Cænys. (Cramer's Ancient Italy, vol. 2, p. 426, seqq.)

CÆRE, or, as it is always called by the Greek writers, Agylla, one of the most considerable cities of Etruria, and universally acknowledged to have been founded by the Tyrrhenian Pelasgi. (Dion. Hal., 1, 20.—Id., 3, 60.) It was situate near the coast, to the west of Veii. Ancient writers seem puzzled to account for the change of name which this city is allowed to have undergone, the Romans never calling it anything but Cære, except Virgil. (Æn., 8, 478.) Strabo (220) relates, that the Tyrrheni, on arriving before this city, were hailed by the Pelasgi from the walls with the word Xaîpe, according to the Greek mode of salutation; and that, when they had made themselves masters of the place, they changed its name to that form of greeting. Other variations of this story may be seen in Servius (ad Æn., 8, 597). According to one of them, given on the authority of Hyginus, the Romans, and not the Lydians, changed its name from Agylla to Cære. All these explanations, however, are very unsatisfactory. It has been supposed that Cære might be the original name, or perhaps that which the Siculi, the ancient possessors, gave to the place before the Pelasgic invasion. Ker is a Celtic word. (Cramer's Ancient Italy, vol. 1, p. 205.) According to Müller (Die Etrusker, vol. 1, p. 87), the two names for the place point to two different stems or races of inhabitants. This same writer makes the genuine Etrurian name to have been Cistræ. (Compare Verrius Flaccus., Etrusc. 1, ap. Interp. Æn. 10, 183, Veron.) The earliest record to be found of the history of Agylla is in Herodotus (1, 166). That writer informs us, that the Phœaciæns, having been driven from their native city on the shores of Ionia by the arms of Cyrus, formed establishments in Corsica, of which the Tyrrhenians and Carthaginians jealous of their nautical skill and enterprising spirit, sought to dispossess them. A severe action accordingly took place in the Sea of Sardinia, between the Phocæans and the combined fleet of the latter powers, in which the former gained the day; but it was such a victory as left them little room for exultation, they having lost several of their ships, and the rest being nearly all disabled. The Agylleans, who appear to have constituted the principal force of the Tyrrhenians, on their return home landed their prisoners and barbarously stoned them to death; for which act of cruelty they were soon visited by a strange calamity. It was observed, that all the living creatures which approached the spot where the Phocæans had been murdered, were immediately seized with convulsive distortions and paralytic affections of the limbs. On consulting the oracle at Delphi, to learn how they might expiate their offence, the Agylleans were commanded to celebrate the obsequies of the dead, and to hold games in their honour; which order, the historian informs us, was punctually attended to up to his time. We learn also from Strabo (220), that the Agylleans enjoyed a great reputation for justice among the Greeks; for, though very powerful, and able to send out large fleets and numerous armies, they always abstained from piracy, to which the other Tyrrhenian cities were much addicted. According to Dionysius, the Romans were first engaged in hostilities with Cære under the reign of Tarquin the Elder, and subsequently under Servius Tullius, by whom a treaty was concluded between the two states (3, 28). Long after, when Rome had been taken by the Gauls, the inhabitants of Cære rendered the former city an important service, by receiving their priests and vestals, and defeating the Gauls on their return through the Sabine territory; on which occasion they recovered the gold with which Rome is said to have purchased its liberation. This is a curious fact, and not mentioned by any historian; but it agrees very well with the account which Polybius gives us of the retreat of the Gauls (1, 6). In return for this assistance, the Romans requited the Cærites by declaring them the public guests of Rome, and admitting them, though not in full, to the rights enjoyed by her citizens. They were made citizens, but without the right of voting; whence the phrases, in Cæritum tabulas referre aliquem, "to deprive one of his right of voting," and Cæritæ cera digni, "worthless persons," in reference to citizens of Rome, since what would be an honour to the people of Cære would be a punishment to a native Roman citizen. (Cramer's Ancient Italy, vol. 1, p. 207.)—"It is a weak notion of Strabo," observes Niebuhr, "that the Romans had acted ungratefully in not admitting the Cærites to a higher franchise. It was not in their power to do so, unless the Cærites themselves preferred renouncing the independence of their state, receiving their landed property from the republic, according to the Roman law, and forming a new tribe; and this they were certainly far from wishing at that time, as fortune had been more favourable to them in the Gallic war than to Rome; if, indeed, the Roman citizenship were really conferred on the Cærites at this time, and not considerably earlier, in the flourishing days of the ancient Agylla." (Roman History, vol. 1, p. 403, Walter's transl.) In the first edition of his work (vol. 1, p. 193, seqq. in notis), Niebuhr starts the bold hypothesis, that Cære was the parent city of Rome. In the second edition, however (Cambridge transl.), this theory is silently withdrawn.

CÆSAR, a surname given to the Julian family at Rome, for which various etymologies have been assigned. Pliny (7, 9) informs us, that the first who bore the name was so called, quod cæso mortuæ matris utero natus fuerit. Festus derives it from cæsaries, cum qua e matris ventre prodierit. Others, because the first of the name slew an elephant, which was called cæsa in Punic, as Servus informs us (ad Æn., 1, 290). The derivation of Pliny is generally considered the best. The nobility of the Julian family was so ancient and so illustrious, that, even after it obtained the imperial dignity, it needed not the exaggeration of flatterers to exalt it. Within thirty years after the commencement of the republic, we find the name of C. Julius on the list of consuls, and the same person, or a relation of the same name, is said to have been one of the Decemviri by whom the laws of the twelve tables were compiled. It numbered, after this, several other individuals who attained to the offices of prætor and consul, one of whom, L. Julius Cæsar, distinguished himself in the Italian war by a great victory over the Samnites, and was afterward murdered by order of Marius. Another, of the same line, C. Julius Cæsar, the brother of Lucius, was eminent as a public speaker for his wit and pleasantry, and perished together with the former when Marius and Cinna first assumed the government.—The most illustrious of the name, however, was C. JULIUS CÆSAR, born July (Quintilis) 10th, B.C. 100. His father was C. Julius Cæsar, a man of prætorian rank, and is recorded by Pliny (7, 53) as a remarkable instance of sudden death, he having expired suddenly one morning at Pisa while dressing himself. C. Cæsar married Aurelia, of the family of Aurelius Cotta, and of these parents was born the subject of the present sketch. From his earliest boyhood Cæsar discovered extraordinary talents. He had a penetrating intellect, a remarkably strong memory, and a lively imagination; was indefatigable in business, and able, as we are told by Pliny, to read, write, hear, and dictate, at one and the same time, from four to seven different letters. When the party of Marius had gained the ascendancy at Rome, Cinna gave his daughter Cornelia in marriage to Cæsar. The latter was also farther connected with the popular party through the marriage of Julia, his father's sister, with the elder Marius; yet, although thus doubly obnoxious to the victorious side, he refused to comply with the commands of Sylla, to divorce his wife; and being exposed, in consequence, to his resentment, he fled from Rome, and baffled all attempts upon his life, partly by concealing himself, and partly by bribing the officers sent to kill him, till Sylla was prevailed upon, according to Suetonius, to spare him at the entreaty of some common friends. A story was afterward common, that Sylla did not pardon without great reluctance; and that he told those who sued in his behalf, that in Cæsar there were many Mariuses. Had he indeed thought so, his was not a temper to have yielded to any supplications to save him; nor would any considerations have induced him, to exempt from destruction one from whom he had apprehended so great a danger. After this, the young Cæsar proceeded to the court of Nicomedes, king of Bithynia, and on leaving this monarch, of whose intimacy with him a scandalous anecdote is recorded, he went to M. Municius Thermus, then prætor in Asia, who intrusted him with the command of the fleet that was to blockade Mytilene. In the execution of this trust Cæsar distinguished himself highly, although but twenty-two years of age. He next visited Rhodes, and studied eloquence for some time under Apollonius Molo, from whom Cicero, about the same period, was also receiving instruction. (Sueton., Jul., c. 4.—Cic., de Clar. Or., c. 91.) On the way thither he was taken by pirates, and was detained by them till he collected from some of the neighbouring cities fifty talents for his ransom. No sooner, however, was he released, than he procured a small naval force, and set out on his own sole authority in pursuit of them. He overtook the pirates, and captured some of their vessels, which he brought back to the coast of Asia with a number of prisoners. He then sent word of his success to the proconsul of Asia, requesting him to order the execution of the captives; but that officer being more inclined to have them sold as slaves, Cæsar crucified them all without loss of time, before the procursul's pleasure was officially known. Such conduct was not likely to recommend him to those in authority; and we are told that on several other occasions, he wished to act for himself (Veil. Patere, 2, 67.—Sueton, Jul, 4), and even to take part in the war which was now renewed with Mithradates, without any commission from the government, and without submitting himself to any of the regular officers of the republic. These early instances of his lawless spirit are recorded with admiration by some of his historians, as affording proofs of vigour and greatness of mind. He now returned to Rome, and became, in succession, military tribune, quæstor, and ædile. At the same time, he had the address to win the favour of the people by affability, by splendid entertainments, and public shows; and, trusting to his popularity, he ventured to erect again the statues of Marius, whose memory was hated by the senate and patricians. In the conspiracy of Catiiline he certainly had a secret part; and his speech in the senate, on the question of their punishment, was regarded by many as an actual proof of this, for he insisted that death, by the Roman constitution, was an illegal punishment, and that the property merely of the conspirators should be confiscated, and they themselves condemned to perpetual imprisonment. Soon after this he was chosen pontifex maximus, and was about to go as governor to Farther Spain; but his creditors refusing to let him depart, Crassus became his security in the enormous sum of eight hundred and thirty talents. It was on his journey to Spain that the remarkable expression fell from his lips, on seeing a miserable village by the way, "that he would rather be first there than second at Rome." When he entered on the government of this province, he displayed the same ability, and the same unscrupulous waste of human lives for the purposes of his ambition, which distinguished his subsequent career. In order to retrieve his fortune, to gain a military reputation, and to entitle himself to the honour of a triumph, he attacked some of the native tribes on the most frivolous pretences (Dio Cass, 37, 52), and thus enriched himself and his army, and gained the credit of a successful general by the plunder and massacre of these poor barbarians. On his return to Rome he paid off his numerous and heavy debts, and, in order to gain the consulship, brought about a reconciliation between Pompey and Crassus, whose enmity had divided Rome into two great parties. He succeeded in his design, and that famous coalition was eventually formed between Pompey, Crassus, and himself, which is known in Roman history by the name of the First Triumvirate (Vid Triumvir). Supported by such powerful assistants, in addition to his own popularity, Cæsar was elected consul, with M. Calpurnius Bibulus, confirmed the measures of Pompey, and procured the passage of a law for the distribution of certain lands among the poorer class of citizens. This, of course, brought him high popularity. With Pompey he formed a still more intimate connexion, by giving him his daughter Julia in marriage; and the favour of the equestrian order was gained by releasing them from a disadvantageous contract for the revenues of Asia, a step which the senate had refused to take in their behalf; and thus the affections of a powerful body of men were alienated from the aristocracy at the very time when their assistance was most needful. When the year of his consulship had expired, Cæsar obtained from the people, by the Vatian law, the government of Cisalpine Gaul and Illyricum, for five years, with an army of three legions. As the law then stood, the disposal of such commands was vested in the senate alone; but that body, wishing, no doubt, to increase the weight of Cæsar's employments abroad, and to remove him farther from the city, added to his government the province of Transalpine Gaul, and voted him another legion. After marrying Calpurnia, the daughter of Lucius Calpurnius Piso (his third wife had been divorced by him in consequence of the affair of Clodius), Cæsar repaired to Gaul, in nine years reduced the whole country, crossed the Rhine twice, passed over twice into Britain, defeated the natives of this island in two battles, and compelled them to give hostages. The senate had continued his government in Gaul for another period of five years; while Pompey was to have the command of Spain, and Crassus that of Syria, Egypt, and Macedonia, for five years also. The death of Crassus, however, in his unfortunate campaign against the Parthians, dissolved the triumvirate. About this same time, too, occurred the death of Julia, and thus the tie which had bound Pompey so closely to Cæsar was broken, and no private considerations any longer existed to allay the jealousies and animosities which political disputes might enkindle between them. The power of Pompey, meanwhile, kept continually on the increase; and Cæsar, on his part, used every exertion to strengthen his own resources, and enlarge the number of his party and friends. Cæsar converted Gaul into a Roman province, and kept governing it with policy and kindness. Pompey, on his side, elevated Cæsar's enemies to the consulship, and prevailed upon the senate to pass a decree requiring Cæsar to leave his army, and resign his government of Gaul. The latter declared his willingness to obey this mandate, if Pompey also would lay aside his own authority, and descend to the ranks of a private citizen. The proposition was unheeded, and a second decree followed, commanding Cæsar to resign his offices and military power within a specified period, or be declared an enemy to his country, and at the same time appointing Pompey commander-in-chief of the armies of the republic. An open rupture now ensued. The decree of the senate was negated by two of the tribunes, Antony and Cassius (Cæs. Bell. Civ., 1, 2, seq.); the senate, on the other hand, had recourse to the exercise of their highest prerogative, and directed the consuls for the time being "to provide for the safety of the republic." This resolution was entered on the journals of the senate on the seventh of January; and no sooner was it passed, than Antony and Cassius, together with Curio, professing to believe their lives in danger, fled in disguise from Rome, and hastened to escape to Cæsar, who was then at Ravenna, waiting for the result of his proposition to the senate. (Cic. Ep. ad Fam., 16, 11.—Plut., Vit. Cæs., c. 31.) It appears, from one of Cicero's letters (ad Att., 7, 9), written a few days before the first of January, that he had calculated on such an event as the flight of the tribunes, and on its affording Cæsar a pretext for commencing his rebellion. When it had actually taken place, the senate, well aware of the consequences to which it would lead, began to make preparations for defence. Italy was divided into districts, each of which was to be under the command of a separate officer; soldiers were ordered to be everywhere levied, money was voted from the treasury to be placed at Pompey's disposal, and the two Gauls, which Cæsar had just been summoned to resign, were bestowed on L. Domitius and M. Cossidius Nonianus. When Cæsar was informed of the flight of the tribunes and of the subsequent resolutions of the senate, he assembled his soldiers, expatiated on the violence offered to the tribunitian character, and on the attempts of his enemies to despoil himself of his dignity, by forcing him to resign his province before the term of his command was expired. He found his troops perfectly disposed to follow him, crossed the Rubicon, and, seizing on Ariminum, the first town of importance without the limits of his province, thus declared himself in open rebellion against the state. At Ariminum he met the fugitive tribunes, introduced them without delay to his army, and, working upon the feelings of the latter by a powerful harangue, soon made himself master of Italy without striking a blow, as Pompey, taken by surprise through the suddenness of Cæsar's hostile operations, and destitute of troops to meet him, had left the city with the senators, consuls, and other magistrates. Levying an army thereupon, with the treasures of the state, Cæsar hastened into Spain, which he reduced to submission, without coming to a pitched battle with Pompey's generals. He next conquered Massilia (Marseille), and then, returning to Rome, was appointed dictator by the prætor M. Æmilius Lepidus. Meanwhile Pompey had collected an army in the East, and his rival hastened to Epirus, with five legions, by land. After various operations, which our limits prevent us from detailing, the rival commanders met in the plain of Pharsalia, and Cæsar gained a decided victory. Pompey, fleeing to Egypt, was basely murdered there, while his more fortunate antagonist, hastening likewise to the East, came just in time to give an honourable burial to the body of his opponent. After settling the differences between Ptolemy and his sister Cleopatra, Cæsar marched against Pharnaces, king of Pontus, son of Mithradates the Great, and finished the war so rapidly as to have announced the result to his friends at home in those well-known words, "veni, vidi, vici" ("I have come, I have seen, I have conquered"), so descriptive of the celerity of his movements. Returning to Rome, after having thus composed the affairs of the East, Cæsar granted an amnesty to all the followers of Pompey, and gained by his clemency a strong hold on the good feelings of the people. He had been appointed, meanwhile, consul for five years, dictator for a year, and tribune for life. When his dictatorship had expired, he caused himself to be chosen consul again, and, without changing the ancient forms of government, ruled with almost unlimited authority. Then came the campaign in Africa, where the friends of the republic had gathered under the standard of Cato and other leaders. Crossing over against them, Cæsar engaged in several conflicts against these new antagonists, and at last completely defeated them at the battle of Thapsus. Fresh honours awaited him at Rome. The dictatorship was again bestowed on him for the space of ten years, he was appointed censor for life, and his statue was placed by that of Jupiter in the capitol.—From the date of Cæsar's return from Africa to the period of his assassination, there is an interval of somewhat less than two years, and even of this short time nine months were engrossed by the renewal of the war in Spain, which obliged him to leave Rome once more, and contend for the security of his power against the sons of Pompey at the point of the sword. (Vid. Munda.) He enjoyed the sovereignty, therefore, which he had so dearly purchased, during little more than one single year: from the end of July, A.U.C. 707, to the middle of the winter, a period of between seven and eight months, owing to the reformation of the calendar which he introduced during this interval; and again from October, 708, to the Ides of March in the following spring. When Cæsar again entered Rome after conquering the sons of Pompey, he was made perpetual dictator, and received the title of imperator with powers of sovereignty. The appellation also of "Father of his Country" was voted him; the month in which he was born, and which had till then been called Quintilis, was now named Julius (July), in honour of him; money was stamped with his image, and a guard of senators and citizens of equestrian rank was appointed for the security of his person. He was allowed also to wear, on all public festivals, the dress worn by victorious generals at their triumphs, and at all times to have a crown of laurel on his head. He continued, meanwhile, to conciliate his enemies, and to heap favours on his friends. Largesses were also distributed among the populace, shows of various kinds were exhibited, and everything, in fact, was done to call off their attention from the utter prostration of their liberties which had so successfully been achieved. The gross and impious flattery of the senate now reached its height. The statues of Cæsar were ordered to be carried, along with those of the gods, in the processions of the circus; temples and altars were dedicated to him, and priests were appointed to superintend his worship. These things he received with a vanity which affords a striking contrast to the contemptuous pride of Sylla. Cæsar took a pleasure in every token of homage, and in contemplating with childish delight the gaudy honours with which he was invested. It was a part of the prize which he had coveted, and which he had committed so many crimes to gain; nor did the possession of real power seem to give him greater delight, than the enjoyment of these forced, and, therefore, worthless flatteries.—We now come to the closing scene, his assassination. Various causes tended to hurry this event. Cæsar had given offence to the senate by receiving them without rising from his seat when they waited upon him to communicate the decrees which they had passed in honour of him. He had given equal offence to numbers in the state by assuming so openly not only the patronage of the ordinary offices, but the power of bestowing them in an unprecedented manner, in order to suit his own policy. On one occasion, too, as he was sitting in the rostra, Marc Antony offered him a royal diadem. He refused it, however, and his refusal drew shouts of applause from the people. The next morning his statues were adorned with diadems. The tribunes of the people took them off, and imprisoned the persons who had done the act, but they were deposed from their office by Cæsar. These and other acts, that declared but too plainly the ambitious feelings of the man, and his hankering after the bauble of royalty, gave rise to a conspiracy, of which Caius Cassius was the prime mover. Cæsar, having no suspicion of the danger which threatened him, was forming new projects. He resolved to subdue the Parthians, and then to conquer all Scythia from the Caucasus to Gaul. His friends gave out, that, according to the Sibylline books, the Parthians would be conquered only by a king, and the plan proposed therefore was, that Cæsar should retain the title of dictator with regard to Italy, but should be saluted with that of king in all the conquered countries. For this purpose a meeting of the senate was appointed for the 15th (the Ides) of March; and this was the day fixed upon by the conspirators for the execution of their plot. Cæsar, it is said, had been often warned by the augurs to beware of the Ides of March (Plut., in Vit., c. 63. —Sueton., in Vit., c. 81), and these predictions had probably wrought upon the mind of his wife Calpurnia, so that, on the night which preceded that dreaded day, her rest was broken by feverish dreams, and in the morning her impression of fear was so strong that she earnestly besought her husband not to stir from the house. He himself, we are told, felt a little unwell, and being thus more ready to be infected by superstitious fears, was inclined to comply with Calpurnia's wishes. His delay in attending the senate alarmed the conspirators; Decimus Brutus was sent to call on him, and, overcome by his persuasions, he proceeded to the capitol. On his way thither, Artemidorus of Cnidus, a Greek sophist, who had been admitted into the houses of some of the conspirators, and had there become acquainted with some facts that excited his suspicions, approached him with a written statement of the information which he had obtained, and, putting it into his hand, begged him to read it instantly, as it was of the last importance. Cæsar, it is said, tried to look at it, but was prevented by the crowd that pressed around him as he passed along, and he still held it in his hand when he entered the senate-house. When Cæsar had taken his seat, the conspirators gathered more closely around him, and L. Tillius Cimber approached him as if to offer some petition. Cæsar seemed unwilling to grant it, and appeared impatient of further importunity, when Cimber took hold of his robe and pulled it down from his shoulders. This was the signal for attack. The dagger of Casca took the lead, and Cæsar at first attempted to force his way through the circle that surrounded him. But when all the conspirators rushed upon him, and were so eager to share in his death that they wounded one another in the confusion of the moment; and when, moreover, he saw Junius Brutus among the number, Cæsar drew his robe closely around him, and, having covered his face, fell without a struggle or a groan. He received three-and-twenty wounds, and it was observed that the blood, as it streamed from them, bathed the pedestal of Pompey's statue. No sooner was the murder finished, than Brutus, raising his gory dagger, turned round to the assembled senate, and calling on Cicero by name, congratulated him on the recovery of their country's liberty. But to preserve order was hopeless, and the senators fled in dismay. (For an account of the events immediately subsequent, vid. Antonius and Brutus.)—Cæsar died in the 56th year of his age.—In his intellectual character he deserves the highest rank among the men of his age; as a general, moreover, it is needless to pronounce his eulogy. But if we turn from his intellectual to his moral physiognomy, the whole range of history can hardly furnish a picture of greater deformity. Besides being excessively addicted to gross sensualities, never did any man occasion so large an amount of human misery with so little provocation. In his campaigns in Gaul he is said to have destroyed one million of men in battle (Plut., Vit. Cæs., c. 15.—Compare Plin., 7, 25), and to have made prisoners a million more, many of whom were destined to perish as gladiators, and all were torn from their country and reduced to slavery. The slaughter which he occasioned in the civil wars cannot be computed; nor can we estimate the degree of suffering caused in every part of the empire by his spoliations and confiscations, and by the various acts of oppression which he tolerated in his followers.—Was, then, his assassination a lawful act? Certainly not. The act of assassination is in itself so hateful, and involves in it so much of dissimulation and treachery, that, whatever allowance may be made for the perpetrators, when we consider the moral ignorance of the times in which they lived, their conduct must never be spoken of without open condemnation. (Encyc. Metropol., Div. 3, vol. 2, p. 156, seqq.—Encyc. Amer., vol. 2, p. 379.)—As an historical writer Cæsar has been compared to Xenophon. Simplicity is the characteristic of both, though in Cæsar perhaps it borders on severity. We have from the pen of the Roman commander seven books of commentaries on the Gallic war, and three of the civil contest. His style is remarkable for clearness and ease, and its most distinguishing characteristic is its perfect equality of expression. It has been affirmed, by some critics, that Cæsar did not write the three books of the civil war, and even that Suetonius was the author of the seven books on the Gallic war. But Vossius has vindicated Cæsar's title to the authorship of the Commentaries as they stand in the editions, though he does not vouch for his accuracy or veracity on all occasions. The opinion that the extant commentaries are not Cæsar's may possibly have arisen from a confusion of circumstances between two works. It is believed that he wrote Ephemerides, containing a journal of his life; but they are lost. Servius quotes them, as does also Plutarch. Frontinus likewise seems to refer to them, since he relates many of Cæsar's stratagems not mentioned in the commentaries, and must in all probability have read them in the journal. (Malkin's Classical Disquisitions, p. 185, seqq.)—The question, when Cæsar wrote his commentaries, has been frequently agitated. Guischart (Mem. Crit., 539) is in favour of the common opinion, that they were written shortly after the events themselves, 1. Because Cicero, in his Brutus, a work written before the civil war, speaks of the commentaries of Cæsar. 2. Because, if Cæsar had written his commentaries after the civil war was ended, there would not have been a lacuna after the sixth book, to be supplied by Hirtius. 3. Because Cæsar had little leisure at his disposal after the civil war.—Cæsar wrote other books, especially one on the analogies of the Latin tongue. A few fragments remain, which do not impress us with a very high opinion of this performance. It was entitled De Analogia, and was written, as we are informed by Suetonius, while Cæsar was crossing the Alps, on his return to the army from Hither Gaul, where he had been to attend the assembly of that province. (Suet., Jul., 56.) In this book, the great principle established by him was, that the proper choice of words formed the foundation of eloquence (Cicero, Brut., 72); and he cautioned authors and public speakers to avoid as a rock every unusual word or unwonted expression. (Aul. Gell., 7, 9.)—There were also several useful and important works accomplished under the eye and direction of Cæsar, such as the graphic survey of the whole Roman empire. Extensive as their conquests had been, the Romans hitherto had done almost nothing for geography, considered as a science. Their knowledge was confined to the countries they had subdued, and these they only regarded in the view of the levies they could furnish and the taxations they could endure. Cæsar was the first who formed more exalted views. Æthicus, a writer of the fourth century, informs us, in the preface to his Cosmographia, that this great man obtained a senatus consultum, by which a geometrical survey and measurement of the whole Roman empire was committed to three geometers. Zenodorus was charged with the eastern, Polyetetus with the southern, and Theodotus with the northern provinces. Their scientific labour was immediately commenced, but was not completed till more than thirty years after the death of him with whom the undertaking had originated. The information which Cæsar had received from the astronomer Sosigenes in Egypt, enabled him to alter and amend the Roman calendar. The computation he adopted has been explained by Scaliger and Gassendi, and it has been since maintained, with little farther alteration than that of the style introduced by Pope Gregory. When we consider the imperfections of all mathematical instruments in the time of Cæsar, and the total want of telescopes, we cannot but view with admiration, not unminged with astonishment, that comprehensive genius which, in the infancy of science, could surmount such difficulties, and arrange a system that experienced but a trifling derangement in the course of sixteen centuries.—Although Cæsar wrote with his own hand only seven books of the Gallic campaigns, and the history of the civil wars till the death of his great rival, it seems highly probable that he revised the last or eighth book of the Gallic war, and communicated information for the history of the Alexandrian and African expeditions, which are now usually published along with his own commentaries, and may be considered as their supplement or continuation. The author of these works, which nearly complete the interesting story of the campaigns of Cæsar, was Aulus Hirtius, one of his most zealous followers and most confidential friends. The eighth book of the Gallic war contains the account of the renewal of the contest by the states of Gaul after the surrender of Alesia, and of the different battles that ensued, at most of which Hirtius was personally present, till the final pacification, when Cæsar, learning the designs which were forming against him at Rome, set out for Italy. Cæsar, in the conclusion of the third book of the civil war, mentions the commencement of the Alexandrian. Hirtius was not personally present at the succeeding events of this Egyptian contest, in which Cæsar was involved with the generals of Ptolemy, nor during his rapid campaigns in Pontus against Pharnaces, and against the remains of the Pompeian party in Africa, where they had assembled under Scipio, and, being supported by Juba, still presented a formidable appearance. He collected, however, the leading events from the conversation of Cæsar, and the officers who were engaged in these campaigns. He has obviously imitated the style of his master; and the resemblance which he has happily attained, has given an appearance of unity and consistency to the whole series of these well-written and authentic memoirs. It appears that Hirtius carried down the history even to the death of Cæsar: for in his preface addressed to Balbus, he says that he had brought down what was left imperfect from the transactions at Alexandria to the end, not of the civil dissensions, to a termination of which there was no prospect, but of the life of Cæsar. This latter part, however, of the Commentaries of Hirtius, has been lost. It seems now to be generally acknowledged that he was not the author of the book De Bello Hispanico, which relates Cæsar's second campaign in Spain, undertaken against young Cneius Pompey, who, having assembled, in the ulterior province of that country, those of his father's party who had survived the disasters in Thessaly and Africa, and being joined by some of the native states, presented a formidable resistance to the power of Cæsar, till his hopes were terminated by the decisive battle of Munda. Dodwell, indeed, in his Dissertation De auctore Belli Gallici, &c., maintains, that it was originally written by Hirtius, but was interpolated by Julius Celsus, a Constantinopolitan writer of the sixth or seventh century. Vossius, however, whose opinion is the one more commonly received, attributes it to Caius Oppius, who wrote the Lives of Illustrious Captains, and also a book to prove that the Egyptian Cæsarion was not the son of Cæsar. (Dunlop's Roman Literature, vol. 2, p. 191, seqq.) The best editions of Cæsar's Commentaries are, the magnificent one by Dr. Clarke, fol., Lond., 1712; that of Cambridge, with a Greek translation, 4to, 1727; that of Oudendorp, 2 vols. 4to, L. Bat., 1737; that of the Elzevirs, 8vo, L. Bat., 1635; that of Oberlinus, Lips., 1819, 8vo; and that of Achainre and Lemaire, Paris, 4 vols. 8vo, 1819-22.—II. The name Cæsar became a title of honour for the Roman emperors, commencing with Augustus, and at a later period designated also the presumptive heirs to the empire. (Vid. Augustus.)—III. The twelve Cæsars, as they are styled in history, were Julius Cæsar, Augustus, Tiberius, Caligula, Claudius, Nero, Galba, Otho, Vitellius, Vespasian, Titus, Domitian. These succeeded each other in the order which we have mentioned. The true line of the Cæsars, however, terminated in Nero.

CÆSARAUGUSTA, a town of Hispania Tarraconensis, now Saragossa, so called from its founder, Augustus Cæsar, by whom it was built on the banks of the river Iberus, on the site of the ancient city Subduba. It was the birthplace of the poet Prudentius. (Isidor., Hisp. Etymol., 15, 1.—Manner, Geogr., vol. 1, p. 428.)

CÆSARĒA, the principal city of Samaria, situate on the coast, and anciently called Turris Stratonis, "Strato's tower." Who this Strato was is not clearly ascertained. In the preface to the Novels it is stated that he came from Greece and founded this place; an event which took place probably under the reign of Seleucus, the first king of Syria. The first inhabitants were Syrians and Greeks. (Joseph., Ant. Jud., 20, 6.) It was subsequently made a magnificent city and port by Herod, who called it Cæsarea in honour of Augustus; and it now began to receive Jews among its inhabitants. Frequent contentions hence arose, in consequence of the diversity of faiths that prevailed within its walls. Here the Roman governor resided, and a Roman garrison was continually kept. Vespasian, after the Jewish war, settled a Roman colony in it, with the additional title of Colonia prima Flavia. (Ulpian, 1, de cens.) In later times it became the capital of Palæstina Prima. This city is frequently mentioned in the New Testament. Here King Agrippa was smitten, for neglecting to give God the praise when the people loaded him with flattery. Here Cornelius, the centurion, was baptized; and also Philip, the deacon, with his four daughters; and here Agabus, the prophet, foretold to Paul that he would be bound at Jerusalem. (Acts, 8, 10.) The modern name of the place is Kaisarich. It was the birthplace of Eusebius.—II. The capital of Mauritania Cæsariensis, and a place of some note in the time of the Roman emperors. It was originally called Iol, but was beautified at a subsequent period by Juba, who made it his residence, and changed its name to Cæsarea, in honour of Augustus. This city was situate on the coast, to the west of Saldæ, and, according to D'Anville, its remains are to be found at the modern harbour of Vacur. (Plin., 5, 2.—Mela, 1, 6.—Strab., 571.)—III. Ad Argæum, the capital of Cappadocia, called by this name in the reign of Tiberius, previously Mazaca. It was situate at the foot of Mount Argæus, as its name indicates, and was a place of great antiquity, its foundation having even been ascribed by some writers to Mesech, the son of Japhet. (Joseph., Ant. Jud., 1, 6.) Philostorgius, however, says it was first called Maza, from Mosoch, a Cappadocian chief, and afterward Mazaca. (Strab., 530.) The modern name is Kaisarich. This city, as Strabo reports, was subject to great inconveniences, being ill supplied with water, and destitute of fortifications. The surrounding country was also unproductive, consisting of a dry, sandy plain, with several volcanic pits for the space of many stadia around the town. And yet it is worthy of remark, that in modern times, travellers are struck with the great quantity of vegetables offered for sale in the market of Kaisarich, and it is said that there is no part of Asia Minor which surpasses the neighbourhood for the quality and variety of its fruits. (Kinneir's Travels, p. 103.—Cramer's Asia Minor, vol. 2, p. 118.)—IV. Philippi, a town on the northern confines of Palestine, in the district of Trachonitis, at the foot of Mount Paneus, and near the springs of the Jordan. It was also called Leshem, Laish, Dan, and Paneas. The name Paneas is supposed to have been given it by the Phenicians. The appellation of Dan was given to it by the tribe of that name, because the portion assigned to them was "too little for them," and they therefore "went up to fight against Leshem (or Laish. Judg., 18, 29), and took it," calling it "Dan, after the name of Dan, their father." (Josh., 19, 47.) Eusebius and Jerome distinguish Dan from Paneas as if they were different places, though near each other; but most writers consider them as one place, and even Jerome himself, on Ezek., 48, says, that Dan or Leshem was afterward called Paneas. Philip, the tetrarch, rebuilt it, or, at least, embellished and enlarged it, and named it Cæsarea, in honour of the Emperor Tiberius; and afterward Agrippa, in compliment to Nero, called it Neronias. According to Burekhardt, the site is now called Banias. (Plin., 5, 15.—Joseph. Ant. Jud., 18, 3.—Id., Bell. Jud., 1, 16.—Sozom., 3, 21.)—V. Insula, now the isle of Jersey.

CÆSARIÏON, the reputed son of Julius Cæsar and Cleopatra. Plutarch calls him the son of Cæsar, but Dio Cassius (47, 31) throws doubt on his paternity. He was put to death by Augustus. (Sueton., Vit. Jul., c. 52.—Id., Vit. Aug., 17.)

CÆSÆRIS ARÆ, placed by Ptolemy near the Tanais, in what is now called the country of the Don Cossacks. They are supposed to have been erected in honour of some one of the Roman emperors by some neighbouring prince; perhaps by Polemo, in the reign of Tiberius. Near the source of the Tanais Ptolemy places the Alexandri Aræ, which see. (Strab., 493.—Tacit., Ann., 12, 15.—Dio Cass., 9, 8.—Mannert, Geogr., vol. 4, p. 159.)

CÆSARODUNUM, now Tours, the capital of the Turones. (Amn. Marcell., 15, 28.—Greg. Turon., 10, 19.—Sulp. Sever., Dial. 3, 8.)

CÆSAROMAGUS, I. now Beauvais, the capital of the Bellovaci. (Anton., Itin.)—II. A city of the Trinobantes in Britain, answering, as is thought, to what is now Chelmsford. It lay 28 miles north of Londinum. (Anton., Itin.) The Peutinger Table calls it Baromacus.

CÆSIA SYLVA, a forest in Germany, in the territory of the Istævones and Sicambri. It is supposed to correspond to the present forest of Heservald. (Tacit., Ann., 1, 50.—Brotier, ad Tacit., l. c.)

CÆSO or KÆSO, a Roman prænomen, peculiar to the Fabian family. Thus we have CÆSO FABIVS in Livy (2, 43), and CÆSO QUINTIVS in the same writer (3, 11). In ancient inscriptions it is more commonly written with an initial K.—The latter of the two individuals just mentioned was the son of L. Quintius Cincinnatus, and opposed the tribunes in their passage of the Lex Terentilla. He was brought to trial for this, and also for the crime of homicide that was alleged against him, but escaped death by going into voluntary exile. (Livy, 3, 11, seqq.)

CAICINUS, a river of Italy in Brutium, near the Epizephyrian Locri, and at one time separating the territories of Locri and Rhegium. It is noticed by ancient writers for a natural phenomenon which was observed to occur on its banks. It was said that the cicadae on the Locrian side were always chirping and musical, while those on the opposite side were as constantly silent. The Caicinus is supposed by Romanelli to correspond to the Amendolea, which falls into the sea about ten miles to the west of Cape Spartivento. (Cramer's Anc. Italy, vol. 2, p. 412.)

CAICUS, I. a companion of Æneas. (Virg., Æn., 1, 187.)—II. A river of Mysia, falling into the Ægean Sea, opposite Lesbos. On its banks stood the city of Pergamus, and at its mouth the port of Elæa. It is supposed by some to be the present Girmasti. According to Mannert, however, its modern name is the Mandragorai. (Pliny, 5, 30.—Mela, 1, 18.—Virg., Georg., 4, 370.—Ovid, Met., 15, 277.)

CAIETA, a town and harbour of Latium, southeast of the promontory of Circeii, which was said to have received its name from Caieta, the nurse of Æneas, who was buried there. (Virg., Æn., 7, 1.) This, however, is a mere fable, since Æneas never was in Italy. Equally objectionable is the etymology of Aurelius Victor, who derives the name from καίειν, to burn, because the fleet of Æneas was burned here: as if the Trojans spoke Greek! Strabo (233) furnishes the best explanation. It comes, according to him, from a Laconian term (κοιάττα), denoting a hollow or cavity; in allusion, perhaps, to a receding of the shore. It is now Gacta. The harbour of Caieta was considered one of the finest and most commodious in Italy. Cicero laments on one occasion that so noble a port should be subject to the depredations of pirates even in the open day. (Proleg. Man.—Compare Florus, 1, 16.)

CAIVS and CAIA, a prænomen very common at Rome to both sexes. In this word, and also in Cneius, the C must be pronounced like G. (Quintil., 1, 7.) C, in its natural position, denoted the name of the male, and when reversed that of the female: thus, C was equivalent to CAIVS; but Q to CAIA. Female prænomena, which were marked with an inverted capital, were, however, early disused among the Romans. The custom after this was, in case there was only one daughter, to name her after the gens. If there were two, to distinguish them by major and minor added to their names; if there were more than two, they were distinguished by their number, Prima, Secunda, &c. Thus we have, in the first case, Tullia, the daughter of Cicero, Julia, the daughter of Cæsar; and in the second, Cornelia Major, Cornelia Minor, &c.

CALABER. Vid. Quintus, II.

CALABRIA, the part of Italy occupied by the ancient Calabri. It seems to have been that portion of the Iapygian peninsula extending from Brundisium to the city of Hydruntum, answering nearly to what is now called Terra di Lecce. Its name is supposed to have been derived from the Oriental "Kalab" or pitch, on account of the resin obtained from the pines of this country. It was also called Messapia and Iapygia. The poet Ennius was born here. The country was fertile, and produced a variety of fruits, much cattle, and excellent honey. (Virg., G., 3, 425.—Horat., Od., 1, 31; Epod., 1, 27, 1.—Plin., 8, 48.)

CALAGURRIS. There were two cities of this name in ancient Spain, both of them in the territory of the Vascones. One was called Calagurris Fibularensis, the other Calagurris Naseica. The moderns are not yet decided which of these two cities answers to the present Calahorra and which to Loharre. It is generally thought that Calagurris Fibularensis is the modern Calahorra, but Marca is in favour of Loharre, and his opinion appears confirmed by Livy. (Petr. de Marca, 2, 28.—Liv., fragm., lib. 91, ed. Bruns., p. 27.)

CALAI'S and ZETES. Vid. Zetes.

CALAMIS, a very celebrated statuary, and engraver on silver, respecting whose birthplace, and the city in which he exercised his profession, ancient writers have given no information. The period when he flourished appears to have been very near that of Phidias. From the account given of his works by the ancient writers, he would seem to have been one of the most industrious artists of antiquity, for he executed statues of every description, in bronze, marble, and in gold blended with ivory. Cicero and Quintilian refer to his productions as not sufficiently refined, though superior in this respect to those of his predecessors. (Cic., Brut., 18, 70.—Quintil., 12, 10.—Sillig, Dict. Art., s. v.)

CALANUS, a celebrated Indian philosopher, one of the gymnosophists. He followed Alexander from India, and, becoming unwell when he had reached Persia, he desired to have his funeral pile erected. Having offered up his prayers, poured libations upon himself, and cut off part of his hair and thrown it into the fire, he ascended the pile, and moved not at the approach of the flames. Plutarch says, that, in taking leave of the Macedonians, he desired them to spend the day in merriment and drinking with their king, "For I shall see him," said he, "in a little while at Babylon." Alexander died in Babylon three months after this. Calanus was in his eighty-third year when he burned himself on the funeral pile. (Cic., de Div., 1, 23.—Arrian, et Plut. in Alex.—Ælian, V. H., 2, 41, 5, 6.—Val. Max., 1, 8.)

CALAURÆA, an island in the Sinus Saronicus, opposite the harbour of Træzene in Argolis. It obtained its greatest celebrity from the death of Demosthenes. Before that event, however, it was a place of great note and sanctity. Neptune was said to have received it from Apollo in exchange for Delos, agreeably to the advice of an oracle. (Ephor. ap Strab., 374.) His temple was held in great veneration, and the sanctuary accounted an inviolable asylum. Seven confederate cities here held an assembly somewhat similar to the Amphictyonic council, and joined in solemn sacrifices to the god. Strabo names Hermione, Epidaurus, Ægina, Athens, Prasie, Nauplia, and the Minyan Orchomenus. Argos subsequently represented Nauplia, and Sparta succeeded to Prasie. (Strab., l. c.) In this sanctuary Demosthenes, who had rendered himself obnoxious to the Macedonian sovereign, took refuge when pursued by his satellites. Here he swallowed poison and terminated his existence. (Plut., Vit. Demosth.—Pausan., 2, 33.) A monument was raised to this great orator within its peribolus, and divine honours were paid to him by the Calauræans. According to Strabo, the island of Calauræa was four stadia from the shore, and thirty in circuit. It is now called Poros, or "the ford," as the narrow channel by which it is separated from the mainland may, in calm weather, be passed on foot. The temple of Neptune was situated at some distance from the sea, on one of the highest summits of the island. Dodwell observes (Class. Tour, vol. 2, p. 276), that not a single column of this celebrated sanctuary is standing, nor is the smallest fragment to be seen among the ruins.

CALCHAS, a celebrated soothsayer, son of Thestor. He had received from Apollo the knowledge of future events; and the Greeks, accordingly, on their departure for the Trojan war, nominated him their high-priest and prophet. Among the interpretation of events imputed to him, it is said he predicted that Troy could not be taken without the aid of Achilles; and that, having observed a serpent, during a solemn sacrifice, glide from under an altar, ascend a tree, and devour nine young birds with their mother, and afterward become itself changed into stone, he inferred that the siege of Troy would last ten years. He also foretold that the Grecian fleet, which was at that same time detained by contrary winds in the harbour of Aulis, would not be able to sail until Agamemnon should have sacrificed his own daughter Iphigenia. Calchas also advised Agamemnon, during the pestilence by which Apollo desolated the Grecian camp, to restore Chryseis, as the only means of appeasing the god. He was consulted, indeed, on every affair of importance, and appears to have often determined, with Agamemnon and Ulysses, the import of the oracles which he expounded. His death is said to have happened as follows. After the taking of Troy, he accompanied Amphilocheus, son of Amphiaræus, to Colophon in Ionia. It had been predicted that he should not die until he found a prophet more skilful than himself: this he experienced in the person of Mopsus. He was unable to tell how many figs were on the branches of a certain fig-tree; and when Mopsus mentioned the exact number, Calchas retired to the wood of Claros, sacred to Apollo, where he expired of grief and mortification.—Calchas had the patronymic of Thestorides. (Hom., Il., 1, 69, &c.—Æsch., Agam.—Eurip., Iphig.—Pausan., 1, 43.)

CALEDONIA, a country in the north of Britain, now called Scotland. The ancient Caledonia comprehended all those countries which lay to the north of the Forth and Clyde. It was never completely subdued by the Romans, though Agricola penetrated to the Tay, and Severus into the very heart of the country. The Caledonians are supposed to have derived their name from the Celtic words Gael Dun, implying "the Gael (Gauls) of the mountains," i. e., "Highlanders." These Gallic tribes were driven into Scotland, from Britain, by the conquests of the Belgic or Kimric race. (Compare Adelung's Mithridates, vol. 2, p. 78.)

CALENTUM, a city of Spain, in the country of Bætica, supposed to correspond to the modern Cazalla. The ancient place was famed for making bricks of so much lightness that they floated upon the water. (Plin., 35, 49.—Vitruv., 2, 3.) This was also done at Massilia (Marseille) in Gaul, and at Pitane in Asia. (Vitruv., l. c.) According to a modern authority, the same kind of bricks are made in Italy, "de una singularissima specie di mattonc." (Fabroni, Dissert., Venezia, 1797, Svo.)

CALES, a city of Campania, to the south of Teanum, now Calevi. According to Livy (8, 16), it formerly belonged to the Ausones, but was conquered by the Romans, and colonized (A.U.C. 421). The Ager Calenus was much celebrated for its vineyards. (Vid. Falernum.)

CALETES, a Belgic tribe in Gaul, north of the mouth of the Sequana, and inhabiting the peninsula which that river makes with the sea. Their territory is now le pays de Caux, forming a part of Normandy, in the département de la Seine-Inférieure. Their capital was Juliobona, now Lillebonne. Strabo calls them Kalætoi, and hence on D'Anville's Map of Ancient Gaul they are named Calcti. Ptolemy, on the other hand, gives Kalîτες. They appear to have been ranked by Cæsar among the Armoric states, if in one part of his Commentaries (B.G., 7, 75) we read Caletes for Cadetes. They could easily have been connected with the Armoric tribes by commercial relations and affinity, and yet have belonged, by their position, to the Belgic race. (Lemaire, Ind. Geogr. ad Cæs., p. 220.—Op., vol. 4.)

CALIGŪLA, Caius Cæsar Augustus Germanicus, son of Germanicus and Agrippina, was born A.D. 12, in the camp, probably in Germany, and was brought up among the legions. (Sueton., Vit. Calig., 8) Here he received from the soldiers the surname of Caligula, from his being arrayed, when quite young, like a common soldier, and wearing a little pair of caligæ, a kind of shoe or covering for the feet used chiefly by the common soldiers. This was done in order to secure towards him the good-will of the troops. Caligula himself, however, disliked the appellation in after days, and preferred that of Caris Cæsar, which is also his historical name. Upon his father's death he returned from Syria, and lived with his mother till her exile, when he removed to the residence of Livia Augusta, his great-grandmother, whose funeral oration he delivered in public, while he still wore the prætecta. He afterward remained in the family of his grandmother Antonia until his twentieth year, when, being invited to Caprææ by the emperor, he assumed the dress proper to manhood, but without the customary ceremonies. In the court of his grandfather, his naturally mean and vicious temper appeared in a servile compliance with the caprices of those in power, in a wanton love of cruelty towards the unfortunate, and in the most abandoned and unprincipled debauchery; so that Tiberius observed, that he was breeding a second Phæthron for the destruction of the world. (Sueton., Cal., c. 10.) Tiberius had, by his testament, appointed his two grandsons, Caius Cæsar and Tiberius Gemellus, the latter the son of Drusus, joint heirs of the empire. The first act of Caligula, however, was to assemble the senate, for the purpose of declaring the invalidity of the will; and this being readily effected, and Tiberius Gemellus being declared too young to rule, Caius Cæsar Caligula was immediately proclaimed emperor. This appointment was received with the most unbounded joy both at Rome and in the provinces, and the conduct of the new prince seemed at first to promise one of the most auspicious of reigns. But this was all dissimulation on his part; a dissimulation which he had learned under his wily predecessor; for Caligula esteemed it prudent to assume the appearance of moderation, liberality, and justice, till he should be firmly seated on the throne, and freed from all apprehension lest the claims of the young Tiberius might be revived on any offence having been taken by the senate. He interred, in the most honourable manner, the remains of his mother and of his brother Nero, set free all state prisoners, recalled the banished, and forbade all prosecutions for treason. He conferred on the magistrates free and independent power. Although the will of Tiberius had been declared, by the senate, to be null and void, he fulfilled every article of it, with the exception only of that above mentioned. When he was chosen consul, he took his uncle Claudius as his colleague. Thus he distinguished the first eight months of his reign by many actions dictated by the profoundest hypocrisy, but which appeared magnanimous and noble to the eyes of the world, when he fell, on a sudden, dangerously ill, in consequence, as has been imagined, of a love-potion given him by his mistress Milonia Cæsonia (whom he afterward married), with a view to secure his unconstant affections. On recovering from this malady, whether weary by this time of the restraints of hypocrisy, or actually deranged in his intellect by the inflammatory effects of the potion which he had taken (Juv., Sat., 6, 614), the emperor threw off all appearance of virtue and moderation, as well as all prudent considerations, and acted on every occasion with the mischievous violence of unbridled passions and wanton power, so that the tyranny of Tiberius was forgotten in the enormities of Caligula. (Senec., Consol. ad Helv., 9, c. 779.) The most exquisite tortures served him for enjoyments. During his meals he caused criminals, and even innocent persons, to be stretched on the rack and beheaded: the most respectable persons were daily executed. In the madness of his arrogance he even considered himself a god, and caused the honours to be paid to him which were paid to Apollo, to Mars, and even to Jupiter. He built a temple to his own divinity. At one time he wished that the whole Roman people had but one head, that he might be able to cut it off at a single blow. He frequently repeated the words of an old poet, Oderint dum metuant. One of his greatest follies was the building of a bridge of vessels between Baiæ and Puteoli, in imitation of that of Xerxes over the Hellespont. He himself consecrated this grand structure with great splendour; and, after he had passed the night following in a revel with his friends, in order to do something extraordinary before his departure, he caused a crowd of persons, without distinction of age, rank, or character, to be seized, and thrown into the sea. On his return he entered Rome in triumph, because, as he said, he had conquered nature herself. After this he made preparations for an expedition against the Germans, passed with more than 200,000 men over the Rhine, but returned after he had travelled a few miles, and that without having seen an enemy. Such was his terror, that, when he came to the river, and found the bridge obstructed by the crowd upon it, he caused himself to be passed over the heads of the soldiers. He then went to Gaul, which he plundered with unexampled rapacity. Not content with the considerable booty thus obtained, he sold all the property of his sisters Agrippina and Livilla, whom he banished. He also sold the furniture of the old court, the clothes of Augustus, Agrippina, &c. Before he left Gaul he declared his intention of going to Britain. He collected his army on the coast, embarked in a magnificent galley, but returned when he had hardly left the land, drew up his forces, ordered the signal of battle to be sounded, and commanded the soldiers to fill their helmets with shells, while he cried out, "This booty, ravished from the sea, is fit for my palace and the capitol." When he returned to Rome he was desirous of a triumph on account of his achievements, but contented himself with an ovation. Discontented with the senate, he resolved to destroy the greater part of the members, and the most distinguished men of Rome. This is proved by two books which were found after his death, wherein the names of the proscribed were noted down, and of which one was entitled Gladius (Sword), and the other Pugillus

(Dagger). He became reconciled to the senate again when he found it worthy of him. He supported public brothels and gaming-houses, and received himself the entrance-money of the visitors. His horse, named Inciatus, was his favourite. This horse he made one of his priests, and, by way of insult to the republic, declared it also consul. It was kept in an ivory stable, and fed from a golden manger; and, when it was invited to feast at the emperor's table, gilt corn was served up in a golden basin of exquisite workmanship. He had even the intention of destroying the poems of Homer, and was on the point of removing the works and images of Virgil and Livy from all libraries: those of the former, because, as he said, he was destitute of genius and learning; those of the latter, because he was not to be depended upon as an historian. Caligula's morals were, from his youth upward, abominably corrupt. After he had married and repudiated several wives, Cæsonia retained a permanent hold on his affections. A number of conspirators, at the head of whom were Chærea and Cornelius Sabinus, both tribunes of the prætorian cohorts, murdered him in the 29th year of his age, and the fourth of his tyrannical reign, A.D. 41. (Crevier, Hist. des Emp. Rom., vol. 2, p. 1, seqq.—Encyclop. Americ., vol. 2, p. 405, seqq.—Encyclop. Metropol., div. 3, vol. 2, p. 434, seqq.)

CALLAICI or CALLÆCI, a people of Spain, in the northwestern part of the country. They inhabited what is now Gallicia, together with the Portuguese provinces of Entre-Douro-y-Minho and Tras-los-Montes. (Eutrop., 4, 19.—Sil. Ital., 3, 352.—Plin., 3, 3.—Inscript., ap. Gruter.)

CALLE or CALÆ, a seaport town of the Callaici, at the mouth of the Durus. It is now Oporto. From Portus Calles comes, by a corruption, the name of modern Portugal. (Sil. Ital., 12, 525.—Vell. Pat., 1, 14.—Cic., Agrar., 2, 31.)

CALLIAS, a rich Athenian, who offered to release Cimon, son of Miltiades, from prison, into which he had been thrown through inability to pay his father's fine, if he would give him the hand of Elpinice, Cimon's sister and wife. Cimon consented, but with great reluctance. He was afterward charged with having violated the terms of his agreement with Callias, which was looked upon by the Athenians as adultery on his part, Elpinice having become the property of another. This custom of marrying sisters at Athens extended, according to Philo Judæus, only to sisters by the same father, and was forbidden in the case of sisters by the same mother. Elpinice was taken in marriage by Cimon, because, in consequence of his extreme poverty, he was unable to provide a suitable match for her. The Lacedæmonians were forbidden to marry any of their kindred, whether in the direct degrees of ascent or descent; but in the case of a collateral it was allowed. Several of the barbarous nations seem to have been less scrupulous on this head; the Persians especially were remarkable for such unnatural unions. (C. Nep. in Plut. in Cim.)

CALLICOLONE, a hill in the district of Troas, deriving its name (καλή κολῶνη) from the pleasing regularity of its form, and the groves by which it seems for ages to have been adorned. It is mentioned by Homer in the 20th book of the Iliad (v. 53 and 151). Strabo informs us, from Demetrius of Scepsis, that it was ten stadia from the village of the Ilians (Ἰλίων κῶμη), which would make it forty stadia from Troy itself. It was situate to the northwest of this city, near the banks of the Simois. (Compare Le Chevalier's Map of the Plain of Troy, and the note of Heyne to the 262d page of the German translation of Le Chevalier's works on this subject. Consult also Clarke's Travels, vol. 3, p. 119, Lond., 8vo ed.)

CALLICRATES, I. an Athenian, who caused Dion to be assassinated. (Vid. Dion I.)—II. An officer intrusted with the care of the treasures of Susa by Alexander. (Curt., 5, 2.)—III. An architect, who, in conjunction with Ictinus, built the Parthenon at Athens, and who undertook also to complete the long walls termed σκεῖλη. (Plut., Vit. Pericl., c. 13.) He appears to have flourished about Olymp. 80 or 85. (Sillig, Dict. Art., s. v.)—IV. A sculptor, distinguished principally by the minuteness of his performances. He is mentioned as a Lacedæmonian, and is associated with Myrmecides by Ælian. (V. H., 1, 17.—Compare Galen, Adhort. ad Art., c. 9.) In connexion with this artist he is said to have made some chariots which could be covered with the wings of a fly, and to have inscribed on a grain of the plant sesamum some verses of Homer. (Plin., 7, 21.) Galen, therefore, well applies to him the epithet ματαότεχνος. Athenæus, however, relates that he engraved only large vases (11, p. 782). The age in which he lived is uncertain. (Sillig, Dict. Art., s. v.)

CALLICRATIDAS, a Spartan, who succeeded Lysander in the command of the fleet. He took Methymna, and routed the Athenian fleet under Conon. He was defeated and killed near the Arginusæ, in a naval battle, B.C. 406. He was one of the last that preserved the true Spartan character, which had become greatly altered for the worse during the Peloponnesian war, by the habit which the Lacedæmonians had contracted of fighting beyond the limits of their country. The enervating climate of Ionia had also contributed very much towards producing this result. (Xen., Hist. Gr., 1, 6, 1, seqq.—Diod. Sic., 13, 76.—Id. ib., 13, 99.)

CALLIDRŌMUS, according to Livy (36, 15), the highest summit of Mount Ceta. It was occupied by Cato, with a body of troops, in the battle fought at the pass of Thermopylæ, between the Romans, under Acilius Glabrio, and the army of Antiochus; and, owing to this manoeuvre, the latter was entirely routed. (Compare Pliny, H. N., 4, 7.)

CALLIMACHUS, I. a native of Cyrene, descended from an illustrious family. He first gave instruction in grammar, or belles-lettres, at Alexandria, and numbered among his auditors Apollonius Rhodius, Eratosthenes, and Aristophanes of Byzantium. Ptolemy Philadelphus subsequently placed him in the Museum, and from this period he turned his principal attention to poetic composition. He lived, loaded with honours, at the court of this prince, where his abilities were greatly admired. The small number of pieces, however, that remain to us, out of eight hundred composed by him, present him to us in the light of a cold poet, wanting in energy and enthusiasm, and making vain efforts to replace by erudition the genius which nature had denied him. These productions compel us to subscribe to Ovid's opinion in relation to him, "Quamvis ingenio non valet, arte valet." (Amor., 1, 15.) The principal works of Callimachus were as follows: 1. Elegies. These were regarded as his principal title to renown. The Romans, especially in the Augustan age, held them in high estimation; they were imitated by Ovid and Propertius. Among the Elegies of Callimachus two in particular were celebrated, one on the tresses of Berenice, queen of Ptolemy III., which Catullus has either translated or imitated; and the other, entitled Cydidpe, to which Ovid alludes (Rem. Am., 1, 380), and which he has imitated in his 20th Hæroid. We have only some fragments remaining of the elegies. 2. Aἵτια, "Causes," i. e., a poem, in four cantos, on the origin or causes of various fables, customs, &c. Some fragments remain. 3. Ἑκάλη, Hecale, an heroic poem, the subject of which was the hospitable reception given to Theseus, by an old female, when he was proceeding to combat the Marathonian bull. Some fragments remain. 4. Ἴβις, "the Ibis," a poem directed against one of his pupils, accused by him of ingratitude, named Apollonius Rhodius. It has not reached us. The Ibis is a bird, whose habits taught man, it is said, the use of clysters. We know not the reason why Callimachus gave this appellation to his enemy: it was done in ridicule, probably, of some personal deformity, or else from some resemblance which Apollonius bore to this bird in the eyes of his irritated master. It is in imitation of Callimachus that Ovid has given the title of Ibis to one of his poems. 5. Hymns. Of these we have six remaining; five in the Ionic dialect, and the sixth in Doric. The subject of this last is the bathing of the statue of Minerva. According to the commentators, the Doric dialect was preferred for this poem, because Callimachus composed it at Argos, where, during a certain festival, the statue of Pallas was bathed in the Inachus. Of the six hymns which we have from Callimachus, that addressed to Ceres is the best. The one in honour of Delos is in the epic style, like the hymns of the Homericidæ. 6. Epigrams. Of these we possess seventy-four, which may be regarded among the best of antiquity. The grammarian Archibius, the father, or, according to others, the son of Apollonius, wrote a commentary or exegesis (ἐξηγήσεις) on these epigrams and Marianus, who lived under the Emperor Anastasius, made a paraphrase of them in iambic verse. 7. Iambics and choliambics. Strabo refers to them, and some fragments remain.—Such are some of the principal poetic works of Callimachus. We have to regret the loss of several prose works, which would, no doubt, have thrown great light on various subjects connected with the antiquities of Greece. Such are his Commentaries, or Memoirs (Υπομνήματα); his work entitled Κρίσεις νήσων καὶ πόλεων, "The settling of islands and founding of cities;" his "Wonders of the World," Θαυμάσια, or, Θαυμάσια τῶν εἰς ἅπασαν τὴν γῆν καὶ τόπους ὄντων συναγωγῇ, &c. Callimachus did not want detractors, who occasioned him that species of torment to which the vanity of authors exposes them, and, at the same time, renders them so sensitive. A certain grammarian, named Aristophan, wrote against one of his productions; and there exists, in the Anthology, a distich against Callimachus, by Apollonius the grammarian, which is often erroneously ascribed to the author of the Argonautics.—Among the editions of Callimachus may be mentioned that of Ernesti, Lugd. Bat., 1761, 2 vols. 8vo, and that of Blomfield, London, 1815, 8vo. Brunck gave also a revised text in his Poetæ Gnomici. (Schöll, Hist. Lit. Gr., vol. 3, p. 107, seqq.)—II. A celebrated artist, whose attention was directed not only to statuary, but to engraving on gold and to painting. (Plin., 34, 8.) On account of the elegant finish of his works in marble, he was styled by the Athenians κατάτεχνος. (Vitrur., 4, 1, 10.—Compare the remarks of Sillig, Dict. Art., s. v.)

CALLIOPE, one of the Muses, daughter of Jupiter and Mnemosyne. She presided over epic poetry and eloquence, and was represented holding a close-rolled parchment, and sometimes a trumpet. She derived her name from her beautiful (silver-toned) voice, ἀπὸ τῆς καλῆς ὁπῆς. Calliope bore to Cægrus a son named Linus, who was killed by his pupil Hercules. (Apollod., 1, 3, 2.) She had also by the same sire the celebrated Orpheus. Others, however, made Apollo the sire of Linus and Orpheus. Hesiod (frag. 97) says, that Urania was the mother of Linus. (Vid. Musæ, and consult Müller, Archæol. der Kunst, p. 594, seqq.)

CALLIPATIRA, daughter of Diagoras, and wife of Callianax the athlete. According to the common account, she went with her son, after the death of her husband, to the Olympic games, having disguised herself in the attire of a teacher of gymnastics. When her son was declared victor, she discovered her sex in the joy of the moment, and was immediately arrested, as women were not allowed to appear on such occasions. The punishment to which she was liable was to be cast down from a precipitous and rocky height, but she was pardoned in consequence of the peculiar circumstances of her case. A law, however, was immediately passed, ordaining that the teachers of gymnastic exercises should also appear naked at the games. (Pausanias, 5, 6, 5.)—From an examination of authorities, it would appear that the story just told relates rather to Berenice (Βερενίκη), the sister of Callipatira. (Consult Bayle, Dict., s. v. Berenice, and Siebelis, ad Pausan., l. c.)

CALLIPHON, a painter, a native of Samos, who decorated with pictures the temple of Diana at Ephesus. The subjects of his pieces were taken from the Iliad. (Pausan., 5, 19.)

CALLIPOLIS, I. a city of Thrace, about five miles from Egospotamos. Its origin is uncertain: a Byzantine writer ascribes its foundation and name to Callias, an Athenian general (Jo. Cinnamus, 5, 3), while another derives its appellation from the beauty of the site. (Agathias, 5, p. 155.) It is certain that we do not hear of Callipolis before the Macedonian war, when Livy mentions its having been taken by Philip, the last king of that name (31, 16.—Compare Plin., 4, 11). From the Itineraries we learn, that Callipolis was the point whence it was usual to cross the Hellespont to Lampsacus or Abydos. The modern name is Gallipoli, and it is from this that the Chersonese now takes its name as a Turkish province. (Cramer's Anc. Greece, vol. 1, p. 330.)—II. A town of Sicily, north of Catania, now Gallipoli.—III. A city of Calabria, on the Sinus Tarentinus, now Callipoli. According to Dionysius of Halicarnassus (17, 4), it owed its foundation to Leucippus, a Lacedæmonian, who erected a town here with the consent of the Tarentines, who expected to be put in possession of it shortly after; but in this hope they were deceived; and on finding that the Spartan colony was already strong enough to resist an attack, they suffered Leucippus to prosecute his undertaking without molestation. (Dion. Hal., frag. ed. Angelo Maio, Mediol., 1816.) Mela styles it "urbs Graia Callipolis" (2, 4). The passage in which Pliny names this town is corrupt. (Plin., 3, 11.—Cramer's Ancient Italy, vol. 2, p. 317.)

CALLIRHÖE, I. a daughter of the Scamander, who married Tros, by whom she had Ilus, Ganymede, and Assaracus. (Il., 20, 231.)—II. A daughter of Oceanus and Tethys, mother of Geryon, Echidna, Cerberus, and other monsters, by Chrysaor. (Hesiod, Theog., 287, seqq.)

CALLISTE, an island of the Ægean Sea, called also Thera. (Vid. Thera.)

CALLISTEIA, Beauty's rewards; a festival at Lesbos, during which all the women presented themselves in the temple of Juno, and the prize was assigned to the fairest. (Athenæus, 13, p. 610, a.) There was also an institution of the same kind among the Parthians, made first by Cypselus, whose wife was honoured with the first prize. The Eleans had one also, in which the fairest man received as a prize a complete suit of armour, which he dedicated to Minerva. (Athenæus, l. c.—Cusaub. et Schweigh., ad loc.)

CALLISTHÈNES, a native of Olynthus, the son of Hero, Aristotle's sister. He was placed by the Stagiris about the person of Alexander, as a kind of instructor, or, rather, companion of his studies, and accompanied the monarch into the East. He gave offence, however, by the rudeness of his manners and his boldness of speech, and was eventually charged with being implicated in a conspiracy against Alexander. According to the common account, he was mutilated, and then carried along with the army in an iron cage, until he ended his days by poison. Ptolemy, however, wrote in his history of Alexander, that he was first tortured and then hanged. Callisthenes does not deserve the name of a philosopher, which some have bestowed upon him; he appears, on the contrary, to have been little better than a mere sophist. He wrote a history of Alexander's movements which has not come down to us, but which, from the remarks of ancient writers, does not appear to have possessed even the merit of exactness in ordinary details. (Plut., Vit. Alex.—Polyb., 12, 23.—Sainte-Croix, Ezamen, &c., p. 34, seqq.—Id. ib., p. 163, seqq.)

CALLISTO and CALISTO, called also Helice, was daughter of Lycaon, king of Arcadia, and one of Diana's attendants. Jupiter saw her, and assuming the form of Diana, accompanied the maiden to the chase, and surprised her virtue. She long concealed her shame; but at length, as she was one day bathing with her divine mistress, the discovery was made, and Diana, in her anger, turned her into a bear. While in this form she brought forth her son Arcas, who lived with her in the woods, till the herdsmen caught both her and him, and brought them to Lycaon. (Vid. Arcas.) Some time afterward she went into the temenos, or sacred enclosure of the Lycæan Jove, which it was unlawful to enter. A number of Arcadians, among whom was her own son, followed to kill her, but Jove snatched her out of their hands, and placed her as a constellation in the sky. (Apollod., 3, 8.—Ovid, Met., 2, 401, seq.—Id., Fast., 2, 155, seq.—Hygin., fab., 177.) It was also fabled, that at the request of Juno, Tethys forbade the constellation of the bear to descend into her waves. This legend is related with great variety in the circumstances. According to one of these versions, Arcas, having been separated from his mother and reared among men, met her one day in the woods, and was on the point of slaying her, when Jupiter transferred the mother and son to the skies. (Keightley's Mythology, p. 425, seq.)

CALLISTRATUS, I. a celebrated orator of Athens. Demosthenes, having heard him plead on one occasion, was so charmed by his eloquence that he abandoned all his other studies, and betook himself to oratory. He was employed on several occasions as an ambassador, but eventually met with the common fate of popular leaders, and was exiled. Retiring upon this to Thrace, he founded Datum in that country. (Plut., Vit. Demosth., c. 3.—Scylax, Periplus, p. 27.)—II. A sophist, who lived, as Heyne thinks, a little before the elder Philostratus, towards the close of the second century of our era. We have from him a description of fourteen statues, written, it is true, in the style of a rhetorician, but still containing many details of a curious nature as regards the history of ancient art. (Heyne, Opusc., vol. 5, p. 196, seqq.) The work accompanies the writings of Philostratus, and is found in all our editions of the latter.—III. A Roman lawyer, who lived during the time of Severus and Caracalla. (Biogr. Univ., vol. 6, p. 555.)

CALOR, a river of Italy, which rose in the mountains of the Hirpini, passed Beneventum, and joined the Volturnus. (Liv., 24, 14.)

CALPE, a lofty mountain in the most southern parts of Spain, opposite to Mount Abyla on the African coast. These two mountains were called the Pillars of Hercules. Calpe is now called Gibraltar, from the Arabic Gibbel Tarik (i. e., "the mountain of Tarik.") This Tarik was a Moorish general, who first led the Moors into Spain, A.D. 710.—For some remarks on the etymology of the name Calpe, vid. Abyla.

CALPURNIA, I. a daughter of L. Piso, and Julius Cæsar's fourth wife. The night previous to her husband's murder, she dreamed that he had been stabbed in her arms. According to others, she dreamed that the pinnacle had fallen, which the senate, by way of ornament and distinction, had caused to be erected on Cæsar's house. (Plut., Vit. Cæs., c.) After Cæsar's death she intrusted Antony with his private treasure, which amounted to four thousand talents, and also with the private papers of the dictator. (Plut., Vit. Ant., c. 15.)—II. Calpurnia Lex, passed A.U.C. 604, against extortion, by which law the first questio perpetua was established. (Cic. in Verr., 4, 25.)—III. Another, called also Aclia, concerning bribery, A.U.C. 686. (Cic. pro Muran., 23.)

CALPURNIUS, I. a writer of mimes, not to be confounded with the pastoral poet of the same name. (Bähr, Gesch. Röm. Lit., vol. 1, p. 118.)—II. A Christian in the time of Hadrian and Antoninus Pius, from whom we have fifty-one Declamations remaining. (Bähr, ib., p. 557.)—III. A Latin poet, a native of Sicily, and contemporary of Nemesianus, lived during the third century of our era. In the earliest editions of his works, and in all but one of the MSS., eleven eclogues pass under his name. Ugoletus, however, at a later period, guided by this single MS., undertook to assign four of the eleven to Nemesianus. In this he is wrong, for the tone and manner of these pieces show plainly that they all came from one pen. Such was the opinion of Ulpian (Præf. ad Nemesian., Eclog., p. 459.—Id. ad Nemesian., Cynege., v. 1, p. 314), with which Burmann agrees (Poet. Lat. Min., Præf., p. 4), and which Wernsdorff at last has fully established. (Poet. Lat. Min., vol. 2, p. 15, seqq.) The Eclogues of Calpurnius are not without merit, though greatly inferior in elegance and simplicity to Virgil's. They are dedicated to Nemesianus, his protector and patron, for he himself was very poor. In the time of Charlemagne these pieces were placed in the hands of young scholars. The best editions are found in the Poeta Latini Minores of Burmann, Lugd. Bat., 1731, 2 vols. 4to, and of Wernsdorff, Altemb., 1780–1799, 10 vols. 8vo. (Bähr, Gesch. Röm. Lit., vol. 1, p. 301.)

CALVUS CORN. LICINIUS, a Roman, equally distinguished as an orator and a poet. In the former capacity he is mentioned with praise by Cicero (Brut., 81.—Ep. ad Fam., 7, 24.—Ibid., 15, 51). He was also the friend of Catullus, and two odes of that author's are addressed to him, in which he is commemorated as a most delightful companion, from whose society he could scarcely refrain. The fragments of his epigrams which remain do not enable us to judge for ourselves of his poetical merits. He is classed by Ovid among the licentious writers. (Horat., Serm., 1, 10, 19.—Dunlop's Rom. Lit., vol. 1, p. 540.)

CALYCAENUS, a large and rapid river of Cilicia Trachea, which rises in the central chain of Taurus, and, after receiving some minor tributary streams, falls into the sea between the promontories of Zephyrium and Sarpedon. It is now the Giuk-sou. (Plin., 5, 27.—Liv., 38, 38.—Amm. Marcell., 14, 25.)

CALYDNÆ, I. small islands, placed by Strabo (603) between Cape Lectum and Tenedos, but not to be found in that direction. In Choiseul Gouffier's map they are laid down between Tenedos and Sigæum.—II. A group of islands, lying off the coast of Caria, to the southeast of Leros. One of the number was called Calymna. (Hom., Il., 2, 676.) Herodotus informs us (7, 99), that the Calydydians were subject to Artemisia, queen of Caria. Calymna, in modern charts, is called Calimno, and the surrounding group Kappari and Carabaghlar. (Cramer's Asia Minor, vol. 2, p. 218.)

CALYDON, a city of Ætolia, below the river Evenus, and between that stream and the sea. It was famed in Grecian story on account of the boar-hunt in its neighbourhood (vid. Meleager), the theme of poetry from Homer to Statius. We are told by mythologists that Æneus, the father of Meleager and Tydeus, reigned at Calydon, while his brother Agrius settled in Pleuron. Frequent wars, however, arose between them on the subject of contiguous lands; a circumstance to which Homer alludes. (Il., 9, 525, seqq.) From the same poet we collect, that Calydon was situate on a rocky height. (Il., 2, 640; 13, 217.) Its territory, however, was ample and productive. (Il., 9, 577, seqq.) Some time after the Peloponnesian war, we find Calydon in the possession of the Achæans. It is probable that the Calydydians themselves invited over the Achæans, to defend them against the Acarnanians. (Xen., Hist. Gr., 4, 6, 1.—Pausan., 3, 10.) Their city was, in consequence, occupied by an Achæan garrison, until Epaminondas, after the battle of Leuctra, compelled them to evacuate the place. (Diod. Sic., 15, 57.) It was still a town of importance during the Social war (Polyb., 4, 65.—Id., 5, 95), and as late as the time of Cæsar. (B. Civ., 3, 35.) But Augustus accomplished its downfall by removing the inhabitants to Nicopolis. According to Dodwell, there are yet to be seen here the remains of a city, and its acropolis, composed of magnificent walls, constructed nearly in a regular manner. (Cramer's Anc. Greece, vol. 2, p. 78, seqq.)

CALYDŌNIS, a name of Deianira, as living in Calydon. (Ovid, Met., 9, 112)

CALYMNA, an island of the Ægean, southeast of Leros. (Vid. Calydnæ, II.)

CALYPSO, a daughter of Atlas, according to Homer. (Od., 1, 52.—Id., 7, 245.) Hesiod, however, makes her an ocean-nymph (Theog., 359), and Apollodorus a Nereid (1, 2). Like Circe, she was a human-speaking goddess, and dwelt in solitary state with her attendant nymphs on an island named Ogygia, in the midst of the ocean. Her isle presented such a scene of sylvan beauty as charmed even Mercury, one of the dwellers of Olympus. (Od., 5, 72.) Calypso received and kindly entertained Ulysses, when, in the course of his wanderings, that hero was thrown upon her domains after his shipwreck. She detained him there for eight years, designing to make him immortal, and to keep him with her for ever; but Mercury arriving with a command from Jupiter, she was obliged to consent to his departure. She gave the hero tools to build a raft or light vessel, supplied him with provisions, and reluctantly took a final leave of him.—The name Calypso means "the Concealer," the poet, after his usual manner, giving her a significant appellation. As regards her island, Homer seems to have conceived Ogygia to lie in the northwestern parts of the West sea, far remote from all other isles and coasts; and he thus brought his hero into all parts of that sea, and informed his auditors of all its wonders. (Keightley's Mythology, p. 274. seq.)

CAMALODŪNUM, the first Roman colony in Britain, established under Claudius. Its situation agrees with that of the modern Malden, according to Cluver and Cellarius. (Tacit., Ann., 12, 32.—Id. ib., 14, 31.)

CAMARACUM, a city of the Nervii, in Belgic Gaul, east of Nemetacum, now Cambray (Cammerik).

CAMARINA, a city of Sicily, near the southern coast, on the river Hipparis. (Schol. ad Pind., Ol., 5, 19.) It was originally founded by a colony from Syracuse, but, proving subsequently disobedient, it was destroyed by the parent state, and the ground on which it stood was sold to Hippocrates, tyrant of Gela, as a ransom for some Syracusan captives. Hippocrates rebuilt the city; but his successor, Gelon, after having obtained the sovereignty of Syracuse, transferred the inhabitants of Camarina to the former city, and thus again was Camarina destroyed. (Herodot., 7, 156.) Dissensions in Syracuse enabled the Gelonians to rebuild Camarina; according to Timæus, in the 82d Olympiad, but according to Diodorus at the end of the 79th. This city, however, seemed destined to be still unfortunate. It again suffered from the elder Dionysius, and the inhabitants were once more obliged to become wanderers. When Timoleon, after the overthrow of tyranny, gave peace to the whole island, Camarina again revived. (Diod. Sic., 16, 82.) It suffered once more, however, in the contest between Carthage and Agathocles; and finally, in the first Punic war, was severely punished by the Romans for having admitted Carthaginian troops within its walls. From this time it remained an inconsiderable city. In the neighbourhood of the place the river formed a low island, covered at high water, but when the tide fell converted into a marsh. This marsh yielded exhalations which produced a pestilence, and the inhabitants consulted an oracle whether they should drain it. Although the oracle dissuaded them, they drained it, and opened a way to their enemies to come and plunder their city. Hence arose the proverb, from the words of the oracle, οὐ κίλει Καμαρίνα, "move not Camarina," applied to those who, by removing one evil, will bring on a greater. Nothing now remains of this city but some ruins, and the name Camarana, given by the natives to a town and a neighbouring marsh. (Virg., Æn., 3, 701.—Herod., 7, 154.)

CAMBUNĪ MONTES, a chain of mountains forming the southern boundary of Macedonia, and separating that country from Thessaly. (Liv., 42, 53.—Id., 44, 2.)

CAMBYSES, I. an early monarch of the line of the Achæmenides, the successor of Teispes, who was himself the successor of Achæmenes. He must not be confounded with Cambyses, the son of Cyrus, who was, in fact, the second of the name in the line of Persian kings. (Herod., 7, 11.—Consult Bähr and Larcher, ad loc.)—II. A Persian of good family, but peaceful disposition, to whom Astyages, king of Media, gave his daughter Mandane in marriage. (Vid. Astyages.) The issue of this union was Cyrus the Great. (Herod., 1, 46.—Id., 1, 107.)—III. The son and successor of Cyrus the Great, ascended the throne of Persia B.C. 530. Soon after the commencement of his reign, he undertook the conquest of Egypt, being excited to the step, according to the Persian account as given in Herodotus (3, 1), by the conduct of Amasis, the king of that country. Cambyses, it seems, had demanded in marriage the daughter of Amasis; but the latter, knowing that the Persian monarch intended to make her, not his wife, but his concubine, endeavoured to deceive him by sending in her stead the daughter of his predecessor Apries. The historian gives also another account besides this; but it is more than probable that both are untrue, and that ambitious feelings alone on the part of Cambyses prompted him to the enterprise. (Compare Dahlmann, Herod., p. 148.—Creuzer, ad Herod., l. c.) Amasis died before Cambyses marched against Egypt, and his son Psammenitus succeeded to the throne. A bloody battle was fought near the Pelusiac mouth of the Nile, and the Egyptians were put to flight, after which Cambyses made himself master of the whole country, and received tokens of submission also from the Cyrenæans and the people of Barca. The kingdom of Egypt was thus conquered by him in six months. Cambyses now formed new projects. He wished to send a squadron and subjugate Carthage, to conquer Æthiopia, and to make himself master of the famous temple of Jupiter Ammon. The first of these expeditions, however, did not take place, because the Phœnicians, who composed his naval force, would not go to attack one of their own colonies. The army that was sent against the Ammonians perished in the desert; and the troops at whose head he himself had set out against the Æthiopians were compelled by hunger to retreat. How far he advanced into Æthiopia cannot be ascertained from anything that Herodotus says. Diodorus Siculus, however (1, 33), makes Cambyses to have penetrated as far as the spot where Meroë stood, which city, according to this same writer, he founded, and named after his mother. His mother, however, was Cassandana. Josephus (Ant. Jud., 2, 10, 2) makes the previous name to have been merely changed by Cambyses to Meroë, in honour of his sister. (Compare Strabo, 790.) Both accounts are untrue. (Vid. Meroë.)—After his return from Æthiopia, the Persian king gave himself up to the greatest acts of outrage and cruelty. On entering Memphis he found the inhabitants engaged in celebrating the festival of the re-appearance of Apis, and, imagining that these rejoicings were made on account of his ill success, he caused the sacred bull to be brought before him, stabbed him with his dagger, of which wound the animal afterward died, and caused the priests to be scourged. (Herod., 3, 27, seqq.) Cambyses is said to have been subject to epilepsy from his earliest years; and the habit of drinking, in which he now indulged to excess, rendered him at times completely furious. No relation was held sacred by him when intoxicated. Having dreamed that his brother Smerdis was seated on the royal throne, he sent one of his principal confidants to Persia, with orders to put him to death, a mandate which was actually accomplished. His sister and wife Atossa, who lamented the death of Smerdis, he struck with a blow of his foot, which brought on abortion. (Herod., 3, 30, seqq.) These and many other actions, alike indicative of almost complete insanity, aroused against him the feelings of his subjects. A member of the sacerdotal order called the Magi availed himself of this discontent, and, aided by the strong resemblance which he bore to the murdered Smerdis, as well as by the exertions of a brother who was also a Magian, seized upon the throne of Persia, and sent heralds in every direction, commanding all to obey, for the time to come, Smerdis, son of Cyrus, and not Cambyses. The news of this usurpation reached Cambyses at a place in Syria called Ecбатана, where he was at that time with his army. Resolving to return with all speed to Susa, the monarch was in the act of mounting his horse, when his sword fell from its sheath and inflicted a mortal blow in his thigh. An oracle, it is said, had been given him from Butus, that he would end his life at Ecбатана, but he always thought that the Median Ecбатана was meant by it. He died of his wound soon after, B.C. 522, leaving no children. (Herod., 3, 61, seqq.) Ctesias gives a different account. He makes Cambyses to have died at Babylon of a wound he had given himself on the femoral muscle, while shaving smooth a piece of wood with a small knife. (Ctes., Excerpt. Pers., § 12.) According to Herodotus (3, 66), Cambyses reigned seven years and five months. Ctesias says eighteen years; but there must be some error in this. Clemens of Alexandria gives ten years. (Clem. Alex., Strom., 1, p. 395.)—IV. A river of Asia, which rises, according to Pomponius Mela (3, 5), at the base of Mons Coraxicus, a branch of Caucasus, and in the vicinity of the sources of the Cyrus. After flowing through Iberia and Hyrcania, it joins the Cyrus, and the united streams empty into the Hyrcanian Sea. La Martinière (Diet. Géog.) remarks, that there is no river in modern times answering to this description of the Cambyses. Vossius thinks that Mela intended to designate the Araxes, but the sources of this river are too far distant. Hardouin, suspecting that Ptolemy has spoken of the Cambyses under another name, believes it to be the same with the Soana of this geographer: he goes, however, too high towards the northern extremity of Albania. (Hardouin, ad Plin., 6, 13, not. 7.)

CAMERINUM, a town of Umbria, on the borders of Picenum. It was a Roman colony and a city of some note, and must not be confounded with the Camerte of Strabo, an error into which Cluverius has fallen. (Ital. Ant., 1, p. 613.) The modern name is Camerino. (Cæs., Bell. Civ., 1, 15.—Cic. ad Attic., 8, 12.—Ptol., p. 62.) Appian calls it Cameria. (Bell. Civ., 5, 50.—Cramer's Anc. Italy, vol. 1, p. 262.)

CAMERTE, a town of Umbria, between Tuder and Ameria. (Strab., 227, seq.)—Consult the remarks of Cramer, Anc. Italy, vol. 1, p. 274.)

CAMILLA, queen of the Volsci, was daughter of Metabus and Casmilla. Her father, who reigned at Priver-num, having by his tyranny rendered himself odious to his subjects, was by them expelled from his dominions, and forced to take refuge from their fury in the lonely woods. Here he bred up the infant Camilla, the sole companion of his flight; and, having dedicated her to the service of Diana, he instructed her in the use of the bow and arrow, and accustomed her to the practice of martial and sylvan exercises. She was so remarkable for her swiftness, that she is described by the poets as flying over the corn without bending the stalks, and skimming over the surface of the waves without wetting her feet. Attended by a train of warriors, she led the Volscians to battle against Æneas. Many brave chiefs fell by her hand; but she was at length herself killed by a soldier of the name of Aruns, who, from a place of concealment, aimed a javelin at her. Diana, however, who had foreseen this fatal event, had commissioned Opis, one of her nymphs, to avenge the death of Camilla, and Aruns was slain in his flight from the combat by the arrows of the goddess. (Virg., Æn., 7, 803, seqq.—Id. ib., 11, 532, seqq.—Id. ib., 11, 848, seqq.) Tasso has applied this story of Camilla to Clorinda (B. 12, stanza 20, &c.).

CAMILLUS (L. FURIUS), a celebrated Roman, called a second Romulus, from his services to his country. After filling various important stations, and, among other achievements, taking the city of Veii, which had for the space of ten years resisted the Roman arms, he encountered at last the displeasure of his countrymen, and was accused of having embezzled some of the plunder of this place. Being well aware how the matter would terminate, Camillus went into voluntary exile, although his friends offered to pay the sum demanded of him. During this period of separation from his country, Rome, with the exception of the capitol, was taken by the Gauls under Brennus. Camillus, though an exile, was invited by the fugitive Romans at Veii to take command of them, but refused to act until the wishes of the Romans besieged in the capitol were known. These unanimously revoked the sentence of banishment, and elected him dictator. The noble-minded Roman forgot their previous ingratitude, and marched to the relief of his country; which he delivered, after it had been for some time in the possession of the enemy. The Roman account says, that Camillus, at the head of an army of forty thousand men, hastened to Rome, where he found the garrison of the capitol on the point of purchasing peace from the invaders. "With iron, not with gold," exclaimed Camillus, "Rome buys her freedom." An attack was instantly made upon the Gauls, a victory obtained, and the foe left their camp by night. On the morrow Camillus overtook them, and they met with a total overthrow. His triumphal entry into Rome was made amid the acclamations of thousands, who greeted him with the name of Romulus, father of his country, and second founder of the city. After performing another equally important service, in prevailing upon his countrymen to rebuild their city and not retire to Veii, and after gaining victories over the Æqui, Volsci, Etrurians, and Latins, he died in the eighty-ninth year of his age, having been five times dictator, once censor, three times interrex, twice military tribune, and having obtained four triumphs. (Plut. in Vit.—Liv., 5, 46, seqq.—Flor., 1, 13—Virg., Æn., 6, 825.)—We have touched merely on a few of the events connected with the history of Camillus, in consequence of the strong suspicion which attaches itself to the greater part of the narrative. In no instance, perhaps, have the family-memorials of the Roman aristocracy more completely usurped the place of true history than in the case of Camillus. The part relative to the overthrow of the Gauls appears to be all a pure fiction. "For a long time past," observes Niebuhr, "no one has pursued, with any degree of faith, Livy's narrative of the arrival of the dictator Camillus in the city during the payment of the ransom-money to the Gauls, his breaking off the compact as invalid, his expelling the Gauls from the city, and then gaining a victory over them on the road to Gabii, from which no messenger escaped to carry home the tidings. Polybius, a more ancient witness, and of much greater validity, who is never partial towards the Romans, and could not be so to the Gauls, assures us that the conquerors returned home with the booty (2, 18). The story, however, was common among the Romans, that the gold which had been paid was recovered, and it is said to have been kept in the capitol, in the sanctuary of Jupiter (Plin., 33, 5), until the time of Crassus's sacrilege, and increased to double the amount by the addition of plunder. Yet, even according to Livy himself (5, 50), this Capitoline gold was no proof of it, and was rather collected from the treasures of different temples, which it was impossible to separate in order to restore them; and even the duplication might prove a replacing, according to custom, for the payment of the war-taxes. Livy thought it shocking and insufferable that the existence of Rome should have been purchased with gold; hence his narration, according to which the arrival of Camillus arrested the payment, is poetically consistent. Besides the bitter truth of Polybius, there are two other series of traditions, which do not deny the departure of the Gauls with the gold, but do not allow them to have derived any advantage thereby. Of the first class apparently is that of Pliny, already adduced; it is found most distinctly in Diodorus. According to him, Camillus recovered the ransom, and almost all the remaining booty, when relieving one of the allied towns which was besieged by the Gauls. (Diod., 14, 117.) The other story seems to have deemed it sufficient for the honour of Rome if the Gauls did not carry home the gains of their victory. It deposes as a witness to the unpalatable truth revealed by Polybius. On its authority Strabo relates of the Cæritians, that they defeated the Gauls on their return from Rome, and wrested from them the booty which they were carrying off. (Strabo, 220.) Diodorus has also the story of a victory gained by this nation over the Gauls that were returning from Apulia; he blends the two accounts together." (Niebuhr's Rom. Hist., vol. 2, p. 282, Walter's transl.—Compare the remarks of Arnold, Hist. of Rome, vol. 1, p. 547, seqq.)

CAMIRUS, a town of the island of Rhodes, on the western coast. It derived its name from a son of Cercaphus, one of the Heliade. We learn from Diodorus Siculus (5, 57), that Juno Telchinea was worshipped here. Pisander, the epic poet, was a native of Camirus. The place retains the name of Camiro. (Cramer's Asia Minor, vol. 2, p. 237.)

CAMPANIA, a district of Italy, below Latium, and for some time separated from it by the river Liris. All ancient writers who have treated of Italy bear witness to the frequent change of inhabitants which Campania more particularly has undergone in the course of its history. Attracted by the fertility of its soil, the beauty of its climate, and the commodiousness of its havens, successive invaders poured in and dispossessed each other, until the superior ascendancy of Rome left her the undisputed mistress of this garden of Italy. From these repeated contentions arose, as Strabo asserts, the fiction of the battle between the gods and giants in the Phlegmæan plains. The true solution of this tradition, however, it may be observed in passing, refers itself to some early and tremendous volcanic eruption, since it would seem that there is a source of volcanic fire, at no great distance from the surface, in the whole of Southern Italy. (Consolations in Travel, p. 123, Am. ed.)—It is universally agreed that the first settlers in Campania with whom history makes us acquainted are the Oscans. (Anthoch. Syrac. ap. Strab., 234.—Plin., 3, 5.) Even when the Oscan name had disappeared from the rest of Italy, the Oscan language was retained by the inhabitants of Campania, though mingled with the dialects of the various tribes which successively obtained possession of that much-prized country. Of these, the next to be mentioned are the Tuscans, who are stated to have extended their dominion at an early period both to the north and south of that portion of Italy, which is considered as more properly belonging to them. When they had effected the conquest of Campania, that province became the seat of a particular empire, and received the federal form of government, centred in twelve principal cities. (Strabo, 242.—Liv., 4, 37.—Polyb., 2, 17.) Wealth and luxury, however, soon produced their usual effects on the conquerors of Campania, and they in their turn fell an easy prey to the attacks of the Samnites, and were compelled to admit these hardy warriors to share with them the possession and enjoyment of these sunny plains. This observation, however, applies more particularly to Capua and its district, which was surprised by a Samnite force, A.U.C. 331. (Liv., 4, 44.) It is from this period that we must date the origin of the Campanian nation, which appears to have been thus composed of Oscans, Tuscans, Samnites, and Greeks, the latter having formed numerous colonies on these shores. About eighty years after, the Romans gladly seized the opportunity of adding so valuable a portion of Italy to their dominions, under the pretence of defending the Campanians against their former enemies the Samnites. From this time Campania may be regarded as subject to Rome, if we except that short interval in which the brilliant successes of Hannibal withdrew its inhabitants from their allegiance; an offence which they were made to expiate by a punishment, the severity of which has few examples in the history, not of Rome only, but of nations. (Liv., 26, 14, seqq.)—The natural advantages of Campania, its genial climate and fertile soil, so rich in various productions, are a favourite theme with the Latin writers, and elicit from them many an eloquent and animated tribute of admiration. Pliny, in particular, styles it, "Felix illa Campania . . . certamen humanæ voluptatis." (Cramer's Ancient Italy, vol. 2, p. 143, seqq.)

CAMPASPE, a beautiful female whom Alexander bestowed upon Apelles. (Vid. Apelles.)

CAMPI, I. CANINI, plains situate in the country of the Mesiates, in Cisalpine Gaul, whose territory corresponded to the modern Val di Misocco. (Amm. Marcell., 15, 10.)—II. DIOMENIS, the plains in Apulia on which the battle of Cannæ was fought. (Sil. Ital., 8, 242.—Liv., 25, 11.—Strab., 283.)—III. LABORINI, a name applied to the district between Cumæ and Puteoli, now Terra di Laroro. The modern name is probably derived from the ancient. (Plin., 3, 5.)—IV. RANDII. (Vid. Randii Campi.)—V. TAURASINI, a name given to the territory of Taurasiium, in Samnium. Pyrrhus was defeated here by Dentatus. The name is often incorrectly given as Campi Arusini. (Flor., 1, 18.—Frontin., Strateg., 4, 1.—Oros., 4, 2.)

CAMPUS MARTIUS, a large plain at Rome, without the walls of the city, where the Roman youths performed their gymnastic exercises. Public assemblies were often held here, magistrates chosen, and here, too, audience was given to such ambassadors as the senate did not choose to admit within the city. The bodies of the dead were also burned here. The Campus Martius, as we learn from Livy (2, 5), was land which belonged formerly to Tarquin, but which, being confiscated with the remaining property of that king after his expulsion, was dedicated to Mars. But Dionysius of Halicarnassus affirms (5, 13) that it had been consecrated before, but, having been seized by Tarquin, was recovered afterward by the people. And this account is more probable, as Festus quotes a law of Numa in which mention is made of the Campus Martius (s. v. Solitauril), and Livy himself seems to allow the name to be as ancient as the reign of Servius Tullius (1, 44). In the Latin poets we generally find it designated under the simple name of Campus. The Campus Martius is the principal situation of modern Rome. In the reign of Augustus, when the city had extended itself far beyond the lines of Servius Tullius, a great part of the Campus Martius was enclosed and occupied by public buildings, more especially by the great works of Agrippa. A considerable expanse of meadow was left open, however, at that time, as we learn from Strabo (236), who has accurately described its situation and appearance. It was here that the Roman youths engaged in martial sports and exercises, while the neighbouring waters of the Tiber afforded them a salutary refreshment after their fatigue. Strabo also informs us, that the Campus Martius was surrounded by many porticoes and sumptuous buildings. These were principally the structures erected by Agrippa. In times posterior to the age of the geographer, we find that Nero constructed baths in this part of the city. (Cramer's Ancient Italy, vol. 1, p. 436.)

CANARIA, the largest of the cluster of islands called by the ancients Beata and Fortunate Insule, and now Canary Islands. Pliny says, that this island derived its name from the number of very large-sized dogs which it contained, and that two of these were brought over to Africa for King Juba. (Plin., 6, 32.—Vid. Fortunate Insule.)

CANDACE, a name given to the queen-mothers in Meroë, in Æthiopia. Some females of this name appear in history, but they seem to have been merely queen-regents, governing during the minority of their sons. Some ancient authors, however, state, that it was customary for the Æthiopians to be governed by queens called each by the name of Candace. (Compare Plin., 6, 29, but especially Eusebius, Hist. Eccl., 2, 1: κατὰ τὸ πάτριον ἔθος ὑπὸ γυναικὸς τοῦ ἔθνους εἰσέρει νῦν βασιλευσμένην.) Suidas speaks of a Candace who was made prisoner by Alexander the Great; but this appears to be a mere fable.—A Candace, blind of one eye, made an irruption into Egypt during the reign of Augustus, B.C. 20. She took and pillaged several cities, but Petronius, the prefect of Egypt, pursued her, penetrated into her dominions, which he pillaged in turn, until she restored the booty which she had carried off from Egypt, and sued for peace. (Dio Cass., 54, 5.—Plin., 6, 29.)—Mention is also made in the sacred writings of a queen of Æthiopia named Candace. (Acts, 8, 27.—Consult Quinocl. ad loc.) There is a gloss given by Alberti (Gloss. N. T., p. 213), in which it is said that the Æthiopians had no particular or individual name for their kings, but styled them all "sons of the Sun," whereas the queen-mother they called Candace, as above. Now in the Lydian language Candaules was an appellation for Hercules, or the Sun. (Bähr. ad Herod., 1, 12.) Possibly, therefore, the word Candace, in the ancient Æthiopian, may be of cognate origin with Candaules in the Lydian tongue, the root being apparently the same, and may signify "a daughter of the Sun."

CANDAVIA, a district of Macedonia, bounded on the east by the Candavian mountains, supposed by some to be the same with the Cambuini Montes of Livy, and the Cavalurii Montes of Ptolemy. (Strab., 323.—Lucan., 6, 331.)

CANDAULES, a monarch of Lydia, the last of the Heraclidae, dethroned by Gyges at the instigation of his own queen. (Consult Herod., 1, 7, seqq.) His true name appears to have been Myrsilus, and the appellation of Candaules to have been assumed by him as a title of honour, this latter being, in the Lydian language, equivalent to Hercules, i. e., the Sun. (Bähr. ad Herod., 1, 12.)

CANEPHORI (Κανηφόροι), a select number of virgins of honourable birth, who formed part of the procession in the festival called Dionysia, celebrated in honour of Bacchus. They carried small baskets of gold, containing fruit and various sacred and mysterious things. (Clem. Alex., Protr., p. 19.—Aristoph., Acharn., 241, seqq.) They wore around their necks a collar of dried tigs. (Compare Aristoph., Lysistr., v. 647.—Sainte-Croix, Mystères du Paganisme, vol. 2, p. 87, with the note of De Saey.)

CANICULĀRES DIES, certain days in the summer, preceding and ensuing the heliacal rising of Canicula, or the dog-star, in the morning. The ancients believed that this star, rising with the sun, and joining his influence to the fire of that luminary, was the cause of the extraordinary heat which usually prevailed in that season; and accordingly they gave the name of dog-days to about six or eight weeks of the hottest part of summer. This idea originated with the Egyptians, and was borrowed from them by the Greeks. The Romans sacrificed a brown dog every year to Canicula, at its rising, to appease its rage. (Consult remarks under the article SIRIUS.)

CANIDĀ, a reputed sorceress at Rome, ridiculed by Horace. (Epod. 5.)

CANINEFĀTES, a people of Germania Superior, of common origin with the Batavi, and inhabiting the western part of the Insula Batavorum. The name is written differently in different authors. (Vell. Patere., 2, 105.—Plin., 4, 15.—Tacit., Hist. 4, 15.)

CANINIUS REBILUS, C. a consul along with Julius Cæsar. Q. Fabius Maximus, the regular colleague of Cæsar in the consulship, died on the last day of his official year, in the morning, and Cæsar caused Caninius to be elected in his stead, although only a few hours remained for enjoying the consulship. Caninius, therefore, was chosen consul at one o'clock P.M. on the 31st December, and held office until midnight, the end of the civil year, and commencement of the kalends of January. As we may suppose that the newly-appointed consul would hardly retire to rest before midnight, we can understand the jest which Cicero uttered on this occasion, that Rome had in Caninius a most vigilant consul, since he had never closed his eyes during the period of his consulship. This mode of conferring office was intended to conciliate friends, for the individual thus favoured enjoyed, after his brief continuance in office, all the rights and privileges, together with the honorary title, of a man of consular rank. (Cic., Ep. ad Fam., 7, 30.)

CANNÆ, a small village of Apulia, situate about five miles from Canusium, towards the sea, and at no great distance from the Aufidius. It was celebrated for the defeat of the Romans by Hannibal. Polybius tells us that, as a town, it was destroyed the year before the battle was fought, which took place May 21st, B.C. 216. The citadel, however, was preserved, and the circumstance of its occupation by Hannibal seems to have been regarded by the Romans of sufficient importance to cause them considerable uneasiness and annoyance. It commanded, indeed, all the adjacent country, and was the principal southern depôt of stores and provisions on which they had depended for the approaching campaign. The Greek writers, especially Polybius, use the name in the singular, Κάννα. There is an exception to this, however, in the 15th book, c. 7 and 11, where the plural form is used by the historian just mentioned.—The decisive victory at Cannæ was owing to three combined causes: the excellent arrangements of Hannibal, the superiority of the Numidian horse, and the skilful manœuvre of Hasdrubal in opposing only the light-armed cavalry against that of the Romans, while he employed the heavy horse, divided into small parties, in repeated attacks on different parts of the Roman rear. The Roman army contained 80,000 infantry and 6000 cavalry, the Carthaginians 40,000 infantry and 10,000 cavalry. Hannibal drew up his forces in the form of a convex crescent, having his centre thrown forward before the wings. He commanded in the centre in person, and here he had purposely stationed his worst troops; the best were posted at the extremities of each wing, which would enable them to act with decisive advantage as bodies of reserve, they being, in fact, the rear of the other forces. Hasdrubal commanded the left wing, Hanno the right. On the Roman side, want of union between the two consuls, and want of spirit among the men, afforded a sure omen of the fortune of the day. Æmilius commanded the right, Varro the left wing; the proconsuls Regulus and Servius, who had been consuls the preceding year, had charge of the centre. What Hannibal foresaw took place. The charge of the Romans, and their immense superiority in numbers, at length broke his centre, which, giving way inward, his army now assumed the shape of a concave crescent. The Romans, in the ardour of pursuit, were carried so far as to be completely surrounded. Both flanks were assailed by the veterans of Hannibal, who were armed in the Roman manner; at the same time the cavalry of the Carthaginians attacked their rear, and the broken centre rallying, attacked them in front. The consequence was, that they were nearly all cut to pieces. The two proconsuls, together with Æmilius the consul, were slain. Varro escaped with 70 horse to Venusia. The Romans lost on the field of battle 70,000 men; and, 10,000 who had not been present in the fight were made prisoners. The Carthaginian loss amounted to 5500 infantry and 200 cavalry. Such is the account of Polybius, whose statement of the fight is much clearer and more satisfactory than that of Livy. Hannibal has been censured for not marching immediately to Rome after the battle, in which city all was consternation. But a defence of his conduct may be found under the article Hannibal, which see. (Polyb., 3, 113, et seqq.—Liv., 22, 44.—Flor., 2, 6.—Plut., Vit. Hannib.)

CANOPICUM (or CANOBICUM) OSTIUM, the westernmost mouth of the Nile, twelve miles from Alexandria. Near its termination is the lake Madie or Maadié (denoting, in Arabic, a passage), which is the remains of this branch. This lake has no communication with the Nile, except at the time of its greatest increase. It is merely a salt-water lagoon. The Canopic mouth was sometimes also called Naucraticum Ostium and Heracleoticum Ostium. (Herod., 2, 17.—Diod. Sic., 1, 33.—Plin., 5, 10.—Mela, 1, 9.)

CANOPUS (or CANOBUS), a city of Egypt, about twelve miles northeast of Alexandria, and a short distance to the west of the Ostium Canopicum. The Greek writers give the name as Canobus (Κάνωβος); the Latin, Canopus. The form Κάνωβος occurs also in Scylax (p. 43), but the reference there is to the island formed by the mouth of the Nile in this quarter.—Canopus was a very ancient city, and most probably of Egyptian origin, since we are informed by Diodorus Siculus (1, 33) that each mouth of the Nile was defended by a fortified city, and since the Ionian Greeks, who came first to this quarter, were only allowed originally to enter by this arm of the river. Whence the name of the place arose is unknown. It came, very likely, from the brilliant star Canobus, which one beholds, even in the southern regions of Asia Minor, on the edge of the horizon, but which was seen to rise in full splendour by a spectator on the coast of Egypt. The Greek writers, however, not knowing any better derivation for the name, deduced it from that of the pilot of Menelaus, who was fabled to have been called Canopus, and to have died and been interred here. Herodotus makes no mention of this legend, but Scylax speaks of a monument in this quarter which Menelaus, as he informs us, erected here in memory of his pilot. Previous to the founding of Alexandria, Canobus must have been a very important place, since it formed the chief centre of communication between the interior of Egypt and other countries lying to the north. It sank, however, in importance after Alexandria was built, and merely retained some consequence from its temple and oracle of Serapis, which latter was consulted during the night, and gave intimations of the future to applicants while sleeping within the walls of the structure. The festivals, also, that were celebrated at this temple, drew large crowds of both sexes from the adjacent country, and exercised an injurious influence on the morals of all who took part in them. Canopus, in fact, was always regarded as a dissolute place, and, even after Alexandria arose, it was much frequented by the inhabitants of the capital for purposes of enjoyment and pleasure, the temperature of the air and the situation of the city being spoken of in high terms by the ancient writers. (Ann. Marcell., 22, 16.) The festivals of Serapis ceased on the introduction of Christianity, and from that period history is silent respecting Canopus. The French savans found some traces of the ancient city a short distance to the west of the modern Aboukir. (Mannert, Geogr., vol. 10, pt. 1, p. 541, seqq.)

CANTABRI, a warlike and ferocious people of Spain, who long resisted the Roman power. Their country answers to Biscay and part of Asturias. Augustus marched in person against them, anticipating an easy victory. The desperate resistance of the Cantabrians, however, induced him to retire to Tarraco, and leave the management of the war to his generals. They were finally reduced, but, rebelling soon after, were decreed to be sold as slaves. Most of them, however, preferred falling by their own hands. The final reduction of the Cantabri was effected by Agrippa, A.U.C. 734, after they had resisted the power of the Romans in various ways for more than two hundred years. (Liv., Epit., 48.—Flor., 4, 12.—Plin., 3, 2.—Horat., Od., 3, 8, 22.)

CANTUUM, a country in the southeastern extremity of Britain, now called Kent. The name is derived from the British word cant, signifying an angle or corner. (Consult Adelung, Gloss. Med. et Inf. Lat., vol. 2, p. 133, s. v. canto.)

CANULIA LEX, a law proposed by C. Canuleius, tribune of the commons, A.U.C. 310, and allowing of intermarriages between the patricians and plebeians. (Liv., 4, 1.)

CANUSIUM, a town of Apulia, on the right bank of the Aufidus, and about twelve miles from its mouth. The origin of Canusium seems to belong to a period which reaches far beyond the records of Roman history, and of which we possess no memorials but what a fabulous tradition has conveyed to us. This tradition ascribes its foundation to Diomedes, after the close of the Trojan war. Perhaps, however, we should see in Diomedes one of those Pelasgic chiefs, who, in a very distant age, formed settlements in various parts of Italy. Canusium appears to have been in its earlier days a large and flourishing place. It is said by those who have traced the circuit of the walls from the remaining vestiges, that they must have embraced a circumference of sixteen miles. (Pratili, Via Appia, 4, 13.—Romanelli, vol. 2, p. 265.—Compare Strabo, 28.) The splendid remains of antiquity discovered among the ruins of Canosa, together with its coins, establish the fact of the Grecian origin of this place. Antiquaries dwell with rapture on the elegance and beauty of the Greek vases of Canosa, which, in point of size, numbers, and decorations, far surpass those discovered in the tombs of any other ancient city, not even excepting Nola. (Millingen, Peintures Antiques des Vases, &c.)—Horace alludes to the mixed dialect of Oscan and Greek, in the expression employed by him, "Canusini more bilinguis." (Sat., 1, 10, 30.)—It is stated, that the small remnant of the Roman army, which escaped from the slaughter of Cannæ, took refuge here. Livy records the generous treatment they experienced on that occasion from Busa, a wealthy lady of this city (22, 52). Philostratus informs us (Vit. Sophist.), that Hadrian colonized this place, and procured for it a good supply of water, of which it stood much in need, as we know from Horace. (Sat., 1, 5, 90.) The same poet complains also of the grittiness of the bread. (Cramer's Ancient Italy, vol. 2, p. 292.)

CAPANEUS, an Argive warrior, son of Hipponous. He was one of the seven leaders in the war against Thebes (vid. Adrastus), and is often alluded to by the ancient poets as remarkable for his daring and impiety. Having boasted that he would take the Theban city, in despite even of Jove, this deity struck him with a thunderbolt as he was in the act of ascending the ramparts. When his body was being consumed on the funeral pile, his wife Evadne threw herself upon it and perished amid the flames. Æsculapius was fabled to have restored Capaneus to life. (Apollod., 3, 6, 3.—Id., 3, 6, 7.—Id., 37, 2.—Id., 3, 10, 3.—Æsch., Sept., c. Theb., 427, seqq.—Heyne, ad Apollod., 3, 6, 3.)

CAPELLA, I. (Marcianus Mincus Felix), a poet, born, according to Cassiodorus, at Madaura in Africa: he calls himself, however, at the end of this work, "the foster-child of the city of Elissa;" whether it be that he was born at Carthage, or else received his education there, which latter is the more probable opinion of the two. The MSS., however, give him the title of "the Carthaginian." In process of time he attained to preconsular dignity, but whether he was a Christian or not is a matter of uncertainty. About the middle of the fifth century of our era he wrote at Rome a work bearing the appellation of Satira or Satyricon, divided into nine books. It is a species of encyclopædia, half prose and half verse, modelled after the Varronian satire. The first two books form a detached and separate work, entitled De Nuptiis Philologie et Mercurii, and treating of the apothecosis of Philology and her marriage with Mercury. We find in it, among other things, a description of heaven, which shows that the mystic notions of the Platonists of that day approximated in a very singular manner to the truths of Christianity. In the seven following books Capella treats of the seven sciences, which formed at that time the circle of human study, namely, grammar, logic, rhetoric, geometry, astrology, arithmetic, and music, which comprehends poetry. This work, written in a barbarous style, was introduced into the schools of the middle ages: hence it was frequently copied, and the text has become extremely corrupt. The best edition of Capella is that of Grotius, Lugd. Bat., 1599, 8vo; although a good edition, in the strict sense of the term, is still a desideratum. The work of Grotius is generally regarded as a literary wonder, since he was only fourteen years old when he undertook the task of editing Capella, and published his edition at the age of fifteen. He was aided in it by his father, as he himself informs us, and very probably also by Joseph Scaliger, who induced him to attempt the task. (Bahr, Gesch. Rom. Lit., vol. 1, p. 727, seqq.—Schöll, Hist. Lit. Rom., vol. 3, p. 98.—Walkenaer, in Biogr. Univ., vol. 7, p. 62.)—II. An elegiac poet, mentioned with eulogium by Ovid. (Pont., 4, 16, 36.) We have no remains of his productions.

CAPENA, I. a gate of Rome, now the gate of S. Sebastian, in the southeast part of modern Rome. (Ovid, Fast., 5, 192.)—II. A city of Etruria, southeast of Mount Soracte. It is frequently recorded, in the early annals of Rome, among those which opposed, though unsuccessfully, the gradual encroachments of its power. Great diversity of opinion has existed as to the modern site, but the conjecture of Galetti is now generally followed, which makes Capena to have stood at a place called Civitucula. (Cramer's Ancient Italy, vol. 1, p. 231.)

CAPETUS, a king of Alba, who reigned twenty-six years. (Consult, however, the remarks under the article ALBA.)

CAPHARÉUS, a lofty mountain and promontory at the southeastern extremity of Eubœa, where Naulpius, king of the country, to avenge his son Palamedes, put to death through the false accusation brought against him by Ulysses, set a burning torch in the darkness of night, which caused the Greeks to be shipwrecked on the coast. It is now called Capo d'Oro, and, in the infancy of navigation, was reckoned very dangerous on account of the rocks and whirlpools on the coast. (Eurip., Troad., 88.—Id., Hel., 1136.—Virg., Æn., 11, 260.—Ovid, Met., 14, 481.—ProPERT., 4, 1, 115.)

CAPRO, I. the uncle of Paternulus, who joined Agrippa against Cassius. (Vell. Patere., 2, 69.)—II. Fonteius, a Roman nobleman sent by Antony to settle his disputes with Augustus. (Horat., Scrm., 1, 5, 32.)

CAPITOLINUS, I. a surname of Jupiter, from his temple on Mount Capitolinus.—II. A surname of M. Manlius, who, for his ambition in aspiring to sovereign power, was thrown down from the Tarpeian Rock, which he had so nobly defended.—III. Mons, one of the seven hills on which Rome was built, containing the citadel and fortress of the Capitol. Three ascents led to its summit from below. 1st. By the 160 steps of the Tarpeian Rock, which was probably on the steepest side, where it overhangs the Tiber. (Compare Tacitus, Hist., 3, 71.—Liv., 5, 46.—Plut., Vit. Camill.) 2d. The Clivus Capitolinus, which began from the arch of Tiberius and the temple of Saturn, near the present hospital of the Consolazione, and led to the citadel by a winding path. (Ovid, Fast., 1, 261.) 3d. The Clivus Asyli, which, being less steep than the other two, was on that account the road by which the triumphant generals were borne in their cars to the Capitol. This ascent began at the arch of Septimius Severus, and from thence, winding to the left, passed near the ruined pillars of the temple of Concord, as it is commonly but improperly called, and from thence led to the Intermontium. The Capitoline Hill is said to have been previously called Saturnius, from the ancient city of Saturnia, of which it was the citadel. Afterward it was known by the name of Mons Tarpeius, and finally it obtained the appellation first mentioned, from the circumstance of a human head being discovered on its summit, in making the foundations of the temple of Jupiter. (Varro, L. L., 4, 8.) It was considered as forming two summits, which, though considerably depressed, are yet sufficiently apparent. That which looked to the south and the Tiber was the Tarpeian Rock or citadel; the other, which was properly the Capitol, faced the north and the Quirinal. The space which was left between these two elevations was known by the name of Intermontium.—IV. An appellation said to have been given to an individual named Petilius, who had been governor of the Capitol. (Compare the scholiast on Horace, Sat., 1, 4, 94.) It is also related, that he was accused of having stolen, during his office, a golden crown, consecrated to Jupiter, and that, having pleaded his cause in person, he was acquitted by the judges, in order to gratify Augustus, with whom he was on friendly terms. One part, at least, of the story is incorrect, since the Capitolini were a branch of the Petilian family long before this time. (Compare Vaillant, Num. fam. Rom., vol. 2, p. 222.) What degree of credit is to be attached to the rest of the narrative is uncertain. (Consult Wieland, ad Horat., l. c.)—V. Julius, one of those later Roman historians, whose works form what has been termed "the Augustan History." He lived during the reign of Dioclesian and Constantine the Great, and we have from him the lives of Antoninus Pius, Marcus Aurelius, Verus, Pertinax, Albinus, Macrinus, the two Maximins, the three Gordians, Maximus, and Balbinus. He wrote other lives also which have not reached us. The greater part of his biographies are dedicated to Dioclesian and Constantine. His works show carelessness and want of proper arrangement. (Bähr, Gesch. Röm. Lit., vol. 1, p. 464.—Moller, Dissert. de Julio Capitol., Altdorf, 1689, 4to.)

CAPITOLIUM, a celebrated temple and citadel at Rome, on the Tarpeian Rock. The foundations were laid by Tarquinius Priscus, A.U.C. 139, B.C. 615. The walls were raised by his successor Servius Tullius, and Tarquinius Superbus finished it, A.U.C. 231, B.C. 533. It was not, however, consecrated until the third year after the expulsion of the kings. This ceremony was performed by the consul Horatius. It covered 8 acres, was 200 feet broad, and about 215 long. It consisted of three parts, a nave sacred to Jupiter, and two wings or aisles, the right sacred to Minerva, and the left to Juno. The ascent to it from the forum was by a hundred steps. The magnificence and richness of this temple are almost incredible. All the consuls successively made donations to the Capitol, and Augustus bestowed upon it at one time 2000 pounds weight of gold. The gilding of the whole arch of the temple of Jupiter, which was undertaken after the destruction of Carthage, cost, according to Plutarch, 21,000 talents. The gates of the temple were of brass, covered with large plates of gold. The inside of the temple was all of marble, and was adorned with vessels and shields of solid silver, with gilded chariots, &c. The Capitol was burned in the time of Sylla, A.U.C. 679, B.C. 84, through the negligence of those who kept it, and Sylla rebuilt it, but died before the dedication, which was performed by Q. Catulus, A.U.C. 675. It was again destroyed in the troubles under Vitellius, 19th December, A.D. 69; and Vespasian, who endeavoured to repair it, saw it again in ruins at his death. Domitian raised it again for the last time, and made it more grand and magnificent than any of his predecessors had, and spent 12,000 talents in gilding it.—The ordinary derivation of the term Capitolium is deservedly ridiculed by a modern tourist: "It was in digging the foundation of the temple of Jupiter Capitolinus that a human head was found, according to Roman legends; and the augurs declared this to be emblematical of future empire. The hill, in consequence, which had been originally called Saturnius, and then Tarpeius, was now denominated Capitolius (Caput Oliv.), because this head, it seems, belonged to somebody called Tolius or Olius, though how they knew the man's name from his skull I never could discover." (Rome in the Nineteenth Century, vol. 1, p. 179.) Equally unfortunate is the etymology assigned by Nork, who deduces Capitolium from caput (τοῦ) πόλεως, where πόλεως is the old form for πόλις, and which old form, in the process of time, dropped the π instead of the τ! (Etymol. Handwört., vol. 1, p. 128.)

CAPPADOCIA, a country of Asia Minor, bounded on the north by Galatia and Pontus, west by Phrygia east by the Euphrates, and south by Cilicia. Its eastern part was called Armenia Minor. The term Cappadocia, under the Persians, had a more extended meaning than in later geography: it comprised two satrapies, Cappadocia the greater and Cappadocia on the Pontus Euxinus. The first satrap of the greater Cappadocia was a member of the royal family of Persia, and a kind of hereditary succession seems to have prevailed, which the great king probably allowed, because he could not prevent it. The founder of this dynasty was named Anaphus, and, according to Diodorus Siculus (ap. Phot., Cod., 244, p. 1157), was one of the seven conspirators who slew the false Smerdis. Datames, the grandson of Anaphus, was the first regular sovereign of this Cappadocian dynasty; and after him and his son Ariamnes, we have a long list of princes, all bearing the name of Ariarathes for several generations. (Vi'd. Ariarathes).—Cappadocia was surrounded on three sides by great ranges of mountains, besides being intersected by others of as great elevation as any in the peninsula. Hence its mineral productions were various and abundant, and a source of wealth to the country. Strabo specifies the rich mineral colour called Sinople, from its being exported by the merchants of Sinope, but which was really dug in the mines of Cappadocia: also, onyx; crystal; a kind of white agate, employed for ornamental purposes; and the lapis specularis: this last was found in large masses, and was a considerable article of the export trade. The champagne country yielded almost every kind of fruit and grain, and the wines of some districts vied with those of Greece in strength and flavour. Cappadocia was also rich in herds and flocks, but more particularly celebrated for its breed of horses; and the onager, or wild ass, abounded in the mountains towards Lycaonia. (Strab., 535, seqq.)—Herodotus informs us, that in the days of Cæresus and Cyrus the people commonly known in history by the name of Cappadocians were termed Syrians by the Greeks, while the Persians employed the more usual appellation. (Herod., 1, 72.—Id., 7, 72.) A portion, moreover, of this same nation, who occupied the coast of Pontus and Paphlagonia, about Sinope and Amisus, long retained the name of Leucosyri, or white Syrians, to distinguish them from the more swarthy and southern inhabitants of Syria and Palestine. (Strab., 511.) The origin of the Cappadocians, therefore, unlike that of most of the other nations of Asia Minor, was of Asiatic growth, unmingled with the Thracian hordes which had overrun Phrygia and all the western part of the peninsula. (Cramer's Asia Minor, vol. 2, p. 105, seqq.)—The Cappadocians bore among the ancients the character of volatility and faithlessness. They were also made the subject of sarcastic remark, for having refused freedom when it was offered them by the Romans, and for having preferred to live under the sway of kings. (Justin, 38, 2.) There was nothing, however, very surprising in this refusal, coming, as it did, from a people who knew nothing of freedom, and who had become habituated to regal sway. Their moral character is severely satirized in the well-known epigram, which states that a viper bit a Cappadocian, but did itself from the poisonous and corrupt blood of the latter!—The Greeks and Romans found in this country few towns, but a number of strong castles on the mountains, and large villages in the neighbourhood of celebrated temples, to which the latter served as a kind of protection. Most of these villages became cities in the time of the Romans, when this people had destroyed the castles and strongholds on the mountains. (Mannert, Geogr., vol. 6, pt. 2, p. 216, seqq.)

CAPPADOX, a river of Cappadocia, bounding it on the side of Galatia, and falling into the Halys. (Plin., 6, 3.)

CAPRARIA, I. a mountainous island, south of Balearis Major or Majorca, and deriving its name from its numerous goats (capra, capra). The modern name is Cabrera. (Pliny, 3, 6.)—II. One of the Fortunatæ Insulæ, or Canaries. Some make it the modern Palma, but it answers rather to Gomera. (Mannert, Geogr., vol. 10, pt. 2, p. 628.)

CAPRÆ, an island off the coast of Campania, situated near the promontory of Minerva. It is now Capri. This island is chiefly known in history as the abode of Tiberius, and the scene of his infamous debauchery. (Sueton. Tib., c. 42, seqq.—Tacit., Ann., 6, 1.—Dio Cass., 58, 22.)—Tradition reported, that this island was first in the possession of the Telebœ, who are mentioned as a people of Greece, inhabiting the Echinades, a group of islands at the mouth of the Achelôis, in Acarnania; but how they came to settle in Capræ no one has informed us. (Compare Schol. in Apoll.

Rhod., Argon., 1.) Augustus was the first emperor who made Capræ his residence, being struck, as Suetonius relates, by the happy presage of an old decayed ilex having, as it was said, revived on his arrival there. Not long after, he obtained the island from the Neapolitans, by giving them in exchange that of Ischia, which belonged to him. (Suet., Aug., 92.) Tiberius was led to select this spot for his abode, from its difficulty of access, being cut off from all approach, except on one side, by lofty and perpendicular cliffs. The mildness of the climate and the beauty of the prospect, which extends over the whole bay of Naples, might also, as Tacitus remarks, have influenced his choice. Here he caused twelve villas to be erected, which he is supposed to have named after the twelve chief deities. (Tacit., Ann., 4, 67.) The ruins of the villa of Jove, which was the most conspicuous, are still to be seen on the summit of the cliff looking towards Sorrento. It is probably the same with the Arx Tiberii of Pliny (3, 6)—The island of Capri, at the present day, abounds so much with various birds of passage, but especially with quails, that the greatest part of the bishop's income arises from this source. Hence it has been called the "Bishopric of Quails." In bad years the number caught is about 12,000, in good years it exceeds 60,000. The island is surrounded by steep rocks, which render the approach to it very dangerous. In the centre the mountains recede from each other, and a vale intervenes, remarkable for its beauty and fertility. The climate of the island is a delightful one; the lofty rocks on the coast keep off the cold winds of winter, and the seabreeze tempers the heat of summer. (Malte-Brun, Geogr., vol. 4, p. 240, Brussels ed.)

CAPSA, a town of Libya, in the district of Byzacium, north of the Palus Tritonis, surrounded by vast deserts. Here Jugurtha kept his treasures. It was surprised by Marius; and was destroyed in the war of Cæsar and Metellus Scipio. It was afterward rebuilt, and is now Cafsa. Sallust (Bell. Jug., 94) ascribes the origin of this place to the Libyan Hercules. Diodorus Siculus also (4, 18) speaks of a large city, called Hecatopylus, from its hundred gates, and which was founded in a fertile spot in the desert by Hercules, as he was proceeding from Libya to Egypt. Hanno is said to have taken this city during the first Punic war. (Diod., 2, 24, exc. 1.—Compare Polyb., 1, 73.) Mannert identifies Hecatopylus with Capsa, and strives to elucidate the fable by ascribing to the place an Egyptian origin. (Mannert, Geogr., vol. 10, pt. 2, p. 346.) Gesenius derives the name of Capsa from the Punic capsa, "a bolt," "bar," or "barrier." (Phan. Mon., p. 421.)

CAPUA, a rich and flourishing city, the capital of Campania until ruined by the Romans. Its original name was Vulturinus, which was changed by the Tyrrheni, after they became masters of the place, to Capua. This latter name was derived from that of their leader Capys, who, according to Festus, received this appellation from his feet being deformed and turned inward. The name is not of Latin, but Tuscan origin. The Latins, however, pretended, notwithstanding, to ascribe the foundation of the city to Romulus, who named it, as they stated, after one of his ancestors. Capua was the chief city of the southern Tyrrheni; and even after it fell under the Roman dominion, continued to be a powerful and flourishing place. Before Capua passed into the hands of the Romans, a dreadful massacre of its Tyrrhenian inhabitants by the Samnites put the city into the hands of this latter people. Livy appears to have confounded this event with the origin of the place, when he makes it to have changed its name from Vulturinus to Capua, after the Samnite leader Capys. It is very remarkable that retaliation should have followed in a later age from the hands of the Romans, themselves in part of Tyrrhenian, that is,

Pelasgian descent. Capua deeply offended them by opening its gates to Hannibal after the victory of Cannæ. The vengeance inflicted by the Romans was of a most fearful nature, when, five years after, the city again fell under their dominion. Most of the senators and principal inhabitants were put to death, the greater part of the remaining citizens were sold into slavery, and by a decree of the senate the Capuani ceased to exist as a people. The city and territory, however, did not become thereupon deserted. A few inhabitants were allowed to remain in the former, and the latter was in a great measure sold by the Romans to the neighbouring communities. Julius Cæsar sent a powerful colony to Capua, and under the emperors it again flourished. But it suffered greatly from the barbarians in a later age; so much so, in fact, that the Bishop Landulfus and the Lombard Count Lando transferred the inhabitants to Casilinum, on the Vulturum, 19 stadia distant. This is the site of modern Capua. (Mannert, Geogr., vol. 9, pt. 1, p. 701, 766.)

CAPYS, I. a Trojan who came with Æneas into Italy, and, according to the common, but erroneous, account, founded the city of Capua. (Vid. Capua.)—II. A son of Assaracus, by a daughter of the Simois. He was father of Anchises by Themis. (Ovid, Fast., 4, 33.)

CAR, I. a son of Phoroneus, king of Megara. (Pausan., 1, 40.)—II. A son of Manes, and regarded by the Carians as the patriarch of their race. (Herod., 1, 171.—Strab., 659.)

CARACALLA, Antoninus Bassianus, eldest son of the Emperor Severus. His name Caracalla was derived from a species of Gallic cassock which he was fond of wearing; that of Bassianus from his maternal grandfather. Caracalla was born at Lugdunum (Lyon), A.D. 188, and appointed by his father his colleague in the government at the age of thirteen years. And yet he is said, even at this early age, to have attempted his father's life. Severus died A.D. 211, and was succeeded by his two sons Caracalla and Geta. These two brothers bore towards each other, even from infancy, the most inveterate hatred. After a campaign against the Caledonians, they concluded a disgraceful peace. They then wished to divide the empire between them; but their design was opposed by their mother, Julia, and by the principal men in the state, and Caracalla now resolved to get rid of his brother, by causing him to be assassinated. After many unsuccessful attempts, he pretended to desire a reconciliation, and requested his mother to procure him an interview with his brother in her own apartment: Geta appeared, and was stabbed in his mother's arms, A.D. 212, by several centurions, who had received orders to this effect. The prætorian guards were prevailed upon, by rich donations, to proclaim Caracalla sole emperor, and to declare Geta an enemy to the state, and the senate confirmed the nomination of the soldiers. After this, the whole life of Caracalla was only one series of cruelties and acts of extravagant folly. All who had been in any way connected with Geta were put to death, not even their children being spared. The historian Dio Cassius makes the whole number of victims to have amounted to 20,000. (Dio Cass., 77, 4.) Among those who fell in this horrid butchery was the celebrated lawyer Papinian. And yet, after this, by a singular act of contradiction, he not only put to death many of those who had been concerned in the murder of his brother, but even demanded of the senate that he should be enrolled among the gods. His pattern was Sylla, whose tomb he restored and adorned. Like this dictator, he enriched his soldiers with the most extravagant largesses which extortion enabled him to furnish. The augmentation of pay received by them is said to have amounted to 280 millions of sesterces a year. As cruel as Caligula and Nero, but weaker than either, he regarded the senate and people with equal hatred and contempt. From motives of avarice, he gave all the freemen of the empire the right of citizenship, and was the first who received Egyptians into the senate. Of all his follies, however, the greatest was his admiration of Alexander of Macedon. From his infancy he made this monarch his model, and copied him in everything which it was easy to imitate. He had even a Macedonian phalanx of sixteen thousand men, all born in Macedonia, and commanded by officers bearing the same names with those who had served under Alexander. Convinced, moreover, that Aristotle had participated in the conspiracy against the son of Philip, he caused the works of the philosopher to be burned. With equally foolish enthusiasm for Achilles, he made him the object of his deepest veneration. He went to Ilium to visit the grave of Homer's hero, and poisoned his favourite freedman named Festus, to imitate Achilles in his grief for Patroclus. His conduct in his campaigns in Gaul, where he committed all sorts of cruelties, was still more degrading. He crossed over the Rhine into the countries of the Catti and Alemanni. The Catti defeated him, and permitted him to repossess the river only on condition of paying them a large sum of money. He next marched through the land of the Alemanni as an ally, and built several fortifications. He then called together the young men of the tribe, as if he intended to take them into his service, and caused his own troops to surround them and cut them in pieces. For this barbarous exploit he assumed the surname of Alemanicus. In Dacia he gained some advantages over the Goths. He signed a treaty of peace at Antioch with Artabanus, the Parthian king, who submitted to all his demands. He invited Abgares, the king of Edessa, an ally of the Romans, to Antioch, loaded him with chains, and took possession of his estates. He exercised the same treachery towards Vologeses, king of Armenia; but the Armenians flew to arms and repulsed the Romans. After this Caracalla went to Alexandria, to punish the people of that city for ridiculing him. While preparations were making for a great massacre, he offered hecatombs to Serapis, and visited the tomb of Alexander, on which he left his imperial ornaments by way of offering. He afterward devoted the inhabitants for several days and nights to plunder and butchery, and seated himself, in order to have a view of the bloody spectacle, on the top of the temple of Serapis, where he consecrated the dagger which he had drawn, some years before, against his own brother. His desire to triumph over the Parthians induced him to violate the peace, under the pretence that Artabanus had refused him his daughter in marriage. He found the country undefended, ravaged it, marched through Media, and approached the capital. The Parthians, who had retired beyond the Tigris to the mountains, were preparing to attack the Romans the following year with all their forces. Caracalla returned without delay to Mesopotamia, without having even seen the Parthians. When the senate received from him information of the submission of the East, they decreed him a triumph and the surname Parthicus. Being informed of the warlike preparations of the Parthians, he prepared to renew the contest; but Macrinus, the prætorian prefect, whom he had offended, assassinated him at Edessa, A.D. 217, on his way to the temple of Lunus. His reign had lasted more than six years. It is remarkable, that this prince, although he did so much to degrade the throne of the Cæsars, yet raised at Rome some of the most splendid structures that graced the capital. Magnificent thermæ bore his name, and among other monuments of lavish expenditure was a triumphal arch, on which were represented the victories and achievements of his father Severus. Notwithstanding his crimes, Caracalla was deified after death by a decree of the senate. (Dio Cass., 122, 1, seqq.—Spartian., Vit. Caracall.—Biogr. Univ., vol. 7, p. 95.—Encyclop. Am., vol. 2, p. 506.)

CARACĀTES, a people of Germania Prima, in Belgic Gaul. Their country answers now to the diocese of Maïence. (Tacul., Hist., 4, 70.)

CARACTĀCUS, king of the Silures in Britain, a people occupying what is now South Wales. After withstanding, for the space of nine years, the Roman arms, he was defeated in a pitched battle by Ostorius Scapula, and his forces put to the rout. Taking refuge, upon this, with Cartismandua, queen of the Brigantes, he was betrayed by her into the hands of the Romans, and led to Rome. Great importance was attached to his capture. Claudius, who was emperor at the time, augmented the territories of Cartismandua, and triumphal honours were decreed to Ostorius. This exploit was compared to the capture of Syphax by Scipio, and that of Perses by Paulus Æmilius. The manly and independent bearing, however, of the British prince, when brought into the presence of the Roman emperor, excited so much admiration, that his fetters were removed, and freedom was granted him, together with his wife and children, who had shared his captivity. Some time after Claudius sent him back to his native island with rich presents, and he reigned there for two years after, remaining during all that period a firm friend to the Romans. (Tacul., Ann., 12, 33, seqq.—Biogr. Univ., vol. 7, p. 103.)

CARĀLIS, or, with less accuracy, Carallis, a city of Sardinia, founded by the Carthaginians, and soon made the capital of the island. It is supposed to correspond to the modern Cagliari, but it reached, in fact, farther to the east than Cagliari, up to the present Capo St. Elia. This we learn from Ptolemy, who speaks of the city and promontory of Caralis together. Claudian also alludes to the long extent of the place. "Tenditur in longum Caralis," &c. (Bell. Gild., 520.) Its harbour, which afforded a good shelter against the winds and waves, rendered it always a place of importance. (Mannert, Geogr., vol. 9, pt. 2, p. 490.)

CARAMBIS, I. a promontory of Paphlagonia, now Karempi, facing Crīu-Metopon (Cape Crio), in the Tauric Chersonese. (Strab., 545.—Plin., 6, 2.)—II. A city near the promontory of the same name. (Scylax, Periplus, p. 34.—Plin., 6, 2.)

CARANUS, a descendant of Temenus the son of Hercules. According to Justin (7, 1), Velleius Paterculus (1, 6), Pausanias (9, 40), and others, he quitted Argos, his native city, at the head of a numerous body of colonists, and, arriving in Ænathia, a district of Macedonia, then ruled by Midas, obtained possession of Edessa, the capital, where he established his sway, and thus laid the foundation of the Macedonian empire. Considerable doubts, however, arise, upon looking into the accounts of Herodotus and Thucydides, as to the authenticity of the adventure ascribed to Caranus. (Consult remarks under the article MACEDONIA.)

CARASĪUS, a native of Gaul, born among the Menapii. His naval abilities attracted the notice of Maximian, who gave him the command of a squadron against the pirates. He proved, however, unfaithful to his trust, and too much bent on enriching himself. Maximian thereupon gave orders to put him to death; but Carasius, apprized of this in season, retired with his fleet to Britain. Here he succeeded in gaining over, or else intimidating, the only Roman legion that remained in the island, and finally proclaimed himself emperor. He forced the emperors Maximian and Dioclesian to acknowledge his authority, which he maintained for the space of seven years. He was assassinated by Allectus. (Crevier, Hist. des Emp. Rom., vol. 6, p. 177, 202.)

CARBO, the surname of a branch of the Papirian family at Rome. Several distinguished men bore this name, among whom were, I. Caius, a Roman orator, the contemporary and friend of Tiberius Gracchus, was accused of seditious conduct by L. Crassus, and committed suicide by swallowing cantharides. (Cic., Brut., 27, et 43.—Id., Or., 34.—Id., Ep. ad Fam., 9, 21.) He was thought to have been concerned in the assassination of the younger Africanus. (Cic., Or., 2, 40.—Ep. ad Fam., l. c.)—II. Cneius, son of the preceding, was three times consul, and at last proconsul in Gaul. He was a partisan of Marius', and was put to death by order of Pompey, at Lilybæum, in Sicily. Consult, as regards the singular attachment to life which he displayed, the account given by Valerius Maximus (9, 13).

CARCHĒDON (Καρχηδών), the Greek name of Cardage.

CARDIA, a town in the Thracian Chersonesus, at the top of the Sinus Melanis. It was destroyed by Lysimachus when he founded Lysimachia a little south of it. It derived its name from being built in the form of a heart. It was also called Hexamilium, because the isthmus is here about six miles across. It was afterwards rebuilt, and is now Hexamili. (Plin., 4, 11.—Mela, 2, 2.—Solin., c. 10.—Ptol., 3, 12.—Herod., 7, 58.)

CARDŪCHI, a warlike nation in Gordyene, a district of Armenia Major, inhabiting the Montes Carduchi, between the Tigris and Lake Arsissa. Strabo says that in his time they were called Gordyai. Pliny (6, 12) and Quintus Curtius (4, 10) both make mention of the Montes Gordyai, but the former writer elsewhere (6, 17) informs us that the Carduchi were called in his time Corduēni. The modern Kurds are regarded as the descendants of this ancient people. (Xen., Anab., 3, 5, 16, &c.—Consult Krüger, ad loc.)

CARIA, a country of Asia Minor, to the south of Ionia and Lydia, from which it was separated by the course of the Mæander. In extent it was the least considerable of the divisions of the peninsula; but, from the number of towns and villages assigned to it by the ancient geographers, it would seem to have been very populous. The corresponding division of the Turkish provinces, in modern geography, is called Mentesha. Caria was a fruitful country, and produced, like the surrounding regions, wheat, oil, wine, &c. The Carians were not considered by Herodotus and other early Greek historians as the aboriginal inhabitants of the country to which they communicated their name. Herodotus, himself a native of Caria, and who must therefore be allowed to have been well acquainted with its traditions, believed that the people who inhabited it had formerly occupied the islands of the Ægean, under the name of Leleges; but that, being reduced by Minos, king of Crete, they were removed by that sovereign to the continent of Asia, where they still, however, continued to be his vassals, and to serve him more especially in his maritime expeditions. At this period, says the historian, the Carians were by far the most celebrated of the existing nations; they excelled in the manufacture of arms, and the Greeks ascribed to them the invention of crests, and the devices and handles of shields. (Herod., 1, 171.—Compare Anacret. et Alc. ap. Strab., 661.) The Carians appear to have been, at an early period, great pirates, and it was for this reason, doubtless, that Minos expelled them from the island, while he was glad, at the same time, to avail himself of their skill and enterprise for the aggrandizement of his own empire. The account which the Carians themselves, however, gave of the origin of their race, indicates a near degree of affinity with the Lydians and Mysians, for they made Lydus and Mysus the brothers of Car, the patriarch of their nation. (Herod., 1, 171.—Strab., 659.) Hence it is not unreasonable to suppose, that as Thrace and Macedonia furnished those numerous tribes, which, under the several names of Leleges, Caucones, and Pelagii, spread themselves over the shores of the Ægean and the islands of that sea, the Carians therefore must have belonged to the same great family, since they are confounded by the best authorities with the Leleges. It is difficult to say what nation inhabited Caria before Minos had removed thither the people from whom it took its name; but it is not improbable that the Phœnicians occupied a portion of it. For we know that they had colonized Rhodes and other islands off the coast, and Athenæus remarks (4. p. 174) that certain poets had applied the name Phœnicæ to Caria. The Carians appear to have offered but little resistance to the Greek settlers who successively established themselves on their coast, and to have been gradually confined to the southern coast chiefly, and to the valleys of those streams which are tributary to the Mæander, towards the borders of Phrygia and Pisidia. We find them also yielding to the superior ascendancy of the Lydians, under the dominion of Alyattes and Cræsus. (Nic., Damasc., p. 243.—Herod., 1, 28.) On the overthrow of the Lydian empire they passed under the Persian sway. The policy of the sovereigns of Persia was, to establish in each subject or tributary state a government apparently independent of them, but whose despotic authority at home afforded the best guarantee that the people would everywhere be brought under the control of the court of Susa. It was to this system that the dynasty of Carian princes, who fixed their residence at Halicarnassus, owed its origin. A sketch of their history will be given in the account of that city. From the Persian Caria passed to the Macedonian sway. At a later period, it appears to have been, for a time, annexed to the kingdom of Egypt. (Polyb., 3, 2.) It next fell under the dominion of Antiochus; but, on his defeat by Scipio, the Roman senate bestowed this part of the conquered monarch's territory upon the Rhodians. It was afterward overrun, and occupied for a short time, by Mithradates, but was finally annexed by the Romans to the proconsular province of Asia. (Cramer's Asia Minor, vol. 2, p. 163, seqq.)

CARINÆ, a street of Rome, where Cicero, Pompey, and others of the principal Romans dwelt. From the epithet lautæ, which Virgil applies to the Carinæ, we may infer, that the houses which stood in this quarter of ancient Rome were distinguished by an air of superior elegance and grandeur. (Æn., 8, 361, seqq.) The name Carinæ is derived, as Nardini not improbably supposes, from the street's being placed in a hollow between the Cælian, Esquiline, and Palatine hills. (Cramer's Ancient Italy, vol. 1, p. 375.)

CARINUS (M. AURELIUS), eldest son of the Emperor Carus, who gave him the title of Cæsar, and rank of Augustus, together with the government of Italy, Illyricum, Africa, and the West, when he himself was setting out with his second son Numerianus, to make war against the Persians. Carus, knowing the evil qualities of Carinus, gave him this charge with great reluctance, but he had no alternative, as Numerianus, though superior in every respect to his elder brother, was too young to hold so important a command. As soon as Carinus entered Gaul, which his father had particularly charged him to defend against the barbarians, who menaced an irruption, he gave himself up to the most degrading excesses, discharged the most virtuous men from public employment, and substituted the vile companions of his debaucheries. On hearing of the death of his father he indulged in new excesses and new crimes. Still, however, his courage and his victories merit praise. He defeated the barbarians who had begun to attack the empire, among others the Sarmatæ, and he afterward overthrew Sabinus Julianus, who had assumed the purple in Venetia. He then marched against Dioclesian, who had proclaimed himself emperor after the death of Numerian. The two armies met in Mœsia, and several engagements took place, in which success seemed balanced. At last a decisive battle was fought near Margum, and Carinus was on the point of gaining a complete victory, when he was slain by a tribune of his own army, who had received an outrage at his hands. This event took place A.D. 285, so that the reign of Carinus, computing it from his father's death, was a little more than one year. (Vopisc., Car., 7.—Id., Numer., 11.—Id., Carin., 16, seq.—Suid., s. v. Καρίνος.—Eutrop., &c.) If historians have decried Carinus for his vices, there have not been wanting poets to sing his praises. Nemesianus and Calpurnius have followed the example of Virgil; and, as the latter has placed, on the lips of shepherds, eulogiums on Augustus, so these two bards have sung in their eclogues the praises of Carinus and Numerian, and have raised them both to the rank of gods! (Biogr. Univ., vol. 7, p. 137, seq.—Crevier, Hist. Emp. Rom., vol. 6, p. 150, seqq.)

CARMÂNĪA, a country of Asia, between Persia and Gedrosia, now Kerman. Its capital was Carmania or Kerman, southeast of Persepolis. (Plin., 6, 22, seq.—Solin., c. 104.—Arrian, Exp. Al., 6, 28.)

CARMELUS, a god of the Syrians, who was worshipped on Mount Carmel. He had an altar, but no temple. According to Tacitus, a priest of this deity predicted to Vespasian that he would be emperor. (Compare the remarks of Brohier, ad Tacit., Hist., 2, 78.)

CARMENTA and CARMENTIS, according to the old Italian legend, a prophetess of Arcadia, mother of Evander, with whom she was said to have come to Italy. Her first name is said to have been Themis, and the appellation Carmenta, or Carmentis, to have been given her from her delivering oracles in verse (Carmina).—Compare Kruse, Hellas, vol. 1, p. 444, in notes. Carmenta seems, in fact, to have been a deity similar to the Camenæ or Muses. That she was an ancient Italian deity is clear, for she had a flamen and a festival. (Cic., Brut., 14.) The Carmentalia were on the 11th and 15th of January. Carmenta was worshipped by the Roman matrons. They prayed, on this occasion, to two deities, named Porrima and Prosa, or Antivorta and Postvorta, for a safe delivery in childbirth. (Keightley's Mythol., p. 532.)

CARMENTĀLIA, a festival at Rome in honour of Carmenta, celebrated the 11th and 15th of January. (Virg. Carmenta.—Ovid, Fast., 1, 461.)

CARMENTĀLIS PORTA, one of the gates of Rome in the neighbourhood of the Capitol. It was afterward called Scelerata, because the Fabii passed through it in going to that fatal expedition where they perished. (Virg., Æn., 8, 338.)

CARNEIDES, a philosopher of Cyrene in Africa, founder of a sect called the third or New Academy. The Athenians sent him with Diogenes the Stoice, and Critolaus the peripatetic, as ambassador to Rome, B.C. 155. Carneades excelled in the vehement and rapid, Critolaus in the correct and elegant, and Diogenes in the simple and modest, kind of eloquence. Carneades, in particular, attracted the attention of his new auditory by the subtlety of his reasoning and the fluency of his language. Before Galba and Cato the Censor, he harangued with great variety of thought and copiousness of diction in praise of justice. The next day, to establish his doctrine of the uncertainty of human knowledge, he undertook to refute all his former arguments. Many were captivated by his eloquence; but Cato, apprehensive lest the Roman youth should lose their military character in the pursuit of Grecian learning, persuaded the senate to send back these philosophers, without delay, to their own schools. Carneades obtained such high reputation at home, that other philosophers, when they had dismissed their scholars, frequently came to hear him. It was the doctrine of the New Academy, that the senses, the understanding, and the imagination frequently deceive us, and therefore cannot be infallible judges of truth; but that, from the impression which we perceive to be produced on the mind by means of the senses, we infer appearances of truth or probabilities. He maintained, that they do not always correspond to the real nature of things, and that there is no infallible method of determining when they are true or false, and consequently that they afford no certain criterion of truth. Nevertheless, with respect to the conduct of life, Carneades held that probable appearances are a sufficient guide, because it is unreasonable that some degree of credit should not be allowed to those witnesses who commonly give a true report. He maintained, that all the knowledge the human mind is capable of attaining is not science, but opinion. (Enfield's Hist. Phil., vol. 1, p. 254, seq.—Cic. ad Att., 12, 23, de Orat., 1 et 2.—Lactant., 5, 14.—Val. Max., 8, 8.)

CARNÆA, a festival observed in many of the Grecian cities, but more particularly at Sparta, where it was first instituted, in honour of Apollo Carnæus. (Vid. Carnæus.) It commenced at Sparta on the seventh day of the month named after it Carnæus (Καρνείος), which corresponded to the Athenian Metageitnion, or a part of our August and September. The celebration lasted nine days, and, according to some, was an imitation of the manner of living, and the discipline used, in camps; for nine ἐκιάδες (teuts) were erected; in every one of which nine men, of three different tribes, three being chosen out of a tribe, lived for the space of nine days, during which time they were obedient to a public crier or herald, and did nothing without express directions from him. Hesyclus tells us, that the priest, whose office it was to attend at this solemnity, was named ἀγυρίης, and he adds, in another place, that out of every tribe five other ministers were elected, and called Καρνεῖται, who were obliged to continue in their function four years, during which time they led a life of celibacy. At this festival, the musical numbers called Καρνεῖται νόμοι were sung by musicians, who contended for victory. The first prize was won by Terpander. (Athenæus, 14, p. 635, c.—Compare Corsini, Fast. Attic., 3, p. 41.—Struz, ad Hellanic., fragm., p. 83.—Manso, Sparta, vol. 1, pt. 2, p. 215, seqq.)

CARNÆUS, an epithet applied to Apollo. According to the common account, the name was derived from Carus, an Acarnanian, who was instructed by the god in the art of divination, but was afterward slain by Hippotes, a descendant of Hercules. Apollo, in revenge, sent a plague upon the Dorians, to avert which they instituted the festival of the Carneæ. Various other accounts, equally unworthy of reliance, are given. The epithet Carnæus evidently refers to the prophetic powers of the god, and the certain fulfilling of his predictions; and hence it is clearly related to the Greek verb καίρω, “to accomplish.” (Compare Schol. ad Theocrit., 5, 83.—Manso, Sparta, vol. 1, pt. 2, p. 218.)

CARNŪTES, a powerful nation of Gallia Celtica, known even before the time of Cæsar, and mentioned by Livy (5, 34) among the tribes that crossed the Alps in the time of Tarquinius Priscus. And yet they are numbered by Cæsar (B. G., 6, 4) among the clients or dependants of the Remi. Their country was the principal seat of the Druids, and lay to the southwest of the Parisii. It answered to the modern départements d'Eure-et-Loire and du Loiret. Atricum, now Chartres, was their chief city. (Lemaire, Ind. Geogr. ad Cæs., s. v.)

CARNŪTUM, or Carnuntum, a city of Pannonia Superior, on the Danube, opposite the mouth of the Marus. It became a place of importance in the war with the Marcomanni, and here the emperor Marcus Aurelius took up his residence for some years, and made it a central point from which to direct his operations against the Marcomanni and Quadi. It was plundered and destroyed by the barbarians in the fourth century (Ammian. Marcell., 30, 5), but was afterward rebuilt, though it never attained to its previous flourishing condition. The ruins of this place are to be found at the present day between Petronel and Altenburg, on the Danube. (Vell. Patere., 2, 109.—Plin., 4, 12.—Eutrop., 8, 6.—Spartian. Sec., 5.—Mannert, Geogr., vol. 3, p. 657.)

CARPATES, a long chain of mountains in the northern parts of Dacia, called also Alpes Bastarnicæ, now the range of Mount Krapak. (Ptol., 3, 7.)

CARPATHUS, an island in the Mediterranean, between Rhodes and Crete. The adjacent sea received from it the name of Mare Carpathium. Its first inhabitants were transplanted here by Minos from Crete; and an Argive colony was afterward added to them. (Diod. Sic., 5, 54.) Carpathus was two hundred stadia in circumference, and, according to Strabo, had four towns. In this he is wrong; since Pliny and Scylax speak merely of three; and even this is a large number for so small an island. The chief place was Nisyrus. The Turks call the island of Carpathus at the present day Scarpanto, but the modern Greeks Carpatho. (Plin., 4, 12.—Scylax, p. 38.)

CARRÆ and CARRIÆ, a town of Mesopotamia, near which Crassus was killed. It lay to the southeast of Edessa, and was a very ancient city. It is supposed to be the Charran of Scripture, whence Abraham departed for the Land of Canaan. (Compare Well's Sacred Geogr., s. v. Charran.—Calmet's Dict., vol. 5, p. 323.) According to Kinneir, a modern traveller in that quarter, Charran, or, as it is now called, Harran, is peopled by a few families of wandering Arabs, who have been led thither by a plentiful supply of good water from several small streams. It is situated in 36° 52' north latitude, and 39° 5' east longitude, in a flat sandy plain. (Lucan., 1, 104.—Plin., 5, 24.—Eutrop., 6, 18.—Ann. Marcell., 23, 4.—Jornand., de regn. Success., p. 22.—Zosim., 3, 12.—Joseph., Ant. Jud., 1, 7, 19.)

CARSŒLI, a town of the Æqui, on the Via Valeria. It became a Roman colony after the Æqui had been finally reduced. (Liv., 10, 3.) It was sometimes selected by the senate as a residence for illustrious state captives and hostages. Ovid (Fast., 4, 683) describes the adjacent country as cold, and unfit for raising olives, but good for grain. The ruins of the place still retain the name of Carsoli. (Cramer's Anc. Italy, vol. 1, p. 324.)

CARTEIA, a city of Hispania Batica, the position of which has given rise to much dispute. It does not appear, however, to have been the same with Calpe. D'Anville places it at the extremity of a gulf which the mountain of Calpe covers on the east; but Mannert, more correctly, at the very extremity of the strait below Algésiras. (Mannert, Geogr., vol. 1, p. 305.—Compare Ukert, Geogr., vol. 2, p. 345.)

CARTHÆA, a town in the island of Ceos, whence the epithet of Carthæus. (Ovid, Met., 7, 368.) It was situate on the southeastern side of the island, and is now called Poles. (Compare the French Strabo, vol. 4, p. 164, not.)

CARTHAGINIENSES, the inhabitants of Carthage. (Vid. Carthago.)

CARTHĀGO, a celebrated city of Africa, the rival, for a long period, of the Roman power. It was founded by a colony from Tyre, according to the common account, B.C. 878. Some suppose, however, that the city was more than once founded, and in this way they seek to remove the difficulty presented by the various accounts respecting the building of Carthage, by referring them to different epochs. (Heyne, Excurs., 1, ad Æn., 4.—Vol. 2, p. 543, ed. Lips.) According to this view of the subject, Carthage was originally settled by Tzorus and Carchedon,

50 years before the fall of Troy. (Appian, Bell. Pun. init.—Hieron. in Euseb. ad Num., 805, p. 91, ed. Scalig.) By the computation of Eusebius, however, it took place 37 years before Troy was destroyed. The second founding of Carthage occurred 173 years subsequent to the former one (Chron. Euseb., Hieron. ad Num., 971), or, if we follow Syncellus (p. 181, A), 133 years after the taking of Troy. With this epoch the mention of Dido comes in for the first time. Her true era, however, appears to be that of the third founding of the city, 190 years later, according to Josephus (in Apion, I, 18, p. 1042).—The Greeks called Carthage Καρχηδόνη, and the Carthaginians, Καρχηδόνιοι. The name of the place in Punic was Carthada, i. e., "The New City," in contradistinction to the old or parent city of Tyre. (Compare Gesenius, Gesch. Hebr. Spr., p. 229.—Id., Phœn. Mon., p. 421.)—Carthage was situated on a peninsula, in the recess of a spacious bay, formed by the promontory Hermæum (Cape Bon) on the east, and that of Apollo (Cape Zibib) on the west. The Bagradas flows into the bay between Utica and the peninsula, and, being an inundating river, has doubtless caused many changes in this bay. The adventurers who founded Carthage bought a small piece of land, for which they paid a yearly tax; with the increasing wealth and power of the city, the respective conditions of the Carthaginians and the natives were changed, and the merchants assumed and maintained a dominion over the Libyans who dwelt around them. The Carthaginians upheld their control over the native tribes by sending out colonies, as the Romans did into the Italian states; a mixed population would thus soon arise. A regular colonizing system was part of the Carthaginian policy. (Aristot., Polit., 6, 3.) To provide for the poor by grants of land, and to avoid popular commotion, which is naturally produced by poverty, was the object of their colonial establishments. This kind of relief cannot be permanent, and we consequently read of more colonies of this description in the later periods of Carthage. Their settlements in Africa were principally on the coast between Carthage and the Syrtis Minor: they appear to have been under the immediate control of the parent city. But there is no reason for supposing, that the genuine Phœnician colonies, those established by Tyre, or other cities of the parent country, were in this kind of dependance on Carthage.—It was the policy of Carthage to encourage the agriculture of the productive region of Byzacium: their city was thus supplied with the prime necessities of life.—The boundaries of the Carthaginian territories in Africa were these: on the east the tower of Euphranta was the barrier between them and the Cyrenæans. From this place, which was on the eastern shore of the Syrtis Major, or from Charan, which was near to it, the Carthaginians carried on a contraband trade to procure the sulphur. (Strabo, 836.) The southern boundary was determined by natural limits: the sandy desert and its wandering inhabitants owned no master. It is more difficult to assign a western boundary: they had posts, or trading positions, along the northern coast as far as the Straits of Gibraltar, but this will not prove that they had any territorial possession. The Nomades would give themselves little concern about a small island opposite to the coast, or a barren rock upon it, and the Carthaginians might gradually attain some small tract besides the spot which was a dépôt for commodities. The Carthaginian possessions which were undisputed probably did not extend west of the 26th degree of east longitude, and spread some distance into the interior. The lake Tritonis may be considered as the southern and western limit of the cultivated region. Among the foreign possessions of Carthage may be enumerated their dependances in Sicily and Spain, as well as Sardinia, Corsica, the Balears, and Malta. In Sicily the Carthaginians succeeded to the possessions of the mother-country, Phœnicia. They were never able, however, to make themselves masters of the whole island: had they succeeded in their design, their subsequent history might have been different. They probably never had secure possession of more than one third of the island. Sicily was the point where the interests of the Greeks and Carthaginians conflicted. The Greek cities were free states, whose wealth increased with as much rapidity, according to extant documents, as any countries whose history is known, except some of the free states of America. Had these little commonwealths always united their forces, the Carthaginian settlements, which were strictly colonies in the modern acceptation of the word, must have yielded to the superior energies of the Greeks. It is said (Herodot., 7, 165) that it was a concerted plan between Xerxes and the Carthaginians, that Greece and Sicily should be crushed at the same time; one by the united myriads of the east, the other by the barbarians of the west, who formed the armies of Carthage. But Hamilcar, the Carthaginian general, saw his forces vanquished by the Sicilian Greeks, and he himself lost his life.—As to Spain, it is difficult to distinguish between the Phœnicians and their descendants, the Carthaginians, owing to the imperfect records we possess of Carthaginian history; nor can we with certainty assign the era when the colonists succeeded to the foreign possessions of the mother-country. The southwestern part of Spain, the modern Andalusia, was their favourite region: the town of Gades (Cádiz) became a flourishing place, and the emporium of Southern Spain. (Heeren, Ideen, vol. 2, pt. 1, p. 27, seqq.—Long's Anc. Geogr., p. 91, seqq.)

1. The Carthaginian Polity.

Our information on this important and interesting subject is not so complete as the investigator of ancient history desires. Aristotle's small extant treatise, entitled "Politica," is our best guide in this obscure matter. The city was a commercial town, possessing, as we have seen, numerous foreign colonies, besides dependent towns in the fertile region of Byzacium. Agriculture was encouraged in the African colonies, or subject cities, by the demands for the necessities of life which a great capital would create: from the fragments of Mago's book on husbandry, and the testimony of historians, we infer that the cultivation of grain, of the olive, and the vine, and the raising of cattle, were well understood. Carthage, like most of the towns in the Greek states, was the ruling city of the district in which it was situated: the citizens of the metropolis possessed the sovereign power, but the mode in which it was distributed among those of Carthage requires some explanation. There was in Carthage, undoubtedly, a body of rich citizens, who are sometimes considered as a kind of aristocracy, but there is no proof that this was an hereditary dignity, or that it was anything more than the influence which a rich individual possesses and transmits to his children by joining it to a large estate. An aristocracy may be formed in this way: that of Carthage, as far as we know, possessed no hereditary privileges, and no political power but from election. But posts of honour and dignity brought with them no emolument, and, consequently, were the exclusive property of the rich, who alone could afford to sustain the expense which such situations necessarily require. Bribery is a consequence of such an institution, and a small body, whatever name it may have, will thus govern a community. (Aristot., Polit., 2, 8.—Heeren's Ideen, vol. 2, pt. 1, p. 108, seqq.) The Spartan polity was that which Aristotle and Polybius consider the most nearly related to the Carthaginian. The power of the people was very limited, and was exercised only in their public meetings. The kings or suffetes, and the generals of the republic, were elected by the people in their public assemblies; but bribery was so usual that Aristotle considered those high distinctions as salable at the time when he wrote. When the suffetes and the senate could not agree about any proposed enactment, the people had the right of deciding between them. The senate possessed the chief power, both legislative and executive; but we are entirely ignorant of the constitution of this body. It is only from the comparison made by Aristotle and Polybius between the constitutions of Carthage and Sparta, and the additional resemblance between that of Carthage and Rome in the time of Polybius, that we can attain to any probabilities. We suppose, then, that the senators might hold their offices for life; that their number was considerable, and that they possessed the principal legislative and executive power. The presiding officers of the senate and the chief civil magistrates were the suffetes: the Greek writers call them kings, and the Roman historian, Livy, compares them with the consuls. They were elected from the richest and noblest families (Aristot., Polit., 2, 81); we suppose the number was two, like that of the kings of Sparta and consuls of Rome: any farther conjectures about them may be ingenious, but they will also be useless. The generals of the state were elected also from the most distinguished families. The civil and the military power in Carthage were distinct. We may find instances in which the kings seem to have had something like military command, as in the case of King Hanno, who conducted the colonial expedition; but, in general, we can have no doubt that the generals of the republic were officers chosen by the people to command the armies in foreign expeditions or in domestic dissension. The judicature of Carthage resembled that of Sparta: the judges of the several courts had the full and complete cognizance of all civil and criminal cases, without the aid of jurymen. (Aristot., Polit., 3, 1.) The court of the one hundred was the supreme tribunal of Carthage, and the account of its origin, given by Justin (18, 7), is rendered more probable by Aristotle's comparing this body with that of the Spartan Ephori. Such a tribunal as this could be converted by favourable circumstances and a few bold leaders into a real court of inquisition: it actually became so in the later ages of the commonwealth; and, if we believe Livy (33, 46), the lives and property of the citizens were disposed of according to its caprice. Any injury, real or imaginary, done to one of the body, was an offence against the dignity of the whole college. Hannibal overturned the throne of the inquisitors, and destroyed this tyrannical and dangerous tribunal. This body was not chosen by the people, but by courts called Pentarchies: we know nothing more of these latter courts, except that they had cognizance of very important cases, and enjoyed the privilege of supplying the vacancies that happened in their own body. The members of the court of one hundred retained their place for a long time, though originally not for life. (Aristot., Polit., 2, 8.) Our materials will hardly admit any farther development of the constitution of Carthage. In the decline of the state, we know from Aristotle that the influence of a few rich families in obtaining possession of places of importance, and the union of several distinct offices in one person, contributed materially to hasten the end of the political system. (Heeren's Ideen, vol. 2, pt. 1, p. 118, seqq. — Long's Anc. Geogr., p. 97.)

2. Religion of the Carthaginians.

The religious faith and ceremonies of the Carthaginians appear to have been at bottom the same with those of the mother country, Phœnicia. Hence the general denominations for their divinities betray a strong resemblance between the two nations. Thus we have Elim, Alonim, and, in the feminine, Alonoth; Baal and Baalath; Melech and Malcath; Don for Adon. (Plaut., Pœn., 5, 1, 15.—Compare Beller-mann, vol. 1, p. 45, and vol. 2, p. 15.) These appellations, given to the deities of Carthage as well as to those of Phœnicia, expressed in both countries the majesty of those all-powerful beings, and the dominion which they exercised over men. It was to the sun, however, as the first principle of nature, as the generative power, that the Carthaginians, after the example of the nations of Canaan, offered peculiar adoration. They styled him Baal or Moloch, "the lord," "the king," and also Belsamen, "the lord of heaven." This supreme deity they worshipped with a reverence so profound as scarcely ever to dare to pronounce his true name: they contented themselves in general with designating him as the "Ancient One," "the Eternal." (Augustin., De Consensu Evang., 1, 36.—Vol. 3, p. 11, ed. Maur.—Compare the expression, "Ancient of Days," in Daniel, 7, 9, 13.) The Greek writers translated Baal by Κρόνος, and the Romans by Saturnus, no doubt on account of the common reference which those divinities had to the idea of time. The images, as well as the titles of the Sun-God, were the same, to all appearances, both among the Phœnicians or Canaanites, and the Carthaginians. The description which Diodorus has left us of the statue of Cronus (Saturn) at Carthage, coincides in general with the account given by the Jewish Rabbins of that of Moloch in Canaan. (Diod. Sic., 20, 14.—Selden, de Diis Syris, 1, 6.) Both were made of metal; both had the arms extended, with a kind of furnace, or inner cavity, below, into which children were thrown to be destroyed by fire, as an offering to this horrid idol. In process of time, when the Carthaginians had become more closely connected with the Greeks, it is probable that Baal was made in some respects to resemble the Apollo of the latter; his worship, as well as his figure, would begin to modify themselves, and hence the Apollo of Carthage, whose colossal statue, entirely gilt, was transported to Rome by Scipio. (Polyb., 7, 9.—Appian., Bell. Pun., 79.—Plut., Vit. Flamin., c. 1.—Creuzer's Symbolik, vol. 2, p. 269.—But consult Guigniaut's note, vol. 2, p. 231, of the French work.) In the Roman Carthage, which retained the worship of its ancient deities, while it changed, at the same time, their forms and names, the Latin Saturn appeared to take the place of the Phœnician Baal; but the human sacrifices, still continually renewed, notwithstanding the repeated orders to the contrary on the part of the Romans, attest the permanency of ancient ideas and rites. Baal-Saturn maintained his honours even to the extremities of the west, even to Gades, where, under the Roman dominion, there still existed a temple of this god. (Compare Münter, Religion der Karthager, p. 17, seqq.—Id., über Saisische Idole, p. 8, seqq.) Various animals were consecrated to Baal, as to all the great divinities of paganism. Oxen were sacrificed to him, and he himself bore the attributes of a bull. A Phœnician medal, which has come down to us, displays the image of a god, like the Jupiter of the Greeks, seated on a throne, and having the head of an ox. The inscription is Baal-Thurz. Payne Knight (Inquiry into the Symb. Lang., &c., § 31.—Class. Journ., vol. 23, p. 226) compares the name Thor, given to the bull among the Phœnicians, according to Plutarch (Vit. Syll., 17), with the god Thor of Scandinavian mythology, the head of whose image was that of a bull. Horses were also dedicated to the Sun, and their blood shed at his festivals. (Münter, Religion der Karthager, p. 14, n. 44, who deduces this from a passage in the 2d (4th) Book of Kings, 23, 11.) It is also very probable that the elephant, an animal so renowned among the ancients for the species of worship which it was said to offer to the sun and moon (Elian

H. A., 7, 4.—Plin., 8, 1), was held sacred to Baal. One thing at least is certain, that in Africa these pious animals were in some degree connected with the worship of Ammon; and the coins of Juba, king of Mauritania, display on one side the head of Jupiter Ammon, and on the other an elephant. (Eckhel, Doctr. Num. Vet., vol. 4, p. 154.)—To the Sun-God, as monarch of the skies and supreme generator, was joined a female divinity, as the great goddess κατ' ἑσπεριν, as the queen of heaven, and the principle of fecundated nature. This divinity makes her appearance under various forms and different names in almost all the religions of Asia. (Compare Nouveau Journal Asiatique, vol. 1 (1828), p. 11, seqq.—Creuzer's Symbolik, par Guignaut, vol. 2, p. 232.) At Carthage, as in Syria and Phœnicia, she appears to have borne the name of Astarte or Asturoth, which corresponds to the idea of sovereign of the heavens and the stars. Thus the Greeks called her, in their language, Urania, and the Romans the "Celestial Goddess." This deity was worshipped in numerous temples at Carthage, along the coast of Africa, at Malta, and in the other isles of the Mediterranean, as also in Spain, near Gades; and her rites were no less voluptuous in their character than those of Mylitta at Babylon, of Anaitis in Armenia, and of Venus-Urania in Cyprus. (Münter, Rel. der Karthager p. 80, seqq.)—Immediately after Baal and Astarte, was placed, among the national divinities of Carthage, Melkarth, the "king of the city," the tutelary deity of the parent city of Tyre. (Münter, ibid. p. 36, seqq.) Wherever the Phœnicians penetrated, the altars that were raised in honour of this god, and the various traces of his worship, testify the high veneration which this people entertained for him. The Tyrian colonies regarded him as their common protector; they adored him as a kind of divine mediator; as a sort of sacred bond, uniting them one with another and with their common country. The symbol of the victorious course of the sun, and identical, in this respect, with the Grecian Hercules, he naturally became, for these hardy navigators, the celestial guide of their distant expeditions, and, consequently, the god of commerce. (Creuzer's Symbolik, par Guignaut, vol. 2, p. 172, n. 4.) In this way he was in some measure assimilated to another deity, Sumes, whose Phœnician name recalls the Son of Egypt. (Compare Bellermann, über Phœnic. Münz., 1, p. 25.) A similar alliance existed at Rome between Hercules and Mercury, both deities being considered as the gods of riches and abundance. Melkarth was, in effect, like the Grecian Hercules, the same with the sun. The Tyrians raised, in his temple at Gades, an altar to the year (Eustath. ad Dionys. Perieg., p. 453), and it is in a point of view directly analogous, that Nonnus calls Hercules the conductor of the twelve months. (Dionys., 40, 338.) Every year they kindled at Carthage, as at Tyre, and probably in all the Phœnician colonies, a large pyre in honour of Melkarth, whence an eagle was let loose, as a symbol, like the Egyptian phoenix, of the sun, and of time renewing itself from its own ashes. This scene was transferred by the Greeks to Mount Eta, where Hercules, in consuming himself on the funeral pile, celebrates his apotheosis after the accomplishment of his twelve labours. (Dio. Chrysostom, Orat., 33—Vol. 2, p. 23, ed. Reiske.) The worship of a Hercules, distinct from the one of Thebes, was continued, even to the last periods of paganism, in Carthage and in all the Phœnician cities.—Omitting the mention of other and less important divinities of the Carthaginians, we will conclude the present head with some general remarks on the religion of this people. The character of the Carthaginian religion, like that of the nation which professed it, was melancholy even to cruelty. Terror was the animating principle of this religion; a religion thirsting after blood, and envired with the most gloomy and appalling images. When we vie the abstinences, the voluntary tortures, and, above all, the horrid sacrifices which it imposed as a duty on the living, we are not astonished that the dead should appear in some degree actual objects of envy. I silenced the most sacred sentiments of human nature; it degraded the minds of its votaries by superstitions in turn atrocious and dissolute; and we are naturally led to the inquiry, what moral influence such a religion could have exercised over the people who professed it. The portrait which antiquity has left us of the Carthaginian character is hence far from being a flattering one. By turns imperious and servile, melancholy and cruel, inexorable and faithless, egotistical and covetous, it would seem as if the spirit of their religion had conspired with the jealous aristocracy that weighed so heavily upon them, and with their purely commercial and industrious habits, to close their hearts to every generous emotion and every elevated thought. Their system of belief may have contained some noble ideas, but their practice of that system served effectually to obscure these. A goddess presided over their public councils (Appian, Bell. Pun., p. 81, ed. Tollii); but these councils or assemblies were held during the night, and history informs us respecting some of the terrible measures that were agitated therein. The god of the solar fire was the patron deity of both Carthage and Tyre, and gave an example of great enterprises and hardy labours; yet his brightness was often stained with blood, and every year human victims were immolated at his altars as at those of Baal. Wherever the Phœnicians, or the Carthaginians after them, carried their commerce and their arms, not only at particular periods, but in all critical conjunctures, their high-toned fanaticism renewed these sanguinary sacrifices. In vain did Gelon of Syracuse, with the authority which victory gave him; in vain did the Greeks established at Carthage, endeavour, by mild and pacific influence, to put an end to these inhuman rites (Timæus, Tauromen. ap. Schol. in Pind., Pyth., 2, 3.—Münter, Rel. der Karth., p. 25); the ancient barbarity constantly reappeared, and maintained itself even in Roman Carthage. At the commencement even of the third century of our era, traces of this frightful mode of worship were still found to be practised in secret. (Tertull., Apol., 9.) From the year of Rome 655, all human sacrifices had been prohibited; but the emperors more than once found themselves under the necessity of making this prohibition a more binding one. Still, however, the evil was not completely eradicated; and we see, even at Rome, the worthless Elagabalus immolating children in the course of his magic ceremonies. (Dio Cass., 79, 12.—Creuzer's Symbolik, par Guignaut, vol. 2, p. 252.)

3. Carthaginian Language and Literature.

An account of the language and literature of Carthage will come in more naturally when treating of the Phœnicians. To this latter head, therefore, we refer the reader.

4. History of Carthage.

The first period of the history of Carthage extends to the beginning of the war with Syracuse, from B.C. 878 to 480. Carthage extended its conquests in Africa and Sardinia, carried on a commercial war with the people of Marseille (Massilia) and the Etrurians, and concluded a commercial peace with Rome, B.C. 509. The Carthaginians then directed their chief attention to the conquest of Sicily, with which commences their second and most splendid period, extending to the beginning of their war with the Romans, B.C. 265. When Xerxes undertook his campaign into Greece, the Carthaginians made a league with him, and the object of this arrangement was to crush at once both Sicily and Greece. The Carthaginians, however, were defeated at Himera by Gelon, king of Syracuse, and obliged to sue for peace, and to abstain from offering human sacrifices. In the war with Hiero, the next king, the Carthaginians conquered the cities Selinus, Himera, and Agrigentum. Dionysius the elder obtained a temporary peace. But, after Timoleon had delivered Syracuse and Sicily from the yoke of tyranny, the Carthaginians were peculiarly unfortunate. Contagious diseases and frequent mutinies reduced the strength of the city. When Sicily suffered under the tyranny of Agathocles, Carthage engaged in a war with him, and was soon attacked and severely pressed by the usurper. After the death of Agathocles, Carthage once more took part in the commerce of Sicily, when difficulties broke out there with their auxiliaries the Mamertines. The Romans took advantage of these troubles to expel the Carthaginians from Sicily, although they had previously received assistance from them in the war against Pyrrhus, king of Epirus, in Sicily and Lower Italy. Here begins the third period of Carthaginian history, embracing the thrice-repeated struggle for dominion between Rome and Carthage, in the interval between 264 and 146 B.C. The first Punic war continued 23 years. The fleets and armies of Carthage were vanquished. By the peace (B.C. 241) the Carthaginians lost all their possessions in Sicily. Upon this, the mercenary forces, whose wages could not be paid by the exhausted treasury of the city, took up arms. Hamilcar Barcas conquered them, and restored the Carthaginian power in Africa. Notwithstanding the peace with Carthage, the Romans took possession of Sardinia in 228, where the mercenary troops of Carthage had revolted. Hamilcar, who was at the head of the democratic party, now undertook the conquest of Spain, whose rich mines tempted his countrymen. For the success of this enterprise, within 17 years, Carthage was indebted to the family of Barcas, which could boast of the glorious names of Hamilcar, Hasdrubal, and Hannibal. To secure the possession of this acquisition, Hasdrubal founded New Carthage (Carthago), the most powerful of all the Carthaginian colonies. The second Punic war (from 218 to 201 B.C.), notwithstanding the abilities of the general, ended with the subjugation of Carthage. Hannibal, neglected by his countrymen, and weakened by a victory that cost him so much blood, was obliged to leave Italy, in order to hasten to the assistance of Carthage, which was threatened by the Romans. The battle of Zama resulted in favour of the Romans. Scipio granted the city peace under the severest conditions. Carthage ceded Spain, delivered up all her ships except ten, paid 10,000 talents (about $10,000,000), and promised to engage in no war without the consent of the Romans. Besides this, Masinissa, the ally of Rome and implacable enemy of Carthage, was placed on the Numidian throne. This king, under the protection of Rome, deprived the Carthaginians of the best part of their possessions, and destroyed their trade in the interior of Africa. The third war with the Romans was a desperate contest. The disarmed Carthaginians were obliged to demolish part of their own walls. Then, taking up arms anew, they fought for death or life. After three years, the younger Scipio ended this war by the destruction of the city, B.C. 146. Only 5000 persons are said to have been found within its walls. It was 23 miles in circumference; and when it was set on fire by the Romans, it burned incessantly for 17 days. After the overthrow of Carthage Utica became powerful. Cæsar planted a small colony on the ruins of Carthage. Augustus sent 3000 men thither, and built a city at a small distance from the spot on which ancient Carthage stood, thus avoiding the ill effects of the imprecations which had been pronounced by the Romans, according to custom, at the time of its destruction, against those who should rebuild it. This new city of Carthage was conquered from the Romans by the arms of Genseric, A.D. 439, and it was for more than a century the seat of the Vandal empire in Africa. It was at last destroyed by the Saracens, during the califate of Abdel Melek, towards the end of the 7th century, and few traces of it now remain except an aqueduct. According to Livy, Carthage was twelve miles from Tunetum or Tunis, a distance which still subsists between that city and a fragment of the western wall of Carthage. (Heeren, Ideen, vol. 2, pt. 1, p. 270, seqq.—Encyclop. Americ., vol. 2, p. 543, seqq.)

5. Circulating Medium and Revenue of Carthage.

The precious metals were probably early used in Carthage, as a medium of exchange as well as an article of luxury; but whether the state stamped coin for the use of the community is a question still undecided. That gold and silver coin was in circulation we cannot doubt; the dispute is about the existence of real Carthaginian coins. But we read of a substitute that the Carthaginians had for gold and silver, which renders it probable that the precious metal in circulation was often inadequate to the wants of the community. It is likely that the conquest of Spain materially supplied this deficiency. Several writers speak of a leather circulating medium: this was a piece of leather with a state-stamp on it, probably denoting its value. In this leather a small piece of metal was enclosed, the precise nature of which, whether it was a compound, or had some peculiar mark upon it, we cannot now ascertain. The best account of this substitute, which we may presume was not used beyond the city, is found in a dialogue on wealth in Æschines Socraticus (2, 24, p. 78, ed. Fischer.—Compare Aristid., Orat. Plat., 2, p. 241.—Salmas., de Us., p. 463). The revenue of Carthage was derived from various sources: that from the agricultural colonies within the African territory of Carthage, consisted of a tax paid in raw commodities. The duties on imported goods, both in the metropolis and the colonies, were another abundant source of public income. We learn from Aristotle (Polit., 3, 5), that there were treaties between the Carthaginians and Etrurians, by which the commodities that might be carried by each nation into the ports of the other were accurately described: this is an indication of commercial restrictions, mutual jealousies, and high duties. The produce of the mines of Spain, which at that time were rich in gold, silver, and iron, must be added to the public revenues of the state. The richest mines were in the neighbourhood of New Carthage. It is probable that they were worked by slaves, both native and imported, while they were in the possession of the Carthaginians, as they were afterward when the Romans were masters of Spain. In times of difficulty Carthage occasionally applied for loans to foreign countries. In the Punic war, the impoverished republic asked as a favour from the rich Ptolemy Philadelphus, king of Egypt, the loan of 2000 talents, which the prudent Greek declined. It cannot be considered that this was one of the ordinary sources of revenue, because the only profit that could arise from it would be the use of the money and the non-payment of the interest and principal; and this kind of profit would necessarily cease, as in the case of some modern states, when the character of the borrower was known. (Heeren, Ideen, vol. 2, pt. 1, p. 148.—Long's Anc. Geogr., p. 98.)

6. Naval Commerce and Naval and Military force of Carthage.

The district of Byzacium, in the province called Africa Propria by the Romans, and the island of Sardinia, were the grain countries of Carthage: this commercial town derived its supply of bread from remote parts, like Athens, Corinth, and other large cities of Greece. Sicily was much frequented by the Punic merchants; and the rich emporium of Syracuse, in times of peace, saw its port crowded with African vessels. Oil and wine were imported from Sicily; both of these articles were produced in Africa, but it is probable that the supply was insufficient. Strabo (836) speaks of a contraband trade carried on by Carthage with the Cyrenæans, through the port of Charax; the Punic merchant brought wine, and received in exchange the precious silphium. The treaties with Rome preserved in Polybius, and the remarks of Aristotle in his Politica, prove the active commerce of the Carthaginians and their jealousy of foreign rivals. The Etrurians, who had built towns in Campania, were probably rather pirates than merchants: they procured the wares which they had to exchange for other commodities by robbing vessels on the sea, or the towns of the coast. The Carthaginians, as has already been remarked, had commercial treaties with the Etrurians, who, from the nature of their profession, could furnish them with most of the articles that the Mediterranean produced. In return, their African friends gave them slaves, precious stones, ivory, and gold, the produce of the vast continent behind their city. Malta, and the small adjoining island of Gaulus (Gozo), were Carthaginian possessions: cloth for wearing apparel was manufactured in Malta, and probably from a native cotton. The wax of Corsica was also an article of commerce: the natives of the island were prized for making excellent servants. (Diad. Sic., 5, 13.) The little island of Æthalia or Ilva, now Elba, has furnished iron ore from the remotest historical period; the foreign trader and the merchant of Carthage purchased the ore when it was smelted, and deposited it in the hands of their countrymen for farther improvement. Majorca and Minorca exchanged mules and fruit for wine and female slaves; the latter article these idle islands were always ready to purchase. The precious metals of Spain have been frequently alluded to; some of the mines appear to have been public property, while in other cases the merchant procured gold-dust from the natives by an exchange of commodities. There is no impossibility involved in supposing that the Phœnicians or the Carthaginians visited the northern shores of Europe; but, as direct evidence is wanting, it is not necessary to assume that the tin and the amber which they sold to the world were brought by their own ships from the Scilly islands (Cassiterides) or the coast of the Baltic. The trading towns established on the shores of Mauritania seem to have been intended to form a commercial connexion with central Africa: the carriers of the desert would bring the products of Soudan to the small island of Cerne, the most southern of the colonies established by Hanno. The Carthaginians supplied them from the stores in Cerne with earthen vessels, trinkets, and ornaments of various kinds. There was also a fishery on this coast, according to the book of wonders ascribed to Aristotle (c. 148). The fish was salted and carried to Carthage, where it commanded a high price. As regards the discovery-voyage of Hanno, we feel some curiosity to know whether it was useful in establishing a trade on the gold coast of Africa; and our admiration of the extensive knowledge of Herodotus is increased, by finding in his history the only extant information on this obscure subject. In the fourth book (c. 146), he tells us, on the authority of some Carthaginians, that merchants from that renowned trading town, after passing through the straits, visited a remote place on the Libyan coast, where they procured gold from the natives by barter. When they landed at the spot which the natives frequented, it was their practice to lay their wares on the shore and return to their vessel after raising a smoke. The inhabitants, seeing this, would come down to the coast, place a quantity of gold near the commodities, and retire. The Carthaginians then would leave the ship, and examine what the natives had left in exchange: if it was sufficient, they would take the gold, leaving their own merchandise in its stead; if they were not satisfied, they gave the gold-possessioners an opportunity of adding to the deposit of precious metals by retiring again to their ship. This was repeated till the bargain was closed, and, it is added, neither party ever wronged the other. This story of the Carthaginians must not be considered as a mere fiction: it may have received some slight alterations, but the outline of it bears the marks of truth. A modern traveller (Höft), quoted by Heeren (Ideen, vol. 2, pt. 1, p. 182), describes in a similar way the mode of exchanging commodities between the people of Morocco and the negroes on the borders of Negroland. A caravan goes once a year from Sus, one of the four divisions of the empire of Morocco, across the terrific waste of the western Sahara: tobacco, salt, wool, with woollen and silken cloths, are the articles which they carry. Gold-dust, negroes, and ostrich-feathers are given in exchange by the blacks. The Moors do not enter the Negroland, but meet the blacks at a place on the frontiers, and conclude the bargain without speaking a word. The mutual ignorance of each other's language renders this the only mode of conducting their mercantile transactions.—Carthage, in time of war, maintained a large army and navy: nay, even when she was not engaged in foreign struggles, her distant colonies required the residence of a garrison and the occasional visits of a navy. The writers on the Punic wars have left us information on the military and naval force of the republic, which is in general satisfactory. The principal dockyard was in the city of Carthage. (Appian, Bell. Pun., 96.) There were two ports or havens, an outer one, intended for merchant ships, and an inner basin, which was separated from the other by a double wall. A small but elevated island in the centre of the inner haven commanded a view of the sea. The admiral of the navy resided here. Two hundred and twenty ships of war were generally laid up in this dockyard, with all the necessary stores for fitting them out on a short notice. In the wars with Syracuse, the ships of Carthage were only triremes (Diad. Sic., 2, 16), but they afterward built vessels of a much larger size, in imitation of the Macedonian Greeks. The war-ships of the Romans and the Carthaginians in the first Punic war (Polyb., 1, 2) carried nearly five hundred men: each Roman vessel contained one hundred and twenty soldiers and three hundred seamen. The Carthaginian ships had about the same number of men on board. In one engagement the Carthaginians collected a fleet of three hundred and fifty ships, manned, according to the computation of Polybius himself, by more than one hundred and fifty thousand sailors and soldiers. We find extravagant and apparently improbable estimates of numbers in all the Carthaginian wars in Sicily, and in their sea-fights with the Romans. The sailors or rowers were slaves, purchased by the state for this service: the complement of a quinquereme was about three hundred slaves and one hundred and twenty fighters. In ancient naval tactics, to move in any direction with celerity, to break through the enemy's line, and to disable or sink his ships, were the evolutions on which victory depended. Sometimes a number of ships were wedged together, and the soldiers fought on the decks as if it were a land battle, but with this important difference, that an escape was not so easy. The slaughter in their naval engagements was prodigious, sometimes amounting to ten, twenty, or even thirty thousand men. The sea-fights described by Thucydides and Polybius, particularly in the first book, are minute, and, we believe, generally faithful accounts by the two great historians of antiquity. The command of the fleet was usually separated from that of the land force, but we find instances in which a single person possessed the direction of both. The military force of Carthage consisted principally of hired troops, collected from all the nations with which the state had commercial connexions. Only a small part of the citizens of Carthage could be employed in military service. The mercantile occupations of the majority would not allow them to neglect their business for foreign conquests, or the defence of remote possessions. It was found to be a more economical plan, to make a bargain with nations who had nothing to dispose of but their bodies, and with this saleable commodity to provide for the defence of their colonies or to acquire new possessions. But the distinguished families of Carthage served in the armies of the state, and from this class all the commanders were chosen. In times of danger, all the citizens would necessarily arm themselves to repel an attack on the metropolis; but we are now speaking of the ordinary constitution of a Carthaginian army, and this neither admitted nor required a large number of Carthaginian citizens. A Punic army was like a congregation of nations: the half-naked savage of Gaul stood by the side of the wild Iberian; the cunning Ligurian, from the Alpine or Apennine mountains, met with the Lotophagi of Libya; and the Nasamones, the explorers and guides in the great desert, half-bred Greeks, runaways, and slaves, found themselves mingled in this strange assembly. Troops of Carthaginian and Liby-Phœnician origin were in the centre of the army: on the flank the numerous Nomadic tribes of western Africa wheeled about on unsaddled horses guided by a bridle of rushes. The Balearic slingers formed the vanguard, and the elephants of Æthiopia, with their black conductors, were the moveable castles that protected the front lines. According to Polybius (1, 6), it was considered politic to form an army of such materials, that difference of language might prevent union between several nations, and remove all danger of a general conspiracy; but there are disadvantages also, which arise from the want of a medium of communication, and these were developed in the later periods of the republic. When Xerxes led the nations of Asia against the Greeks of the land of Hellas, a Carthaginian armament was despatched to subjugate the western colonies in Sicily. The muster-roll of the Asiatic force (Herodot., 7, 61, seqq.) contained the names of all the nations in his extensive empire, and even some beyond it, who served for money. The Punic army was composed of the tribes of the western world and of the African desert, and the two armies combined would have exhibited specimens of nearly all the tribes of men that were then known. We become intimately acquainted with the nature of a Carthaginian army from the extant narrative of Polybius. In the opinion of this soldier and historian, the cavalry of Numidia formed the strongest part of the army, and to their quick evolutions, their sudden retreat, and their rapid return to the charge, he attributes the success of Hannibal in his great victories. (Polyb., 3, 12.) Another cause may be assigned for the losses of the Romans, without at all impeaching the opinion of Polybius on the Numidian cavalry. The Romans frequently had two consuls at the head of their armies, and when both happened to be together in the field, they commanded alternately, day by day. At the fatal battle of Cannæ, the ignorance and presumption of Varro were associated with the better judgment and calm valour of Æmilius; the single unshackled energy of the great Hannibal was more than a match for this unfortunate combination. We can readily admit the possibility of the large armaments which the rich commercial city of Carthage is said to have equipped, but we perhaps shall find it necessary to detract something from the numerical estimates of Diodorus, which he took from the careless and credulous Ephorus, or from Timæus (Polyb., 12, exc. 8), whose authority is not much better. To form some idea of the naval and military force of Carthage, even in time of peace, we must recollect that their foreign trading ports were maintained by garrisons, and that, in the short interval of peace, it was necessary to support a force sufficient to meet the probable danger of war. Three hundred elephants were kept in the citadel of Carthage, which contained, also, stalls for four thousand horses, with accommodations for their riders, and for forty thousand foot soldiers besides. (Heeren, Ideen, vol. 2, pt. 1, p. 250, seqq.—Long's Anc. Geogr., p. 98, seqq.)

6. Inland Commerce of Carthage.

Writers who have discussed the commercial relations of Carthage, seem scarcely to have supposed the existence of an extensive caravan-trade with central Africa and other parts of the continent. But if we compare the position of the modern towns of Tripoli, Tunis, and Algiers, with that of Carthage, and consider the nature of their commerce at the present day, we cannot doubt that similar circumstances would, in ancient times, produce corresponding results. This probability is increased and strengthened by a few passages in the works of Herodotus. The commodities of Central Africa, of the desert, and of the region of Beledulgerid, must necessarily create a caravan trade, extending from the shores of the Mediterranean to the banks of the Niger. These commodities are black slaves, male and female, from the countries south of the Sahara; salt from the great saline deposits in the desert; and dates from the region bordering on the north side of the great sandy waste. These three things have in all ages been considered articles of necessity by the inhabitants of the Tripoli and Tunis coasts, or those connected with them by commercial relations. Gold is seldom found in north Africa; it is principally procured by washing the earths in the neighbourhood of the Kong, or Mountains of the Moon, south of the great river Niger. Ivory is also another article of luxury, which the central countries furnish to the merchants of the sea-coast. The native tribes of the Sahara are the carriers of the desert, for which occupation they are peculiarly adapted by their nomadic life, and the possession of numerous beasts of burden. Many of them are merely carriers for the rich merchants settled at the different trading ports, while some of them, who possess a capital, purchase commodities on their own account, and frequently acquire considerable wealth. The direction of this traffic across the desert has probably changed very little: the great emporiums of commerce on the shores of the Mediterranean and in Lower Egypt, are nearly in the same position, and the caravan-routes across the Sahara are determined by the unchanging physical circumstances of this extensive sandy waste. The caravans choose those times for their route at which springs of water can be found to refresh the men and animals, and to furnish them with a sufficient supply during their journey from one halting-place to the next. It appears from the narrative of Herodotus, that the people between the two Syrtes were the carriers of the desert. The Carthaginians might either directly participate in this traffic, or they might meet the caravan near the smaller Syrtis, and receive from it their slaves, their gold and precious stones, in exchange for manufactured articles, for wine, oil, or grain. The immense consumption of slaves in this commercial and military republic, would render a slave-trade necessary to its existence, and from no place could they be procured in such number as from the inexhaustible slave-magazines of the African continent. When we affirm that the Carthaginians were engaged in commerce with the nations of Central Africa, we do not mean to say that it was a direct commerce, though it is possible it might be so in some degree. The tribes between the two Syrtis travelled to Garama, and, as every great resting-place might be a dépôt for commodities, they could procure from this town the products of remote lands which the Carthaginians desired to possess. The towns on the coast of Byzacium would be the market for the caravans of Garama, and places of the greatest importance for the commerce of Carthage. It does not appear that the wares and products of Central Africa were carried by the caravans any farther than the towns near the Syrtis, on the edge of the desert: thus the connexion of Carthage with the nations of the interior appears to have attracted little attention. (Heeren, Ideen, vol. 2, pt. 1, p. 185, seqq.—Long's Anc. Geogr., p. 104, seqq.)

CARTHAGO NOVA, a well-known city of Hispania Tarraconensis, situate on the coast, a little distance above the boundary line between Tarraconensis and Bætica. It was founded by Hasdrubal, the Carthaginian, who succeeded Barcas, the father of Hannibal, B.C. 242. (Polyb., 2, 3.—Mela, 2, 6.—Strab., 158.) It was taken by Scipio Africanus during the second Punic war, and, on falling into the hands of the Romans, it became a colony, under the title of Colonia Victrix Julia Nova Carthago (Flores, Med. de Esp., vol. 1, p. 216.) The situation of this place was very favourable for commerce, since it lay almost in the middle of the southern coast of Spain, which had hardly any good harbours besides this along its whole extent. (Polyb., 10, 10.—Id., 3, 39.—Strab., 156.) In Strabo's time it was a very important place, and carried on an extensive commerce, and in the mountains not far to the north of it were the richest silver mines of all Spain. The governor of the province of Tarraconensis spent the winter either in this city or Tarraco. (Strab., 167.) The modern Cartagena occupies the site of the ancient city. (Ukert, Geogr., vol. 2, p. 400, seqq.)

CARVILIUS, I. one of the four kings of Cantium (Kent), who, at the command of Cassivelaunus, made an attack on Cæsar's naval camp, in which they were repulsed and lost a great number of men. (Cæs. B. G., 5, 22.)—II. The first Roman who divorced his wife during the space of six hundred years. This was for barrenness, B.C. 231. (Val. Max., 2, 1, 4.)—III. A grammarian of this name, according to Plutarch (de quest. Rom., n. 54), first introduced the G into the Roman alphabet, C having been previously used for it. This was nearly 500 years after the building of the city. (Compare Quintilian, 1, 7, 23.—Terent. Maur., p. 2402.—Id., p. 2410.—Mar. Vict., p. 2469.—Diom., p. 417.—Serv. ad Virg., Georg., 1, 194.—Schneider, L. G., vol. 1, p. 223, seqq.)

CARUS, a Roman emperor, who succeeded Probus. He was first appointed, by the latter, Prætorian prefect, and after his death was chosen by the army to be his successor, A.D. 282. Carus created his two sons, Carinus and Numerianus, Cæsars, as soon as he was elevated to the empire, and, some time after, gave them each the title of Augustus. On the news of the death of Probus, the barbarians put themselves in motion, and Carus, sending his son Carinus into Gaul, departed with Numerianus for Illyricum, in order to oppose the Sarmatæ, who threatened Thrace and Italy. He slew 16,000, and made 20,000 prisoners. Proceeding after this against the Persians, he made himself master of Mesopotamia, and of the cities of Seleucia and Ctesiphon, and took in consequence the surnames of Persicus and Parthicus. He died, however, in the midst of his successes, A.D. 283. (Vid. Aper.) His whole reign was one of not more than sixteen or seventeen months. Carus was deified after his death. According to Vopiscus, he held a middle rank between good and bad princes. (Vopisc., Car.—Id., Prob., c. 24.—Id., Carin., c. 16, seq.—Bastie, Mem. de l'Acad. des Inscriptions, &c., vol. 13, p. 437, seqq.)

CARYÆ, I. a village of Arcadia, near the sources of the Aroanius. (Pausan., 8, 14.)—II. A small town of Laconia, to the north of Sellasia. (Pausan., 3, 10.) It appears from Pausanias (8, 45), that the Caryatæ were formerly attached to the territory of Tegæa; and it is clear from Xenophon (Hist. Gr., 6, 5, 25), that it was a border-town. At the latter of these two places a festival was observed in honour of Diana Caryâtis. (Vid. Caryatæ.)

CARYATÆ, the inhabitants of Caryæ (II.). It is said, that they joined the Persians upon their invading Greece, and that, after the expulsion of the invaders, the Greeks made war upon the Caryatæ, took their city, slew all the males, carried the women into slavery, and decreed, by way of ignominy, that their images should be used as supporters for public edifices. Hence the Caryatides of ancient architecture. No trace of this story, however, is to be found in any Greek historian, and no small argument against its credibility may be deduced from the situation of the Caryatæ, within the Peloponnesus. A writer in the Museum Criticum (vol. 2, p. 402) suggests, that these figures were so called from their resembling the statue of Ἀρτεμις Καρυάτις, or else the Laconian virgins, who celebrated their annual dance in her temple; and he refers to Pausan., 3, 10.—Lucian, Salt., 10.—Plut., Vit. Artax. (Compare Winckelmann, Gesch. der Kunst des Alterthums, vol. 4, pt. 1, p. 225.—Visconti, Mus. Pio-Clement., vol. 2, p. 42.—Bähr, ad Ctes., p. 239.)

CARYSTUS, I. a city of Eubœa, on the seacoast, at the foot of Mount Oche. It is now known by the name of Castel-Rosso, and was founded, as we are told, by some of the Dryopes, who had been driven from their country by Hercules. (Thucyd., 7, 57.) This place was principally celebrated for its marble, which was highly esteemed, and much used by the Romans in the embellishment of both public and private edifices. (Tibull., 3, 13.—Compare Plin., 4, 12.—Id., 36, 7.) We learn from Strabo (446), that the spot which furnished this valuable material was named Marmarium, and that a temple had been erected there to Apollo Marmarius.—II. A town of Laconia, belonging to the territory of Ægys. Its wine was celebrated by the poet Aleman, as we are informed by Strabo (446.—Cramer's Anc. Greece, vol. 3, p. 224.)

CASCA, P. Servilius, one of the conspirators against Cæsar, and the individual who inflicted the first blow. He had been attached to the party of Pompey, but had submitted, and received a pardon from Cæsar. Plutarch states, that Casca gave Cæsar a stroke upon the neck, but that the wound was not dangerous, as he was probably in some trepidation at the time. Cæsar, turning around, caught hold of his dagger, crying out at the same time, "Villain! Casca! what art thou doing!" (Plut., Vit. Cæs., c. 66.)

CASCELLIUS AULUS, a lawyer of great erudition and talent in the time of Augustus. (Horat., Ep. ad Pis., 371.—Val. Max., 8, 12, 1.)

CASILINUM, a city of Campania, on the river Volturnus and the Appian Way. It is celebrated in history for the obstinate defence which it made against Hannibal after the battle of Cannæ. It appears from Livy, that the river Volturnus divided the town into two parts, and that the one on the right bank was occupied by the Roman garrison, while the other was in possession of the Carthaginian army, which was thus enabled to cut off all supplies, except such as might be conveyed down the stream; by this means the brave handful of soldiers who defended the town were at last forced to surrender. (Liv., 23, 17, seqq.—Val. Max., 7, 6.) This town appears to have been still in existence in the time of Strabo (249); but Pliny, who wrote some time after, speaks of it as being reduced to the lowest state of insignificance. (Plin., 3, 5.) It is, however, mentioned by Ptolemy (p. 66). The modern Capua is generally supposed to occupy the site of Casilinum. (Pratilli, Via Appia, 2, 12, p. 257.—Cramer's Anc. Italy, vol. 2, p. 199.)

CASINUM, the last town of Latium on the Latin Way, according to Strabo (238). It was a large and populous place, and its site is now partly occupied by the modern town of San Germano. According to Varro, its name was derived from Casum, an Oscan word, answering to the Latin Vetus. The same writer informs us, that Casinum originally belonged to the Samnites, from whom it was conquered by the Romans. (Varr., L. L., 6.)

CASIUS, I. a mountain on the coast of Africa, near the Palus Scrbonis (Herodot., 2, 6), and, according to Strabo (758), three hundred stadia from Pelusium. The Itin. Antonin., however, makes the distance between it and the latter place 320 stadia. (Compare Larcher, Hist. d'Herodote, Table Géographique, vol. 8 p. 101.) On this mountain reposed the remains of Pompey, and here also Jupiter, surnamed Casius, had a temple. (Compare remarks under the article Asi.) Mount Casius forms a promontory called at the present day Cape El-Cas.—II. Another in Syria, below Antiochia. It is a very lofty mountain. Pliny, in a style of exaggeration, asserts, that at the fourth watch (three o'clock A.M.), the rising sun could be seen from its top, while the base was enveloped in darkness. (Plin., 5, 22.) The African appears to have been named after the Syrian mountain. (Mannert, Geogr., vol. 10, p. 493.) As regards the etymology of the name Casius, consult Ritter, Vorhalle, p. 465, and compare remarks under the article Asi.

CASPIÆ PORTÆ or PYLÆ, the Caspian gates or pass, a name belonging properly to a defile near Teheran, in ancient Media. Morier (Second Journey through Persia, &c., chap. 23) names it the pass of Charvur. (Compare Sainte-Croix, Examen des Hist. d'Alex., p. 688, seqq., and 862, ed. 2d.) It is vaguely applied by Tacitus and some other ancient writers to different passes of Mount Caucasus. (Malte-Brun, Geogr., vol. 2, p. 13, Brussels ed.) For the Caucasian and Albanian gates, vid. Caucasus.

CASPII, a nation dwelling along the southern borders of the Caspian Sea, and giving name to it, according to Ritter. (Erdkunde, vol. 2, p. 899, seqq.) They appear to have been at one time a powerful commercial people, and to have occupied, in the time of the Persian dominion, the country answering to Ghilan and Derbend. Their name is supposed to have been derived from the term Casp, signifying "a mountain." (Ritter, l. c.) Gatterer is wrong in placing them between the Sea of Aral and the northeastern shore of the Caspian, from which quarter, according to him, they advanced into the country of the Sarmatæ, and afterward, in the first century of our era, emigrated into Europe. (Consult Bähr, ad Herod., 3, 95, and compare Ptol., 7, 1.—Mela, 3, 5.)

CASPIUM MARE, a celebrated inland sea of Upper Asia, deriving its name either from the Caspiæ along its southern shores (vid. Caspi), or from Casp, "a mountain," in allusion to its vicinity to Caucasus. According to the latest astronomical observations and local measurements, it extends from north to south, in a longitudinal direction, nearly all of equal width, excepting a contraction which occurs at the encroachment made by the peninsula of Apsheron. The northern end forms a large bay, turning round from the north to the northeast, and approaching to the basin of the Sea of Aral. The length of the Caspian may be estimated at 760 miles, in a line drawn from north to south, that is, from the bay of Kolpinskiom, on the west of the river Ural, to Balfoosh. This line, however, crosses the peninsula of Karagan. Its smallest width is 113, and its greatest width 275 miles. The situation of this sea, though now well known, was not ascertained a hundred years ago. The ancients laboured under a general mistake of its being a gulf of the Northern Ocean, and this was not corrected till the second century of our era. Ptolemy re-established the fact, which had been known to Herodotus, and perhaps to Aristotle. The Caspian Sea was then restored in the maps to the form of a lake or inland sea, separate on all sides from the northern and every other ocean. But, instead of having its longest diameter in a direction from north to south, it was described as longest from east to west. One reason for this view of it was, that the Northern Ocean was still thought to come much nearer to it than it did, and not to leave room in a northerly direction for the dimensions of this sea, the total extent of which was pretty well known. Besides this, the Sea of Aral, being imperfectly known, was considered as a part of the Caspian Sea. This notion is shown to have been entertained by the opinion which the ancients had of the mouth of the river Oxus. (Vid. Oxus.)—The level of the Caspian Sea is much lower than that of the ocean or the Black Sea. Olivier makes a difference of 64 feet. Lowitz, whose researches seem to have been unknown to that learned traveller, makes it only 53. The north and south winds, acquiring strength from the elevation of the shore, added to the facility of their motion along the surface of the water, exercise a powerful influence in varying the level of the water at the opposite extremities. Hence its variations have a range of from four to eight feet, and powerful currents are generated both with the rising and subsiding of the winds. It has also been said to be subject to another variation, which observes very distant periods. We are told, that since 1556, the waters of the sea have encroached on the Russian territory to the north. This is a fact which might deserve to be better ascertained. The depth of this sea is inconsiderable, except at the southern extremity, where bottom has not been found at a depth of 2100 feet. (Sainte-Croix, Examen des historiens d'Alexandre, p. 701.) Pallas and others have indulged in the geological speculation first advanced by Varenius, of the former existence of a much greater extension of this sea to the northwest, and a union of it with the Palus Mæotis, or Sea of Azof, along the low grounds, abounding in shells and saline plants. But of such an extension not the slightest historical trace is to be found in any creditable author. The ideas of the ancient geographers respecting a great extension of this sea to the east have no relation to this supposed strait. The voyage of the Argonauts would not be at all explained by such a strait, and requires no such explanation.—But what becomes, it may be asked, of all the water which so many rivers pour into the Caspian Sea? Do they flow into two subterranean communications, which connect this sea with the Persian Gulf, and which some travellers pretend to have seen? (Strug's Travels, p. 126—Arel, Voyages, &c., p. 73.) Tunnels of this kind have at all times been considered by the judicious as purely imaginary.—(Kœmpfer, Amoen. Exot., p. 254.) The willow-leaves found in the Persian Gulf do not require to come from Ghilan, or any other part of the Caspian shore, the banks of the Euphrates being sufficient to furnish them. The waters of the Caspian Sea, like those of the ocean, give off their superfluity by evaporation. This evaporation has been considered as established by the extreme humidity of the air in Daghistan, Shirvan, Ghilan, and Mazanderan; but no such phenomena as these are required for the demonstration.—Round the mouths of the rivers the water is fresh, but becomes moderately salt towards the middle of the sea, though less so than that of the ocean. In addition to the usual ingredients of seawater, it contains a considerable quantity of sulphuric acid, which is obtained from it in union with soda, that is, in the state of Glauber's salt. (Gmelin, Voyage, vol. 3, p. 267.) The northwest winds are said to diminish the saltiness, and to increase the bitterness of the water. The powerful phosphorescence of the thick, muddy waters of the Caspian Sea is remarked by Pallas. The black colour which they assume at a great distance from the shore is nothing more than the effect of the depth, and owing to the same optical cause which makes the ocean appear comparatively dark and blue instead of light green, in deep places where the colour of the bottom does not intermix itself with the natural colour of the water.—It would serve little purpose to enumerate all the names which have been given to this sea. The "Caspian" is one of the most ancient. This name is not only common to the Greek and Latin languages, but enters into the Georgian, the Armenian, and the Syriac. (Wahl, Asien, vol. 1, p. 679, seqq.) The Jewish Rabbis and Peritsol call it the Dead Sea. The Turkish denomination for it, Khoosghoon Daghizi, is variously translated, but no probable etymology is assigned. The Byzantine and Arabian writers call it the Sea of Khazars, after a powerful nation; and the Russian annalists knew it in the tenth century under the name of Guelenskoi or Shualenskoi-More, after the Shawlis a Slavonian people, not much known, that lived on the Wolga. The name given to this sea in the Zendavesta is, however, worthy of remark. That apocryphal work, which is full of old traditions, calls this sea Tchekaët Daëti, or "the great water of the judgment." Perhaps Noah's flood, as described in some of the Eastern traditions, might have a connexion with a sinking of the earth, which had destroyed the inhabitants of an extensive country, and converted it into this remarkable sea. (Malte-Brun, Geogr., vol. 2, p. 130, Brussels ed.)

CASSANDER, son of Antipater. A short time before the death of Alexander, he crossed over into Asia for the purpose of defending his father against the accusations of Olympias; and when, after the decease of the Macedonian monarch, Antipater was appointed regent, his son received from him the command of the Asiatic horse. The ambitious views, however, of the young Cassander, induced his parent to bequeath to him no share in the government, and Cassander, therefore, wishing to annul the arrangements which his father had made at his death, gave Nicanor the command of the garrison in the Munychia at Athens, by means of secret orders, before the news of his father's death could reach that city, and thus secured for himself an important stronghold. He then crossed over into Asia, in order to secure the co-operation of Ptolemy and Antigonus. During his absence, Polysperchon sent an army into Attica, and issued a decree for the re-establishment of democracy in all the Grecian cities, in place of the aristocratic forms of government which had been brought in by Alexander. This edict had all the effect which Polysperchon intended, and the cities of Greece drove out, for the most part, those individuals who were at the head of their affairs. The Athenians, likewise, put many persons to death, in the number of whom was the celebrated Phocion, but could not dislodge the garrison from the Munychia. Cassander, having returned with troops and vessels, which he had obtained from Antigonus, seized upon the Piræus, and compelled the Athenians to submit once more to an aristocratic rule, at the head of which he placed Demetrius the Phalerean. He then went into Macedonia, where he had many partisans, and conferred the reins of government on Eurydice and her husband; and, after this, returning to the Peloponnese, he drew many of the Grecian cities over to his side. While he was occupied with the siege of Tegea in Arcadia, Polysperchon, in order to check the influence of Eurydice, advised the recall of Olympias, the mother of Alexander, into Macedon, where it was intended that she should once more enjoy a share of that authority in the government, of which, during the regency of Antipater, it had been necessary to deprive her. Polysperchon had soon reason, however, to repent of this resolution; for Olympias, still untaught by events, and thirsting for revenge, returned to the Macedonian capital only to gratify her worst feelings and disturb the tranquillity of the state. A powerful rivalry soon arose between the two queens, Olympias and Eurydice; and the former, having acquired a momentary ascendancy over the affections of the Macedonian soldiers, drove out Eurydice and Aridaeus, and afterward, on getting possession of their persons, caused them both to be despatched by assassins. But the rage of the inexorable Olympias was not supported by an adequate force. The presence of Cassander in Macedonia, who flew thither to avenge the death of Eurydice, struck terror into the aged queen, and she shut herself up in the city of Pydna. After a long resistance, this strongly-fortified place fell before the arms of Cassander; Olympias was put to death, and the victor married Thessalonica, half-sister of the conqueror of Asia, who, with other members of the royal family, had, by the capture of the place, fallen into his hands. The nuptials were celebrated in a style of the greatest magnificence, and the active governor chose to mark his accession to power by building Cassandria on the Isthmus of Pallene, and by restoring to its ancient splendour the city of Thebes. Aspiring now to the throne, he found powerful opponents in Antigonus and Ptolemy, who, in order to strengthen their side, proclaimed liberty for the whole of Greece, and this country became, in consequence, the theatre of war, which was terminated at last by a treaty, B.C. 311. The conditions of this treaty were, that, until Alexander, son of Roxana, should be of age, Cassander was to hold the government of Macedon and Greece, Lysimachus that of Thrace, Ptolemy that of Egypt, and Antigonus that of Asia. The death of the young Alexander was, without doubt, one of the secret conditions of this league, for Cassander caused him to be put to death not long after, together with his mother Roxana, and no attempt was made by the other contracting parties to punish him for the deed. Polysperchon, moreover, influenced by Cassander, put to death Hercules, son of Alexander and Barsine. The race of Alexander being thus extinct, Antigonus assumed the title of king, in which he was imitated by Ptolemy, Lysimachus, and Cassander, and these three soon found themselves obliged to unite their forces against Antigonus and his son Demetrius, who aimed at nothing less than reuniting under their sway all the countries once ruled over by Alexander. Antigonus having lost the battle of Ipsus, B.C. 301, and Demetrius being too feeble in point of resources to make any effectual opposition, Cassander found himself the tranquil possessor of Macedonia. He did not, however, long enjoy the fruits of his labours, but died, B.C. 298, of a dropsy which ended in the morbus pedicularis. He had by Thessalonica three sons, Philip, Antipater, and Alexander. It is difficult to form a true opinion of the character of this prince. The Greek writers have not done justice to him, since they regarded both him and his father Antipater as foes to popular freedom. We cannot refuse him, however, the praise of valour and of considerable talents for government. He loved letters, had copied Homer with his own hand, and could repeat from memory a large number of his verses. Still, however, no excuse can be found for his conduct towards the mother and the children of Alexander. A grasping ambition alone was the inciting cause to these acts of bloodshed—His son Philip succeeded him, but died the same year with his father. Antipater, his second son, put to death his own mother, for having, after the decease of Cassander, favoured, as he thought, the interests of his brother Alexander. The latter, with the aid of Demetrius, son of Antigonus, made war upon him for this; but, when about to become reconciled to him, was treacherously slain by Demetrius, his own ally; and Antipater was afterward put to death by his own father-in-law Lysimachus. (Justin, 13, 4, 18.—Id., 14, 6, 12.—Id., 15, 2, 3.—Id., 16, 2, 1, &c.—Diod. Sic., 18, 3, seqq.—Id., 18, 54, &c.)

CASSANDRA, daughter of Priam and Hecuba. She was beloved by Apollo, and promised to listen to his addresses, provided he would grant her the knowledge of futurity. This knowledge she obtained; but she was regardless of her promise; and Apollo, in revenge, determined that no credit should ever be attached to her predictions. Hence her warnings respecting the downfall of Troy, and the subsequent misfortunes of the race, were disregarded by her countrymen. When Troy was taken, she fled for shelter to the temple of Minerva, but was exposed there to the brutality of Ajax, the son of Oileus. In the division of the spoils she fell to the share of Agamemnon, and was assassinated with him on his return to Mycenæ. (Vid. Agamemnon.) Cassandra was called Priameïs from her father; and Alexandra, as the sister of Alexander or Paris.—Lord Bacon considers this fable to have been invented to express the inefficacy of unseasonable advice: "For they," affirms the great philosopher, "who are conceited, stubborn, or untractable, and listen not to the instructions of Apollo, the god of harmony, so as to learn and observe the modulations and measures of affairs, the sharps and flats of discourse, the difference between judicious and vulgar ears, and the proper times of speech and silence, let them be ever so intelligent, and ever so frank of their advice, or their counsels ever so good and just, yet all their endeavours, either of persuasion or force, are of little significance, and rather hasten the ruin of those whom they advise. But at last, when the calamitous event has made the sufferers feel the effects of their neglect, they too late reverence their advisers as deep, foreseeing, and faithful prophets." (Apollod., 3, 12, 5—Virg., Æn., 2, 324.—Bacon, De Sap. Vet. 1.)

CASSANDRÆA, a city of Macedonia, on the neck of the peninsula of Pallene. It was founded by Cassander, and he transferred to it the inhabitants of several neighbouring towns, and, among others, those of Potidea, and the remnant of the population of Olynthus. Cassandrea is said to have surpassed all the Macedonian cities in opulence and splendour. (Diod. Sic., 19, 52.) Philip, the son of Demetrius, made use of the place as his principal naval arsenal, and at one time caused a hundred galleys to be constructed in the docks of that port. (Liv., 28, 8.) Pliny speaks of Cassandrea as a Roman colony (4, 10). From Procopius we learn that this city at length fell a prey to the Huns, who left scarcely a vestige of it remaining. (Bell. Pers., 2, 4.—Id., de Edif., 4, 3.—Nicéph. Greg., vol. 1, p. 150.—Cramer's Anc. Greece, vol. 1, p. 246.)

CASSIA LEX was enacted by Cassius Longinus, A.U.C. 649. By it no man condemned by the people or deprived of military power was permitted to enter the senate-house.—II. Another, that the people should vote by ballot.—III. Another, called frumentaria, proposed by the consuls C. Cassius and M. Terentius, and hence sometimes termed Lex Cassia Terentia. It ordained, as is thought, that five modii of grain should be given monthly to each of the poorer citizens, &c. It was passed A.U.C. 680. (Sall., Hist. frag., p. 974, ed. Cort.)

CASSIODORUS, Magnus Aurelius, an eminent statesman, orator, historian, and divine, who flourished during the greater part of the sixth century, under Theodoric, Anaslasontha and her sons Athalaric, Theodorus and Vitiges, by all of whom he was honourably employed, and held in high estimation. He was a native of Scyllacium in Magna Græcia, and descended of a noble family, his father having held a considerable office under Odoacer. In 514 he was sole consul, and afterward commander of the prætorian guard and secretary of state. It is in this latter capacity that he composed his twelve books of public epistles, or Variarum (Epistolarum), libri xii., consisting of various writings and ordinances prepared by him from time to time for the Ostrogothic kings. They are the most valuable of his works now extant, and give a considerable and curious insight into the history and manners of the age in which he lived. The style is considered by Gibbon to be quaint and declamatory, while Tiraboschi characterizes it as possessing a barbarous elegance. During the whole of his continuance in office, he was the patron of learning and of learned men, till the impending dissolution of the Gothic kingdom in Italy induced him to retire from public life to the enjoyment of a learned leisure in a monastery of his own founding near his native place. Here he divided his time between the study of the Scriptures and other religious writings, and the construction of various mechanical contrivances, such as water-clocks, sundials, curious lamps, &c., and is said to have lived in his retirement till 575, when his decease took place in his ninety-sixth year. His writings were of various descriptions; all his orations, highly celebrated in their day, are lost; as also is his history of the Goths, comprised in twelve books, an abridgment of which by Jornandes is, however, still extant. His devotional tracts, consisting of a "Commentary on the Psalms," "Institutions of Divine and Human Letters," "Commentaries on the Epistles of St. Paul," "On the Acts and Apostolical Epistles, and the Apocalypse," &c., were composed by him in his seclusion. The editions of his works that we possess are that of Grævius, Colo., 1650, 8vo; that of Garet, Rotom., 1679, 8vo; that of Lebrun des Marettes, Paris, 1685, 2 vols. 4to; and that of L. A. Muratori, Veron., 1736, fol. The last is the best. (Schöll, Hist. Rom. Lit., vol. 3, p. 174 and 328.—Id., vol. 4, p. 114.—Bähr, Gesch. Rom. Lit., vol. 1, p. 602.)

CASSIOPE and CASSIOPÆA, I. wife of Cepheus, king of Æthiopia, and mother of Andromeda. Having offended the Nereïds by her presumption in setting herself before them as regarded beauty, Neptune, sympathizing with the anger of the sea-maidens, laid waste the realms of Cepheus by an inundation and a sea-monster. (Vid. Andromeda.)—Cassiope was made a constellation after death in the southern hemisphere. It consists of thirteen stars, and is placed over the head of Cepheus. The Arabians compare the stars of this constellation to an open hand. (Ideler, Sternnamen, p. 81.)—The form Cassiopea, which is sometimes given to the Latin name, is incorrect. It ought to be Cassiopea, from the Greek Κασσιόπεια. (Scaliger, ad Manil., p. 459.—Buttmann in Ideler's Sternnamen, p. 308.)—II. A harbour of Epîros, to the south of Onchesimus, and probably so called from its vicinity to a port and town of the same name in the island of Coreya.—III. A town and harbour of Coreya, to the north of the city of Coreya, at the distance of about 120 stadia. (Cic., Ep. ad Fam., 16, 9.) It probably derived its name from a temple sacred to Jupiter Cassius or Cassius. (Plin., 4, 12.—Procop. Goth., 4, 22.) Suetonius relates (Vit. Ner., 22), that Nero, in a voyage made to this island, sang in public at the altar of this god. Ptolemy also notices Cassiope (p. 85), and near it a cape of the same name. Its vestiges remain on the spot which is still called Santa Maria di Cassopo. The promontory is the Cape di Santa Caterina. (Cramer's Ancient Greece, vol. 1, p. 162.)

CASSITERIDES, islands in the Western Ocean, where tin was found, supposed to be the Scilly Islands of the modems, together with a part of Cornwall. The term Cassiterides is derived from the Greek Κασσίτερος, tin. The tin was obtained by the islanders from the main land, and afterward sold to strangers. Solinus (c. 22) mentions these islands under the name of Silurum Insula, and Sulpitius Severus (2, c. 51) under that of Sylina Insula. (Mannert, Geogr., vol. 2, p. 238.)

CASSIVELLAUNUS, a monarch over part of Britain at the time of Cæsar's invasion. His territories were separated from the maritime states by the river Tamesis or Thames. He commanded the confederate forces against Cæsar. In Dio Cassius the name is incorrectly written Σουέλλαν, which Reimar changes in the text to Κασογγλανόν, but, in a note, thinks that the true form is Κασογγλαν. (Reim. ad Dion. Cass., 40, 2.) Polyænus has Κασόγλανθος (8, 23, 5). Bede gives Cassabellannus. Julius Celsus (p. 60) has Casmellannus, and in another place (p. 61) Casmellannus. Camden makes Cassivellaunus equivalent to Cassiorum princeps. Cæsar makes mention of the Cassi (whom Camden calls Cassii) in a part of his Commentaries. (Cæs., B. G., 5, 11.—Id. ib., c. 21.—Reimar, l. c.)

CASSIUS, I., C. or C. Cassius Longinus, one of the conspirators against Julius Cæsar. Even when a boy he is said to have been remarkable for the pride and violence of his temper, if we may believe the anecdotes recorded of him by Plutarch (Vit. Brut., c. 9) and Valerius Maximus (3, 1). He accompanied Crassus into Parthia as his quæstor, and distinguished himself, after the death of his general, by conducting the wreck of the Roman army back to Syria in safety. At the beginning of the civil war he was one of the tribunes of the people. We find him after this commanding the Syrian squadron in Pompey's fleet, and infesting the coasts of Sicily. A short time before the battle of Pharsalia he had burned the entire fleet of the enemy, amounting to thirty-five ships, in the harbour of Messana. The news of Pompey's defeat, however, deterred him from pursuing his advantages, and, resigning the contest, he submitted to Cæsar in Asia Minor, when the latter was returning from Egypt into Italy. Cicero, however, asserts, that at this very time Cassius had intended to assassinate the man whose clemency he was consenting to solicit, had not an accident prevented the accomplishment of his purpose. (Philipp., 2, 11.) He was not only spared by Cæsar, but was appointed by him one of his lieutenants, a favour bestowed by magistrates upon their friends, in order to invest them with a public character, and thus enable them to reside or to travel in the provinces with greater comfort and dignity. Even during the last campaign of Cæsar in Spain, Cassius wrote to Cicero, saying that he was anxious that Cæsar should be victorious, for that he preferred an old and merciful master to a new and cruel one. (Cic., Ep. ad Fam., 15, 19.) He also, together with Brutus, was appointed one of the prætors for the year 709 (Plut., Vit. Brut., c. 7.—Cic., Ep. ad Fam., 11, 2, et 3), at a moment in which he was entirely discontented with Cæsar's government; and he is said to have been the person by whose intrigues the first elements of the conspiracy were formed. Cassius had married Junia, the sister of Brutus, and it was partly through her means that he made his approaches, when seeking to gain over her brother and induce him to join in the plot. After the assassination of Cæsar, Cassius, together with Brutus, raised an army to maintain his country's freedom. They were met by Octavius and Antony at Philippi. The wing which Cassius commanded being defeated, he imagined that all was lost, and killed himself, B.C. 42. Brutus gave him an honourable burial, and called him, with tears, the last of the Romans. (Vit. Brutus.)—II. PARNENSIS, so called from his having been born at Parma in Italy, was a Latin poet of considerable talent. He sided with Brutus and Cassius in the civil war, and obtained the office of military tribune. After the defeat of the republican forces he retired to Athens, and was put to death by Q. Varius, who had been sent for that purpose by Octavius. (Schol. ad Horat., Ep., 1, 4, 3.) He must not be confounded with Cassius the Etrurian, who appears to have been a very rapid and poor writer. (Horat., Scrm., 1, 10, 61.—Schol., ad loc.) Ruhnken inclines to the opinion, that the person sent by Octavius, to put to death Cassius of Parma, was not Varius, but Varus, a commander of his, and the same individual to whom Virgil alludes. (Ruhnken. ad. Vell. Patere., 2, 88.)—III. Hemina, an early annalist of Rome, who flourished about A.U.C. 608. (Voss., de Hist. Lat., 1, 7.—Funck. de Adolosc., L. L., 6, 7.—Maffei, Ver. Illustr., 3, p. 35.)—IV. A Roman lawyer, remarkable for his strictness in dispensing justice. Hence severe and rigid magistrates were called from him Cassiani Judices. (Cic., pro Rose, c. 30.)—V. A Roman orator, distinguished for his eloquence, and fond, at the same time, of indulging in satirical composition. He was exiled by Augustus to the island of Seriphus, where he ended his days in wretchedness. His full name was T. Cassius Severus. (Tacit., Ann., 1, 75.—Id. ib., 4, 21.—Lips. ad Tacit., 4, 21.)

CASTABALA, a city of Cappadocia, northeast of Cybistra, and near the source of one of the branches of the Halys. Col. Leake is inclined to identify it with the modern Nigdé, but this latter place answers rather to Cadyna. Castabala was remarkable for a temple sacred to Diana Perasia. It was asserted, that the priestesses of the goddess could tread with naked feet on burning cinders without receiving any injury. The statue of Diana was also said to have been the identical one brought by Orestes from Tauris, whence the name of Perasia, "from beyond sea" (πέρα), was thought to be derived. (Strab., 538.—Steph. Byz., s. v.—Cramer's Asia Minor, vol. 2, p. 132.)

CASTALIAN FONS, or CASTALIA, I. a celebrated fountain on Mount Parnassus, sacred to the Muses. It poured down the cleft or chasm between the two summits, being fed by the perpetual snows of the mountain. "The Castalian spring," says Dodwell, "is clear, and forms an excellent beverage. The water, which oozes from the rock, was in ancient times introduced into a hollow square, where it was retained for the use of the Pythia and the oracular priests. The fountain is ornamented with pendent ivy, and overshadowed by a large fig-tree. After a quick descent to the bottom of the valley, through a narrow and rocky glen, it joins the little river Pleistis." (Travels, vol. 1, p. 172.)—II. Another in Syria, near Daphne. The waters of this fountain were believed to give a knowledge of futurity to those who drank them. The oracle at the fountain promised Hadrian the supreme power when he was yet in a private station. He had the fountain shut up with stones when he ascended the throne. (Amm. Marcell., 22, 12.—Casaub. ad Spartian., Vit. Hadr., 2.—Id. ad Capitol., Vit. Antonin., Philos., c. 8.)

CASTELLUM, a term of frequent occurrence in ancient geography, as indicating some fortified post or castle, which in later days became the site of a city. The most important of these are, I. CASTELLUM, or, as it is sometimes given, MUNIMENTUM TRAJANI, a fortified post on the Rhine, strengthened and enlarged by Trajan and Julian. It is now Castel. (Amm. Marcell., 17, int.)—II. CASTELLUM ARIANORUM, now Castel-Naudarcy in France, in the department of Aude.—III. CASTELLUM BALDUM, now Castel Baldo, on the Adige.—IV. CASTELLUM HUNNORUM, now Castellawn in Prussia, on the river Duin.—V. CASTELLUM MENAPIORUM, now Kessel, a village on the western bank of the Maas.—VI. CASTELLUM MORINORUM, now Montcassel, northeast of St. Omer in France.—VII. CASTELLUM TURENTINUM, in Picenum, now Torre Segura. (Pomp. in Cic., Epist. ad Fam., 8, 12.)

CASTIANÆA, a town of Thessaly, on the coast of Magnesia, northwest of the promontory Sepias. It is noticed by Herodotus in his account of the terrible storm experienced by the fleet of Xerxes off this coast (7, 183.—Compare Strab., 443.—Phn., 4, 9). The name is written by Steph. Byz. Καστανία (Castania), and in the Etymol. Mag. Καστρία (Castania).—Cramer's Anc. Greece, vol. 1, p. 424)

CASTOR and POLLUX (in Greek Κάστωρ and Πόλλυξ), twin brothers, the latter the son of Leda and Jupiter, the former of Leda and Tyndarus. (Vid Leda.) The earliest exploit of these twin heroes, who were born at Amyclæ in Laconia, was the recovery of their sister Helen from the hands of Theseus, whose mother Æthra they dragged into captivity. They took part in all the great undertakings of their time, were at the Calydonian hunt, accompanied Hercules against the Amazons, sailed in the Argo, and aided Peleus to storm Iolcos. Pollux was the most distinguished pugilist, Castor the most experienced charioteer of his day. Mercury bestowed on them the fleet steeds Phlogius and Harpagus, the offspring of the harpy Podarge: Juno gave them the swift Xanthus and Cyllarus. The brothers fell into the very same offence which they had punished in Theseus. Being invited to the wedding-feast by their cousins Idas and Lynceus, the sons of Aphareus, who had married their cousins Phoebe and Hilara, the daughters of Leucippus, they became enamoured of the brides, and carried them off. Idas and his brother pursued them. In the conflict Castor fell by the spear of Idas; and Pollux, aided by the thunder of Jove, slew the two sons of Aphareus. (Schol. ad Il., 3, 243.—Schol. ad Pind., Nem., 10, 112.—Hygin., fab., 80.) Another account says, that the two heroes joined to drive off the herds of the Arcadians. Idas was appointed to divide the booty. He killed one of the prey; and, dividing it into four parts, said that one half of the prey should fall to him who had first eaten his share, and the remainder to him who next finished. He then quickly devoured his own and his brother's part, and drove the whole herd to Messene. The Dioscuri (Διόσκουροι, Jove's sons), as Castor and his brother were called, made war on Messene. Driving off all the cattle which they met, they laid themselves in ambush in a hollow tree. But Lynceus, whose vision could penetrate the trees and the rocks, ascended the top of Taygetus, and, looking over on the Peloponnesus, saw them there; whereupon he and his brother hastened to attack them. Castor fell by the spear of Idas; Pollux pursued the slayers, and, coming up with them at the tomb of their father Aphareus, was struck by them in the breast with the pillar belonging to it. Unretarded by the blow, he rushed on, and killed Lynceus with his spear; and Jupiter, at the same moment, struck Idas with a thunderbolt. (Schol. ad Pind., Nem., 10, 114.—Tzet., ad Lycophr., 511.) Pollux was inconsolable for the loss of his brother; and Jupiter, on his prayer, gave him his choice of being taken up himself to Olympus, and sharing the honours of Mars and Minerva, or of dividing them with his brother, and for them to live day and day alternately in heaven and under the earth. Pollux chose the latter, and divided his immortality with Castor. (Pind., Nem., 10, 103, seqq.—Schol. ad Theocrit., 22, 137, seqq.—Apollod., 3, 11, 2.—Tzet., ad Lycophr., 5, 11.—Ovid., Fasti, 5, 699, seqq.)—The remarkable circumstance of the two brothers living and dying alternately, leads at once to a suspicion of their being personifications of natural powers and objects. This is confirmed by the names in the myth, all of which seem to refer to light or its opposite. Thus,

Leda differs little from Leto, and may therefore be regarded as darkness: she is married to Tyndarus, a name which seems to be of a family of words relating to light, flame, or heat. (Possibly there may have been a Pelasgic word akin to the German zünden, and the Anglo-Saxon tendan, whence the English tinder. The children of Leda by Tyndarus or Jupiter, that is by Jupiter-Tyndarus, "the bright god," are Helena, "brightness" (Ἥλα, light), Castor, "adornor" (κάστω, "to adorn" or "regulate"), and Polydeukes, "deuful" (δευόω, deukhō). In Helena, therefore, we have only another name for Selene, or the moon; the Adornor is a very appropriate name for the day, whose light adorns all nature; and nothing can be more apparent than the suitability of Deuful to the night. It is rather curious, that, in the legend, Helena is connected by birth with Polydeukes rather than with Castor.—Another explanation of this myth views the brothers as sun and moon, to which their names and the form of the legend are equally well adapted. Welcker, who adopts this latter opinion, makes Castor the same as Astor (Starry), and Polydeukes the same as Poly-leukes (Lightful). This latter etymology will remind us at once of the Latin form of the name Pol-lux, and is much better, as far as we can hazard an opinion, than the other derivation for the name Polydeukes given above. (Welcker, Tril., p. 120, 220, 271.) To proceed to the other names of the legend, Idas and Lynceus, that is, Sight and Light, are the children of Aphareus or Phareus, that is, the Shiner (φάω); and the two daughters of Leucippus or White-horsed (an epithet of the Dioscuri, Eurip., Hel., 639), are Phoebe, Brightness, and Hilara, Joyful (ἡλαρός), which last is an epithet given to the moon by Empedocles. (Plut., de Fac. in Orb. Luna, 2.) In the Cyria they were called the daughters of Apollo. (Pausan., 3, 16, 1.)—That these were original divinities is demonstrated by their being objects of worship. The Dioscuri were also called Anaces (Ἀνακας) or Kings, and had their temples and statues. They were represented generally as two youths on horseback, each holding a spear in his hand, and their heads surmounted by a circular cap, fabled by the poets to be a half egg, in allusion to the circumstances of their birth, but referring evidently to the cosmogonical egg, and forming an additional proof, if one were needed, of the truth of our explanation of the legend. The Dioscuri were also identified with the Cabiri, and were regarded as the protectors of ships in tempests (Eurip., Orest., 1653.—Id., Hel., 1663); and the St. Elmo's fire, as it is now termed, was ascribed to them. They were also said to be the constellation of the twins. (Keightley's Mythology, p. 430, seqq.)

CASTRA, a term of frequent occurrence in ancient geography, and generally indicating the site of some Roman or other encampment. From the winter quarters of the Romans, strongly fortified according to established custom, and presenting the appearance of cities in miniature, many towns in Europe are supposed to have had their origin: in England particularly those, the names of which end in cester or chester.—The principal places indicated by the term castra are as follows: I. CASTRA AD GARUMNAN, now Castres, on the Garonne in France.—II. CASTRA CONSTANTINA, now Contances, on the river Saône in Normandy.—III. CASTRA CORNELIA, a city of Africa, in the neighbourhood of Utica, where Scipio pitched his first camp in the second Punic war. It is now Gellah. (Plin., 5, 4.—Mela, 1, 7).—IV. CASTRA EXPLORATORUM, now Netherby, on the borders of Scotland.—V. CASTRA HANNIBALIS, now Castelletto in Calabria.—VI. CASTRA INDEORUM, a place in Lower Egypt, now Schudich.—VII. CASTRA TRAJANA, a place in Dacia, now Ribnik in Wallachia.

CASTRUM, a term of frequent occurrence in ancient geography. The principal places thus designated are as follows: I. CASTRUM NOVUM, a town of Etruria, south of Centum Cellæ, and situate on the coast. It is now Santa Marinella. D'Anville, however, makes it correspond to the modern Torre Chiarruccia.—II. CASTRUM INUI, a place on the coast of Latium, between Antium and Ardea. (Virg., Æn., 6, 775.) According to Livy (1, 5), Inuus was the same with Pan.—III. CASTRUM LUCHI, now Chalus in France, in the department of Upper Vienné. Here Richard I. of England died.—IV. CASTRUM SEDUNUM, now Sion in Switzerland. It was also called Civitas Sedunorum. (Casaub. ad Suet., Vit. Aug., c. 58.)

CASTULO, a town of Hispania Bætica, on the Bætis, west of Corduba. Now Cazlona. (Plut., Vit. Sert.—Liv., 24, 41.)

CATABATHMUS, a great declivity, whence its name, Katabathmós, separating Cyrenaica from Egypt. It is now called by the Arabs Akabet-assolom. Some ancient writers, and in particular Sallust, make this the point of separation between Asia and Africa. There was another Catabathmus in the Libyan nome, called parvus, as this was styled magnus. It lay southeast of Parætonium. (Sallust, Jug., 17 et 19.—Plin., 5, 5.)

CATADŪPA, a name given by the Greek geographers to the smaller cataract of the Nile (Cataractes Minor), and intended to indicate the loud noise occasioned by the fall of the waters (κατά and δούρος, a heavy, crushing sound). It was situate in the Thebais, at Dodecaschœnus, to the south of Elephantina, and near Philæ. (Cic., Som. Scip., c. 5.—Plin., 5, 9.—Senec., Quæst. Nat., 4, 2.) The ancients believed that the neighbouring inhabitants were deprived of hearing by the constant roar of the waters! (Cic., l. c.)

CATANA, a city of Sicily, on the eastern coast, at the base of Ætna, and a short distance below the river Acis and the Cyclopus Scopuli. It was founded by a colony from Chalcis in Eubœa, five years after the settlement of Syracuse. Catana, like all the other colonies of Grecian origin, soon became independent of any foreign control, and, in consequence of the fertility of the surrounding country, attained to a considerable degree of prosperity. It does not appear, however, to have been at any time a populous city; and hence Hiero of Syracuse was enabled without difficulty to transfer the inhabitants to Leontini. A new colony of Peloponnesians and Syracusans was established here by him, and the place called Ætna, from its proximity to the mountain. (Diocl. Sic., 11, 49.—Psud., Pyth., 1.)—After the death of Hiero, the new colonists were driven out by the Siculi, and the old inhabitants from Leontini then came, and, recovering possession of the place, changed its name again to Catana. We find Catana after this possessed for a short time by the Athenians, and subsequently falling into the hands of Dionysius of Syracuse. This tyrant, according to Diodorus Siculus (14, 15), sold the inhabitants as slaves, and gave the city to his mercenary troops, the Campani, to dwell in. It is probable, however, that he only sold those who were taken with arms in their hands, and that many of the old population remained, since Dionysius afterward persuaded these same Campani to migrate to the city of Ætna. (Diocl. Sic., 14, 58.) Catana fell into the power of the Romans during the first Punic war. (Plin., 7, 60.) The modern name is Catania, and the distance from it to the summit of Ætna is reckoned thirty miles. (Mannert, Geogr., vol. 9, pt. 2, p. 287.)

CATAONIA, a tract of country in the southern part of Cappadocia. The inhabitants were of Cilician origin. It answers now to the canton of Aladeuli, in the pælatie of Adana. (Compare Mannert, Geogr., vol. 6, pt. 2, p. 222, seqq.)

CATARACTES, I. a river of Pamphylia, falling into the sea near Attalia. It derived its ancient name from its impetuosity. Now Dodensouï.—II. A river of Asia Minor, the same with the Marsyas. (Compare Larcher, Hist. d'Hérodote, vol. 8, p. 104.—Table Géographique, and the authorities there cited.)

CATHÆA, a country of Asia, the precise situation of which is doubtful. Mannert places it northeast of the Malli, in the vicinity of the Hydræotes. The chief town was Sangala. Diodorus Siculus calls the people Catheri. Thevenot is supposed to allude to their descendants under the name of Catry, that is, the Kuttry tribe or Rajpoots. (Mannert, Geogr., vol. 5, p. 56.)

CATILINA, L. SERGIUS a Roman of patrician rank, and the last of the gens Sergia. Of his father and grandfather little is known: the former would seem to have been in indigent circumstances, from the language of Quintus Cicero (de Petitone Consulatus, c. 2), who speaks of Catiline as having been born amid the poverty of his father (in patris egestate). The great grandfather, M. Sergius Silus or Silo, distinguished himself greatly in the second Punic war, and was present in the battles of Ticinus, Trebia, Trasymenus, and Cannæ. Pliny (7, 29) speaks of his exploits in a very animated strain.—The cruelty of Catiline's disposition, his undaunted resolution, and the depravity of his morals, fitted him for acting a distinguished part in the turbulent and bloody scenes of the period in which he lived. He embraced the interest of Sylla, in whose army he held the office of quæstor. That monster in his victory had in Catiline an able coadjutor, whose heart knew no sympathy and his lewdness no bounds. He rejoiced in the carnage and plunder of the proscribed, gratifying at one time his own private resentments by bringing his enemies to punishment, and executing at another the bloody mandates of the dictator himself. Many citizens of noble birth are said by Quintus Cicero (de Petit. Cons., c. 23) to have fallen by his hand; and, according to Plutarch (Vit. Syll., c. 32.—Vit. Cic., c. 10), he had assassinated his own brother during the civil war, and now, to screen himself from prosecution, persuaded Sylla to put him down among the proscribed as a person still alive. He murdered too, with his own hands, his sister's husband, a Roman knight of a mild and peaceable character. (Q. Cic., de Petit. Cons., c. 3.) One of the most horrid actions, however, of which he was guilty, would seem to have been the killing of M. Marius Gratidianus, a near relation of the celebrated Marius. Sylla had put the name of this individual on the list of the proscribed, whereupon Catiline entered the dwelling of the unfortunate man, exhausted upon his person all the refinements of cruelty and insult, and having at last put an end to his existence, carried his bloody head in triumph through the streets of Rome, and brought it to Sylla as he sat on his tribunal in the forum. When this was done, the murderer washed his hands in the lustral water at the door of Apollo's temple, which stood in the immediate vicinity. (Seneca, de Ira, 3, 18.)—Catiline was peculiarly dangerous and formidable, as his power of dissimulation enabled him to throw a veil over his vices. Such was his art, that, while he was poisoning the minds of the Roman youth, he gained the friendship and esteem of the severe Catulus. Equally well qualified to deceive the good, to intimidate the weak, and to inspire his own boldness into his depraved associates, he evaded two accusations brought against him by Clodius, for criminal intercourse with a Vestal, and for monstrous extortions of which he had been guilty while præconsul in Africa (A.U.C. 687). He was suspected also of having murdered his first wife and his son. A confederacy of many young men of high birth and daring character, who saw no other means of extricating themselves from their enormous debts than by obtaining the highest offices of the state, having been formed, Catiline was placed at their head. This eminence he owed chiefly to his connexion with the old soldiers of Sylla, by means of whom he kept in awe the towns near Rome, and even Rome itself. At the same time he numbered among his adherents not only the worst and lowest of the riotous populace, but also many of the patricians and men of consular rank. Everything favoured his audacious scheme. Pompey was pursuing the victories which Lucullus had prepared for him, and the latter was but a feeble supporter of the patriots in the senate, who wished him, but in vain, to put himself at their head. Crassus, who had delivered Italy from the gladiators, was now striving with mad eagerness after power and riches, and, instead of opposing, countenanced the growing influence of Catiline, as a means of his own aggrandizement. Cæsar, who was labouring to revive the party of Marius, spared Catiline, and, perhaps, even encouraged him. Only two Romans remained determined to uphold their falling country—Cato and Cicero; the latter of whom alone possessed the qualifications necessary for the task. The conspirators were now planning the elevation of Catiline and one of his accomplices to the consulship. When this was effected, they hoped to obtain possession of the public treasures and the property of the citizens, under various pretexts, and especially by means of proscription. It is not probable, however, that Catiline had promised them the liberty of burning and plundering Rome. Cicero had the courage to stand candidate for the consulship, in spite of the impending danger, of the extent of which he was perfectly aware. Neither insults nor threats, nor even riots and attempts to assassinate him, deterred him from his purpose; and, being supported by the rich citizens, he gained his election, B.C. 65. All that the party of Catiline could accomplish was the election of Caius Antonius, one of their accomplices, as colleague of Cicero. This failure, however, did not deprive Catiline of the hope of gaining the consulship the following year. For this purpose he redoubled the measures of terror, by means of which he had laid the foundation of his power. Meanwhile he had lost some of the most important members of his conspiracy. Antony had been prevailed upon or compelled by Cicero to remain neutral. Cæsar and Crassus had resolved to do the same. Piso had been killed in Spain. Italy, however, was destitute of troops. The veterans of Sylla only waited the signal to take up arms. This signal was now given by Catiline. The centurion Manlius appeared among them, and formed a camp in Etruria. Cicero was on the watch, and a fortunate accident disclosed to him the counsels of the conspirators. One of them, Curius, was on intimate terms with a woman of doubtful reputation, Fulvia by name, and had acquainted her with their plans. Through this woman Cicero learned that two knights had undertaken to assassinate him at his house. On the day which they had fixed for the execution of their plan, they found his doors barred and guarded. Still Cicero delayed to make public the circumstances of a conspiracy, the progress and resources of which he wished first to ascertain. He contented himself with warning his fellow-citizens, in general terms, of the impending danger. But when the insurrection of Manlius was made known, he procured the passage of the celebrated decree, "that the consuls should take care that the republic received no detriment." By a decree of this kind, the consuls or other magistrates named therein were, in accordance with the custom of the state, armed with the supreme civil and military authority. It was exceedingly difficult to seize the person of one who had soldiers at his command, both in and out of Rome; still more difficult would it be to prove his guilt before those who were accomplices with him, or, at least, were willing to make use of his plans to serve their own interests. He had to choose between two evils—a revolution within the city, or a civil war: he preferred the latter. Catiline had the boldness to take his seat in the senate, known as he was to be the enemy of the Roman state. Cicero then rose and delivered that bold oration against him, which was the means of saving Rome by driving Catiline from the city. The conspirators who remained, Lentulus, Cethegus, and other infamous senators, engaged to head the insurrection in Rome as soon as Catiline appeared at the gates. According to Cicero and Sallust, it was the intention of the conspirators to set the city on fire, and massacre the inhabitants. At any rate, these horrid consequences might have easily followed from the circumstances of the case, without any previous resolution. Lentulus, Cethegus, and the other conspirators, in the mean while, were carrying on their criminal plots. They applied to the ambassadors of the Allobroges to transfer the war to the frontiers of Italy itself. These, however, revealed the plot, and their disclosures led to others still more important. The correspondence of the conspirators with their leader was intercepted. The senate had now a notorious crime to punish. As the circumstances of the case did not allow of a minute observation of form in the proceedings against the conspirators, the laws relating thereto were disregarded, as had been done in former instances of less pressing danger. Cæsar spoke against immediate execution, but Cicero and Cato prevailed. Five of the conspirators were put to death. Caius Antonius was then appointed to march against Catiline, but, on the eve of battle, under pretence of being disabled by the gout, he gave the command to his lieutenant Petreius. The battle was fought at Pistoria (now Pistoia) in Etruria, and ended in the complete overthrow of the insurgents. Catiline, on finding that all was lost, resolved to die sword in hand. His followers imitated his example.—The history of Catiline's conspiracy has been written by Sallust. The conspiracy of Catiline, as described by this historian and Cicero, is considered by some persons to contain many improbabilities. It is incredible, say they, that a man like Catiline, unconnected with the regular popular party, should have seriously hoped to effect a revolution; nor can it be believed that any of the nobility would have submitted themselves to the guidance of such a leader. Even if he had succeeded in setting fire to the city and destroying the principal senators, the prætor of the nearest province would presently have marched against him, and would have crushed him with little difficulty. But they who argue thus, forget that Catiline was a patrician of noble family; that he had been prætor; and that he was considered by Cicero as his most dangerous competitor for the consulship when he was candidate for that office. He had been known in Sylla's proscription as a man who scrupled at nothing; and there was a large party in Rome to whom such a character was the greatest recommendation, and who would gladly follow any one that possessed it. That this party was inconsiderable in point of political power, is true; and they accordingly hoped to effect their designs by fire and assassination rather than by open force. But if Catiline could have once made himself master of the city, no one can doubt but that he would have found a majority in the Comitia ready, either from fear or sympathy in his projects, to elect him consul or dictator; and, when once invested with the title of a legal magistrate, and in possession of the seat of government, he would probably have persuaded a very great part of the community to remain neutral, while his own active supporters, the profligate young nobility, the needy plebeians, the discontented Italian allies, and the restless veterans of Sylla's armies, would have enabled him to defy the efforts of any neighbouring prætor who might have been disposed to attack him. He might have held the government as easily as Cinna had done; and, although Pompey might have imitated successfully the conduct of Sylla, in returning from Asia to revenge the cause of the aristocracy, yet the chance of resisting him was not so hopeless as to dismay a set of desperate conspirators, who, in their calculations, would have been well contented if the probability of their failure was only a little greater than that of their success. (Sall., Bell. Cat.—Cic., Or. in Cat., 1, &c.—Id., pro Muræn., c. 25.—Æneyclop. Amer., vol. 3, p. 3, seqq.—Æneyclop. Metropolit., Div. 3, vol. 2, p. 176, not.)

CATILLUS, or CATILUS. Vid. TIBUR.

CATIUS, M. a fictitious name in Horace (Serm., 2, 4), under which the poet alludes to an entire class of persons, who abused the genuine doctrines of Epicurus, and made a large portion of human felicity consist in the pleasures of the table. According to Manso (Schriften und Abhandlungen, p. 59), Catius appears to have had for his prototype one Malius, a Roman knight, famed for his acquaintance with the precepts of the culinary art. (Consult Heindorf, ad Horat., l. c.)—The scholast cited by Cruquius makes Catius to have been an Epicurean, and to have written on “the Nature of Things,” and “the Sovereign Good.” With this account Acron and Porphyry agree. Cicero, moreover, speaks of the Epicurean Catius, from Insurbria, as of a writer who had died only a short time previous. (Cic., Ep. ad Fam., 15, 16.—Compare Quintil., 10, 1.) Still, however, the explanation we have given suits better the spirit of Horace’s satire; and, besides, Catius had died some time before, and was almost entirely forgotten. (Heindorf, l. c.)

CATO, a surname of the Porcian family, rendered illustrious by M. Porcius Cato, a celebrated Roman, surnamed Censorius, in allusion to the severity with which he discharged the office of censor, and hence commonly styled, at the present day, “Cato the Censor.” Other surnames were, Priscus, “the old,” and Major, “the elder,” both alluding to his having preceded, in the order of time, the younger Cato, who committed suicide at Utica. The subject of the present sketch was born 232 B.C., at Tusculum, of plebeian parents. His family were in very moderate circumstances, and little, if anything, was known of it, until he himself made the name a conspicuous one. His father left him a small farm in the Sabine territory, and here the first years of his youth were spent. The state of public affairs, however, soon compelled him to take up arms for the defence of his country. The second Punic war had broken out, and Hannibal had invaded Italy. Cato, therefore, served his first campaign at the age of seventeen, under Fabius Maximus, when he besieged the city of Capua. Five years after this he fought under the same commander at the siege of Tarentum, and, after the capture of this place, became acquainted with the Pythagorean Nearchus, who initiated him into the principles of that system of philosophy, with which, in practice, he had already become familiar. The war being ended, Cato returned to his farm. Near this there stood a cottage belonging to Manius Curius Dentatus, who had repeatedly triumphed over the Sabines and Samnites, and had at length driven Pyrrhus from Italy. Cato was accustomed frequently to walk over to the humble abode of this renowned commander, where he was struck with admiration at the frugality of its owner, and the skilful management of the farm which was attached to it. Hence it became his great object to emulate his illustrious neighbour, and adopt him as his model. Having made an estimate of his house, lands, slaves, and expenses, he applied himself to husbandry with new ardour, and retrenched all superfluity. In the morning he went to the small towns in the vicinity to plead and defend the causes of those who applied to him for assistance. Thence he returned to his fields; where, with a plain cloak over his shoulders in winter, and almost naked in summer, he laboured with his servants till they had concluded their tasks, after which he sat down along with them at table, eating the same bread and drinking the same wine. Valerius Flaccus, a noble and powerful Roman, occupied an estate in the neighbourhood of Cato’s residence. A witness of the virtues and talents displayed by him, he persuaded the young Cato to remove to Rome, and promised to assist him by his influence and patronage. Cato came accordingly to the capital, with an obscure name, and with no other resources but his own talents and the aid of the generous Flaccus; but by the purity of his morals, the austere energy of his character, his knowledge of the laws, his fluency of elocution, and the great ability that marked his early forensic career, he soon won for himself a distinguished name. It was in the camp, however, rather than at the bar, that he strove to raise himself to eminence. At the age of thirty he went as military tribune to Sicily. The next year he was chosen quæstor, and was attached to the army which Scipio Africanus was to carry into Africa, at which period there commenced between him and that commander a rivalry and hatred which lasted until death. Cato, who had returned to Rome, accused Scipio of extravagance; and, though he failed in supporting his charge, yet his zeal for the public good gained him great influence over the minds of the people. Five years subsequent to this, after having been already ædile, he was chosen prætor, and the province of Sardinia fell to him by lot. His austere self-control, his integrity and justice, while discharging this office, brought him into direct and most favourable contrast with those who had preceded him. Here too it was that he became acquainted with the poet Ennius, who was then serving among the Calabrian levies attached to the army. From Ennius he acquired the Greek language, and, on his departure from the island, he took the bard along with him to Rome. He was finally elected consul, B.C. 193, and his colleague in office was Valerius Flaccus, his early friend. While consul he strenuously but fruitlessly opposed the abolition of the famous Oppian Law (vid. Oppia Lex), and soon after this set out for Spain, which had attempted to shake off the Roman yoke. With newly-raised troops, which he soon converted into an excellent army, he quickly reduced that province to submission, and obtained the honours of a triumph at Rome, though there is but too much reason to believe that he had justly exposed himself, in the eyes of a candid historian, if such a one could then have been found among his countrymen, to the charge of perfidious conduct and cruelty. Hardly had Cato descended from the triumphal chariot, when, laying aside the consular robe and assuming the garb of the lieutenant, he accompanied, as such, the Roman commander Sempronius into Thrace. He afterward placed himself under the orders of Manius Acilius, the consul, to fight against Antiochus and carry the war into Thessaly. By a bold march he seized upon Callidromus, one of the rockiest summits of Thermopylæ, and thus decided the issue of the conflict. For this signal service, the consul, in the excess of his enthusiasm, embraced him in the presence of the whole army, and exclaimed that it was neither in his power, nor in that of the Roman people, to award him a recompense commensurate with his deserts. Acilius immediately after this sent him to Rome to communicate the tidings of the victory. Seven years subsequently he obtained the office of censor, notwithstanding the powerful opposition of a large part of the nobility, who dreaded to have so severe an inspector of public morals, at a time when luxury, the result of their Asiatic conquests, had driven out many of the earlier virtues of the Roman people. He fulfilled this trust with inflexible rigour. Some of his acts, it is true, would seem to have proceeded from that pugnacious bitterness which must be contracted by a man engaged in constant strife and inflections; thus, for example, he took away his horse from Lucius Scipio, and expelled Manilius from the senate for saluting his wife at what Cato deemed an improper time. Still, however, most of his proceedings when censor indicate a man who aimed, by every method, at keeping up the true spirit of earlier days. Hence, though his measures, while holding this office, caused him some obloquy and opposition, they met in the end with the highest applause, and, when he resigned the censorship, the people erected a statue to him in the temple of Health, with an honourable inscription, testifying his faithful discharge of the duties of his office. Cato's attachment to the old Roman morals was still more plainly seen in his opposition to Carneades and his colleagues, when he persuaded the senate to send back these philosophers, without delay, to their own schools, through fear lest the Roman youth should lose their martial character in the pursuit of Grecian learning. The whole political career of Cato was one continued warfare. He was continually accusing others, or made the subject of accusation himself. Livy, although full of admiration for his character, still does not seek to deny, that Cato was suspected of having excited the accusation brought against Scipio Africanus, which compelled that illustrious man to retire from the capital. He was also the means of the condemnation of Scipio Asiaticus, who would have been dragged to prison had not Tiberius Gracchus generously interfered. As for Cato himself, he was fifty times accused and as often acquitted. He was eighty-five years of age when he saw himself compelled to answer the last accusation brought against him, and the exordium of his speech on that occasion was marked by a peculiar and touching simplicity: "It is a hard thing, Romans, to give an account of one's conduct before the men of an age different from that in which one has himself lived."—The last act of Cato's public life was his embassy to Carthage, to settle the dispute between the Carthaginians and King Massinissa. This voyage of his is rendered famous in history, since to it has been attributed the destruction of Carthage. In fact, struck by the rapid recovery of this city from the loss it had sustained, Cato ever after ended every speech of his with the well known words, "Præterea censeo Carthaginem esse delendam" ("I am also of opinion that Carthage ought to be destroyed"). Whatever we may think of his patriotism in this, we certainly cannot admire his political sagacity, since the ruin of Carthage, by removing all dread of a once powerful rival, only tended to accelerate the downfall of Roman freedom itself. Cato died a year after his return from this embassy, in the eighty-fifth year of his age.—Although frugal of the public revenues, he does not appear to have been indifferent to riches, nor to have neglected the ordinary means of acquiring them; nay, if Plutarch speaks truly, some of the modes to which he had recourse for increasing his resources were anything but reputable. Towards the end of his life he was fond of indulging in a cheerful glass, and of inviting daily some of his neighbours to sup with him at his villa; and the conversation on these occasions turned, not, as one might have supposed, chiefly on rural affairs, but on the praises of great and excellent men among the Romans. He was twice married, and had a son by each of his wives. His conduct as a husband and father was equally exemplary.—Cato may be taken as a specimen of the Sabino-Samnite character. If his life be regarded as that of a mere private man, it offers only acerbity and rigour: it presents, however, a wholly different aspect if one contemplates him as the representative of the early Italian popular character. Many features of this same character strikingly resemble the modern. Who does not, in Cato's vehement bitterness, retrace a leading feature of the modern Italian, so vehement and implacable when his feelings are once irritated? Who knows not that in Italy is most frequently to be found the strange combination of grovelling cupidity and boundless indifference towards external goods? As to what regards the first point, we need not, as in other cases, betake ourselves to Plutarch's collection of anecdotes; we can judge of it from Cato's own work on husbandry and household economy. At the very outset of the book, he sees nothing to find fault with in a respectable man's endeavouring to enrich himself by trade; for profit and gain appear to him an important object of life; only he looks upon the mercantile profession as too hazardous in its nature.—While we recognise with pleasure, even in Cato's generation, the old Sabine discipline in the simplicity of life, rural employments, and social cheerfulness of the Roman country nobleman, yet we perceive with horror that the treatment of slaves, even in ancient Italy and according to old Roman manners, was still more degrading to humanity than in Greece. Cato bought slaves like hounds or foals, when they were young, in order to sell them again when grown up; he treated them exactly like hounds or foals; used them well, because they had a money value, but otherwise viewed them merely as live-stock, not as persons. This, however, we find less surprising, since, even in his warlike undertakings, Cato opposed rigour and cruelty, as genuine Roman policy, to Scipio's mildness. His advice, however, to the farmer, as to the mode in which old and sickly slaves are to be disposed of, shows an utter want of good feeling. He classes them with old and worn-out iron implements, and recommends them to be sold: "Ferramenta vetera, servum senem, servum morbosum, et si quid aliud supersit vendat." (R. R., 2, p. 12, ed. Bip.)—Among the literary labours of Cato, the first that deserves mention is the treatise De Re Rustica ("On Agriculture"). It appears to have come down to us in a mutilated state, since Pliny and other writers allude to subjects as treated of by Cato, and to opinions as delivered by him in this book, which are nowhere to be found in any part of the work now extant. In its present state, it is merely the loose, unconnected journal of a plain farmer, expressed with rude, sometimes with almost oracular, brevity; and it wants all those elegant topics of embellishment and illustration which the subject might have so naturally suggested. It consists solely of the driest rules of agriculture, and some receipts for making various kinds of cakes and wine. Servius says, it is addressed to the author's son, but there is no such address now extant. The most remarkable feature in this work of Cato's is its total want of arrangement. It is divided, indeed, into chapters, but the author apparently had never taken the trouble of reducing his precepts to any sort of method, or of following any general plan. The hundred and sixty-two chapters, of which this work consists, seem so many rules committed to writing, as the daily labours of the field suggested. He gives directions about the vineyard, then goes to his corn-fields, and returns again to the vineyard. His treatise, therefore, was evidently not intended as a regular and well-composed book, but merely as a journal of incidental observations. That this was its utmost pretension, is farther evinced by the brevity of the precepts, and the deficiency of all illustrations or embellishment. Of the style, he of course would be little careful, as his Memoranda were intended for the use only of his family and slaves. It is therefore always simple, and sometimes rude, but it is not ill-adapted to the subject, and suits our notions of the severe manners of its author and the character of the ancient Romans.—Besides this book on agriculture, Cato left behind him various works, which have almost entirely perished. He left a hundred and fifty orations (Cicero, Brutus, c. 17), which were existing in the time of Cicero, though almost entirely neglected, and a book on military discipline (Vegetius, 1, 8), both of which, if now extant, would be highly interesting, as proceeding from one who was equally distinguished in the camp and forum. A good many of his orations were in dissuasion or favour of particular laws and measures of state. By his readiness and pertinacity, and his bitterness in speaking, he completely wore out his adversaries (Liv., 39, 40), and earned the reputation of being, if not the most eloquent, at least the most stubborn, speaker among the Romans. Both Cicero and Livy have expressed themselves very fully on the subject of Cato's orations. The former admits that his "language is antiquated, and some of his phrases harsh and inelegant: but only change that," he continues, "which it was not in his power to change—add number and cadence—give an easier turn to his sentences, and regulate the structure and connexion of his words, and you will find no one who can claim the preference to Cato." Livy principally speaks of the facility, asperity, and freedom of his tongue.—Of the book on military discipline, a good deal has been incorporated into the work of Vegetius; and Cicero's orations may console us for the want of those of Cato. But the loss of the seven books, De Originibus, which he commenced in his vigorous old age, and finished just before his death, must ever be deeply deplored by the historian and antiquary. Cato is said to have begun to inquire into the history, antiquities, and language of the Roman people, with a view to counteract the influence of the Greek taste introduced by the Scipios. The first book of the valuable work, De Originibus, as we are informed by Cornelius Nepos, in his short life of Cato, contained the exploits of the kings of Rome. Cato was the first author who attempted to fix the era of the foundation of Rome, which he calculated in his Origines, and determined to have been in the first year of the 7th Olympiad, which is also the estimate followed by Dionysius of Halicarnassus. The second and third books treated of the origin of the different states of Italy, whence the whole work has received the name of Origines. The fourth and fifth books comprehended the history of the first and second Punic wars; and in the two remaining books, the author discussed the other wars of the Romans till the time of Servius Galba, who overthrew the Lusitanians. The whole work exhibited great industry and learning, and, had it descended to us, would unquestionably have thrown much light upon the early periods of Roman history and the antiquities of the different states of Italy. Dionysius of Halicarnassus, himself a sedulous inquirer into antiquities, bears ample testimony to the research and accuracy of that part which treats of the origin of the ancient Italian cities.—Cato was the first of his countrymen who wrote on the subject of medicine. This was done in a work entitled "Commentarius quo medetur Filio, Servis, Familiaribus." In this book of domestic medicine, duck, pigeons, and hare were the food he chiefly recommended to the sick. His remedies were principally extracted from herbs; and colewort or cabbage was his favourite cure. (Pliny, 20, 9.) The recipes, indeed, contained in his work on agriculture, show that his medical knowledge did not exceed that which usually exists among a semi-barbarous race, and only extended to the most ordinary simples which nature affords.—Aulus Gellius (7, 10) mentions Cato's Libri quæstionum Epistolarum; and Cicero his Apophthegmata (De Officiis, 1, 29), the first example, probably, of that class of works which, under the appellation of Ana, became so fashionable and prevalent in France.—The only other work of Cato's which we shall here mention is the Carmen de Moribus. This, however, was not written in verse, as might be supposed from the title. Precepts, imprecations, or prayers, or any set formulae whatever, were called Carmena. Misled, however, by the title, some critics have erroneously assigned to the censor the Disticha de

Moribus, now generally attributed to Dionysius Cato, who lived, according to Scaliger, in the age of Commodus and Septimius Severus. (Plut., Vit. Cat. Maj.—Biogr. Univ., vol. 7, p. 399, seqq.—Dunlop's Roman Literature, vol. 2, p. 16, seqq.)—The pretended fragments of the Origines, published by the Dominican, Nannii, better known by the name of Annii Viterbiensis, and inserted in his Antiquitates Varie, printed at Rome in 1498, are spurious, and the imposition was detected soon after their appearance. The few remains first collected by Riccobonus, and published at the end of his Treatise on History (Basle, 1759), are believed to be genuine. They have been enlarged by Ausonius Poppa, and added by him, with notes, to the other writings of Cato, published at Leyden in 1590.—The best edition of the work on Agriculture is contained in Gesner's Scriptores Rei Rusticæ, 2 vols. 4to, Lips., 1735.—II. Marcus, son of Cato the Censor, by his first wife. He distinguished himself greatly in the battle of Pydna, against Perses, king of Macedonia, and received high eulogiums from Paulus Æmilius, the Roman commander on that occasion, whose daughter Tertia he afterward married. He died while filling the office of prætor. (Plut., Vit. Cat. Maj., c. 20 et 24.)—III. Saloniæ, or, as Plutarch calls him, Saloniæ (Σαλωνίως), son of Cato the Censor, by his second wife. This second wife was the daughter of one Saloniæ, who had been Cato's secretary, and was, at the time of the marriage, a member of his retinue. Saloniæ, like his half-brother Marcus, died when prætor. He left, however, a son named Marcus, who attained to the consulship, and who was the father of Cato the younger, commonly called Uticensis. (Plut., Vit. Cat. Maj., c. 27.)—IV. Valerius, a celebrated grammarian in the time of Sylla. He was deprived of all his patrimony during the excesses of the civil war, and then directed his attention to literary pursuits. He wrote a poem entitled Dira in Battarum, "Imprecations on Battarus." It was directed against the individual who had profited by his disgrace, to appropriate to himself all the property of the former. Suetonius, who has preserved some account of him, mentions two other poems of his, the one entitled Lydia, the other Diana, and also a third work, probably in prose, called Indignatio, in which he gives an account of his misfortunes. These three works are lost. (Schöll, Hist. Lit. Gr., vol. 1, p. 152.)—V. Dionysius, a writer supposed to have flourished in the age of Commodus and Septimius Severus, and who is regarded as the author of the Disticha de Moribus. (Compare Scaliger, Lect. Auson., 232—Cannevieter, Rescrip. Bozhor., de Catonæ, c. 18.—Bähr, Gesch. Rom. Litt., vol. 1, p. 154.)—VI. Marcus, surnamed Uticensis, from his death at Utica, was great-grandson to the censor of the same name, and born B.C. 93. A short time after his birth he lost both his parents, and was brought up in the mansion of Livius Drusus, his uncle on the mother's side. Even in early life Cato displayed a maturity of judgment and an inflexible firmness of character far above his years; and Sarpædon, his instructor, being accustomed to take him frequently to the residence of Sylla, who had been his father's friend, the young Cato, then but fourteen years of age, struck with horror at the bloody scenes that were passing around him, asked his preceptor for a sword that he might slay the tyrant. His affectionate disposition was clearly displayed in his strong attachment to Cæpio, his brother by the mother's side, as may be seen by a reference to the pages of Plutarch. Being appointed to the priesthood of Apollo, he changed his residence, and took his share of his father's estate; but, though the fortune which he thus received was a considerable one, his manner of living was simpler and more frugal than ever. He formed a particular connexion with Antipater of Tyre, the stoic philosopher, made himself well acquainted with the tenets of this school, and ever after remained true to its principles, pushing them even to the extreme of austerity. His first appearance in public was against the tribunes of the people, who wished to remove a column of the Porcian Basilica, or Hall of Justice, which incommoded their benches. This Basilica had been erected by his great-grandfather the censor, and the young Cato displayed on the occasion that powerful and commanding eloquence which afterward rendered him so formidable to all his opponents. His first campaign was in the war against Spartacus, as a simple volunteer, his half-brother Cæpio being a military tribune in the same army; and he distinguished himself so highly, that Gellius, the prætor, wished to award him a prize of honour, which Cato, however, declined. He was then sent as military tribune to Macedonia. There he learned that Cæpio was lying dangerously ill at Ænos in Thrace, and instantly embarked for that place in a small passage-boat, notwithstanding the roughness of the sea and the great peril which attended the attempt, but only arrived at Ænos just after Cæpio had breathed his last. Stoicism was here of no avail, and the young Roman bitterly lamented the companion of his early years. According to Plutarch, there were some who condemned him for acting in a way so contradictory to his philosophical principles; but the heavier and more unfeeling charge was the one brought against him by Cæsar, in his work entitled "Anti-Cato." It was there stated, that, after all the lavish expenditure in which Cato had indulged in performing the funeral obsequies of Cæpio, and after having declined repayment from the daughter of the latter, he nevertheless passed Cæpio's ashes through a sieve in search of the gold which might have melted down with them! When the term of his service in Macedonia had expired, he travelled into Asia, and brought back with him the stoic Athenodorus to Rome. He was next made quæstor, and discharged with so much impartiality the duties of this difficult office, and displayed so much integrity in its various details, that, on the last day of his quæstorship, he was escorted to his house by the whole assembly of the people. So high, indeed, was the opinion entertained by his countrymen of the purity of his moral character, that when, at the Floral games given by the ædile Messius, Cato happened to be a spectator, the people, out of respect for him, hesitated about ordering the dancers to lay aside their vestments, according to long-established custom, nor would they allow this to be done until he had departed from the theatre. (Val. Max., 2, 10, 8.) When the conspiracy of Catiline was discovered, Cato supported by every means in his power the acts of Cicero, and was the first that gave him publicly the honourable title of "Father of his Country." Opposing after this the ambitious movements of the first triumvirate, they managed to have him removed to a distance, by sending him out as governor of the island of Cyprus. Having executed this trust with ability and success, and having deposited in the treasury nearly seven thousand talents of silver, he again took part in public affairs at Rome, and again continued his opposition to the triumvirate. When, however, the rupture took place between Pompey and Cæsar, he sided with the former, and was left behind by him at Dyrrhachium to guard the military chest and magazine, while he pushed on after Cæsar, who had been forced to retire from the siege of that city. Cato, therefore, was not present at the battle of Pharsalia. On receiving the news of this event he sailed to Coreyra with the troops under his orders, and offered the command to Cicero, who declined it. He then proceeded to Africa, where he hoped to meet with Pompey, but on reaching Cyrene he heard of his death, and was also informed that Pompey's father-in-law, Scipio, had gone to Juba, king of Mauritania, where Varus had collected a considerable force. Cato immediately resolved to join them, and, in order to effect this, was compelled to make a long and painful march across a desert region, in which his troops suffered severely from hunger, thirst, and every hardship, but which privations his own example enabled them manfully to endure. After seven days of suffering his force reached Utica, where a junction between the two armies took place. The soldiers wished to have him for their general, but he yielded to what he conceived to be the superior claims of Scipio, who held the office of proconsul; and this fault on his part, of which he soon after had reason to repent, accelerated the ruin of the cause in which he had embarked. Scipio having wished, for Juba's gratification, to put all the inhabitants of Utica to the sword, Cato strenuously opposed this cruel plan, and accepted the command of this important city, while Scipio and Labienus marched against Cæsar. Cato had advised them to protract the war; but they hazarded an engagement at Thapsus, in which they were entirely defeated, and Africa submitted to the victor. After vainly endeavouring to prevail upon the fragments of the conquered army, as they came successively to Utica, to unite in defending that city against the conqueror, Cato furnished them with all the ships in the harbour to convey them whithersoever they wished to go. When the evening of that day came, he retired to his own apartments, and employed himself for some time in reading the Phædon of Plato, a dialogue that turns upon the immortality of the soul. He endeavoured at the same time to lull the suspicions of his friends, by seeming to take a lively interest in the fate of those who were escaping by sea from Utica, and by sending several times to the seaside to learn the state of the wind and weather. But towards morning, when all was quiet, he stabbed himself. He fell from his bed with the blow, and the noise of his fall brought his son and servants into the room, by whose assistance he was raised from the ground, and an attempt was made to bind up the wound. Their efforts to save him were in vain: for Cato had no sooner recovered his self-possession, than he tore open the wound again in so effectual a manner that he instantly expired. He died at the age of 48; and when Cæsar heard of his fate he is said to have exclaimed, "I grudge thee thy death, Cato, since thou hast grudged me the saving of thy life."—Such was the end of a man whom a better philosophy, by teaching him to struggle with his predominant faults instead of encouraging them, would have rendered truly amiable and admirable. He possessed the greatest integrity and firmness; and, from the beginning of his political career, was never swayed by fear or interest to desert that which he considered the course of liberty and justice. He is said to have foreseen Cæsar's designs long before they were generally suspected; but his well-known animosity against him rendered his authority on the subject less weighty; and his zeal led him to miscalculate the strength of the commonwealth, when he earnestly advised the senate to adopt those measures which gave Cæsar a pretence for commencing hostilities. During the civil war he had the rare merit of uniting to the sincerest ardour in the cause of his party a steady regard for justice and humanity; he would not countenance cruelty or rapine because practised by his associates or coloured with pretences of public advantage. But philosophical pride overshadowed the last scenes of his life, and led him to indulge his selfish feelings by suicide, rather than live for the happiness of his family and friends, and mitigate, as far as lay in his power, the distressed condition of his country. His character, however, was so pure, and, since Pompey's death, so superior to that of all the leaders engaged with him in the same cause, that his opponents could not refuse him their respect and praise; and his name has become a favourite theme of panegyric in modern times, as that of the most upright and persevering defender of the liberties of Rome. (Plut., Vit. Cat. Min.—Biogr. Univ., vol. 7, p. 405, seqq.—Encyclop. Metropol., Div. 3, vol. 2, p. 261.)—VII. M. Percius, son of the preceding, was spared by Cæsar, but led a somewhat immoral life, until he effaced every stain upon his character by a glorious death at Philippi. (Plut., Vit. Cat. Min., c. 73.)

CATTI or CHATTI (Χάττοι, Strab.—Χάτται, Ptol.—Catti, Tacit.—Chatti, Plin.), a powerful nation of Germany, little known, however, to the Romans, since that people, though they made some incursions into their country, never had a fixed settlement therein. Cæsar knew nothing more of them than that they lived in the vicinity of the Ubii, and that in the interior a wood called Bæcenis separated them from the Cherusci. Tacitus describes them more closely, and assigns the Decumates Agri for their southern boundary, and the Hercynian forest for their eastern. The country of the Catti would seem to have comprehended the territory of Hesse and other adjacent parts. The name Catti or Chatti, and the more modern Hassen and Hessen, appear to be identical. (Compare Wenk, Hessische Landesgeschichte, vol. 2, p. 22.—Mannert, Geogr., vol. 3, p. 183, seqq.) A fortress of the Catti, called Castellum, still bears the name of Cassel; but their capital Mattium is now Marpurg.

CATULLUS, Caius Valerius, a celebrated poet, born of respectable parents in the territory of Verona, but whether in the town so called, or on the peninsula of Sirmio, which projects into the Lake Benacus, has been a subject of much controversy. The former opinion has been maintained by Maffei (Verona Illustrata, pt. 2, c. 1) and Bayle (Diet. Hist., art. Catullus), and the latter by Gyraldus (De Poet., dial. 10), Schöll (Hist. Lit. Rom., vol. 1, p. 310), Fuhrmann (Handbuch der Class., vol. 1, p. 187), and most modern writers. The precise period, as well as place, of the birth of Catullus, is a topic of debate and uncertainty. According to the Eusebian chronicle, he was born A.U.C. 666, but according to other authorities in 667 (Saxii Onomast., vol. 1, p. 148) or 668. In consequence of an invitation from Manlius Torquatus, one of the noblest patricians of the state, he proceeded in early youth to Rome, where he appears to have kept but indifferent company, at least in point of moral character. He impaired his fortune so much by his extravagance, that he complains he had no one “*Fractum qui veteris pedem grabati,

In collo sibi collocare possit.*”

This, however, must partly have been written in jest, as his finances were always sufficient to allow him to keep up a delicious villa on the peninsula of Sirmio, and an expensive residence at Tibur. With a view of improving his pecuniary circumstances, he adopted the usual Roman mode of re-establishing a diminished fortune, and accompanied Caius Memmius, the celebrated patron of Lucretius, to Bithynia, where he was appointed prætor to that province. His situation, however, was but little meliorated by this expedition, and, in the course of it, he lost a beloved brother who was along with him, and whose death was lamented in verses never surpassed in delicacy or pathos. He came back to Rome with a shattered constitution and a lacerated heart. From the period of his return to Italy till his decease, his time appears to have been chiefly occupied with the prosecution of licentious amours in the capital or in the solitudes of Sirmio. The Eusebian chronicle places his death in A.U.C. 696, and some writers fix it in 705. It is evident, however, that he must have survived at least till 708, as Cicero, in his Letters, talks of his verses against Cæsar and Mamurra as newly written, and first seen by Cæsar in that year. He had satirized the dictator, who revenged himself, like a man of the world and a man of sense and good temper, by asking the satirist to sup with him. The distracted and unhappy state of his country, and his disgust at the treatment which he had received from Memmius, were perhaps sufficient excuse for shunning political employments; but when we consider his taste and genius, we cannot help regretting that he was merely an idler and a debauchee. He loved Clodia (supposed to have been the sister of the infamous Clodius), a beautiful but shameless woman, whom he has celebrated under the name of Lesbia, as comparing her to the Lesbian Sappho. Among his friends he ranked not only most men of pleasure and fashion in Rome, but many of her eminent literary and political characters, as Cornelius Nepos, Cicero, and Asinius Pollio. His enemies seem to have been as numerous as his loves or friendships, and competitions in poetry or rivalryship in gallantry appear always to have been a sufficient cause for his dislike; and where an antipathy was once conceived, he was unable to put any restraint on the expression of his hostile feelings. His poems are chiefly employed in the indulgence and commemoration of these various passions. They have been divided into lyric, elegiac, and epigrammatic, an arrangement convenient from its generality, but to which all cannot with strictness be reduced. He seems to have been the earliest lyric poet of Latium, notwithstanding the claim of Horace to the same honour. Much of his poetry appears to have been lost: the pieces that remain to us exhibit, in singular contrast, the sensual grossness which is imbibed from depraved habits and loose imaginations, together with gleams of sentiment and taste, and the polish of intellectual cultivation. They who turn with disgust from the coarse impurities that sully his pages, may be inclined to wonder that the term of delicacy should ever have been coupled with the name of Catullus. But to many of his effusions, distinguished both by fancy and feeling, this praise is justly due. Many of his amatory trifles are quite unrivalled in the elegance of their playfulness; and no author has excelled him in the purity and neatness of his style, the delightful ease and rare simplicity of his manner, and his graceful turns of thought and happiness of expression. Some of his pieces, which breathe the higher enthusiasm of the art, and are coloured with a singular picturesqueness of imagery, increase our regret at the manifest mutilation of his works. No one of his poetical predecessors was more versed in Greek literature than Catullus, and his extensive knowledge of its beauties procured for him the appellation of Doctus: unless we understand by the term in question, not “learned,” but rather knowing and accomplished; what the old English writers generally signify by “cunning,” as “cunning in music and the mathematics.” Catullus translated many of the shorter and more delicate pieces of the Greeks, an attempt which hitherto had been thought impossible, though the broad humour of their comedies, the vehement pathos of their tragedies, and the romantic interest of the Odyssey, had stood the transformation. His stay in Bithynia, though little advantageous to his fortune, rendered him better acquainted than he might otherwise have been with the productions of Greece; and he was therefore, in a great degree, indebted to this expedition (on which he always appears to have looked back with mortification and disappointment) for those felicitous turns of expression, that grace, simplicity, and purity which are the characteristics of his poems, and of which hitherto Greece alone had afforded models. Indeed, in all his verses, whether elegiac or heroic, we perceive his imitation of the Greeks; and it must be admitted that he has drawn from them his choicest stores. His Hellenisms are frequent; his images, similes, metaphors, and addresses to himself are all Greek; and even in the versification of his odes we see visible traces of their origin. Nevertheless, he was the inventor of a new species of Latin poetry; and as he was the first who used such variety of measures, and perhaps invented some that were new, he was amply entitled to call the poetical volume which he presented to Cornelius Nepos Lepidum Norum Libellum. The beautiful expressions, too, and idioms of the Greek language, which he has so carefully selected, are woven with such art into the texture of his composition, and so aptly paint the impassioned ideas of his amorous muse, that they have all the fresh and untarnished hues of originality.—The best editions of Catullus are, that of Vulpius, Patav., 4to, 1737, and that of Döring, Lips., 8vo, 1788, reprinted in London, 1820. The works of this poet have also been frequently edited in conjunction with those of Tibullus and Propertius, of which the best edition is perhaps that of Morell, Paris, fol., 1604. (Bähr, Gesch. Röm. Lit., vol. 1, p. 253, seqq.—Schöll, Hist. Lit. Röm., vol. 1, p. 236, 310, seqq.—Elton's Specimens, vol. 2, p. 31.—Dunlop, Röm. Lit., vol. 1, p. 454, seqq.)

CATULUS, Q. LUTATIUS, I. a Roman naval commander, famous for his victory over the fleet of the Carthaginians, consisting of 400 sail, off the Ægates Insulae; forty of the Carthaginian vessels were sunk, seventy taken, and the remainder dispersed. This celebrated victory put an end to the first Punic war. (Vid. Ægates Insulae.)—II. A celebrated Roman, the colleague of Marius in the consulship, and who jointly triumphed with him over the Cimbri. He was condemned to death by Marius, during the tyrannical sway of the latter, and suffocated himself in a newly-plastered room by the steam of a large fire. (Plut., Vit. Mar.—Vell. Patere., 2, 22.)

CATURIGES, a Gallic nation, dwelling among the Cottian Alps. (Plin., 3, 20.) Their capital was Caturiga, traces of which are found, according to D'Anville, at Chorges, between Gap and Embrun, in the département des Hautes-Alpes. (Lemaire, Ind. Geogr. ad Cas., p. 228, seq.)

Caucasus, the name of the highest and most extensive range of mountains in the northern part of Asia, and which the ancients erroneously considered as a continuation of the chain of Taurus. According to Strabo, it extended from the Euxine to the Caspian Sea. It divided Albania and Iberia towards the south, from the level country of the Sarmatæ on the north. The inhabitants of these mountains formed, according to some, seventy, and according to others, 300 different nations, who spoke various languages, and lived in a savage state. The breadth of this chain, according to the best Russian authorities, is about 400 miles between the mouths of the Don and Koona; about 756 between the straits of Caffia and the peninsula of Apheron; and about 350 between the mouths of the Phasis and the city of Derbend. The etymology of the name of Caucasus, so celebrated in history and poetry, is not agreed upon; the most probable opinion is that which connects it with the Asi, the early divinities of Asia. (Vid. Asi.) The range of Caucasus cannot be compared with the Alps in point of elevation, though in resemblance it may, as the middle of the chain is covered with glaciers, or white with eternal snows. The highest summit is only 5900 feet above the level of the Black Sea. The two principal passages of Caucasus are mentioned by the ancients under the name of the Caucasian and Albanian gates. The first is the defile which leads from Mosdok to Tiflis. It is the narrow valley of four days' journey, where, according to Strabo, the river Aragon, now called Arakut, flows. It is, as Pliny calls it, an enormous work of nature, which has cut out a long opening among the rocks, that an iron gate would be almost sufficient to close. It is by this passage that the barbarians of the north threatened both the Roman and the Persian empire. It is now called Dariel. The Albanian pass of the ancients was, according to common opinion, the pass of Derbend along the Caspian Sea. Later and better authorities sanction the belief, however, that it was the same with the Sarmatian pass, and coincides with a defile passing through the territory of Ooma-khan, along the frontier of Daghestan, and then traversing the district of Kagmamsharie. (Malte-Brun, Geogr., vol. 2, p. 12, Brussels ed.)

CAUCONES, a people of Paphlagonia, who occupied the coast of the Euxine from the Maryandynes as far as the river Parthenius. Some pretend that they were of Arcadian origin, in common with the Pelasgi, and roamed about like this latter people (Strab., 345), while, according to others, they were of Scythian extraction. (Strab., 542.) A portion of these Caucones are said to have passed into Greece, and occupied a territory in the division of Elis, called Coele, or "the hollow." Another part settled in Triphylian Elis. It is of the latter that Herodotus speaks (1, 147; 4, 148.—Compare Larcher, Hist. d'Herod., vol. 8, p. 106, Table Geographique.)

CAUDUM, a city of Samnium, the position of which is not perfectly agreed upon by antiquaries: most of them, indeed, place it, with Holstenius, who examined the whole of this tract with great accuracy, at Arpaia. But D'Anville assigns it a situation a few miles farther towards Beneventum. In the vicinity of Caudium was the famous defile called Furca Caudina, where the Roman army was compelled by the Samnites to pass under the yoke. The present valley of Arpaia is thought to answer to this pass. (Cramer's Ancient Italy, vol. 2, p. 243.)

CAULONIA or CAULON, a city of Brutium, in lower Italy, on the seacoast, a short distance south of Cocintum Promontorium, and between that and the Zephyrian Promontory. It was one of the earliest colonies founded by the Achæans on these shores (Strab., 261.—Seymour. Ch., v. 317), and the name originally, perhaps, was Aulon. (Steph. Byz., s. v. Αὐλών.) That it held a distinguished rank among the republics of Magna Græcia we may collect from Polybius (2, 39), who records its alliance with Crotona and Sybaris. It was razed to the ground by Dionysius of Syracuse, who removed the inhabitants to his capital (Diod. Sic., 14, 106), but it must have arisen again from its ruins, since, during the war with Pyrrhus, it espoused the cause of that prince, and was, in consequence, attacked and pillaged by the Mamertini, who were the allies of the Romans. (Pausan., 6, 3.) The town was subsequently occupied by the Brutii, who defended it against the Romans during the second Punic war. The siege was raised by Hannibal. (Liv., 27, 12 et 15.—Plut., Vit. Fab. Max.) Bano, and the other Calabrian topographers, fixed its site at Castro vetere; but the opinion of the best-informed antiquaries is in favour of Alaro. (Cramer's Anc. Italy, vol. 2, p. 402.)

CAUNUS, a city of Caria, at the foot of Mount Tarbelus, west of the Sinus Glaucus. It appears to have been the capital of a people, whom Herodotus regarded as differing from the Carians in some important particulars, and possessing more of the character of an indigenous nation. (Herod., 1, 172.) This city, though possessing the advantages of a good harbour and a very fertile territory, was nevertheless reckoned particularly unhealthy during the summer by reason of the excessive heat; the abundance of fruit was also prejudicial to the health of its inhabitants. Under the Byzantine emperors, Caunus formed part of Lycia. (Hierocl., p. 685.—Compare the Acts of Councils and Notitiæ.—Geogr. Sacr., p. 218.) The site of Caunus is now occupied by a small town and seaport named Kaignuz or Kheusez, about four miles to the south of the entrance of the Calbis into the sea. (Cramer's Asia Minor, vol. 2, p. 193, seqq.) The figs of this place were famous. Cicero (de Div., 2, 4) mentions the cry of a person who sold Caunian figs at Brundisium, as a bad omen against Crassus when setting out, at the time, on his Parthian expedition. The cry of the fig-vender was Cauneas (supply ficus cme, or vendo), and this to a Roman ear would sound very much like cave æ eas, pronounced rapidly, that is, like caw' n' eas, the letter v being sounded by the Romans like u. (Schneider, L. G., vol. 1, p. 357, seqq.)

CAYSTER or CAYSTRUS, a rapid river of Asia, rising in Lydia, and after a meandering course, falling into the Ægean Sea near Ephesus. Near its mouth it formed a marsh called Asia Palus, or the Asian marsh, and the same with the Ἀσίος λεγίων of Homer, much frequented by swans and other water-fowl. The Cayster is now called the Kitchik Minder, or Little Mæander, from its winding course. (Plin., 5, 29.—Strab., 642.—Hom., Il., 2, 470.—Virg., Georg., 1, 383.—Id., Æn., 7, 699.—Ovid, Mét., 5, 386.—Martial, Ep., 1, 54, 6.)

CEBENNA MOUNTS, a range of mountains in Gaul, commencing in the territory of the Volcæ Tectosages, running thence in a northern direction into the country of the Ruteni, communicating by a side-chain with the mountains of the Arvernî to the northwest, while the main range pursues its course towards the northeast and north, connecting itself, in the former direction with Mount Jura, and in the latter with Mount Vogesus (Vosge). The modern name of the range is the Cevennes, in the departments of l'Aveyron, la Lozère, and l'Ardèche. (Cæs., B. G., 7, 4 et 56.) Pliny calls this range Gebenna (3, 4); Ptolemy, Strabo, and the Greeks in general, style it Κέβενρον ὄρος. Avienus (Or. Marit., 614) calls the adjacent region Cimenice. (Compare Wernsdorff, ad loc.—Lemaire, Index Geogr. ad Cæs., s. v., p. 229.)

CEBES, I. a Greek philosopher, and disciple of Socrates, and also one of the interlocutors whom Plato introduces in his dialogue entitled Phædon. He was born at Thebes, and composed three dialogues, called Heddomé (Ἑδδόμη), Phrynichus (Φρύνιχος), and Panax, or the Picture (Πάναξ). The last is the only one which has come down to us. It is commonly cited by its Latin title Cebetis Tabula (i. e., picta), and is a moral sketch or picture of human life, written in a pleasing and simple style. Some critics have raised doubts as to the authenticity of this little work. It breathes, indeed, a very pure vein of morality, but is not composed, as they think, in the true spirit of the Socratic school; and they are disposed, therefore, to regard it as the work of some stoic, perhaps Cebes of Cyzicus (No. II.), who wished to show that happiness consisted in the practice of virtue. But it is expressly attributed to Cebes by Lucian (de Mercede Conduct., c. 42), and after him by Tertullian (de Præscript. adv. Hæret., c. 39), Diogenes Laërtius (2, 125), Chalcidius, and Suidas. Wolff was the first among the moderns who ventured to call in question this testimony of the ancients, and he has been followed on the same side by the Abbé Sevin (Mem. de l'Acad. des Inscr., &c., vol. 3, p. 75.—Compare the dissertation of Garnier, in the same collection, vol. 49, p. 455). No work of antiquity has met with a wider circulation. It has been translated into almost all the modern languages, even into the Arabic.—The best editions of Cebes are, that of Schweighæuser, Argent., 12mo, 1806, and that of Thieme, Berol., 8vo, 1810, with German notes of great merit. (Schöll, Hist. Lit. Gr., vol. 2, 346.)—II. A philosopher of Cyzicus, who lived in the time of Marcus Aurelius. (Compare Athenæus, 4, p. 156.—Ed. Schweigh., vol. 2, p. 109, and Garnier, Dissert. sur le Tableau de Cebes.—Mem. de l'Acad. des Inscr., &c., vol. 49, p. 455.)

CEBRENE, a city of Troas, capital of a small district named from it Cebrenia. This district was separated by the Scamander (the Simois of Homer) from the territory of Scepsis, as Strabo informs us, and the Cebrenians and the people of Scepsis were almost continually at war, until Antigonus removed the inhabitants of both places to Antigonía, afterward Alexandria Troas. (Strab., 597.) According to Ephorus, Cebrene had received a colony from the Æolian Cyme. (Ap. Harpocr., s. v. Κίθηνα.) Xenophon affirms that it was a place of great strength. (Hist. Gr., 3, 1, 14). The site is called at the present day Kutchulan-tepe. (Cramer's Asia Minor, vol. 1, p. 119.)

CEBRUS, a river of Mæsia, flowing into the Danube, and separating Upper from Lower Mæsia. It is now either the Ischia, a small Bulgarian stream, or the Zibritz. (Dio Cass., 51, 25.)

CECROPĪA, the original name of Athens, in honour of Cecrops, its first founder. (Vid. Cecrops.)

CECROPĪDÆ, a name given to the Athenians by the poets, as the fabled descendants of Cecrops. (Vid. Cecrops.)

CECROPS, according to the Attic legend, an autochthon or indigenous personage, and the earliest monarch of the country, after Ogyges. His form was half human, half that of a serpent. In his days, it is said, the gods began to choose favourite spots among the dwellings of men for their own residence, or, as the expression seems to mean, particular deities were worshipped with especial homage in particular cities. It was at this time, therefore, that Minerva and Neptune strove for the possession of Attica. The question was to be determined by the natural principle of priority of occupation. It was asserted by Neptune, that he had appropriated the territory to himself, by planting his trident on the rock of the Acropolis at Athens, before the land had been claimed by Minerva. He pointed to it there standing erect, and to the salt-spring which had then issued, and was flowing from the fissure of the cliff, that had opened for the reception of the trident. On the other hand, Minerva alleged that she had taken possession of the country at a still earlier period than had been done by the rival deity. She appealed, in support of her claim, to the olive, which had sprung at her command from the soil, and which was growing near the fountain produced by the hand of Neptune from the same place. Cecrops was required to attest the truth of her assertion. He had been witness of the act, and testified accordingly; whereupon the twelve gods, according to one version of the fable, but, according to another, Cecrops himself, decided in favour of Minerva, who then became the tutelary deity of Athens. (Apollod., 3, 14, 1.) Cecrops married Agraulos, daughter of Actæus, and became the father of three daughters, Pandrosos, Herse, and Agraulos. After a reign of many years, spent in introducing among his subjects the blessings of civilization, he died, leaving the kingdom to Cranaus, another autochthon. (Apollod., l. c.)—Thus much for the fable, which has become in our histories so much grave matter of fact. The truth appears to be, that the whole series of Attic kings who are said to have preceded Theseus, including, perhaps, even Theseus himself, are mere fictions, owing their existence to misunderstood names and false etymologies, to attempts to explain ancient customs and religious rites, and to a wish to exalt the antiquity of a nation or a family by giving it a founder in a remote age. At the head of the list of Attic kings is commonly placed Ogyges. The evidence of his historical existence is so slight that his name hardly appears deserving of remark. Whether we make it equivalent, as some do, to ἡχαιος, or trace it, with other etymologists, to a root γῆν, meaning night or darkness, in either case the name is merely figurative, and is intended to refer, not to an individual, but to a period of remote and obscure antiquity.—Next in order comes Cecrops, whom we ought to regard as being, in genuine Attic table, the first king of Attica; the true autochthon from whom, according to the popular faith, the Attic people had their origin. The story of his being half man, half serpent, is only an expression of his autochthonous nature. For in Herodotus (1, 78), the explanation given by the Telmessians of the serpents devoured by the horses at Sardis is, ὅτιν εἶναι γῆς παῖδα, "that the snake is a child of earth." The story of his leading a colony from Sais, in Egypt, to Athens, is a comparatively late invention, and entitled to no credit. (Philol. Museum, 5, p. 357.) The very name Cecrops (Κέκροψ) itself appears to be nothing else than a synonyme of αὐτόχθων. The τέττις, or cicada, was always regarded by the Athenians as a symbol of their autochthonia. As the eggs of this insect fall to the ground from the stalks on which they are deposited (Aristot., Hist. An., 5, 24), and are hatched in great numbers in showery weather, it was natural that the vulgar should consider the earth as producing them. Now one of the names of the cicada is κέκροψ (Elian, Hist. An., 10, 44), the original form of which would seem to have been κρέκοψ, referring, as well as τέττις, to the peculiar sound which the insect emits. Cecrops, therefore (Κέκροψ, Κρέκοψ), is in reality nothing more than the cicada itself, the emblem of autochthonia, converted into the first king of Athens. This is rendered still more probable by the names of his daughters. As the ancients supposed the cicada to be produced from the ground, so they thought that it was wholly nourished by the dew. Hence the names Πάνδροςος ("All-dew") and Ἐρση ("Dew"), given to two of the daughters of the fabled Cecrops. The third name, Ἀγλαύρος ("Field-piper"), is equally appropriate to the cicada, of whose music the ancients thought so highly, that it was doubted whether the Ionians did not wear the golden cicada in their hair in honour of Apollo. (Schol. ad Aristoph., Nub., 971.)—But what becomes of the legend respecting the part that Cecrops bore in the controversy between Neptune and Minerva? It is not difficult to perceive, that in this tradition a record is preserved of the rivalry that arose between two classes of the Attic population, the one devoted to maritime pursuits, and aiming at commercial eminence, the other contented with their own domestic resources, and preferring the tranquil occupations of agricultural and pastoral life, which were typified by the emblematic symbol of peace. The victory of Minerva, which it commemorates, is a true and significant expression of the condition of this country, and of the habits of its people, from the days of Cecrops to those of Themistocles. (Wordsworth's Greece, p. 93).—Cranæus comes next in the list of Attic kings. He was also an autochthon, contemporary with the flood of Deucalion. He married Pedias, and the issue of their wedlock was Atthis. What is this but the legend of a union between the inhabitants of the hills (Κραναῖη γῆ, the rocky country) with those of the plains of Attica (Ἠλεκίη, the plain country)? and thus Attica (Ἀττική) was formed by uniting the rugged district with that belonging to the plain. And yet a hundred histories have repeated the name of Cranæus as a king of Attica!—This state of prosperity, however, does not appear to have been of long duration; for Atthis is said to have died in early youth; and the flood of Deucalion to have inundated the country during the reign of Cranæus, who was himself driven from the throne by the king next in succession, named Amphictyon. This appellation, indicating, as it does, a collector of neighbouring people into one community, appears to indicate an attempt made in this, the next age, to organize afresh the social elements, which had been disturbed by the convulsions of the previous generation, and to combine them together into one federal body. This design seems to have been attended with success, and to have produced results favourable to the cultivation of the arts of civilized life. For the immediate successor of Amphictyon, and the representative of the state of the Athenian nation, as it existed in that period, was Erichthonius. Erichthonius was, in the language of mythology, the son of Vulcan and Minerva; or, as that tradition may be interpreted, it was in this age that the manual labours which enjoyed the especial patronage of those two deities began to attract the attention and assume the importance which afterward rendered them the source of affluence and of glory to the possessors of the Athenian soil. (Wordsworth's Greece, p. 92, seqq.—Philological Museum, 5, p. 345, seqq.)

CELÆNÆ or CELÆNĒ, a city of Phrygia, in the southwest, at the sources of the Marsyas. This was a small river which flows into the Mæander, and which, according to Xenophon, was named after Marsyas, whom Apollo caused to be flayed alive, and whose skin he hung in the cave where the river rises. Cyrus the Younger had a palace there, with a park filled with wild beasts, where he exercised himself in hunting. Within the enclosure of this palace rose the Mæander, and flowed through the park; the Marsyas rose in the market-place. At the sources of the latter, Xerxes, after his return from Greece, built a palace and citadel. The inhabitants of Celænæ were in after days carried off by Antiochus Soter to the city of Apamea, founded by him a few miles to the southeast, at the confluence of the Marsyas and Mæander. (Liv., 38; 13.—Xenoph., Anab., 1.)

CELÆNO, one of the harpies, daughter of Neptune and Terra. (Virg., Æn., 3, 245.)

CELENDERIS, a city on the coast of Cilicia Trachea, to the northeast of the Anemurian promontory. It was founded by the Phœnicians, and afterward received a Samian colony. Celenderis appears to have been a place of great strength, built on a high and craggy precipice, surrounded by the sea. (Tacit., Ann., 2, 80.) It is now Chelindreh. (Cramer's Asia Minor, vol. 2, p. 328.)

CELÈRES. Vid. Equites.

CELEUS, a king of Eleusis, father to Triptolemus by Metanira. He gave a kind reception to Ceres, who taught his son the art of cultivating the earth. (Hesiod., Op. et D., v. 423.—Apollod., 1, 5, 1.—Pausan., 1, 14.—Virg., Georg., 1, 165.)

CELSUS, I. AULUS CORNELIUS, a celebrated physician. His native city is unknown; some writers contending for Rome, others for Verona. (Compare Fabrizius, Bibl. Lat., 2, 4, p. 36, seqq.) Even his very name is partly involved in doubt, some making it Aurelius Cornelius Celsus, others Aulus. The time in which he lived has also been made a subject of controversy. One class of writers infer, from a passage in Columella (R. R., 1, 1, 14, compare 3, 17, 4, and 4, 8, 1), that he was born in the time of Tiberius, and lived until the reign of Trajan. (Schilling, Quæst. de Corn. Celsi Vita, Lips., 1824, p. 19 and 75.) Another class place his birth under the reign of Augustus. (Compare Le Clerc, Hist. de la Med., vol. 1, p. 517, seqq.—Schulze, Compend. Hist. Med., p. 298, seqq.) The most probable opinion is, that he lived under Augustus and Tiberius, but wrote his works under the latter. Celsus composed a large work, on the plan, in some measure, of an encyclopædia, in which he treated of philosophy, jurisprudence, agriculture, and medicine. It was entitled "De Artibus." Unhappily, however, only the eight books (from the 6th to the 14th) which treat of medicine have come down to us. The best editions are that of Ruhnken, Lugd. Bat., 1785, and that of Milligan, Lond., 1826.—Roman literature, otherwise so barren of good medical authorities, can boast of possessing in Celsus one, who, for elegance, terseness, learning, good sense, and practical information, stands unrivalled. Every branch of the profession has been treated of by him, and it may be well said of him, Nihil quod tetigit non ornavit. So complete a specimen of professional knowledge, selected by a sound judgment, and adorned with philosophy, is nowhere else to be met with. As a Roman historian said of Homer, that he who can believe him to have been born blind must himself be devoid of every sense, so may we venture to affirm respecting Celsus, that he who can suppose him to have been a mere compiler, and never to have practised the art of medicine, must be totally destitute of all professional experience. His preface contains an admirable exposition of the principles of the different sects which had risen up in medicine before his time; and in the remaining part of the 1st book there are many pertinent remarks on the best method of preserving the health. In the 2d, which treats of the general symptoms and phenomena of diseases in general, he has copied freely from Hippocrates, having, no doubt, discovered that "to copy nature was to copy him." The last part of this book is devoted to the subject of diet and regimen; and here his views will, with a few exceptions, even now be admitted by the unprejudiced to be wonderfully correct. Dr. Cullen, with all his prejudices against ancient authors, allows that, "in most instances, his judgment, if understood well, might be found perhaps to be very good."—In the 3d book he has treated of fevers; and here his distinctions, remarks upon critical days, and treatment, will be found to be particularly deserving of attention. Venesection and cold applications to the head are the general remedies which he most approves of, and happy would it have been for mankind if the masters of the profession had been content to follow this simple plan of treatment, instead of being carried away by such specious theories as the Cullenian and Brunonian, which all must now admit have introduced very mistaken and fatal views of practice. The other parts of his work it is unnecessary to go over minutely; but we would point out, as particularly valuable, his divisions and treatment of ulcers. It is remarkable that no one has treated of diseases of the "obscure partes" with the same precision that he has done. The different shades of cutaneous diseases, which are found so difficult to define, he has marked with a surprising degree of precision. But, of the whole work, the most interesting part, perhaps, is the 7th book, which treats of the operations of surgery. His account of those performed upon the eye may be instanced as particularly excellent. The operating for couching the cataract is described in much the same manner as it is now performed. The ancients were not acquainted with the mode of extracting. The operation of lithotomy, as described by him, though not exactly the same as that now generally practised, has, even at the present day, its admirers, among whom we may mention the celebrated Dupuytren, who has revived it at Paris, and considers it to possess the advantage over the common plan of affording a freer passage to the stone. Mr. Charles Bell, of London, has also operated much in the same way upon boys, to whom, by-the-by, Celsus restricts his practice. Celsus has the merit of being the first author who makes mention of the application of the ligature to arteries for stopping hemorrhage. The ligature is also mentioned by Heliodorus in a short tract on amputation preserved by Nicetas, by Galen in nearly twenty places, by Aëtius, Paulus Aegineta, Avicenna, Rhazes, Avenzoar, and Albucasis; so that it cannot with any propriety be called a modern invention.—In the last book he treats minutely of fractures and dislocations; and here, of course, he avails himself of the correct views previously laid down by Hippocrates. One may venture to affirm that, even at the present day, he who is thoroughly acquainted with the writings of Celsus, and has learned to reduce his knowledge to practice, will prove a useful and distinguished member of his profession.—II. A Platonic, or, according to others, Epicurean philosopher, who lived towards the close of the reign of Hadrian. His name is famous as that of one of the bitterest enemies of Christianity. From a motive of curiosity, or, perhaps, in order to be better able to combat the new religion, Celsus caused himself to be initiated into the mysteries of Christianity, and to be received into that secret society which St. Clement of Rome is supposed to have founded. (Compare Kestner, Agape, oder der geheime Weltbunde der Christen, &c., Jena, 1819, 8vo.) It appears, however, that the sincerity of the neophyte was distrusted, and that he was refused admittance into the higher ceremonies. The discontent to which this gave rise in the breast of Celsus, inflamed his resentment against the Christians, and he wrote a work against them, entitled Ἀληθὴς λόγος, "A true discourse," in which he employed all the resources of his intellect and eloquence to paint Christianity as a ridiculous and contemptible system, and its followers as a sect dangerous to the well-being of the state. There is no falsehood to which he has not recourse in order to represent in an untrue light the Christian scheme of morals, to parody and falsify the text of the Old and New Testaments, and to calumniate the character of Jesus Christ and his disciples. He styles Christianity a doctrine tending to pervert and corrupt the human race (λόγος λυμαινόμενος τὸν τῶν ἀνθρώπων βίον), and exhorts the government to extirpate the sect, if it wishes to save the empire. The discourse itself is lost; but Origen, who refuted it, in a work divided into eight books, has given us so complete an extract from it, that, by the aid of this, we can follow all the principal reasonings of the author. Celsus wrote also a work against magicians and sorcerers (Κατὰ Μάγων), which is cited by Origen and Lucian. The latter, who was his friend, addressed to him his memoir on Alexander, the false prophet, in which he extols the wisdom of Celsus, his love for truth, and his amiable manners. (Schöll, Hist. Lit. Gr., vol. 5, p. 103, seqq.)—III. Albinovanus, a friend of Horace, warned against plagiarism (Epist., 1, 3, 15) and pleasantly ridiculed (Epist., 1, 8) for his foibles.

CELTÆ, a general name for the whole Gallic race, but, in a special sense, an appellation given to the most indigenous and extensive of the three great tribes that occupied Gaul in the days of Cæsar. (Vid. Gallia.)

CELTIBERI, a people of Spain, brave and powerful, who occupied the greater part of the interior of the country. According to Diodorus Siculus (5, 33), they were composed of two nations, the Celtæ and Iberi, whence their name, which, perhaps, was used for distinction sake from that of the Celtæ beyond the Pyrenees in Gaul. Their cavalry were excellent, and fought equally well on foot and on horseback. Niebuhr considers the fact far from proved that the Celts of Iberia were strangers from Gaul who had migrated into that country. No definite tradition of this event is, according to him, to be found; not even in Diodorus. This assertion, however, is altogether untenable, and is based upon the strange hypothesis that different races of human beings were originally created, and that mankind did not spring from one common parent. (Compare Niebuhr, Rom. Hist., vol. 2, p. 256.) The Celtiberi were reduced beneath the Roman sway in the Sertorian war, after a long and brave resistance. They were divided into six tribes, the Bellones, Arevaci, Pelendones, Diithi, Belli, and Lusones. The country of the Celtiberi was sometimes called Celtiberia, and bordered, on the east, upon the Edetani and the range of Mount Ortospeda; on the north upon the Iberus; on the west upon the Tagus and the Carpetani; on the south upon the Oretani. It comprised, therefore, what is now the southwestern part of Aragon, the southern part of Navarre, the eastern portion of Old Castile, and the northeastern division of New Castile. (Plin., 3, 3.—Id., 4, 22.—Liv., Epit., 48.—Eutrop., 4, 16.—Isidor., Hisp. Chron. Goth., p. 173.)

CELTICI, a people of Lusitania, whose territory lay below the mouth of the Tagus, and between that river and the Turdetani. They were of Celtic origin, as their name imports, and their country answered to what is now the southern part of Alentejos. Their chief town was Pax Julia, now Beja. (Plin., 3, 1.—Id., 4, 21.)

CENÆUM, a promontory of Eubœa, which formed the extreme point of the island towards the northwest. The modern name is Lithada. (Strab., 444.—Plin., 4, 12.—Ptol., p. 87.)

CENCHRÆE, I. a harbour of Corinth, on the Saronic Gulf, from which this city traded with Asia, the Cyclades, and the Euxine. (Strabo, 380.) It was about seventy stadia from the city itself; and the road thither appears, from the account of Pausanias, to have been lined with temples and sepulchres. Dr. Clarke observes, that the remains at Cenchræ faithfully correspond with the description given by Pausanias of the spot. Sir W. Gell says the place is still called Kenchres. (Itin. of the Morea, p. 207.)—II. A village of Argolis, near the frontiers of Arcadia, southwest of Argos. A tumulus was here erected to some Argives who had fallen in a battle with the Spartans. (Strabo, 376.)

CENCHRÆIS, a small island off the Spiræum Promontorium of Argolis. (Plin., 4, 11.)

CENCHRIS, a river of Ionia near Ephesus and Mount Solmissus, where the Curetes, according to some, concealed and protected Latona after her delivery, when she was pursued by the power of Juno. (Strab., 639.—Tacit., Ann., 3, 61.)

CENIMAGNI, a people of Britain, north of the Trinobantes, on the eastern coast, forming part of the great nation of the Iceni. (Vid. Iceni.) Lipsius, however, rejects the term Cenimagni, where it occurs in the text of Cæsar (B. G., 5, 21), on the ground that this race are nowhere else mentioned among the British tribes, and he proposes to read in place of it, Iceni, Cangi. The author of the Greek paraphrase of Cæsar has Κενίμανοι, whence Vossius conjectured the true reading to be Cenomani, and supposed this nation to have crossed over from Gaul. (Lemaire, Ind. Geogr. ad Cæs., p. 231, seqq.)

CENINA. Vid. Cænina.

CENOMANI, a people of Gaul, belonging to the nation of the Auleri. (Vid. Auleri.)

CENSÖRES, two magistrates of great authority at Rome, first created A.U.C. 312. The office of the censors was chiefly to estimate the fortunes, and to inspect the morals of the citizens. For a full account of their duties, &c., consult Adams, Rom. Ant.

CENSORINUS, I. one of the ephemeral Roman emperors who appeared in so great numbers under the reign of Gallienus, and are known in later Roman history as "the thirty tyrants." (Treb. Pollio, in Hist. Aug. Script., vol. 2, p. 254, ed. Hack.) Censorinus had been distinguished in camps and in the senate; he had been twice consul, twice prætorian prefect, three times prefect of Rome, and four times proconsul. After having passed through this honourable career, he retired to the country, being now advanced in years, and lame from a wound he had received in the war against the Persians during the reign of Valerian. It was under these circumstances that he was proclaimed emperor, A.D. 269, in spite, as it would appear, of his own wishes; and by a species of pleasantry he was surnamed, or rather nicknamed, Claudius, in allusion to his lameness (claudus, "lame"). The strict discipline, however, which he wished to introduce, gave offence, and he was slain by the very soldiers who had raised him to the throne. (Treb. Poll., Vit. Cens.)—II. A grammarian and philosopher, who flourished under Maximus and Gordianus, about A.D. 238. He wrote a small work entitled "De die Natali," which was so called because composed on occasion of the birthday of his friend Cerellius. It treats of the time of birth, of the influence of one's Genius, as well as that of the stars, upon the birth-period of an individual; and embraces many other topics of a chronological, mathematical, and cosmographical character. Canio, therefore, who edited the work in 1583, separated the latter part of this production from the rest, and regards it as a fragment of an unknown author, "De naturali institutione." The style of Censorinus is good, though not free, of course, from the blemishes natural to his time. We have also a fragment, de Metris, by this same writer. He composed also a work on accents, and another on geometry, but these last two have not reached us. The best edition of Censorinus is that of Havercamp, Lugd. Bat., 1743, 8vo, reprinted in 1767. (Bähr, Gesch. Röm. Lit., vol. 1, p. 661.) The latest edition is that of Gruber, Nuremb., 1805, 8vo.

CENTAURI, a Thessalian race fabled to have been half-men half-horses.—The Centaurs and Lapithæ are two mythic tribes, which are always mentioned together. The former are spoken of twice in the Iliad, under the appellation of wild-creatures (ῥῆγες), and once under their proper name. (Il., 1, 268.—Id., 2, 742.—Id., 11, 832.) We also find the name Centaurs in the Odyssey (21, 303). They seem to have been a rude mountain-tribe, dwelling on and about Mount Pelion. It is very doubtful whether Homer and Hesiod conceived them to be of a mingled form, as they were subsequently represented. In the fight of the Centaurs and Lapithæ on the shield of Hercules, the latter appear in panoply fighting with spears, while the former wield pine-clobes. (Hes., Scut. Here., 178, seqq.) Pindar is the earliest poet extant who expressly describes them as semi-ferme. According to him (Pyth., 2, 78, seqq.), the offspring of Ixion and the cloud (vid. Ixion) was a son named Centaurus, who, when grown up, wandered about the foot of Mount Pelion, where he united with the Magnesian mares, who brought forth the Centaurs, a race partaking of the form of both parents, their lower parts resembling their dams, their upper their sire. The common account makes the Centaurs to have been the immediate offspring of Ixion and the cloud. By his wife Dia, Ixion had a son named Pirithoüs, who married Hippodamia, daughter of Adrastus, king of Argos. The chiefs of his own tribe, the Lapithæ, were all invited to the wedding, as were also the Centaurs, who dwelt in the neighbourhood of Pelion. Theseus, Nestor, and other strangers were likewise present. At the feast, Eurytion, one of the Centaurs, becoming intoxicated with the wine, attempted to offer violence to the bride; the other Centaurs followed his example, and a dreadful conflict arose, in which several of them were slain. The Centaurs were finally driven from Pelion, and obliged to retire to other regions. (Orind. Met., 12, 210, seqq.—Diod. Sic., 4, 70.)—According to the earliest version of this legend, Eurytion, the Centaur, being invited to the mansion of Pirithoüs, got intoxicated, and behaved so ill, that the heroes rose, and, dragging him to the door, cut off his ears and nose, which was the occasion of "strife between the Centaurs and men." (Od., 21, 295, seqq.) When Hercules was on his way to hunt the Erymanthian boar, he was entertained by the Centaur Pholus; and this gave rise to a conflict between him and the other Centaurs, which terminated in the total discomfiture of the latter.—The most celebrated of the Centaurs was Chiron, the son of Saturn by the nymph Philyra. (Vid. Chiron.)—It is the opinion of Büttmann (Mythologus, vol. 2, p. 22), that the Centaurs and Lapithæ are two purely poetic names, used to distinguish two opposite races of men; the former, the rude horse-riding tribes, which tradition records to have been spread over the north of Greece; the latter, the more civilized race, which founded towns, and gradually drove their wild neighbours back into the mountains. He therefore thinks the exposition of Centaurs as Air-piercers (from κερτεῖν τὴν αἰῶν) not an improbable one, for that very idea is suggested by the figure of a Cossack, leaning forward with his protruded lance as he gallops along. He regards, however, the idea of κένταυρος having been in its origin simply κέντωρ as much more probable. Lapithæ may, he thinks, have signified Stone-persuaders (from λάας πείθειν), a poetic appellation for the builders of towns. He supposes Hippodamia, as her name seems to intimate, to have been a Centauress, married to the prince of the Lapithæ, and thus accounts for the Centaurs having been at the wedding. (Mythologus, l. c.—Keightley's Mythology, p. 316, seqq.)—Knight takes a very different view of the legend. The horse, as he observes, was sacred to Neptune and the Rivers, and was employed as a general symbol of the waters. The Centaurs appear to him to have been the same symbol partly humanized. According to this explanation, the legend respecting the Centaurs and Lapithæ will have reference to the draining of some parts of Thessaly by that old Pelagic race. (Knight's Enquiry, &c., § 111, seqq.—Class. Journ., vol. 25, p. 34, seqq.)

CENTRIRIS, a river of Armenia Major, flowing under the ramparts of Tigranocerta, and falling into the Euphrates. The Greeks gave it the name of Nicephorius, "that brings victory," probably on account of some battle gained in its vicinity during the time of the Syrian kings. It separated Armenia from the country of the Carduchi, and is now the Billis-Soo. (Xen. Anab., 4, 3.—Mannert, Geogr., vol. 5, p. 236.)

CENTRŌNES, a people of Gaul, among the Alpes Graiæ, who, along with the Graioceli and Caturiges, were defeated by Cæsar in several engagements. Their chief city was Forum Claudii Centronum, now Centron. (Lemaire, Index Geogr. ad Cæs., p. 231.)

CENTUM CELLÆ, a seaport town of Etruria, north-east of Cære. It is better known under the name of Trajani Portus, that emperor having caused a magnificent harbour to be constructed there, which Pliny the younger has described in one of his epistles (6, 31). Two immense piers formed the port, which was semicircular, while an island, constructed artificially of immense masses of rock, brought there by vessels and sunk in the sea, served as a breakwater in front and supported a pharos. The coast being very destitute of shelter for vessels of burden, this work of Trajan was of great national benefit. Previous to Trajan's improvements the place was very thinly inhabited, and received its name from the mean and scanty abodes scattered here and there along the shore. Centum Cellæ having been destroyed by the Saracens, the inhabitants built another town at some distance inland, but afterward they reoccupied the site of the old city, which, from that circumstance, obtained its present name of Civita Vecchia. (Cramer's Anc. Italy, vol. 1, p. 201, seqq.—Mannert, Geogr., vol. 9, p. 373.)

CENTUMVIRI, the members of a court of justice at Rome. There were originally chosen three from each of the 35 tribes of the people, and, though 105, they were always called Centumvirs. They were afterward increased to the number of 180, but still kept their original name. They seem to have been first instituted soon after the creation of the prætor peregrinus. The causes that came before them in the time of the republic are enumerated by Cicero. They judged then chiefly concerning testaments and inheritances. (Cic., Or., 1, 38.—Val. Maz., 7, 7.—Quintil., 4, 1, 7.) After the time of Augustus, however, they formed the council of the prætor, and judged in the most important causes. When the number of the Centumviri reached 180, they were divided into four councils, sometimes only into two, and sometimes, in important causes, they judged all together. A cause before them could not be adjourned. (Plin., Ep., 1, 18—Id., 4, 24.) Ten men were appointed, five senators and five equites, to assemble these councils, and preside in them in the absence of the prætor. (Sueton., Aug., 36.) Trials before the centumviri were held usually in the Basilica Julia, sometimes in the forum. (Consult Heinzeus, Antiq. Rom., ed. Haubold, 4, 6, 9, p. 664.)

CENTURIPA (τὰ Κεντόριπα.—Ptol., Κεντούριπα.—Sil. Ital., CENTURIFE), an ancient city of the Siculi, on the eastern shore of Sicily, near Catana. After the Roman conquest of the island it became an important place in the corn-trade to Italy. The modern Centorbi appears to mark the ancient site. (Mannert, Geogr., vol. 9, pt. 2, p. 416.)

CEOS (also called CEA, Plin., 4, 12.—Ovid, Met., 7, 368, &c.), an island of the Ægean, one of the Cyclades, opposite the promontory of Sunium in Attica. It was famed for its fertility and rich pastures. Pliny (4, 12) writes, that it had been torn from Eubœa, and was once 500 stadia in length, but nearly four parts were carried away by the sea on the side of Bœotia. Herodotus states, that it was an Ionian colony peopled from Africa, and furnished a few ships both at Artemisium and Salamis (8, 1). From this island, as Varro reports, a greater degree of elegance was introduced in female dress. (Plin., l. c.) It once possessed four towns, named Iulis, Carthæa, Coressia, and Pœessa, but in Strabo's time only the two former remained, the population of the others having been transferred to them. Iulis was the birthplace of Simonides, and is probably represented by the modern Zea, which gives its name to the island. It is said that the laws of this town decreed, that every man, on reaching his sixtieth year, should destroy himself by poison, in order to leave to others a sufficient maintenance. This ordinance is said to have been promulgated when the town was besieged by the Athenians. (Strabo, 486.—Elian, V. H., 3, 37.—Cramer's Anc. Greece, vol. 3, p. 401, seqq.)

CEPHALLENIA, an island in the Ionian sea, south-west of Ithaca, from which it is separated by a strait of six miles. It is now Cefalonia, and forms one of the seven Ionian islands. Strabo (456) asserts, that it was about three hundred stadia in circuit, or thirty-eight miles; Pliny (4, 12), forty-four miles; but both are very far short of the real measurement, which is little less than one hundred and twenty miles. The more ancient name of this large island was Samos, as we learn from Homer. (Od., 4, 671.) But the poet elsewhere speaks of the Cephalenians as the subjects of Ulysses. (Il., 2, 631.) All the writers of antiquity agree in deriving the name of Cephalenia from Cephalus, who settled here after his expedition against the Telebœ, in which he accompanied Amphitryon. (Strabo, l. c.) The Cephalenians did not share in the glory of the victory of Salamis, but one of their cities sent a few soldiers to Plataea. (Herodot., 9, 28.) Prior to the Peloponnesian war, the whole island was conquered by an Athenian fleet commanded by Tolmides. But its subjugation does not appear to have been permanent, since Thucydides mentions, that, towards the commencement of the war, it was brought under the dominion of Athens, without a struggle, by a fleet of one hundred triremes (2, 30). There were four cities in the island, Palle or Pale, Cranii, Same, and Proni. Besides these well-known cities, Stephanus Byzantinus assigns to Cephalenia a town called Taphos, of which some remains are said to exist near the modern village of Taphios, on the western coast of the island. (Dodwell's Tour, vol. 1, p. 75.) Strabo reports, that, towards the close of the Roman republic C. Antonius, the colleague of Cicero in his consulship, resided in Cephalenia during his exile, and acquired such an influence over the inhabitants that he appeared to have the direction of the whole island. He had projected the foundation of a new city, but the work was never executed. (Cramer's Ancient Greece, vol. 2, p. 49, seq.)

CEPHALION, a Greek writer, whose native country is unknown. Suidas, it is true, makes him to have been born at Gergitha in Troas, but the lexicographer evidently confounds him with another writer named Cephalon. (Voss., Hist. Gr., 2, 12.) Cephalion is said to have lived during the reign of Hadrian, and to have been exiled to Sicily for some offence given to the emperor. He wrote an Abridgment of Universal History (Σύντομος Ἱστορικὸς) from Ninus to the death of Alexander. It was in the Ionic dialect, like the work of Herodotus, and, like this also, was divided into nine books, each named after one of the Muses. He composed also rhetorical declamations. His works are lost. (Photius, Cod., 68—vol. 1, p. 34, ed. Bekker.—Kuster ad Suid., s. v.)

CEPHALON, a native of Gergitha in Troas, not to be confounded with the preceding. Cephalon wrote an historical work, entitled Trojan Events (Τρωικά). He appears to have been anterior to Alexander the Great, and is considered by Dionysius of Halicarnassus worthy of reliance as an historical writer. His work is lost. (Dion. Hal., Ant. Rom., 1, 49, et 72.)

CEPHALUS, I. the son of Deion, and a grandson of Æolus, was married to Procris, the eldest daughter of Erechtheus. They dwelt at Thoricos in Attica, and lived happily together, till curiosity to try the fidelity of his wife entered the mind of Cephalus. Feigning a journey of eight years, he disguised himself and came to Procris with a splendid jewel, which he offered to her on dishonourable terms. After much hesitation she yielded, when her husband discovered himself and reproached her with her conduct. She fled from him in shame, but they were soon after reconciled. Cephalus went constantly to the chase; and Procris growing suspicious, as she had failed herself, fancied that he was attracted by the charms of some other fair one. She questioned the slave who used to accompany him; and he told her, that his master used frequently to ascend the summit of a hill, and cry out, "Come, Nephela, come!" Procris went to the designated hill, and concealed herself in a thicket; and on her husband's crying, "Come, Nephela, come!" (which was nothing more than an invocation for some cloud to interpose itself between him and the scorching beams of the sun), she rushed forward towards her husband, who, in his astonishment, threw his dart and unwittingly killed her. (Pherecydes, ap. Schol. ad Od., 11, 321.) This legend is told with great variations, which it is not worth while here to enumerate. (Consult Hygin., fab., 189.—Ovid, Met., 7, 661, seqq.—Pausan., 9, 19, 1.—Apollod., 3, 15, 1.—Anton. Lib., c. 41.) Cephalus, for his involuntary crime, was banished. He went to Thebes, which was at that time ravaged by a fox, which nothing could overtake, and he joined Amphitryon in the chase of it. His dog Lælops ran it down; but, just as he was catching it, Jupiter turned them both to stone. (Apollod., 2, 4, 7.) Cephalus then aided Amphitryon against the Teleboans, and on their conquest he settled in the island named from him Cephalenia. This last-mentioned circumstance, however, is a mere coincidence of name. (Keightley's Mythology, p. 381, seqq.)—II. An Athenian orator, who flourished towards the end of the Peloponnesian war, and was one of those that contributed most to overthrow the rule of the thirty tyrants. Although he lived during a very stormy period, and although no one ever proposed or caused to be passed more laws than he did, yet he never had any accusation brought against him, a remarkable fact in the history of Athens. We must not confound him with Cephalus, the father of Lysias, who came from Syracuse and settled at Athens. Sui-das makes Cephalus to have been the first orator that made use of an exordium and peroration. (Suid., s. v. Κέφαλος.)—III. The father of Lysias the orator. He was a native of Syracuse, but settled at Athens as a resident sojourner, or one of the μέτοικοι. (Lys. contra Erastoth., 2.—Reiske, ad loc.)

CEPHEÏS, a name given to Andromeda as daughter of Cepheus. (Ovid, A. A., 1, 193.)

CEPHËNES, I. an ancient name of the Persians. (Vid. Persia.—Herodot., 7, 61.)—II. A name of the Æthiopians, from Cepheus, one of their kings. (Ovid, Met., 4, 764.—Gierig, ad loc.)

CEPHEUS, a king of Æthiopia, father of Andromeda, by Cassiope. He was one of the Argonauts, and was changed into a constellation after his death. (Ovid, Met., 4, 669.—Id., 5, 12.—Pausan., 4, 35.)

CEPHISIA, a borough of Attica, at the foot of Mount Brilessus, and near the source of the Cephissus. It was the favourite residence of Herodes Atticus, who had a beautiful villa here. The modern name is said to be Kissia. Cramer, however, gives Cephissia. (Aul. Gell., 18, 10.—Cramer's Ancient Greece, vol. 2, p. 400.)

CEPHISODOTUS, I. a statuary of Athens, flourished about B.C. 372. Two works of his are spoken of by the ancients, a Mercury nourishing Bacchus when an infant, and one of a public speaker in the act of delivering an oration. (Plin., 34, 8, 19.—Sillig, Diet. Art., s. v.)—II. Another statuary, who flourished about Olym. 120. (Plin., 34, 8, 19.—Sillig, Diet. Art., s. v.)

CEPHISUS and CEPHISSUS, I. a celebrated river of Greece, that rises at the foot of Parnassus, close to Lilæa, and, after traversing the plains of Phocis and part of the Boeotian territory, empties into the Copaic Lake in the latter country. Hesiod compared it to a serpent, from the many sinuosities of its course (Ap. Strab., 424.) The modern name is Mauro Potamo. According to the poets, the son of the river-god Cephissus introduced the worship of the Graces into Boeotia (vid. Orchomenus), and hence the peculiar attachment which they were said to have for the waters of this stream. (Vid. Gratæ.)—II. A river of Attica, generally distinguished by the name of Atticus, to prevent its being confounded with the Cephissus which flowed near Eleusis. Strabo (400) affirms, that it took its source near the demus of Trineis, and, after flowing through the Attic plains and passing under the long walls, discharged itself into the sea near Phalerum: he adds, that in summer it was nearly dry. In the Cædipus Coloneus it is described, however, as a perennial stream (v. 685, seqq.—Cramer's Ancient Greece, vol. 2, p. 357.)—III. A river running near Eleusis. According to Sir W. Gell (Itinerary, p. 34), it is divided at present into many small branches, and often inundates the plain in its vicinity. The modern name is said to be the Podhonista.—IV. A river of Argolis, flowing into the Inachus.—V. A river in the island of Salamis. (Strabo, 424.)

CERAMICUS, I. now Keramo, a bay of Caria, north of the peninsula of Doris, receiving its name from the city of Ceramus in its vicinity. (Plin., 5, 29.)—II. One of the most considerable and important parts of the city of Athens. Its name was derived from the hero Ceramus (Pausan., 1, 3), or perhaps from some potteries which were formerly situated there. (Herodotus, 5, 88.—Suidas, s. v. Κεραμικ.) It included probably the Agora, the Stoa Basileios, and the Poecile, as well as various other temples and public buildings. Antiquaries are not decided as to the general extent and direction of this part of the ancient city, since scarcely any trace remains of its monuments and edifices; but we may certainly conclude, from their researches and observations, that it lay entirely on the south side of the acropolis. (Leake's Topography of Athens, p. 101.) In this direction it must have been limited by the city walls, which, as we know, came close to the fountain Callirhoë or Enneacrounos. (Thucyd., 2, 15.) The breadth of the Ceramicus, according to Mr. Hawkins, being thus confined on one side by the walls of the city, and on the other by the buildings immediately under the acropolis, could not have exceeded one half of its length. It was divided into the outer and inner Ceramicus. The former was without the walls, and contained the tombs of those who had fallen in battle, and were buried at the public expense. (Schol., Aristoph. Equit., 772.—Plut., Vit. Syll.—Hesych., s. v. Κεραμικός.) From Plutarch it appears, that the communication from the one Ceramicus to the other was by the gate Dipylum. (Hawkins's Topogr. of Athens, in Walp. Coll., p. 485.—Cramer's Anc. Greece, vol. 2, p. 315, seqq.)

CERĀMUS, a small town and fortress of Caria, on the northern side of the Sinus Ceramicus, and a short distance to the east of Halicarnassus. The village of Keramo, at the present day, indicates the ancient site. (Strab., 611.—Ptol., p. 119.)

CERĀSUS (untis), a city of Pontus, on the seacoast, southwest of Trapezus. It was founded by a colony from Sinope in Paphlagonia, to which it paid a yearly tribute. It must not be confounded with Pharnacia. (Vid. Pharnacia.) Xenophon and the Greeks rested here for ten days on their retreat from Asia. (Anab., 5, 3, 5.) From this place, according to Pliny, Lucullus first brought cherries into Italy, A.U.C. 680, which were introduced 120 years into Britain. Hence the Latin cerasus, "a cherry-tree," and cerasum, "a cherry." According to Tournefort, the country is hilly and the hills covered with forests, in which cherry-trees grow naturally. It is now Kerasoun. (Anm. Marcell., 22, 13.—Plin., 15, 25.—Mela, 1, 19.)

CERAUNI (or ACROCERAUNI) MONTES, a chain of mountains stretching along the coast of northern Epirus, and forming part of the boundary between it and Illyricum. That portion of the chain which extended beyond Oricum, formed a bold promontory, and was termed Acrocerania (Ἀκροκεραῖνα), from its summits (ἄκρα) being often struck by lightning (κεραυνός). The modern name for the Ceraunian range is Monte Chimarra, and that of the Acroceranian promontory is Cape Linguetta. The Greek and Latin poets are full of allusions to this dangerous shore. (Apollon., Arg., 4, 1216.—Lycophr., 1016.—Virg., Æn., 3, 506.—Hor., Od., 1, 3, 19.) It was much dreaded by the mariners of antiquity, from the belief that the mountains attracted storms. Augustus narrowly escaped shipwreck here when returning from Actium. (Cramer's Anc. Greece, vol. 1, p. 94.)

CERBERUS, the famous dog of Hades, the fruit of Echidna's union with Typhon. He was stationed at the entrance of hell, as a watchful keeper, to prevent the living from entering the infernal regions, and the dead from escaping from their confinement. Orpheus lulled him to sleep with his lyre; and Hercules dragged him from hell in the performance of his twelfth and last labour. (Vid. Hercules.) The poets differ in their descriptions of this fabled animal. Hesiod (Theog., 312) assigns him fifty heads, calling him κίνα πεντηκοντακίρηνον. Sophocles (Trach., 1114) styles him ἄιδον τρίκρανον σκύλακα ("the three-headed dog of Pluto"), and in this last account the Latin poets generally coincide. Horace, however, calls him bellua centiceps (Od., 2, 13, 14), either by poetic amplification, or else in accordance with some Greek authority. (Compare the remarks of Tzetzes in his scholium on Lycophron, v. 678: ὁ Κύων τοῦ Ἰδίου, ὃς ἔχει ἑκατὸν κεφαλὰς.) Champollion traces a curious analogy between the Egyptian and Grecian mythology as regards the dog of Hades. "Le voisinage du séjour du suprême juge de l'Amenti est annoncé par un piédestal, sur lequel se repose un animal monstrueux, mais dont les formes sont si déterminées qu'on ne peut y méconnaître un hippopotame, amphibie redoutable, dont les cavernes du Nil renfermaient un grand nombre. Ici c'est l'hippopotame femelle, qui, dans les tableaux astronomiques de Thèbes et d'Esneh, occupe dans le ciel même la place que les Grecs ont donnée à la grande ourse. Cette constellation était nommée le Chien de Typhon par les Egyptiens, et sa présence dans l'Amenti (l'enfer) ne laisse pas douter que cet animal ne soit le type du chien Cerbère, qui, selon les mythes Grecs gardait l'entrée du palais d'Adès." (Champollion le jeune, "Explication de la principale scène peinte dans des Papyrus funéraires Egyptiens."—Bulletin des Sciences Historiques, &c., vol. 4, p. 351.)

CERCASÖRUM, a city of Egypt, in the Memphitic nome, on the western bank of the Nile. It lay to the north of Memphis, and a short distance south of the spot where the Nile branched off into the Pelusiac and Canopic mouths. (Herod., 2, 15.—Id., 17, 97.) The ancient Cercasorum is thought to answer to the modern Eksas, or Al Ahsas. (Compare D'Anville, Mem. sur l'Égypte, p. 73.—Edrisii Africa, p. 426.)

CERCINA (CERCINNA, Mela, 2, 7.—Strab., 574), a small island off the coast of Byzacium, in Africa, at the mouth of the Syrtis Minor, towards the northwest. It is now Kerkine. (Liv., 33, 48.—Tacit., Ann., 1, 53.—Plin., 5, 7.)

CERCINIUM, a town of Macedonia, west of Amphipolis. It was situated at the mouth of the river Pontus, on a lake called Cercinitis palus. (Liv., 31, 41.)

CERCOPES, a predatory race infesting Lydia during the reign of Omphale. They were overcome by Hercules. (Diod. Sic., 4, 31.) The legend connected with their name will be given, with some remarks upon it, under the article Melampyges.

CERCYON and CERCYONES, a king of Eleusis, son of Neptune, or, according to others, of Vulcan. He obliged all strangers to wrestle with him; and, as he was a dexterous wrestler, they were easily conquered and put to death. After many cruel victories of this kind, he challenged Theseus in wrestling, and was conquered and put to death by his antagonist. (Plut., Vit. These.—Diod. Sic., 4, 59.—Hygin., 38.)

CERCYRA (Κέρκυρα), the Greek form of the name Corcyra Latinized. (Vid. Corcyra.)

CEREALIA, festivals in honour of Ceres; first instituted at Rome by Memmius the ædile, and celebrated on the 9th of April. Persons in mourning were not permitted to appear at the celebration; and therefore they were not observed in the year after the battle of Cannæ. They were analogous to the Grecian Thesmophoria. (Vid. Thesmophoria.)

CERES (in Greek DEMETER, Δημήτηρ), daughter of Saturn and Rhea, was the goddess of grain and harvests. She is in fact, however, the same as the goddess of the earth, Mother-Earth (γῆ μήτηρ), whence some ancient system married her to Jupiter, the god of the heavens, and hence in Hesiod (Theog., 454, 912) she is said to have become by this deity the mother of Proserpina (Persephone). In Homer she is but slightly mentioned (Il., 5, 509.—Od., 5, 125), and she does not appear among the gods on Olympus. She seems to have been early distinguished from the goddess called Earth, and to have been thenceforth regarded as the protectress of the growing corn and of agriculture in general. The most celebrated event in the history of Ceres is the carrying off of her daughter Proserpina by Hades or Pluto, and the search of the goddess after her throughout the whole world. It is noticed by Hesiod (Theog., 914); but the Homeric hymn in her honour contains perhaps the earliest narrative of this event, which, though apparently unknown to Homer himself, became a favourite theme with succeeding poets, after whom Ovid has related it (Met., 5, 341.—Id., Past., 4, 417, seq.). Claudian also has sung it in a poem, of which, unfortunately, a portion is lost.—Proserpina, according to the author of the Homeric hymn, was in the Nysian plain with the ocean-nymphs gathering flowers. According to some accounts, Venus, Minerva, and Diana were the companions of their sister on this occasion. (Hygin., fab., 146.—Claudian., Rapt. Pros., 2, 11, seq.—Stat., Achill., 2, 150.) Others gave her the sirens as her attendants. (Apoll. Rh., 4, 896.) She plucked the rose, the violet, the crocus, the hyacinth, when she beheld a narcissus of surprising size and beauty, having a hundred flowers growing from a single root. Unconscious of danger, the maiden stretched forth her hand to seize the wondrous flower, when suddenly the wide earth gaped, Pluto arose in his golden chariot, and, seizing the terrified goddess, carried her off shrieking for aid, but unheard and unseen by gods or mortals save by Hecate, the daughter of Perses, who heard her as she sat in her cave, and by King Helius (the sun), whose eye nothing on earth escapes. So long as the goddess beheld the earth and starry heavens, the fishy sea, and the beams of the sun, so long she hoped to see her mother and the tribes of the gods; and the tops of the mountains and the depths of the sea resounded with her divine voice. At length her mother heard, and, frantic with grief, inquired for tidings of her lost daughter; but neither gods, nor men, nor birds, could give her intelligence. Nine days she wandered over the earth, with flaming torches in her hands; on the tenth Hecate met her, but could not tell who it was that had carried off Proserpina. Together they proceeded to Helius, and the Sun-god tells Ceres that the ravisher is Pluto, who, by the permission of her sire, had carried her away to be his queen. Incensed at the conduct of Jupiter, Ceres thereupon abandoned the society of the gods and came down among men. But now she was heedless of her person, and no one recognised her. Under the guise of an aged female, she came to Eleusis, and was employed, as a nurse for her infant son Demophoon, by Metanira the wife of Celeus, monarch of the place. Beneath the care of the goddess the child "throve like a god." He ate no food, but Ceres breathed on him as he lay in her bosom, and anointed him with ambrosia, and every night hid him beneath the fire, unknown to his parents, who marvelled at his growth. It was the design of Ceres to make him immortal, but the curiosity and folly of Metanira deprived him of the intended gift. She watched one night, and, seeing what the nurse was doing to her child, shrieked with affright and horror. The goddess threw the infant on the ground, declaring what he had lost by the inconsiderateness of his mother, but announcing that he would still become a great and honoured man. She then disclosed her real character, and directed the people of Eleusis to raise an altar and temple to her without the city, on the hill Callichorus. The temple was speedily raised, and the mourning goddess took up her abode in it, but a dismal year came upon mankind; the earth yielded no produce; in vain the oxen drew the plough in the field; in vain the seed was cast into the ground, for Ceres would allow of no increase. Jove at length sent Iris to Eleusis to invite Ceres back to Olympus, but she would not comply with the call. All the other gods were sent on the same errand, but with as little success. Finding that there was no other remedy, and that the goddess would not allow the earth to bring forth until she had seen her daughter, Jupiter sent Mercury to Erebus to endeavour to prevail on Pluto to suffer Proserpina to return to the light. The monarch of the lower world yielded compliance, and, kindly addressing Proserpina, granted her permission to return to her mother. The goddess instantly sprang up with joy, and heedlessly swallowed a grain of pomegranate which he presented to her. Mercury conducted his fair charge safe to Eleusis, and delivered her into the hands of Ceres. When their joy had a little subsided, Ceres anxiously inquired of her daughter if she had tasted anything while below; for if she had not she would be free to spend her whole time with her father and mother; whereas, if but one morsel had passed her lips, nothing could save her from passing one third of the year with her husband; she should, however, pass the other two with her and the gods. Proserpina ingeniously confessed the swallowing of the grain of pomegranate, and then relates unto her mother the whole story of her abduction. They pass the day in delightful converse. Hecate arrives to congratulate Proserpina, and henceforward becomes her attendant. Jove sends Rhea to invite them back to heaven. Ceres now complies, and fertility once more prevailed over the earth. Ceres thereupon taught "Triptolemus, horse-lashing Diocles, the mighty Eumolpus, and Celeus, leader of the people," the mode of performing her sacred rites; and the goddess, after this, returned to Olympus.—Such is, in all probability, the oldest account of this celebrated event. In progress of time it underwent various alterations; the scene was, as usual, changed, and circumstances also were added or modified. In the beautiful versions of it given by the Latin poets, the scene is transferred to the grove and lake in the neighbourhood of Enna in Sicily, the nymph Arethusa gives intelligence of the ravisher, the torches of Ceres are lighted from Ætna, and Ascalaphus tells of Proserpina's having plucked a pomegranate in the garden of Pluto, and having put seven of the seeds in her mouth. In this as in other legends, the fancy of poets, and vanity of the inhabitants of different places, have taken abundance of liberties with the ancient tale.—The meaning of the whole fable is evident enough. Proserpina signifies the seed-corn, which, when cast into the ground, lies there concealed; that is, she is carried off by the god of the lower world; it re-appears; that is, Proserpina is restored to her mother, and she abides with her two thirds of the year. As, however, the seed-corn is not a third part of the year in the ground, it is probable that by the space of time which Proserpina was to spend with the god in the invisible state, was intended to be expressed the period between the sowing of the seed and the appearance of the ear, during which the corn is away; and which space of time in some species of grain, barley for instance, is about four months. The vanity of the people of the hungry soil of Attica made them pretend, that corn was first known, and agriculture first practised, in their country. They fabled, that the goddess gave to Triptolemus (Thrice-plougher), who occupies the place of Demophoon in the foregoing legend, her chariot drawn by dragons, in which he flew through the air, distributing corn to the different regions of the earth. (Callim., II. in Cer., 22.—Pausan., 1, 14, 2.—Ovid., Met., 5, 654.—Hygin., fab., 147.)—Ceres, though of a gentle disposition in general, partook of the usual revengeful character of the gods, as may be seen by the legends of Stello and Erysichthon. (Id. Stello and Erysichthon.)—The chief seats of the worship of Ceres and Proserpina were Attica, Arcadia (vid. Oncaum), and the fertile isle of Sicily, which was given by Jupiter to his daughter on her day of unveiling, that is, on her marriage; as was also Thebes, according to the poet Euphorion. (Schol. ad Eurip., Phæn., 693.—Müller., Orchom., p. 217.) The form of Ceres is copied from that of Juno. She has the same majestic stature and matronly air, but of a milder character. Her usual symbol are poppies, which sometimes compose a garland for her head, sometimes are held in her hand. She is frequently represented holding a torch, significant of her search after Proserpina. At times she appears in her chariot drawn by dragons. (Keightley's Mythology, p. 170, seqq.)—The Latin name CERES is in reality of the same force with the Greek appellation DEMETER (Δημήτηρ, i. e., γῆ μήτηρ), the Roman C being originally the same letter, both in figure and power, as the Greek Γ, which was often employed as a mere guttural aspirate, especially in the old Æolic dialect, from which the Latin is principally derived. (Compare Knight on the Greek Alphabet, p. 4, seqq.) The hissing termination, too, in the S, belonged to the same: wherefore the word, which the Attics and Ionians wrote EPA, EPE, or HPH, would naturally be written TEPEΣ by the old Æolics; the Greeks always accommodating their orthography to their pronunciation; and not, like the English and French, encumbering their words with a number of useless letters. Ceres, however, was not a personification of the brute matter which composed the earth, but of the passive productive principle supposed to pervade it (Ovid, Fast., 1, 673.—Virg., Georg., 2, 324); which, joined to the active, was held to be the cause of the organization and animation of its substance; from whence arose her other Greek name ΔΗΣ, “the inventress.” She is mentioned by Virgil (loc. cit.) as the wife of the omnipotent Father, Æther or Jupiter, and therefore the same as Juno; who is usually honoured with that title, and whose Greek name ΗΠΗ signifies, as before observed, precisely the same. (Plutarch, ap. Euseb., Præp. Evang., 3, 1.) The Latin name Juno is derived from the Greek ΔΙΩΝΗ, the female Ζεύς or Δίς; the Etruscan, through which the Latin received much of its orthography, having no D or O in its alphabet. The ancient Germans worshipped the same goddess under the name of Hertha, the form and meaning of which still remain in our word Earth. The Greek title seems originally to have had a more general signification; for without the aspirate (which was anciently added and omitted almost arbitrarily) it becomes EPE; and by an abbreviation very common in the Greek tongue, PE, or PEE; which, pronounced with the broad termination of some dialects, become PEA; and with the hissing one of others, PES or RES; a word retained in the Latin, signifying properly matter, and figuratively every quality and modification that can belong to it. The Greek has no word of such comprehensive meaning; the old general term being in the refinement of their language rendered more specific, and appropriated to that principal mass of matter which forms the terraqueous globe, and which the Latins also expressed by the same word united to the Greek article τῇ ἔπα—TERRA. (Knight, Inquiry, &c., § 35, seqq.—Class. Journ., vol. 23, p. 228, and vol. 25, p. 39.—Sainte-Croix, Mystères du Paganisme, vol. 1, p. 159.)

CERINTHUS, a town of Eubœa, in the vicinity of Histia, and near a small river called Budorus. The name of Geronda, attached to a hamlet on the western coast, seems to recall that of Cerinthus. (Scymn., Ch., 574.—Plut., Quæst. Gr.—Op., ed. Reiske, vol. 7, p. 187.)

CERNE, an island without the pillars of Hercules, on the African coast, mentioned by Hanno in his Periplus, as it is usually though incorrectly termed. Here he established a colony, and it was always the depôt of the Carthaginians on the Atlantic coast of Africa. Hanno says that it was the same distance from the Columns of Hercules that Carthage was. According to Rennell, the island of Cerne is the modern Arguin. Gosselin, however, makes this island to be the modern Pédala. (Vid. the account of Hanno's voyage under the article Africa.)

CERETANI, a people of Hispania Tarraconensis, at the foot of the Pyrenees, and to the east of the Vascones. Pliny divides them into the Ceretani Augustani (so named from Augustus having enlarged their territory), and the Ceretani Juliani, who possessed the Jus Latii. Their country answers to the district of Cerdagne in Catalonia. (Plin., 3, 3.—Petr. de Marca, 1, 12.)

CESTRINE, a district of Epirus, separated from Thesprotia by the river Thyamis. It was said to have taken its name from Cestrimus, the son of Helenus, having previously borne the appellation of Cammania. It is now called Philates. (Pausan., 1, 11.—Steph. Byz., s. v. Καμπανία.—Thucyd., 1, 46.)

CETHÆGUS, I. a Roman consul, A.U.C. 421. He was obliged to lay down his office on account of some informality in his election.—II. M. Cornelius, a distinguished Roman orator. Being sent as prætor to Sicily, he quelled a sedition of the soldiers in that island. He was called to the censorship before he had been consul, a thing not in accordance with Roman usage, and obtained this latter office six years subsequently, B.C. 204. He carried on the war against the Carthaginians in Etruria, and defeated Mago, who was coming with succours for Hannibal. (Liv., 27, 11.—Id., 30, 18.)—III. C. Cornelius, præconsul in Spain, A.U.C. 552, defeated a numerous army of the Seditani. Being elected consul, A.U.C. 557, he gained a great victory over the Insubres, and on his return to Rome obtained the honours of a triumph. The people having afterward chosen him censor, he assigned distinct places to the senators at the public games. (Liv., 31, 49.—Id., 32, 30.—Id., 35, 9.)—IV. C. Cornelius, a Roman rendered powerful by his influence with Marius. He himself was wholly governed by a female named Præcia, who obtained for Lucullus the government of Cilicia. (Plut., Vit. Lucull.)—V. C. Cornelius, a Roman of the most corrupt and abandoned character, and one of the accomplices of Catiline. He was strangled in prison by order of the senate. (Sall., Bell. Cat.)

CETO, a daughter of Pontus and Terra, who married Phorcys, by whom she had the three Gorgons, the Grææ, Echidna, and the serpent that watched the golden apples. (Hesiod., Theog., 270.)

CÆUS, an incorrect form for Cœus or Coios. (Vid. Cœus.)

CEYX, a king of Trachinia, and husband of Alecyone. He was drowned as he went to consult the oracle of Claros; and his wife, having been apprized of his fate in a dream, found his corpse on the shore. They were both changed into Halecyons. (Vid. Alecyone.)

CHABÔRAS, a river of Mesopotamia, springing, according to Ptolemy, from Mount Masius, a little to the west of Nisibis, but, according to other authorities, a little east of Charræ. These last are followed by D'Anville. It fell into the Euphrates near the town of Circesium. Its modern name is the Khabour. In the Anabasis of Xenophon (1, 4, 19.—Compare Ind. Nom. to the edition of Zeune), it is called the Araxes, which appears to be an appellative term, as we find it applied to many other rivers in antiquity. The Chaboras is called by Strabo (747) the Abborras; by Zosimus (3, 13) the Abôras. (Compare Amm. Marcell., 14, 1, and 23, 5.—Mannert, Geogr., vol. 5, p. 268, seqq.)

CHABRIAS, a celebrated Athenian general, at first a disciple of Plato's, who distinguished himself in the military movements of Athens during the fourth century before our era, after the termination of the Peloponnesian war. One of his first exploits was the aiding of Evagoras, king of Salamis, in the island of Cyprus, against the Persian arms. He was after this sent to the aid of the Boeotians, who had been attacked by Agesilaus, and he disconcerted the Spartan general by a manœuvre hitherto unknown to the Greeks. His army, on this occasion, being hard pressed by the foe, who had already become sure of victory, Chabrias ordered his soldiers to plant one knee on the ground, and rest their spears firmly on the other, covering their persons at the same time with their shields. Agesilaus, not daring to attack them in this position, drew back his forces into camp. A statue was erected to Chabrias in honour of this exploit, and he was represented in the posture just described. Some of the learned of modern times think that they recognise this statue in that of the "Gladiator." Chabrias afterward defeated near Naxos the fleet of the Lacedæmonians, and thus restored to Athens the control of the sea, which she had lost since the battle of Ægos Potamos. Subsequently to this he was accused of treason for having allowed Oropus to be surprised by the Theban exiles, but was acquitted notwithstanding the powerful efforts of his foes, and particularly of Callistratus. Finding a stay at Athens rather unsafe, he accepted the offer of Tachus, king of Egypt, who already had Agesilaus in his service, and accepted the command of his naval forces. Tachus, however, having been abandoned by Agesilaus, who sided with his son Nectanebis, Chabrias returned to Athens, and he was then sent into Thrace to take charge of the war against Chersobleptes. His operations, however, were not very successful in this quarter, owing to the disorganized state of the Grecian forces, in consequence of the failure of their pay. Not long after this the social war, as it has been termed, broke out between the Athenians on the one side, and the Byzantines, together with the inhabitants of Chios, Rhodes, and Cos, on the other. The Athenians gave the command of their forces to Chares, and Chabrias went with him as second in authority, having charge of the fleet according to Diodorus Siculus, but, as Nepos informs us, in the character of a simple volunteer. They proceeded to attack Chios; and Chares, wishing to make an onset by both sea and land, gave the command of his ships to Chabrias. The latter succeeded in forcing an entrance into the harbour, but, not being followed by the remainder of the squadron, he was surrounded by the vessels of the enemy, and fell bravely defending his ship, although he might have escaped had he felt inclined. Great honours were paid to his memory at Athens. Demosthenes says, that he took in the course of his life seventeen cities and seventy vessels; that he made three thousand prisoners, and brought one hundred and ten talents into the public treasury; that he erected also many trophies, but his foes not a single one for any victory over him. He adds, that the Athenians, during the whole time Chabrias was commander, never lost a single city, a single fortress, a single vessel, or even a single soldier. In this, no doubt, there is great exaggeration; still, however, he appears to have been a very able general, and one that would have equalled all who went before him, had he lived in more favourable times. Plutarch says, that Chabrias, though at other times scarcely anything could move him, was in the moment of action impetuously vehement, and exposed his person with a boldness ungoverned by discretion. We have his life by Cornelius Nepos, but it is a very meager one. Xenophon, in his Greek history, might have given us more details respecting him; but the partiality of this writer for Sparta prevented him from saying much in favour of the Athenian commander. (Corn. Nep. in Vit.—Perizon. ad Æl., V. H., 5, 1.—Diod. Sic., 15, 32, seq.—Xen., Hist. Gr., 5, 1, 10, seq.—Demosth., adv. Leptin., 17, &c.)

CHERËMON, I. a tragic poet of Athens, who flourished about 338 B.C. The earliest testimony, perhaps, in relation to this poet, is the mention made of him by the comic writer Eubulus. (Athenæus, 2, p. 43, c.—Compare Aristot., Poet., 2, 25.—Id., Rhet., 2, 23, et 29.—Theophrast., Hist. Plant., 5, 9, 5.—Clinton's Fasti Hellenici, 2d ed., p. xxxii.)—II. A philosopher and historian of Alexandria. He accompanied Ælius Gallus in his journey through Egypt, and was subsequently appointed librarian to the Serapeum. Being afterward called to Rome to preside over the education of Nero, he shared this office with Alexander of Ægæ the peripatetic. His historical labours embraced the antiquities of Egypt, both sacred and profane. He wrote also a work on Hieroglyphics, which has unfortunately perished. He is the author, also, of one of the two systems relating to the Egyptian religion, which divided the opinions of the ancient world. According to him, this religion was nothing more than a species of sacred physics, in which the visible worlds (ὁράμενοι κόσμοι) played a principal part. Iamblichus, on the other hand, maintained, that the Egyptians acknowledged one supreme and absolute intelligence. Perhaps both these philosophers were right: they may have spoken of different epochs.—(Schöll, Hist. Lit. Gr., vol. 5, p. 177, seq.—Creuzer, Symbolik, vol. 1, p. 383.)

CHÆRONÆA, a city of Bœotia, to the northeast of Lebadea. It was about sixteen English miles from Elatea, twenty-seven from Thebes, and sixty-two from Athens (Clinton's Fasti Hellenici, 2d ed., p. 295, in notis), and was remarkable for the important military events which occurred in its territory, and also as being the birthplace of Plutarch. Pausanias is inclined to look upon this city as the Bœotian Arne mentioned by Homer (Il., 2, 507.—Pausan., 9, 40). According to some traditions, however, Arne and Midea had both been swallowed up by the waters of the Copaic Lake; but others considered the town of Acroëphium as the Arne of the poet. (Strabo, 413.) Pausanias reports, on the authority of Hesiod, that the name of Charonea was derived from Charon, the son of Apollo. It was memorable for the defeat of the Athenians by the Bœotians, B.C. 447, and much more for their irretrievable defeat by Philip, B.C. 338. (Plut., Vit. Demosth., c. 24.—Strabo, 414.) Pausanias observes, that no trophy was erected by Philip after this signal victory, as it was not the practice of the Macedonian kings. Several years after this place witnessed another bloody engagement, between the Romans, under the conduct of Sylla, and the troops of Mithradates, commanded by Taxiles and Archelaus, B.C. 86. Charonea is now called Kaprena, and is still a populous village, with many vestiges of the ancient town. (Cramer's Ancient Greece, vol. 2, p. 241, seq.—Dodwell's Tour, vol. 1, p. 220.—Gell, Itin., p. 221.)

CHALCEDON, a city of Bithynia, situate at the southern extremity of the Thracian Bosphorus, nearly opposite to Byzantium or Constantinople. It was founded by a colony from Megara, about seventeen years prior to the settling of Byzantium. Chalcedon was called by the Persian satrap Megabyzus, in derision, the city of the blind, because the inhabitants had overlooked the superior position on the opposite side of the straits, where Byzantium was subsequently founded. (Herodot., 4, 144.) Strabo, however, ascribes this remark to an oracle of Apollo, which was received by the founders of Byzantium, and by which they were directed to select a spot for a city "opposite the blind" (ἀπεναντίον τῶν τυφλῶν.—Strab., 320). But, whichever be the true account, one thing is very certain, that the imputation attempted to be cast upon the Chalcedonians was any other than just. When Chalcedon was founded, the commerce of Megara had not extended to the Euxine, and it would have been idle, therefore, to found a city, at that period, on the European side of the Bosphorus, along which a steady current sets down from the Euxine Sea. It was only when traffic had spread to the shores of the Euxine, that the site occupied at present by Constantinople became an important one; since the vessels from that sea would then be carried down directly by the current into the harbour of the last-mentioned city.

(Mannert, Geogr., vol. 7, p. 155.) Chalcedon was always a considerable place. It preserved its independence until the reign of Darius, to whose arms the Chalcedonians were forced to submit. They recovered their freedom, however, after the defeat of Xerxes, and became the allies, or, rather, tributaries of the Athenians, to whom the ports of the Bosphorus were an object of the highest commercial and financial importance. After the battle of Ægos Potamos, however, Chalcedon opened its gates to Lysander, whose first object seems to have been to secure the entrance of the Bosphorus by the possession of this city and Byzantium. (Xen., Hist. Gr., 2, 2, 1.) Theopompus, who is quoted by Athenæus, observes, that the Chalcedonians at first possessed good institutions, but, having been tainted by the democratic principles of their neighbours, the Byzantines, they became luxurious and debauched. (Athen., 12, p. 526, f.) This city is also celebrated in ecclesiastical history for the council held there against the Eutychian heresy (A.D. 451). Hierocles assigns to it the first rank among the cities of the province then called Pontica Prima (p. 690).—It is to be observed, that in writing the name of this city ancient authors have not been uniform, some giving Καλλιδών, others Χαλκηδών. The former mode is, however, much more frequent, and it is confirmed by the existing coins, the epigraph of which is invariably ΚΑΛΧΑΔΟΝΙΩΝ, according to the Doric form. (Eckhel, Doct. Num. Vet., p. 1, vol. 1, p. 410.)—The site of this ancient city is now occupied by the Turkish village of Kadiköy, but the Greeks still preserve the classical name. (Cramer's Asia Minor, vol. 1, p. 190.—Mannert, Geogr., l. c.—Walpole, Memoirs, vol. 2, p. 8, Append., n. 41.)

CHALCIDICE, I. a district of Macedonia, between the Sinus Thermaicus and Strymonicus. The lower part of it formed three peninsulas, Phlegra or Pallene, Sithonia, and Athos. The small town of Chalcis gave name to this district.—II. Another in Syria, adjacent to the town of Chalcis. (Vid. Chalcis V.)

CHALCIDIŌUS (Chalcidian), an epithet applied to Cumæ in Italy, as built by a colony from Chalcis in Eubœa. (Virg., Æn., 6, 17.)

CHALCICEUS, an epithet applied to Minerva at Sparta, from her having a brazen temple (χαλκοῦς οἶκος). Sir W. Gell, in his account of the Treasury at Argos, gives a reasonable explication of this seemingly strange term. He discovered in the interior of the Treasury, which still remains in a great degree entire, a number of brass nails, placed throughout at regular intervals on the walls, and these he supposes were originally used for securing plates of the same metal to the wall; and hence the seeming fables of brazen chambers and brazen temples. In a similar manner may be explained the account, given by the ancients, of the brazen vessel made by Eurystheus, and into which he retired whenever Hercules returned from his labours. (Gell's Argolis, p. 33.)

CHALCIS, I. the most celebrated and important city of Eubœa, situate on the narrowest part of the Eurippus. According to the common account, it was founded after the siege of Troy by an Ionian colony from Athens, under the conduct of Cothus. (Strabo, 447.) Other authorities, however, have assigned to it a much greater antiquity, and it is certain that Homer speaks of Chalcis as already existing before the event above mentioned. (Il., 2, 537.) The flourishing condition of this great Ionian city, at a very early period, is attested by its numerous colonies on the shores of Italy and Sicily, as well as on the Thracian coast around Pallene and Mount Athos. Aristotle, as Strabo reports, dated these establishments from the period when the government of Chalcis, through the influence of the wealthiest inhabitants, named Hippobotæ, became a pure aristocracy. From Herodotus (5, 77) we learn, that the Chalcidians, having joined the Bœotians in their depredations on the coast of Attica, soon after the expulsion of the Pisistratidæ, afforded the Athenians just grounds for reprisals. They accordingly crossed over into Eubœa with a large force, and, after defeating the Chalcidians, occupied the lands of the wealthiest inhabitants, and distributed among them 4000 of their own citizens. These, however, were obliged to evacuate the island on the arrival of the Persian fleet under Datis and Artaphernes. (Herod., 6, 100.) The Chalcidians, after the termination of the Persian war, became again dependent on Athens with the rest of Eubœa, and did not regain their liberty till the close of the Peloponnesian war, when they asserted their freedom, and, aided by the Bœotians, fortified the Eurippus and established a communication with the continent by throwing a wooden bridge across the channel. Towers were placed at each extremity, and room was left in the middle for one ship only to pass. This work was undertaken, according to Diodorus, 410 B.C. (Diod. Sic., 13, 47.) From the advantages of its situation and the strength of its works, Chalcis was considered, in the latter period of the history of Greece, as one of the most important fortresses of that country; hence we find it a frequent object of contention between the Romans and Philip, son of Demetrius, who termed it one of the chains of Greece. (Polyb., 17, 11.—Id., 18, 28.) In the war with Perses, the Chalcidians were cruelly oppressed and plundered by the Roman prætors Lucretius and Hortensius. (Livy, 43, 7.) They were subsequently treated with still greater severity by Mummius, the destroyer of Corinth, for having favoured the Achæans in their contest with Rome; and the epitomist of Livy asserts that their town was actually destroyed. (Liv., 52.—Compare Freinsh., Suppl., 19.) Pausanias informs us that Chalcis no longer existed in his day (5, 23.—Compare Steph. Byz., s. v. Χαλκίς.—Hierocles, p. 645). Procopius names it among the towns restored by Justinian (4, 3). In the middle ages it assumed the name of Euripus (Apospasm., Geogr., vol. 4, p. 42, Geogr. Min., ed Hudson), which was in process of time corrupted to Negropont, the modern appellation of the whole island, as well as that of its capital. (Cramer's Ancient Greece, vol. 2, p. 134).—II. A town of Ætolia, at the foot of Mount Chalcis, and on the right bank of the Evenus. It was sometimes called Hypochalcis, with reference to its situation at the base of the mountain, and is now represented by the modern village of Galuta. Thucydides (2, 83) places it near the mouth of the Evenus. Livy says it stood on the road from Naupactus to Lysimachia and Stratus (36, 11). Polybius calls it Chalcia, and speaks of it as a maritime town (5, 94).—III. A small maritime town of the Corinthians, situated towards Sicily. (Thucyd., 1, 108).—IV. A city of Macedonia, in the district of Chalcidice, to which it gave name. It was founded at an early period by a colony from Chalcis in Eubœa.—V. A city of Syria, capital of the district of Chalcidice, and of Grecian origin, having been settled by the Macedonians. It was superseded afterward by Chaleb or Berœa. It is represented by the modern Kinnesrin or Chinnesrin. (Appian, Bell. Syr., 20.—Joseph., Bell. Jud., 20, 3.)

CHALDÆA, a country of Asia, at the head of the Persian Gulf, and south of Babylonia. Some writers, however, make Babylonia a part of it. With respect to the origin of the Chaldæans, who are called in scripture Chasdim, various opinions have been entertained. Michaëlis considers them as a foreign race in Assyria. His chief reason for this opinion is founded on the names of Chaldæan and Babylonian kings preserved in scripture, and by Ptolemy and Syncellus, which differ from the Assyrian names, and bear an apparent resemblance to those of some northern nations of Slavonic origin. Thus Nebucadnezzar would be in Sla vomic, Nebu-godnoï-tzar, i. e., a prince worthy of heaven. Belshazzar would be equivalent to Bolshoi-tzar, i. e., a great prince; and so of others. It has been objected to this, that the word Czar in Slavonic is nothing more than a corruption of Cæsar, an opinion hardly worth refuting. The orthography of the Russian term tsar sufficiently disproves such an idea. Compare the Hebrew sar; the Arabic sary; the Sanscrit shera; the English sire. So also we have in the arrow-headed inscriptions of Persepolis, as interpreted by Lassen, the form ksahiah for "king." (Lassen, Altpersischen Keil-Inschriften, &c., p. 141.)—Compare Michaëlis, Spicileg. Geogr., Heb. ext., vol. 2, p. 77, seqq.—The Chaldæans appear to have been originally a mountaineer-race from the northern parts of Mesopotamia, though not, as Michaëlis supposes, of foreign extraction, but in reality a branch of the Semitic race. (Compare Adelung, Mithradates, vol. 1, p. 517.—Fürst, Chald. Gram., p. 5, seqq.—Compare still farther, in relation to the Chaldee tongue, the remarks of Saint-Martin, as cited by Balbi, Introduction à l'Atlas Ethnographique, p. 106, and, as regards the pretended antiquity of the Chaldee empire, consult Cuvier, on the Revolutions of the Surface of the Globe, p. 127, seqq., Eng. transl., 1829, and Drummond's Origines, vol. 1, p. 13, seqq.) The Chaldæans are highly commended in many of the ancient writers for their skill in the sciences, especially in astronomy. If we are to believe Diodorus, however, their claims to this high character were very slight. They seem to have pursued the study of astronomy no farther than as it might tend to aid their astrological researches. They taught that the shape of the earth was that of a skiff or small boat, and of eclipses of the sun they knew but little, and never ventured to predict them, or fix the time of their occurring. So says Diodorus. (Diod. Sic., 2, 31.—Compare, however, in relation to the science of the Chaldæans, the remarks of Sir W. Drummond, Class. Journ., vol. 16, p. 145 and 262; vol. 17, p. 19; vol. 18, p. 1 and 298; vol. 19, p. 296.)

CHALDÆI, I. the inhabitants of Chaldæa.—II. The same with the Chalybes. (Vid. Chalybes.)

CHALYBES, a people of Pontus, in Asia Minor, who inhabited the whole coast from the Jasonium Promontorium to the vicinity of the river Thermodon, together with a portion of the inner country. They were celebrated in antiquity for the great iron-mines and forges which existed in their country. (Apell. Rh., 2, 1002, seqq.—Id., 2, 374.—Virg., Georg., 1, 58.—Dionys. Perieg., 768.) We are ignorant of the grounds on which the ancients attributed this active employment in the manufacture of iron to the Chalybes, for it does not appear at present that this part of Asia is at all productive of that most useful metal; perhaps, however, if the mountainous districts were accurately examined, there could be found traces of the ancient works. It is plain, however, that they had not ceased to furnish a good supply of metallic ore in Strabo's time, for he observes, that the two great articles of produce in the land of the Chalybes, who were then commonly called Chaldæi or Chaldî, were the fisheries of the pelamys and the iron-works; the latter kept in constant employment a great number of men. Strabo observes, also, that these mines formerly produced a quantity of silver; and this circumstance, together with some affinity in the names, led some commentators of Homer to identify the Alybe of that poet with the Chalybes of Pontus. (Il., 2, 856.) Strabo himself strongly contends for this interpretation, and it is in all probability the true one. (Strabo, 549, seqq.) It is remarkable, that Herodotus names the Chalybes among the nations of Asia that were conquered by Cræsus (1, 28), and yet they certainly are found afterward considerably beyond the Halys, which separated his dominion from those of Cyrus: either, therefore, they must have shifted their position, or Cræsus subsequently lost what he had gained on the right bank of the Halys. Xenophon, who traversed the country of the Chalybes, speaks of them as being few in number, and subject to the Mo-synœci; he adds, that their chief employment was forging iron. But it is worthy of remark, that he places these Chalybes more to the east than other writers. (Anab., 5, 5, 2.) Zeunius, therefore, is of opinion, that this people must have lived a wandering sort of life, and have often changed their territory. (Dissert. Geogr. ad Anab., p. xxvii., ed. Oxon., 1809.) Xenophon, however, speaks elsewhere of some other Chalybes, who were situated apparently on the borders of Armenia, and were much more numerous and warlike. (Anab., 4, 7, 10.) Strabo reports, that the Chalybes, in his time, had changed their name to that of Chaldæi (Strab., 549), and it is remarked, that Xenophon speaks of an Armenian tribe of Chaldees, who encountered the Greeks near the river Centritis (Anab., 4, 3, 4.—Compare Eustath. ad Dion. Perieg., 768); but Menippus, in his Periplus, calls the Pontic tribe Chaldî, and their canton Chaldia. (Ap. Steph. Byz., s. v. Χαλδία.—Cramer's Asia Minor, vol. 1, p. 273, seqq.)

CHALYBON, a city of Syria, capital of the district called Chalybonitis, and the same with the Scripture Helbon. (Ezek., 27, 18.) The surrounding country was famed for its wine. (Compare Casaub. ad Athen., 2, p. 66.—Bochart, Hieroz., pt. 1, lib. 2, c. 45, p. 485.—Schleusner, Lex. V. T., s. v. Χαλβών.) Thevenot, Russel, and others make this city correspond to the modern Aleppo (Haleb). Pococke, however, is in favour of Kennesrin, to the south of Aleppo. (Vid. Beræa.)

CHALYBS, a river of Hispania Tarraconensis, in the country of the Celtiberi, and one of the tributaries of the Iberus. Its waters were famed for hardening steel; so that the name Chalybs was given to it from this circumstance, by either the Romans or the Greeks, more probably the former. The modern name is the Queles. (Justin, 44, 3.)

CHAÖNES, a people of Epirus. (Vid. Chaonia.)

CHAÖNIA, a region of Epirus. The ancients comprehended under the name of Chaonia that northwestern part of Epirus which bordered on the territory of Oricum, Amantia, and still more to the east on the country of the Atintanes, while it extended along the coast of the Ionian Sea from the Acroceraunian promontory to the harbour of Buthrotum, opposite the island of Corcyra. The exact limits of Chaonia cannot now be ascertained, since, even in Strabo's time, it was impossible to discern with accuracy what belonged to each of the several tribes into which the body of the nation had been divided, owing to the great political changes which that country had experienced since it became subject to the Romans. (Strabo, 322.) We must observe, however, that in the time of Thucydides, the river Thyamis bounded that southern portion of Chaonia which bore the name of Cestrine, on the side of Thesprotia. The Chaones, as we learn from Strabo, were once the most powerful and warlike people of Epirus, until the Molossi, in their turn, acquired a preponderating ascendancy over the other clans of that country. In the time of the Peloponnesian war the Chaones differed from their neighbours, in being subject to an aristocratical and not a monarchical government; their annual magistrates being always chosen from a particular family. (Thucyd., 2, 80.) Tradition ascribed the origin of their name to Chaon, the brother of Helenus who married Andromache after the death of Pyrrhus. (Virg., Æn., 3, 333.—Compare the commentary of Servius, ad loc.) It may be inferred from the name of Pelasgis given to Chaonia by some ancient writers, that it was formerly occupied by the Pelasgi. (Steph. Byz.,

s. v. Xaoría) Virgil uses the epithet Chaonius for Dodonaus (Georg., 1, 8) in referring to the acorns of Dodona. (Cramer's Anc. Greece, vol. 1, p. 93.)

CHAOS, a heterogeneous mass, containing all the seeds of nature. According to Hesiod (Theog., 116), "Chaos was first;" then came into being "broad-breasted Earth, the gloomy Tartarus, and Love." Chaos produced Erebus and Night, and this last bore to Erebus Day and Æther. The idea of Chaos and Night, divested of poetical imagery, is simply that of unformed matter, eternally existing as the passive principle, whence all forms are produced. Whether, besides this Chaotic mass, the ancient theogonies suppose an infinite, active, intelligent Principle, who from the first matter formed the universe, is a question which has occasioned much debate. It is evident, upon the most cursory review of all the ancient theogonies, that God, the great Creator of all things, is not expressly introduced, but it is doubted whether the framers of these theogonies meant to exclude him from their respective systems, or indirectly to suppose his existence and the exertion of his power in giving motion to matter. When divested of allegory and poetry, the sum of the doctrine contained in the ancient theogonies will, it is conceived, be found to be as follows: The first matter, containing the seeds of all future being, existed from eternity with God. At length the Divine energy acting upon matter produced a motion among its parts, by which those of the same kind were brought together, and those of a different kind were separated, and by which, according to certain wise laws, the various forms of the material world were produced. The same energy of emanation gave existence to animals and men, and to gods who inhabit the heavenly bodies, and various other parts of nature. Among men, those who possess a larger portion of the Divine nature than others are hereby impelled to great and beneficent actions, and afford illustrious proofs of their divine original, on account of which they are, after death, raised to a place among the gods, and become objects of religious worship. (Enfield's Hist. of Philosophy, vol. 1, p. 130, seqq.)

CHARĀDRA, a town of Phocis, about 20 stadia from Lilæa. Near it flowed the river Charadrus, which fell into the Cephissus. Herodotus (8, 33) names this place among the Phocian cities destroyed by the army of Xerxes. Dodwell states, that the ruins of Charadra are to be seen near the village of Mariolates, at the foot of Parnassus. (Dodwell's Tour, vol. 2, p. 132.)

CHARAX, I. a considerable emporium of Bithynia, in the later periods of the Byzantine empire. It was situate on the bay of Nicomedia, or Sinus Astacenus. (Steph. Byz., s. v. Χάραξ).—II. Another and earlier name for the city of Tralles, in Lydia. (Steph. Byz., s. v. Τράλλεις, Χάραξ).—III. A town of Phrygia, between Lampe and Graosgala. (Nicet., Ann., p. 127, b.)—IV. A town of Armenia Minor, in the northeastern angle of the country. (Ptol.—Compare Cramer, Asia Minor, vol. 2, p. 154.)

CHARAXUS, a Mytilenean, brother to Sappho. (Vid. Sappho, near the commencement of the article.)

CHARES, I. an Athenian general, who succeeded to the command after the condemnation and death of Leosthenes. He was sent by the Athenians against Alexander, tyrant of Phææ, but, instead of coming to action with the foe, he harassed the Athenian allies to such a degree by his extortions and oppression, that the social war was the result (B.C. 388). Although Chares was the principal cause of this war, yet the orators of his party shielded him from punishment, and succeeded in having him nominated commander-in-chief. Little, if anything, was effected by him, and he was at length recalled for having aided Artabazus, who had revolted against the king of Persia. Some time after he was sent to aid Byzantium against Philip of Macedon, but he only incurred the contempt of his foe, and excited the discontent of the allies, so that the Athenians finally recalled him, and put Phocion in his place. This, however, did not prevent them from choosing him for their general at the battle of Chæroneæ, where his ignorance and incapacity mainly contributed to the loss of the day. He was one of those whom Alexander ordered to be delivered up to him after the destruction of Thebes, but he succeeded in mollifying the conqueror, and was permitted to live at Athens. (Diod. Sic., 15, 95.—Athenæus, 12, p. 532.—Xen., Hist. Gr., 7, 2, 18.—Lambin., ad Corn. Nep., Vit. Chabr., c. 3).—II. A Greek statuary, born at Lindus. He was the disciple of Lysippus, and was celebrated as the maker of the colossus of Rhodes, on which he was employed twelve years. (Strab., 652.—Plin., 34, 7.—Sillig., Diet. Art., s. v.)

CHARICLES, I. one of the 30 tyrants set over Athens by the Lacedæmonians, and possessing great influence among his colleagues. (Xen., Mem. Socr., 1, 2, 31.—Aristot., Polit., 5, 6.—Schlosser, ad Aristot., l. c.)

—II. A celebrated physician in the train of Tiberius. Towards the end of that emperor's life, Charicles, on taking leave of him, as if about to journey abroad, managed, in grasping the hand of Tiberius, to feel his pulse, and became instantly convinced that the latter had not more than two days to live, a secret which he soon divulged to Macro. (Tacit., Ann., 6, 50.—Gronov., ad loc.)

CHARILA, a festival observed once in nine years by the Delphians. It owed its origin to this circumstance: in a great famine the people of Delphi assembled and applied to their king to relieve their wants. He accordingly distributed the little corn he had among the better portion of them; but an orphan girl coming and importuning him, he beat her with his sandal. The girl, unable to endure the affront, hung herself with her girdle. The famine increased; and the oracle told the king that, to relieve his people, he must atone for the murder of Charila. Upon this a festival was instituted with expiatory rites. The king presided over this festival, and distributed pulse and corn to such as attended. Charila's image was brought before the king, who struck it with his shoe; after which it was carried to a desolate place, where they put a halter round its neck, and buried it where Charila was buried. (Plut., Quest. Rom.—Op., ed. Reiske, vol. 4, p. 176.)

CHARIS, a name applied by Homer (Il., 18, 382) to the wife of Vulcan. In the Odyssey, on the other hand (8, 267), Venus is named as his spouse. It amounts to the same thing in the figurative explanation of the myth, since Grace and Beauty were both regarded as the characteristics of Vulcan's labours. (Heyne, ad Il., l. c.)

CHARISTIA, a festival in honour of the Graces, with dances which continued all night. A cake was given to those who remained awake during the whole time. (Eustath. ad Od., 18, 194.)

CHARISTIA, a festival at Rome, on the 8th day before the Calends of March (February 22). It was celebrated among relations by a kind of family banquet, and presents were made. No stranger was allowed to be present. (Val. Max., 2, 1, 8.)

CHARITES, the Graces, daughters, according to Hesiod (Theog., 907), of Jupiter and the ocean-nymph Eurynome. They were three in number, and their names, as the same bard informs us, were Aglaia (Splendour), Euphrosyne (Joy), and Thalia (the Blooming one). According to Antimachus (Pausan., 9, 35), the Graces were the daughters of Helios (the Sun) and Ægle (Splendour); and Hermesimach made Peitho (Persuasion) one of their number. In Nonnus (Dionys., 24, 263) their names are Pasithea, Peitho, and Aglaia. The Graces, like the Muses and other sister-goddesses, are spoken of by Homer in the plural, and with him their number is indefinite. They are graceful and beautiful themselves, and the bestowers of all grace and beauty both on persons and things. They seem to have been particularly attached to the train of the goddess of love, although the queen of heaven had authority over them (Il., 14, 267); and she promises Pasithea, one of the youngest of them, as a wife to Somnus, in return for his aid in deceiving Jupiter: by later writers she is even said to be their mother. (Nonnus, 31, 184.—Eudocia, ap. Villois, Anecd. Gr., vol. 1, p. 430.) Orchemenus, in Boeotia, was the chief seat of the worship of these goddesses. Its introduction was ascribed to Eteocles, the son of the river Cephissus. The Lacedæmonians worshipped only two Graces, whom they name Cleta (Reinwald) and Phaenna (Bright), as we are informed by Pausanias (l. c., et 3, 18, 6). The Athenians originally adored the same number, under the names of Hegemone (Leader) and Auxo (Increaser). The Graces were at all times, in the creed of Greece, the goddesses presiding over social enjoyments, the banquet, the dance, and all that tended to inspire gayety and cheerfulness. They are represented as three beautiful sisters, either dancing together, or standing with their arms around each other. Sometimes they are nude, sometimes habited. (Keightley's Mythology, p. 192, seq.)—The Graces, like the Horæ and Muses, appear to have had originally a reference to the stars and seasons. The Greeks deprived them of their astronomical functions, and substituted such attributes as were merely of a poetic character. We still see, however, on an ancient gem, the Graces dancing upon the head of Taurus, while two of them are turning towards seven stars, at which they point with the hand. (Borioni, Collect. Antiq. Rom., fol. 1736, n. 82.—Passerat, Thesaur. gemm. astrifer., 1, tab. 144.) At a later period, when moral ideas began to be more intimately blended with parts of the Grecian system, the Graces assumed analogous attributes. One of them was supposed to represent a favour conferred, another a favour received, while the third designated the return made for benefits. (Aristot., Eth., 5, 8.—Senec., de Benef., 1, 3.—Constant, de la Religion, vol. 2, p. 402.—Winckelmann, Essai sur l'Allegorie, c. 2.—Traité sur l'Allegorie, vol. 1, p. 132.)

CHARITON, of Aphrodisias (a Carian town), the name by which we know the author of a Greek romance, entitled, Τὸν περὶ Χαρίαν καὶ Καλλιρρόην ἐρωτικῶν διηγημάτων λόγοι ἢ: "The Loves of Chæreas and Callirhoë," in eight books." The appellation is probably an assumed one, as well as the title he gives himself of "Secretary to the rhetorician Athenagoras." This rhetorician is supposed by some to be the same with the one of whom Thucydides makes mention (6, 35, seqq.) as enjoying great credit among the people of Syracuse. He was opposed to Hermocrates, the general who vanquished the Athenians. The daughter of this Hermocrates is the heroine of the romance, and it is probable that the writer wished to appear to his readers in the light of a contemporary. We have no data by which to fix the period when Chariton flourished. Some place him at the end of the 4th century of our era. As regards the romance itself, it may be observed, that, though by no means remarkable for its invention, it is smooth and easy in the story. "Villemain has said no worse about it," observes a writer in the Foreign Quarterly (No. 9, p. 132), "than that it is 'a work which the learned Larcher has translated without being able to render it amusing;' and Larcher himself, in his preface, resolves, with great good sense, to 'say nothing about it.' In fact, it is by no means easy to say anything about a book which is too dull for praise and too harmless for censure."—The best edition of Chariton is that of D'Orville, with some excellent conjectural emendations of Reiske, Amst., 1750, 3 vols. 4to.

CHARMIDES, son of Glaucon, was famed in early life for his beauty and his dissipated mode of life. After having squandered his patrimony, he became a pupil of Socrates, and was advised by that philosopher to turn his attention to public affairs. This advice proved unfortunate, for Charmides, having joined the party of Critias, was made one of the ten tyrants whom Lysander established in the Piræus, to govern conjointly with the thirty in the city. He was slain along with Critias in the first battle between the exiles under Thrasybulus and the forces of the tyrants. Plato has called one of his dialogues after him. Xenophon makes mention of him on several occasions, especially in his Banquet. (Xen., Mem. Socr., 3, 7, 1.—Schneider, ad loc.—Xen., Sympos., 4, 31, &c.)—II. or CHARMIDAS, an academic philosopher, the companion of Philo. He was celebrated for the compass and fidelity of his memory, and for his moral wisdom. (Cic., Tusc. Quæst., 1, 24.—Davies, ad loc.)

CHARMION, one of Cleopatra's female attendants, who killed herself after the example of her mistress. (Plut., Vit. Anton., c. 86.)

CHARMIS, a physician of Marseille, in Nero's age, who revived the use of cold baths at Rome in cases of sickness, after the practice had been discontinued since the time of Antonius Musa. (Vid. Musa.) He was very successful in his professional labours, and amassed great riches. (Plin., 29, 1.—Sprengel, Hist. de la Med., vol. 2, p. 24.)

CHARON, I. a deity of the lower world, son of Erebus and Nox, who conducted the souls of the dead in a boat over the river Acheron to the infernal regions. The sum exacted for this service, from each of the shades ferried over by him, was never less than an obolus, nor could it exceed three. A piece of money, therefore, was generally placed by the ancients under the tongue of the deceased, in order to meet this necessary demand. Such as had not been honoured with a funeral were not permitted to enter Charon's boat, without previously wandering on the shore for one hundred years. If any living person presented himself to cross the river of the dead, he could not be admitted into the bark before he showed Charon a golden bough, obtained from the Cumæan sibyl; and the ferryman was on one occasion imprisoned for an entire year, because he had, though against his own will, conveyed Hercules across the stream without first receiving from him this necessary passport. The poets have represented Charon as a robust old man, of a severe though animated countenance, with eyes glowing like flame, a white and bushy head, vestments of a dingy colour, stained with the mire of the stream, and with a pole for the direction of his bark, which last is of a dark ferruginous hue. (Virg., Æn., 6, 298, seqq.)—The earliest mention of Charon in Grecian poetry seems to be in the ancient poem of the Minyas, quoted by Pausanias (10, 28). The fable itself is considered by some to be of Egyptian origin, and in support of this opinion they refer to the account of Diodorus Siculus, relative to the statements made by the Egyptian priests. (Diod. Sic., 1, 92, et 96.) The latter asserted, it seems, that Orpheus and Homer had both learned wisdom on the banks of the Nile; and that the Erebus of Greece, and all its parts, personages, and usages, were but transcripts of the mode of burial in Egypt; and here the corpse was, on payment of an obolus, conveyed by a ferryman (named Charon in the language of Egypt) over the Acherusian lake after it had received its sentence from the judges appointed for that purpose. (Diod., l. c.) Lobeck, in his Aglaophamus (vol. 2, p. 811), despatches all these fictions of the Egyptian priesthood in a very plain and summary manner, dignifying them with the appellation of "portentosa mendacia," a title which they fairly deserve. "Quin tota Oræi et lucorum inferorum descriptio ad Orpheum referret auctorem, ab Ægyptiis illis, qui, præter reliqua portentosa mendacia a Diodoro relata, Orpheum narrant τὰς καὶ τῶν ἀσέβων ἐν ἁδὺν τιμωρίας, κ. τ. λ." (Keightley's Mythology, p. 92).—II. One of the earlier Greek historical writers, a native of Lampsacus, supposed to have flourished between the 75th and 78th Olympiads. Charon continued the researches of Hecataeus into eastern ethnography. He wrote (as was the custom of the historians of his day) separate works upon Persia, Libya, Æthiopia, &c. He also subjoined the history of his own time, and he preceded Herodotus in narrating the events of the Persian war, although Herodotus nowhere mentions him. From the fragments of his writings which remain, it is manifest, that his relation to Herodotus was that of a dry chronicler to an historian, under whose hands everything acquires life and character. Charon wrote, besides, a chronicle of his own country, as several of the early historians did, who were thence called Horographers: (ὁροί, corresponding to the Latin annales, ought not to be confounded with ὁροί, termini, limites.—Schweigh. ad Athen., 11, p. 475, b; 12, p. 520, d.) The fragments of Charon have been collected by Creuzer, in his Historicorum Græcorum Antiquissimorum Fragmenta, p. 89, seqq.

CHARONDAS, a celebrated legislator, born at Catana in Sicily, where he flourished about 650 B.C. We have very few details of his life. Aristotle merely informs us, that he was of the middling class of citizens, and that he framed laws for the people of Catana as well as for other communities, which, like them, were descended from Chalcis in Eubœa. Ælian adds (V. H., 3, 17), that he was subsequently driven into exile from Catana, and took refuge in Rhegium, where he succeeded in introducing his laws. Some authors inform us, that he compiled his laws for the Thurians; but he lived, in fact, a long time before the foundation of Thurium, since his laws were abrogated in part by Anaxias, tyrant of Rhegium, who died 476 B.C. It is not necessary, therefore, to suppose, with Sainte-Croix (Mem. de l'Acad. des Inscriptions, vol. 42, p. 317), that there were two legislators of the same name, one a native of Catana, and the other of Thurium. The laws of Charondas were, like those of many of the ancient legislators, in verse, and formed part of the instruction of the young. Their fame reached even to Athens, where they were sung or chanted at repasts. The preamble of these laws, as preserved to us by Stobæus, is thought, as far, at least, as regards the form of expression, not to be genuine; and Heyne supposes it to have been taken from some Pythagorean treatise on the laws of Charondas.—The manner of this legislator's death is deserving of mention. He had made a law, that no man should be allowed to come armed into the assembly of the people. The penalty for infringement was death. He became the victim of his own law: for, having returned from pursuing some robbers, he entered the city, and presented himself before the assembly of the people without reflecting that he carried a sword by his side. Some one thereupon remarked to him, "You are violating your own law." His reply was, "On the contrary, I am establishing it;" and he slew himself on the spot. This action, however, is ascribed by others to Diocles, legislator of the Syracusans; perhaps it is true of neither. For farther details respecting Charondas, consult the memoir of Sainte-Croix, cited above, and Heyne, Opuscula Academica, vol. 2, p. 74, seqq.

CHARYBDIS, a dangerous whirlpool, mentioned in the Odyssey, and placed by Homer somewhere between his Wandering Rocks and his island of Thrinakia. Directly opposite to it was the fearful Scylla. The ancients, who were anxious to localize all the wonders of Homer, made the straits of Messina the abode of Scylla and Charybdis. A full account of the whole fable, with its solution by Spallanzani, will be found under the article SCYLLA.

CHAUCI, a people of Germany, of Suevic race, and divided into the Chauci Majores and Minores. The former were situate between the Visurgis (Weser) and Albis (Elbe); the latter between the Amisia (Emis) and Visurgis. Tacitus draws a very flattering picture of the Chauci. He represents them as the noblest of the German tribes, as distinguished for a love of justice and peace, but able, when attacked, to bring a powerful army of horse and foot into the field. (Tacit. Germ., 35.) What is very surprising, Pliny describes the Chauci as a miserable race, weak in numbers and resources, compelled to build their cabins on hills, their country being twice every day inundated by the sea, without cattle or pasturage, or even a single tree in their territory. (Plin., 16, 1.) How are these two writers to be reconciled? Probably in the following way. The Chauci, about the fourth century of our era, formed part of the confederation of the Saxones. This confederation, however, appears to have been better known by the name of Chauci than that of Saxones. Now Pliny may have meant the people termed Chauci, and Tacitus the confederation. (Consult Malle-Brun., Geogr., vol. 1, p. 105, Brussels ed.)

CHELIDONIA, a festival at Rhodes, in which it was customary for boys to go asking for presents from door to door, and singing a song called Chelidonisma, so named because it began with an allusion to the arrival of the swallows, and the consequent approach of spring: 'Ἦλθ', ἡλθε χελιδὼν, κ. τ. λ. (Athenaus, 8, p. 360, b, c.—Casaub., ad loc.)

CHELIDONIAE, now Kelidoni, small islands south of the Sacrum Promontorium, on the coast of Lycia, very dangerous to sailors. The Chelidonian isles were two in number, according to Seylax (p. 38), or three as Strabo reports: the latter geographer says that they were six stadia from the land, and five from each other. Captain Beaufort, however, distinctly counted five of these islands; whence he is led, not without reason, to think that this increase of number has been produced by the shock of an earthquake: two are from four to five hundred feet high, the other three are small and barren. (Karamania, p. 37, seq.) After the victory at the river Eurymedon, it became the boast of the Greek nation, that no armed ship of Persia was to be seen westward of the Chelidonian isles, or of the Cyaean rocks at the entrance of the Euxine; and that no Persian troops dared to show themselves within a horseman's day's journey of the Grecian seas. In after times a report arose, that a treaty of peace had been regularly made between the Persian monarch and the Greeks, in which it was forbidden for any Persian forces to come within the limits just mentioned. As regards this pretended treaty, consult the remarks towards the close of the article Cimon. (Cramer's Asia Minor, vol. 2, p. 256.)

CHELIDONIUM PROMONTORIUM, the same with the Sacrum Promontorium of Lycia, now Cape Kelidonia. (Vid. Sacrum Promontorium, II.)

CHELONE, a nymph who was the only one of the deities that did not attend the nuptials of Jupiter and Juno; nay, she even made the celebration a subject of ridicule. Mercury thereupon precipitated her into a river on the banks of which her mansion was situated, and transformed her into a tortoise, under which shape she was doomed to perpetual silence, and to the necessity of always carrying her dwelling about with her. The Greek for a tortoise is χελώνη, and hence the fable arose. (Serv. ad Virg., Æn., 1, 509.)

CHELONITES or CHELONATAS, Promontorium, a promontory of Elis, forming the extreme point of the Peloponnesus towards the northwest. (Strabo, 338.—Plin., 4, 5.) It is now called Cape Tornese.

CHEMMIS, I. a city of Egypt, the same as Panopolis. (Vid. Panopolis).—II. A city of Egypt, mentioned by Herodotus (2, 91), and placed by him in the

Thebaïc nome, near Neapolis. There was in it, according to the historian, a temple dedicated to Perseus, the son of Danaë. This city is considered by many to be the same with Panopolis, but incorrectly, as will appear on the least examination of the case. Herodotus says not a word of Pan's being worshipped in this place, he only speaks of the hero Perseus. He places, moreover, his Chemmis, not in the Thebaïd, but in the Thebaïc nome, the distance of which from Panopolis forms another strong objection to this latter place being the same with Chemmis. Still farther, he mentions the city of Neapolis as standing near his Chemmis, when no traces of this city, nor, indeed, of any city at all, are to be found near Panopolis. For these reasons Mannert appears to be perfectly correct in making the Chemmis of Herodotus identical with Coptos. (Mannert, Geogr., vol. 10, pt. 1, p. 374.) Creuzer and Bähr, on the other hand, are in favour of the opposite opinion stated above, but adduce very feeble arguments in its support. (Bähr, ad Herod., 2, 91.)—III. An island in Egypt, situate in a broad and deep lake, near the temple of Latona, in the city of Butus. The Egyptians, according to Herodotus (2, 156), affirmed, that it was a floating island; but the historian, with great candour, adds, that for his own part he could neither see it float nor move. The island contained a spacious temple dedicated to Apollo, and three altars; with great numbers of palms, and other trees, as well of such as produce fruit as of those that do not. The Egyptians had the following legend respecting this island: they stated, that Latona, one of the eight primary deities, residing in Butus, received Apollo from the hands of Isis, and preserved his life by concealing him in this island, when Typhon, arriving in these parts, used all possible diligence to find out the son of Osiris.—It is thought that the Greeks invented from this story their fable respecting Delos. (Compare Larcher, ad Herod., l. c.) As regards the name Chemmis, consult the remarks of Champollion, Système Hierogl., p. 112. Mannert makes the Egyptian legend arise from the wish, on the part of the Egyptian priests, to explain the Grecian mythology by a reference to their own as its parent source. (Compare the remarks at the close of the article Charon.—Mannert, Geogr., vol. 10, pt. 1, p. 559.)

CHEOPS, a king of Egypt, the successor, according to Herodotus (2, 124), of Rhampsinitus. According to Larcher (Chronol. d'Herod., vol. 7, p. 90), Cheops began to reign 1178 B.C. Herodotus makes him to have ruled over Egypt for the space of fifty years, and to have been a most oppressive monarch. He shut up all the temples, forbade public sacrifices, and compelled the people to undergo the severest labour. Ten years were occupied in constructing a causeway, along which to draw the stones intended for a large pyramid, and twenty years were then spent in erecting the pyramid itself. On this structure was an inscription, in Egyptian characters, stating how much had been expended in radishes, onions, and garlic for the workmen. The interpreter informed Herodotus, that this sum amounted to no less than 1600 talents of silver. Taking the Attic talent at a valuation of $1055.60, the sum expended will be nearly $1,700,000 of our currency. The mode to which Cheops had recourse in order to replenish his exhausted treasury, although gravely related by Herodotus (2, 126), is utterly incredible, and must have been a falsehood of the Egyptian priests. Indeed, the whole account given of Cheops bears this same impress of mendacity. He was, in all probability, a monarch who broke loose from the restraints of the sacerdotal order, and not only curbed the power of the latter, but likewise employed on public works a larger part of the population of Egypt, who were living in idleness, and whose morals were becoming more and more corrupted by a frequent attendance on the dissolute festivals so common among the Egyptians.—Diodorus Siculus gives Chembes (Χέμβης) as the name of the monarch who succeeded Rhampsinitus. The true reading, no doubt, is Chemmis (Χέμμης), as we find it written in some MSS. (Diod. Sic., 1, 63.)

CHEPHREN, a king of Egypt, brother and successor to Cheops. According to Herodotus (2, 127), he both imitated his brother in other things, and particularly in building a pyramid. He reigned fifty-six years. The historian adds, that the Egyptians, in consequence of the oppressive reigns of these two monarchs, Cheops and Chephren, would never thereafter mention their names, but always attributed their pyramids to "one Philitis, a shepherd, who kept his cattle at that time in these same parts." Who this Philitis was it is impossible to say. Zoega (de Obelisc., p. 389, not. 20) thinks, that Osiris of Phlæ is meant (Osiris Philensis), a deity to whom these abodes of the dead (the pyramids namely) were consecrated, and who, as he supposes, was called "a shepherd," in the same sense in which kings are called by Homer "the shepherds of their people" (ποιμένες λαών). This opinion, however, is utterly erroneous, since the word "shepherd," as employed on this occasion by the priests of Egypt, is indicative of contempt. (Compare Genesis, 46, 34.—Manetho, ap. Joseph. adv. Apion., 1, 14, p. 1039.—Heeren, Ideen, vol. 2, pt. 2, p. 148.) Besides, neither the genitive Φιλίτινος, as employed by Herodotus, nor the corrupt reading Φιλίτιος, recalled by Zoega, could come from Φίλαι, as the root of their nominative: the form in that event would be Φιλάτων, or Φιλίτων, from a nominative Φιλάτης or Φιλίτης. (Compare Steph. Byz., p. 739, ed. Berk.)—We come now to another opinion, which makes the pyramids of Cheops and Chephren to have been erected by kings of the Shepherd-race. It will be sufficient, however, in rejecting this supposition, to remark, that the building of such structures is entirely at variance with the known habits of a nomadic people.—Jablonski (Voc. Egypt., p. 346) thinks, that in the word "Philitis" there lurks the form "Philistæan," i. e., a native of Palestine, which he considered to be equivalent here to "one of the Jewish nation," and to have reference to Moses.—Heeren, however, appears to be nearest the truth, when he makes the pyramids of Cheops and Chephren to have been the work of Æthiopian conquerors, and the term "shepherd" to have been, as above remarked, merely expressive of the contempt and hatred borne by the conquered towards those who had subdued them. (Heeren, Ideen, vol. 2, pt. 2, p. 118, not.—Bähr, ad Herod., 2, 128.)

CHERSONESUS, a Greek geographical term, equivalent in meaning to the Latin "peninsula." The earlier form is Cherronesus, the word being derived from χέρβος (later form χέρσος), "a continent" or "mainland," and νῆσος, "an island," since a peninsula partakes, as it were, of the properties of both continent and island.—The most noted Chersonesi in ancient times were the following: I. CHERSONESUS AUREA, or Golden Chersonese, a peninsula of farther India, corresponding, according to D'Anville, Rennell, Mannert, and others, to the modern Malacca, but, as Gosselin maintains, to the southern part of Pegu. The positive knowledge of the ancient geographers can hardly be said to have extended much beyond this, their account of the regions farther to the east being principally derived from the natives of India. Even the position of the Golden Chersonese itself is given differently by different writers. (Consult Gosselin, Recherches, &c., vol. 3, p. 49.—vol. 2, p. 262, &c.) The name given to this region by the ancients has reference to the popular belief of its abounding in gold; and here, too, some inquirers into early geography have placed the Ophir of Solomon, an opinion maintained also by Josephus. (Ant. Jud., 8, 6, 4.)—

CHERSONESUS CIMBRICA, a peninsula in the northern part of Germany, answering to the modern Jutland, Schleswig, and Holstein. (Prot., 2, 11.)—III. CHERSONESUS TAURICA, a peninsula between the Pontus Euxinus and Palus Mæotis, answering to the modern Crimca. The name was derived from the Tauri, a barbarous race who inhabited it. It was sometimes called Chersonesus Scythica and Chersonesus Magna. (Ovid, Trist., 4, 4, 63.—Id., Pont., 3, 2, 5.)—IV. CHERSONESUS THRACICA, often called simply the Chersonesus, and the most important of all. It was a peninsula of Thrace, between the Sinus Melas and the Hellespont. The fertility of its soil, and its proximity to the coast of Asia Minor, early attracted an influx of Grecian settlers, and its shores soon became crowded with flourishing and populous cities. From this quarter the Athenians drew their chief supply of grain. (Cramer's Anc. Greece, vol. 1, p. 322, seqq.)

CHERUSCI, a people of Germany, between the Weser and the Elbe, southeast of the Chauci. Under the conduct of Arminius, they defeated and slew three Roman legions commanded by Varus, A.D. 10, in the Saltus Teutobergiensis, or Bishopric of Paderborn. They were afterward defeated by Germanicus, and never recovered their former eminence. (Tacit., Ann., 1, 56 and 59.—Id. ibid., 2, 17, 26, 41, 45, and 64.—Id., German., 36.—Cæs., B. G., 6, 10.—Vell. Patere., 2, 105.)

CHILLO, a Spartan, ranked, on account of his wisdom and experience, among the seven sages of Greece. He directed his attention to public affairs, and became one of the ephori, B.C. 556. (Diog. Laert., 1, 68.—Menag., ad loc.) Many of his maxims are quoted by the ancient writers, which justify the high reputation connected with his name. He died of joy at an advanced age, while embracing one of his sons who had gained a prize at the Olympic games. The story told by Herodotus (1, 59) respecting Chilo and the father of Pisistratus cannot be true, since Pisistratus usurped the government of Athens B.C. 561, only five years after Chilo became ephorus, and there could not have been any very great difference between their respective ages. Chilo appears to have travelled much abroad, and it is probable that he visited Sardis, the capital of Cæsus, a monarch who had sought an alliance with Sparta. (Herod., 1, 69.) It was at the court of the Lydian monarch, in all probability, that he saw Æsop, since Diogenes Laertius speaks of a question put by the philosopher to the fabulist. (Diog. Laert., 1, 68, seqq.)

CHIMÆRA, a fabulous monster, the offspring of Typhon and Echidna (Hesiod, Theog., 319), which ravaged the country of Lycia until slain by Bellerophon. It had the head and neck of a lion, the body of a goat (χίμαρα), and the tail of a serpent, and vomited forth fire. (Hom., Il., 6, 181.) Hesiod's account is somewhat different from that of Homer's, since he gives the Chimæra three heads, one that of a lion, another a goat's, and a third a serpent's. (Theog., 321.) There is strong reason to believe, however, that this passage in Hesiod is an interpolation. (Heyne, in Comment. Soc. Gott., vol. 2, p. 144.) The Latin poets, in their description of this monster, have imitated, as usual, their Grecian masters. (Consult Lucret., 5, 903.—Ovid, Met., 9, 646.—Virgil, Æn., 6, 288.) The various explanations given to this fabulous legend by the Greeks may be seen in Eustathius (ad Il., 6, 181, p. 634, 40). Servius, the great commentator on Virgil, gives a curious one: "This, in truth," says he, speaking of the Chimæra, "is a mountain of Lycia, the top of which is on fire at the present day: near it are lions: but the middle region is occupied by pastures which abound in goats. The lower parts of the mountain swarm with serpents." (Serv. ad Virg., Æn., l. c.)—The geographers agree in adapting this fable to the mountains on the coast of Lycia; but Strabo seems rather to place the site in Mount Cragus (Strab., 665), while Pliny, on the authority of Ctesias, whose words have been preserved by Photius (Cod., 72), fixes it near Phaselis, beyond Olympus. (Plin., 2, 106.) Seneca, in his account of this natural phenomenon, says (Ep., 79): "In Lycia regio notissima est, Hephestion incolæ vocant; perforatum pluribus locis solum, quod sine ullo nascentium damno ignis innoxius eucit. Laeta itaque regio et herbida, nil flammis adurentibus, sed tantum vi remissa ac languida refulgentibus." From this description it is plain that the fire in question had little of the usual volcanic character, being perfectly harmless. Instances of this sort of flame are, however by no means uncommon; that of Pietra mala, in the Apennines, is well known, and there are others in Epirus and the Greek islands. We are indebted to Capt. Beaufort for an accurate account of the Chimæra flame, which, after the lapse of so many centuries, is still unsubdued. This able navigator and antiquary, being at the time to the east of Olympus, says: "We had seen from the ship, the preceding night, a small but steady light among the hills; on mentioning the circumstance to the inhabitants, we learned that it was a ganar or volcanic flame; and they offered to supply us with horses and guides to examine it. We rode about two miles through a fertile plain, partly cultivated, and then, winding up a rocky and thickly-wooded glen, we arrived at the place. In the inner corner of a ruined building the wall is undermined, so as to leave an aperture of about three feet diameter, and shaped like the mouth of an oven; from thence the flame issues, giving out an intense heat, yet producing no smoke on the wall; and though from the neck of the opening we detached some small lumps of caked soot, the walls were hardly discoloured. Trees, brushwood, and weeds grow close around this little crater, a small stream trickles down the hill hard by, and the ground does not appear to feel the effect of its heat beyond the distance of a few yards. No volcanic productions whatever were perceived in the neighbourhood. The guide declared that, in the memory of man, there had been but one hole, and that it never had changed its size or appearance. It was never accompanied, he said, by earthquakes or noises, and it ejected neither stones, smoke, nor noxious vapours; nothing but a brilliant and perpetual flame, which no quantity of water could quench." (Beaufort's Karamania, p. 47, seqq.—Compare Clarke's Travels, vol. 5, p. 427.—Cramer's Asia Minor, vol. 2, p. 258, seqq.)

CHIMERUM, a promontory on the coast of Epirus, opposite the island of Paxos. It is mentioned by Thucydides (1, 30) as the place where the Corinthians formed a camp to protect their allies against the Corcyreans. (Compare Strabo, 324.—Pausan., 8, 7.) It seems to answer to Cape Saracino, above Parga. (Cramer's Ancient Greece, vol. 1, p. 111.)

CHION, a native of Heraclea Pontica, and disciple of Plato. Animated by the political fanaticism to which the young and inexperienced so easily abandon themselves, he left Athens, where he had resided for the space of five years, attending the instructions of Plato, and returned home with the determination of freeing his native city from the yoke of tyranny. Clearchus, who ruled at Heraclea, was not, it is true, a good prince; but, in slaying him, Chion was the cause of this city's falling under a worse tyrant, Satyrus, the brother of Clearchus. Chion himself perished as the victim of the latter's elevation to power. We have seventeen letters said to have been written by this young philosopher. They are principally addressed to his father Matris; but their authenticity has been called into question; and the real author is supposed to have been a Platonist of the fourth century. The style is clear, simple, and animated.

The best edition of these letters is that of Hoffmann, which is joined to the edition of the fragments of Memnon, by Orelli, Lips., 1816.—Consult, in relation to Chion, and the authenticity of these letters, the prolegomena of Hoffmann, p. 131, seqq. (Schöll, Hist. Lit. Gr., vol. 2, p. 281.)

CHIONIDES, said to have been the earliest writer of the old Athenian comedy. (Compare Aristot., Poet., 3, 5.—Suidas, s. v. Χίων.) His representations date from Olymp. 73, 2, or 487 B.C. The names of three of his comedies are recorded, Ἱππῶς, Ἡεσπία ἢ Ἀσσυριοί, and Παγγοί. To judge from these titles, we should conclude that his comedies had a political reference, and were full of personal satire; and from an allusion in Vitruvius (Præf. in lib., 6) we may infer, that they were gnomeic, like those of Epicharmus. (Theatre of the Greeks, p. 99, 4th ed.)

CHIOS, now Scio, an island in the Ægean Sea, between Lesbos and Samos, on the coast of Asia Minor. It is about 900 stadia in circuit, and was probably once connected with the main land, from which it is separated only by a strait three leagues wide. (Strabo, 615.) It was known by the names of Æthalia, Maëris, and Pityusa, but its most prevalent name was Chios, derived, according to some, from χίων, snow, because its mountains were often covered with it. Isidorus, however, deduces the name from a Syriac term signifying mastic, with which the island abounds. (Compare Dioscorides, 1, 90.—Plin., 12, 16.) It was well inhabited, and could once equip a hundred ships; and its chief town, called Chios, had a beautiful harbour which could contain eighty ships. (Herodot., 6, 8, and 31.—Thucyd., 8, 15.) The wine of this island, so much celebrated by the ancients, is still in esteem. The Chians are said to have first known the art of cultivating the vine, taught them by Enopion, the son of Bacchus, and by them communicated to the rest of mankind. The first red wine was made here. The marble of Chios was also in repute. It was one of the places which contended for the honour of having given birth to Homer, and his school was shown in the island. Modern Scio, until the dreadful ravages of the Turks, contained 115,000 inhabitants, nearly all Greeks, and was the best cultivated and most flourishing island in the Archipelago. (Compare Malte-Brun, Geogr., vol. 2, p. 56, Ant. ed.)

CHIRON, the most celebrated of the Centaurs (vid. Centauri), and son of Saturn and the nymph Philyra. Dreading the jealousy of his wife Rhea, the god is said to have transformed Philyra into a mare, and himself into a steed: the offspring of this union was Chiron, half man and half horse. This legend first appeared in the poem of the Gigantomachia. (Schol. ad Apoll. Rh., 3, 554.) It is also noticed by Pindar. (Pyth., 3, 1, seqq.) Probably the praise of Chiron, by Homer (Il., 11, 832), for his love of justice, led to the making him the offspring of the god who ruled over the golden race of men; and if, as it would appear, he was skilled in music, a more suitable mother could not have been assigned him than the nymph “Lyre-loving.” (Φιλιρρα, quasi Φιλιρρα.—Welcker, Nachtrag zur Tril., p. 53, not.) Unto Chiron was intrusted the rearing and educating of Jason and his son Medeus, Hercules, Æsculapius, and Achilles. Besides his knowledge of the musical art, which he imparted to his heroic pupils, he was also skilled in surgery, which he taught to the last two of the number. In the contest between Hercules and the Centaurs, Chiron was accidentally wounded in the knee by one of the arrows of the hero. Grieved at this unhappy event, Hercules ran up, drew out the arrow, and applied to the wound a remedy given by Chiron himself; but in vain; the venom of the hydra was not to be overcome. Chiron retired into his cave longing to die, but unable on account of his immortality, till, on his expressing his willingness to die for Prometheus, he was released by death from his misery. According to another account, he was, on his prayer to Jove for relief, raised to the sky and made the constellation of Sagittarius. (Ovid, Fast., 5, 379, seqq.—Hygin. Poet. Astron., 2, 38.—Keightley's Mythology, p. 69, 317, 356.)

CHLOE, I. a surname of Ceres at Athens. Her yearly festival, called Chloëia, was celebrated with much mirth and rejoicing on the 6th of the month Thargelion (a month corresponding to the middle of our May and June), and a ram, together with young garden plants, was offered to her. She had a temple near the citadel. (Pausan., 1, 22.—Schol. ad Soph., Œd. Col., 1600.) The name Chloë (χλόη) embraces the double idea of “green” or “verdant,” as referring to the young blade of corn coming forth and gradually increasing, and also “golden-coloured” or “yellow,” as applicable to the ripened harvest. In this latter sense it bears a direct relation to the Homeric ξανθή ἀμύνη, and the Roman “Flava Ceres.” (Consult Creuzer, Symbolik, vol. 4, p. 314, not.)—II. A female name of frequent occurrence, and denoting “the blooming one,” “the fresh in youthful beauty,” &c. It comes from χλόη, “the young blade of grass, corn,” &c.

CHLORIS, I. the goddess of flowers, who married Zephyrus. The name is derived from the Greek χλωρός, “verdant,” and, according to Ovid, she is the same as Flora. (Ovid, Fast., 5, 195.)—II. A daughter of Amphion son of Jason and Persephone, who married Nelus, king of Pylos, by whom she had one daughter and twelve sons, who all, except Nestor, were killed by Hercules. (Pausan., 2, 21, 9, 36.)

CHLORUS. Vid. Constantius Chlorus.

CHOASPES, I. an Indian river. (Vid. Suastus.)—II. A river of Susiana. (Vid. Eulaeus.)

CHOBUS, a river of Colechis, falling into the Euxine, north of the mouth of the Phasis. (Arrian, Periplus, Pont. Eux., p. 122, ed. Blancard.) Mannert supposes it to be the same with the modern Shijani. (Geogr., vol. 4, p. 394.)

CHERÆDES, islands in the Ionian Sea, off the coast of Iapygia. (Thucyd., 7, 33.) D'Anville follows Cluverius in placing them near the harbour of Tarentum. (Compare Haack, ad Thucyd., l. c.)

CHEREE, islands off the coast of Eubœa, near Styra. They coincide with the Caralleri of modern maps. (Herodot., 6, 101.)

CHERILUS, I. an Athenian tragic poet, the contemporary of Phrynichus, and, like him, the competitor of Æschylus. With Pratinas and the last-mentioned dramatist he contended Olymp. 70, 2, or B.C. 499, the time when Æschylus first exhibited. It is stated that he contended with Sophocles also, but the difference in their ages renders this extremely improbable; and the mistake may easily have arisen from the way in which Suidas mentions the book on the chorus which Sophocles wrote against him and Thespis. (Cherilus, ed. Næke, p. 7.) It would seem that tragedy had not altogether departed from its original form in his time, and that the chorus was still satyric. Cherilus is said to have written 150 pieces, but no fragments have come down to us. The disparaging remarks of Hermecus and Proclus do not refer to him, but to his Samian namesake (Cherilus, ed. Næke, p. 92), and he is mentioned by Alexis in such goodly company (Athenæus, 4, p. 164, c.) that we cannot believe his poetry to have been altogether contemptible. One of his plays was called the Alope, and appears to have been of a strictly mythical character. (Pausan., 1, 14.) Some improvements in theatrical costume are ascribed to him by Suidas and Eudocia. (Theatre of the Greeks, p. 59, 4th ed.)—II. A native of Samos, born in a state of slavery, from which condition he subsequently found means to extricate himself. Suidas, from whom we obtain this fact, makes him to have been the pupil and favourite of Herodotus; but in what this same lexicographer adds, that Chærilus was a young man when Xerxes invaded Greece, there is a contradiction to the previous assertion, since Herodotus was at this time but just born. Plutarch states, that Lysander of Sparta was very fond of the poet's society: this would fix the period when he flourished between the peace of Cimon and the commencement of the Peloponnesian war, or between 460 and 431 B.C. (Chærilus, ed. Näge, p. 21, seqq.) In his old age Chærilus was invited to the court of Macedonia by King Archelaus, who allowed him, it is said, three minæ daily. At the court of this prince he died. Chærilus perceived that a poet could no longer please by following the footsteps of Homer, since a people arrived at the degree of civilization in which the Greeks then were, seemed no longer capable of relishing, in a modern work, the simplicity which possesses so many charms in the earlier national poetry. Chærilus selected, in consequence, an historical subject, the victory of his countrymen over the arms of Xerxes. In this, however, he was unfortunate, since so recent an event was incompatible with the employment of fiction, and fiction is an important part of the machinery of every epic poem. According to Stobæus, he entitled his poem Περσῆς, "the Perseid." We have so few fragments remaining of this poem of his, that we are unable to ascertain whether he ended it with the battle of Salamis, or carried it on to the close of the war with Xerxes. This poem was a monument raised to the glory of the Athenians. An ancient law of Solon's relative to Homer, was revived in honour of Chærilus, and the people decreed that the poem should be publicly read, every year, at the festival of the Panathenæa. Suidas, it is true, merely states, that "it was decreed that this poem should be read with those of Homer." But such a resolve could only proceed from the Athenians, and could only have reference to the great celebration just mentioned, which periodically reunited the tribes of Attica. Suidas adds, that the author received a piece of gold for every verse; a recompense but little in unison with the spirit of a republic, and still less probable in the case of a long epic poem. It would seem, in fact, that Suidas is here mistaken, and relates of the Samian Chærilus what happened to another poet of the same name, who composed an effusion in honour of Alexander the Great. (Chærilus, ed. Näge, p. 78, seqq.) Whatever the reputation of Chærilus may have been, one thing at least is certain, that the Alexandrian critics excluded him from their canon, in which they assigned the fifth and last place to his rival Antimachus. A certain want of elegance with which the style of Chærilus was reproached, as well as the predilection of Plato for Antimachus, may have been the primary causes of this disgraceful exclusion of the Athenian poet.—Among the fragments of the Perseid which have come down to us, there are some verses that have given rise to a curious discussion. The lines in question are preserved for us by Josephus (contra Apion., 1, p. 454.—vol. 2, ed. Hartercamp), as the most ancient profane document in which mention is made of the Jews. In the enumeration of the forces composing the army of Xerxes, Chærilus speaks of the inhabitants of the mountains of Solymi, in the vicinity of a large lake. (Ὀὐκὸν δ' ἐν Σολύμοις ὄρεσιν, πλατὺν ἐπὶ λίμνην.) Josephus is convinced that the poet means Jerusalem, but some critics of modern days insist that the Solymi in Lycia are meant, because Chærilus speaks of these troops as τροχικοῦνδες, i. e., having the hair cut in a circular form; a usage which the Levitical law (Levit., 19, 27) forbade, with the express view of distinguishing the Jews from the neighbouring nations. All doubt, however, is removed with regard to the poet's meaning, by his adding, that the troops in question spoke the Phœnician tongue, of which the Hebrew is only a dialect (Γλῶσσαν μὲν Φοίνισσαν ἀπὸ στομάτων ἀφέντες). It is probable, therefore, that Chærilus knew the inhabitants of these countries had in general the custom of cutting the hair of the head in this way, and that his means of information had not put him in possession of the fact, that one community of Syria deviated from this custom. (Schöll, Hist. Lit. Gr., vol. 2, p. 125, seqq.)—III. A poet of Iassus in Asia Minor, of whom Horace (Epist., 2, 1, 233.—Epist. ad Pis., 357), Quintus Curtius (8, 5, 8), and Ausonius (Ep. 16), as well as Aëron and Porphyryon, the scholiasts on Horace, make mention. It was to this poet that Alexander the Great is said to have promised a piece of gold for every good verse which he should compose in his praise. The commentator, known under the name of the scholiast of Crœquius, informs us, that Chærilus could only produce seven lines that were deemed worthy of the price offered by the monarch. Porphyryon, however, remarks in more general terms, "Hujus omnino septem versus laudabantur." Now Strabo (672), and also Athenæus (8, 356), have preserved for us a translation, by Chærilus, into seven hexameters, of the Assyrian inscription on the tomb of Sardanapalus; and hence it has been supposed that these are the seven verses to which the scholiasts refer.—It is also stated of Chærilus that he consented to receive a blow for every verse of his encomiums on Alexander which should be rejected by the judges, and that he paid dearly, in consequence, for his foolish presumption. It is probable that he was the author of the poem on the Lamiac war (Λαμιακά), which Suidas erroneously ascribes to the Samian Chærilus. (Chærilus, ed. Näge, p. 101, seqq.—Schöll, Hist. Lit. Gr., vol. 3, p. 75.)

CHORASMII, a people of Asia, between Sogdiana and the northeastern shore of the Caspian, whose capital was Gorgo, now Urgheg. Their country is now Kharasm. Ritter has some curious speculations on the name Khorasan, as indicating a country in which the worship of the sun anciently prevailed (Khorasan.—Ritter, Vorhalle, p. 90.)

CHORÆUS. Vid. Coræus.

CHOSROES, I. (more correctly Khosrou), king of Persia, surnamed the Great, was the twenty-first monarch of the line of the Sassanides, and succeeded his father Kobad, A.D. 531. The Orientals, even after the lapse of twelve centuries, are accustomed to cite him as a model for kings, and the glorious surname of the "Just" is one which he frequently bears in history. Chosroes manifested even in early life the germs of those virtues which were afterward so brilliantly developed by him on coming to the throne. At the period of his accession Persia was involved in a war with Justinian, but Chosroes succeeded in negotiating a favourable peace, by the terms of which the Roman emperor had to pay 11,000 pounds of gold, and forego various advantages. Not long after (A.D. 540), having become powerful by reason of various Asiatic conquests, and regarding the Romans as usurpers of many of the ancient provinces of Persia, he invaded Syria, laid Antioch in ashes, and only drew off his forces from the territories of the empire on the payment of a considerable sum. After several other victorious expeditions, he renewed the war with Justin, the successor of Justinian, whom he compelled to solicit a truce, but was soon after driven back across the Euphrates by Theodosius, the new emperor, and the Romans took up their winter-quarters in the Persian provinces. Chosroes died A.D. 579, after a glorious reign of forty-eight years. He encouraged the arts, founded schools, and is said to have made considerable proficiency in philosophy himself. (Saint-Martin, in Biogr. Univ., vol. 22, p. 380, seqq.—Encycl. Am., vol. 3, p. 162.)—II. The second of the name, grandson of the preceding, ascended the Persian throne A.D. 590. The earlier part of his career was marked by great reverses of fortune, he having been dethroned and driven from his kingdom by a formidable rival, and compelled to take refuge with the Emperor Maurice. He owed his restoration to the generous aid of the same potentate. Not long after, upon the death of Maurice, he carried his victorious arms against his former allies, to the very walls of Constantinople and Alexandria; and subsequently he beheld the very Romans, whom he had so often defeated, penetrating, under Heraclius, into the heart of the Persian empire, and pillaging and burning his palace itself. He was at last dethroned by his own son and cast into prison, where he died A.D. 628. (Saint-Martin, in Biogr. Univ., vol. 22, p. 391.)

CHRONIUM MARE, a name applied by the ancients to the Frozen Ocean. The Cumbri, according to Pliny (4, 13), called it Morimarusa, i. e., "the dead sea." In the Welsh tongue, mor is the "sea," and marv "dead;" in the Irish, muir-croinn denotes a thick, coagulated, frozen sea. (Compare Classical Journal, vol. 6, p. 297.)

CHRYSA, I. a town of Troas, on the coast, near the city of Hamaxitus, where lived Chryseis, the father of the beautiful Chryseis. (Hom., Iliad, 1, 37.—Id. ibid., 430, &c.) Strabo (604), however, places it in the innermost part of the Adramytnian Gulf, and hence some in favour of making two places of this name, an old and a new Chrysa. (Compare Heyne's note to the German transl. of Le Chevalier, p. 7, seqq.) This place was famous for a temple of Apollo Smintheus (vid. Smintheus), whence it was also called Sminthium. (Mannert, Geogr., vol. 6, pt. 3, p. 463.)—II. A small island in the immediate vicinity of Lemnos, in which Philoctetes took up his abode when suffering from the wound inflicted by one of the arrows of Hercules. (Pausan., 8, 33.) It was afterward submerged by the sea, in accordance with an ancient prediction. (Herodot., 7, 6.) Choiseul-Gouffier (Voyage pittoresque de la Grèce, vol. 2, p. 129) thinks he saw traces of it still remaining. That the change here referred to has been occasioned by volcanic action no one can doubt. (Id. Moschell.) The whole island of Lemnos is said to bear the strongest marks of the effects of volcanic fire; the rocks in many parts are like the burned and vitrified scoria of furnaces. (Hunt's Journal, in Walpole's Collection, vol. 2, p. 59.)

CHRYSANTHUS, an eclectic philosopher of Sardis, made highest of Lydia by the Emperor Julian, and supposed to possess a power of conversing with the gods and of predicting future events. (Eunap., p. 144, seqq.—Enfield's History of Philosophy, vol. 2, p. 71.)

CHRYSAOR, a son of Medusa by Neptune, born immediately after the decapitation of his mother by Perseus. (Apollod., 2, 4, 2—Heyne, ad loc.) He was of gigantic stature, and received his name, according to Hesiod (Theog., 283), from his wielding in his hands a "golden sword" (χρυσέον ἄορ). Chrysaor became by Callirhoe, one of the ocean-nymphs, the father of Geryon and Echidna. (Hesiod. Theog., 287, seqq.—Compare Ctesias Ephes. ap. Plut. de flum., p. 1034, ed. Wytt.—Tetzl. ad Lycophr., v. 17.)—The legend of Chrysaor, like that of Perseus itself, has a blended religious and astronomical reference. It is based on the idea of purification by blood, and also of the reappearance of fertility, after the darker period of the year, the months of winter, have passed away. (Compare remarks under the article Perseus.)

CHRYSAORIUS, a surname of Jupiter, from his temple at Stratonice in Caria. There was a political union of certain Carian states, which held their meetings here, under the name of Chrysaorium. These states had votes in proportion to the number of towns they possessed. (Strab., 660.—Cramer's Asia Minor, vol. 2, p. 204.)

CHRYSEIS, the patronymic of Astynome, daughter of Chryseis. (Id. Chryseis.)

CHRYSES, a priest of Apollo Smintheus at Chrysa. He was the father of Astynome, who was called from him Chryseis. In the division of the spoils of Hypoplacian Thebe, when that city was taken by the Greeks, Chryseis, as one of the captives, fell to the share of Agamemnon. Chryses, upon hearing of his daughter's fate, repaired to the Grecian camp, attired in his sacerdotal insignia, to solicit her restitution; and when his prayers were fruitless, he implored the aid of Apollo, who visited the Greeks with a pestilence, and obliged them to restore Chryseis. (Hom., Il., 1, 11, seqq.—Id. ib., 366, seqq.) It has been asked how Chryseis, a native of Chrysa, could have been taken prisoner at Thebe? Eustathius solves the difficulty, giving us our choice of one of two explanations. According to one account, as he informs us, she had been sent to Thebe as to a place of more safety than Chrysa, while another made her to have gone thither to attend a festival of Diana. (Eustath. ad Il., l. 366.)

CHRYSIPIUS, I. a son of Pelops, carried off by Laüs. (Apollod., 3, 5, 6.) This circumstance became a theme with many ancient writers, and hence the story assumed different shapes, according to the fancy of those who handled it. The death of Chrysippus was also related in different ways. According to the common account, he was slain by Atreus, at the instigation of his stepmother Hippodamia. (Consult Heyne, ad loc.)—II. A stoic philosopher of Soli in Cilicia Campestris. He fixed his residence at Athens, and became a disciple of Cleanthes, the successor of Zeno. He was equally distinguished for natural abilities and industry, seldom suffering a day to elapse without writing 500 lines. He wrote several hundred volumes, of which three hundred were on logical subjects, but in all he borrowed largely from others. He maintained, with the Stoics in general, that the world was God, or a universal effusion of his spirit, and that the superior part of this spirit, which consisted in mind and reason, was the common nature of things, containing the whole and every part. Sometimes he speaks of God as the power of fate and the necessary chain of events; sometimes he calls him fire, and sometimes he deifies the fluid parts of nature, as water and air; and again, the earth, sun, moon, and stars, and the universe in which these are comprehended, and even those men who have obtained immortality. He was very fond of the figure Sorites in arguing, which is hence called by Persius the heap of Chrysippus. His discourses abounded more in curious subtleties and nice distinctions than in solid arguments. In disputation, in which he spent the greatest part of his life, he discovered a degree of promptitude and confidence which approached towards audacity. He often said to his preceptor, "Give me doctrines, and I will find arguments to support them." It was a singular proof of his haughty spirit, that when a certain person asked him what preceptor he would advise him to choose for his son, he said, "Me; for if I thought any philosopher excelled me, I would myself become his pupil." With so much contempt did he look down upon the distinctions of rank, that he would never, as other philosophers did, pay his court to princes or great men, by dedicating to them any of his writings. The vehemence and arrogance with which he supported his tenets, created him many adversaries, particularly in the Academic and Epicurean sects. Even his friends of the Stoic school complained, that, in the warmth of dispute, while he was attempting to load his adversary with the reproach of obscurity and absurdity, his own ingenuity often failed him, and he adopted such unusual and illogical modes of reasoning, as gave his opponents great advantages over him. (Cic., Ac. Quæst., 4, 27.) It was also a common practice with Chrysippus, at different times, to take the opposite sides of the same question, and thus furnish his antagonists with weapons, which might easily be turned, as occasion offered, against himself. Carneades, who was one of his most able and skilful adversaries, frequently availed himself of this circumstance, and refuted Chrysippus by convicting him of inconsistency. Of his writings nothing remains, except a few extracts which are preserved in the works of Cicero, Plutarch, Seneca, and Aulus Gellius. He died in the 143d Olympiad, B.C. 208, at the age of eighty-three. A statue was erected to his memory by Ptolemy. (Diog. Laert., 7, 189.—Enfield's History of Philosophy, vol. 1, p. 358.)

CHRYSOCERAS, or the horn of gold, a name given to the harbour of Byzantium. (Vid. Byzantium.)

CHRYSOPLIS, a town and harbour opposite Byzantium, on the Asiatic shore. It is often mentioned in history. The Athenians established there a toll, towards the close of the Peloponnesian war, to be paid by all ships coming from the Euxine. (Xen., Hist. Gr., 1, 1, 14.—Polyb., 4, 44, 3.) The ten thousand Greeks were encamped there for some days prior to crossing over into Thrace. (Xen., Anab., 6, 6, 22.) It is mentioned by Strabo (563) as a small town, and Pliny says, "Fuit Chrysopolis" (5, 32). Several historians, however, of a later date, continue to speak of it. (Zosim., 2, 30.—Soerat., Hist. Eccles., 1, 4.—Amm. Marcell., 22, 12.) Stephanus of Byzantium gives various etymological derivations of the name. The modern Scutari is thought to correspond to the ancient place. (Cramer's Asia Minor, vol. 1, p. 191, seq.)

CHRYSORRHŌAS, or Golden Stream, a river of Syria, near Damascus. It rises in Mount Libanus, and, after leaving its native valley, divides itself into five small streams near the village of Dumar. The main one of these flows through Damascus, while two others water the gardens in the plain of El-Gutha. All the streams unite subsequently, and their collected waters empty into the sea. The Chryssorrhōas is the same with the Bardine or Amāna (in Scripture Abana, 2 Kings, 5, 12), now the Baradi. (Abulfeda, Tab. Syr.—Burekhardt, p. 37.—Von Richter, Wallfahrt, p. 154, seq.)

CHRYSOSTOM (St. John), an eminent father of the church, was born of a noble family at Antioch, A.D. 347. His father's name was Secundus, and the surname of Chrysostom, or "golden mouth" (Χρυσόστομος), obtained by the son, was given to him on account of his eloquence. He was bred to the bar, but quitted it for an ascetic life: first, with a monk on a mountain near Antioch, and then in a cave by himself. He remained in this retirement six years, when he returned to Antioch, and, being ordained, became so celebrated for his talents as a preacher, that, on the death of Nectarius, patriarch of Constantinople, he was chosen to supply his place. On obtaining this preferment, which he very unwillingly accepted, he acted with great vigour and austerity in the reform of abuses, and exhibited all the mistaken notions of the day in regard to celibacy and the monastic life. He also persecuted the pagans and heretics with great zeal, and sought to extend his episcopal power with such unremitting ardour, that he involved himself in a quarrel with Theophilus, bishop of Alexandria, who enjoyed the patronage of the Empress Eudoxia; which quarrel ended in his formal deposition by a synod held at Chalcedon A.D. 403. He was, however, so popular in Constantinople, that a formidable insurrection ensued, and the empress herself interfered for his return. Towards the end of the same year, owing to his zeal relative to a statue of Eudoxia, placed near the great church, and causing a disturbance of public worship, all his troubles were renewed. If true, that in one of his sermons the empress was compared by him to Herodias, who sought the head of John in a charger, the anger of Eudoxia was not altogether unjustifiable. The consequence of her resentment was the assembling of another synod, and in A.D. 404 the patriarch was again deposed and sent into exile. The place of his banishment was Cucusus, a lonely town among the ridges of Mount Taurus, on the confines of Cappadocia and Cilicia. He sustained himself with much fortitude; but having, by means of his great influence and many adherents, procured the intercession of the western emperor, Honorius, with his brother Arcadius, he was ordered to be removed still farther from the capital, and died on the journey at Comana in Pontus, A.D. 407, at the age of sixty. Opinion was much divided in regard to his merits for some time after his death, but at length his partisans prevailed, and, thirty years from his decease, he was removed from his place of interment as a saint, and his remains were met in procession by the Emperor Theodosius the younger, on their removal from the place of his original interment to Constantinople. Chrysostom was a voluminous writer, but more eloquent than either learned or acute. Although falling short of Attic purity, his style is free, copious, and unaffected, and his diction often glowing and elevated. The numerous treatises or sermons by which he chiefly gained his reputation, are very curious for the information they contain on the customs and manners of the times, as elicited by his declamation against prevailing vices and follies. The first entire Greek edition of the works of Chrysostom was that of Sir Henry Saville, at Eton, in 8 vols. folio, 1613; but that of Montfaucon, Paris, with annotations and his life, 11 vols. folio, 1718, is by far the most complete. (Gorton's Biogr. Dict., vol. 1, p. 485.)

CHRYSOTHEMIS, I. a daughter of Agamemnon and Clytemnestra.—II. A Cretan, who first obtained the poetical prize at the Pythian games. (Pausanias, 10, 7.)

CIBĀLE, a town of Lower Pannonia, situate on the Saavus, about fifty miles from Sirmium, and about one hundred from the confluence of the Saavus and Danube. It was famous for the defeat of Licinius by Constantine, A.D. 315, and was also the birthplace of Gratian. Its name is preserved in the obscure ruins of Savilei. (Eutropius, 10, 4.—Amm. Marcellinus, 30, 24.)

CIBYRA, I. a flourishing commercial city in the southwest angle of Phrygia, between Iycaia and Caria. It was surnamed the Great for distinction sake from another city of the same name situate in Pamphylia. Cibyra seems to have been originally a small town of the Cabalees, from whom the tract of Cabalia or Cabalis took its name. On the accession, however, of a Pisidian colony, the site was changed, the town considerably enlarged, and the name gradually altered from Cabalis, or some analogous form, to that of Cibyra. The place became very prosperous, and its prosperity was chiefly owing to the excellence of its laws, though the government was that of an absolute monarchy. Under this government were included the three old Cabalian towns of Bubon, Balbura, and Enoanda, and these, together with the capital Cibyra, constituted a tetrapolis. Each of these towns had one vote in the general assembly of the states, except Cibyra, which had two, in consideration of its superior power. This city, as we are told by Strabo, could raise no less than 30,000 foot and 2000 horse, and its influence and power extended over a part of Pisidia, Milyas, and Lycia, as far as Peræa of the Rhodians. (Strab., 631.) After its conquest by the Romans, we find Cibyra mentioned as the chief city of a considerable forum or conventus, comprising not less than twenty-five towns. (Cic., Ep. ad Att., 5, 21.—Plin., 5, 29.) According to Tacitus (Ann., 4, 13), Cibyra, having been nearly destroyed by an earthquake, was afterward restored by Tiberius. In later writers we find it included within the limits of Caria. (Hierocl., 690.) Strabo reports, that there were four dialects in use at Cibyra: that of the ancient Solymi, the Greek, the Pisidian, and the Lydian; the latter, however, he adds, was quite extinct even in Lydia. The Cibyrææ excelled in engraving on iron or steel. (Strab., 631.) No trace of the ruins of Cibyra has as yet been discovered. They are to be found, however, in all probability, not far from Denisli, or Laodicea, on a river which is either the Lyens or a branch of it. (Cramer's Asia Minor, vol. 2, p. 269, seqq.)—11. A town on the coast of Pamphylia, southeast of Aspendus, called Cibyra Parva, for distinction's sake from the preceding. Ptolemy annexes it to Cilicia Trachea. Its site corresponds to that of the modern Ibvar. (Strab., 667.)

CICERO, MARCUS TULLIUS, a celebrated Roman orator, was born at Arpinum, the native place of Marius, B.C. 107, the same year which gave birth to Pompey the Great. His family was ancient, and of equestrian rank, but had never taken part in public affairs at Rome, though both his father and grandfather were persons of consideration in the part of Italy in which they resided. (Or. contra. Rull., 2, 1.) His father, being a man of cultivated mind, determined to educate his two sons, Marcus and Quintus, on an enlarged and liberal plan, and to fit them for the prospect of those public employments which his own weak state of health incapacitated him from seeking. Marcus, the elder of the two, soon displayed indications of a superior mind, and we are told that his schoolfellows carried home such accounts of his extraordinary parts, that their parents often visited the school for the sake of seeing a youth who gave so much promise of future eminence. (Plut. in Vit.) One of his earliest masters was the poet Archias, whom he defended afterward in his consular year; and under his instruction he made such proficiency as to compose a poem, though yet a boy, on the fable of Glauceus, which had formed the subject of one of the tragedies of Æschylus. Soon after he assumed the manly gown, he was placed under the care of Scevola, the celebrated lawyer, whom he introduces so beautifully into several of his philosophical dialogues; and in no long time he gained a thorough knowledge of the laws and political institutions of his country. (De Clar., Or., 29.) This was about the time of the Social War; and, according to the Roman custom, which made it a necessary part of education to learn the military art by actual service, Cicero took the opportunity of serving a campaign under the consul Pompeius Strabo, father of Pompey the Great. Returning to pursuits more congenial to his natural taste, he commenced the study of philosophy under Philo the Academic. But his chief attention was reserved for oratory, to which he applied himself with the assistance of Molo, the first rhetorician of the day; while Diodotus, the Stoic, exercised him in the argumentative subtleties for which the disciples of Zeno were so celebrated. At the same time he declaimed daily in Greek and Latin with some young noblemen, who were competitors in the same race of honours with himself.—Cicero was the first Roman who found his way to the highest dignities of the state with no other recommendation than his powers of eloquence and his merits as a civil magistrate. (Or. in Cat., 3, 6.—In Pis., 3.—Pro Sull., 30.—Pro Dom., 37.—De Harusp. Resp., 23.—Ep. ad Fam., 15, 4.) The first cause of importance which he undertook was the defence of Roscius Amerinus, in which he distinguished himself by his courageous defence of his client, who had been accused of parricide by Chrysogonus, a favourite of Sylla's. This obliging him, however, according to Plutarch, to leave Rome from prudential motives, the power of Sylla being at that time paramount, he employed his time in travelling for two years under pretence of his health, which he tells us was yet unequal to the exertion of pleading. (De Clar., Or., 91.) At Athens he met with T. Pomponius Atticus, whom he had formerly known at school, and there renewed with him a friendship which lasted through life, in spite of the change of interest and estrangement of affection so commonly attendant on turbulent times. Here too he attended the lectures of Antiochus, who, under the name of an Academic, taught the dogmatic doctrines of Plato and the Stoics. Though Cicero at first evinced considerable dislike of his philosophical views, he seems afterward to have adopted the sentiments of the Old Academy, which they much resembled, and not until late in life to have relapsed into the sceptical tenets of his earlier instructor Philo. (Warburton, Div. Leg., lib. 3, sec. 3.—Vossius, de Nat. Log., c. 8, sec. 22.) After visiting the principal philosophers and rhetoricians of Asia, he returned at the age of thirty to Rome, so strengthened and improved both in bodily and mental powers, that he soon eclipsed in speaking all his competitors for public favour. So popular a talent speedily gained him the suffrage of the commons; and being sent to Sicily as quæstor, at a time when the metropolis itself was visited with a scarcity of corn, he acquitted himself in that delicate situation with so much success as to supply the clamorous wants of the people without oppressing the province from which the provisions were raised. (Or. pro Plane., 26.—In Verr., 5, 14.) Returning thence with greater honours than had ever before been decreed to a Roman governor, he gained for himself still farther the esteem of the Sicilians, by undertaking his celebrated prosecution of Verres; who, though defended by the influence of the Metelli and the eloquence of Hortensius, was driven in despair into voluntary exile. Five years after his quæstorship Cicero was elected ædile. Though possessed of only a moderate fortune, he nevertheless, with the good sense and taste which mark his character, was enabled, while holding this expensive office, to preserve in his domestic arrangements the dignity of a literary and public man, without any of the ostentation of magnificence which often distinguished the candidate for popular applause. (Or. pro Dom., 58.) After the customary interval of two years, he was returned at the head of the list as prætor (Or. in Pis., 1), and now made his first appearance on the rostra in support of the Manilian law. About the same time, also, he defended Cluentius. At the expiration of his prætorship, he refused to accept a foreign province, the usual reward of that magistracy; but, having the consulship full in view, and relying on his interest with Cæsar and Pompey, he allowed nothing to divert him from that career of glory for which he now believed himself to be destined. Having succeeded at length in attaining to the high office of which he was in quest, he signalized his consulship by crushing the conspiracy of Catiline; and the Romans hailed him, on the discovery and overthrow of this nefarious plot, as the Father and Deliverer of his country. His consulate was succeeded by the return of Pompey from the East, and the establishment of the First Triumvirate; which, disappointing his hopes of political greatness, induced him to resume his forensic and literary occupations. From these he was called off, after an interval of four years, by the threatening measures of Clodius, who at length succeeded in driving him into exile. This event, which, considering the circumstances connected with it, was one of the most glorious of his life, filled him with the utmost distress and despondency. Its history is as follows. Clodius, Cicero's bitter enemy, had caused a law to be renewed, declaring every one guilty of treason who ordered the execution of a Roman citizen before the people had condemned him. The blow was aimed against Cicero, on account of the punishment he had caused to be inflicted, by the authority of the senate, upon the accomplices of Catiline. The illustrious ex-consul put on mourning, and appeared in public, accompanied by the equites and many young patricians, demanding the protection of the people. Clodius, however, at the head of his armed adherents, insulted them repeatedly, and ventured even to besiege the senate house. Cicero, upon this, went into voluntary exile. His conduct, however, in this reverse of fortune, showed anything but the firmness of a man of true spirit. He wandered about Greece, bewailing his miserable condition, refusing the consolations which his friends attempted to administer, and shunning the public honours with which the Greek cities were eager to load him. (Ep. ad Att., lib. 3.—Ep. ad Fam., lib. 14.—Or. pro Sext., 22.—Pro Dom., 36.) He ultimately took refuge in Thessalonica with Plancus. Clodius, in the mean time, procured new decrees, in consequence of which Cicero's country seats were torn down, and a temple of Freedom built on the site of his house at Rome. His wife and children were also exposed to ill usage from his imbibed persecutors. A favourable change, however, soon took place in the minds of his countrymen. The audacity of Clodius became insupportable to all: Pompey encouraged Cicero's friends to get him recalled to Rome, and the senate also declared that it would not attend to any business until the decree which ordered his banishment was revoked. Through the zeal of the consul Lentulus, and at the proposition of several tribunes, the decree of recall passed the assembly of the people in the following year, in spite of a bloody tumult, in which Cicero's brother Quintus was dangerously wounded; and the orator returned to his native country, after an absence of ten months, and was received with every mark of honour. The senate met him at the city gates, and his entry resembled a triumph. The attacks of Clodius, though they could now do no harm, were immediately renewed, until Cicero was freed from the insults of this turbulent demagogue by the hand of Milo, whom he afterward, in a public trial for the deed, unsuccessfully defended. (Vid. Milo.) Five years after his return from exile he received the government of Cilicia, in consequence of Pompey's law, which obliged those senators of consular or prætorian rank who had never held any foreign command, to divide the vacant provinces among them. Cicero conducted a war, while in this office, with good success against the plundering tribes of the mountain districts of Cilicia, and was greeted by his soldiers with the title of Imperator. He resigned his command, and returned to Italy, about the close of the year 703, intending to prefer his claim to a triumph; but the troubles which were just then commencing between Cæsar and Pompey prevented him from obtaining one. His return home was followed by earnest endeavours to reconcile Pompey with Cæsar, and by very spirited behaviour when Cæsar required his presence in the senate. But this independent temper was only transient; and at no period of his public life did he display such miserable vacillation as at the opening of the civil war. His conduct, in this respect, had been faulty enough before, for he then vacillated between the several members of the first triumvirate, defending Vatinius in order to please Cæsar, and his bitter political enemy Gabinius to ingratiate himself with Pompey. Now, however, we find him first accepting a commission from the republic; then courting Cæsar; next, on Pompey's sailing for Greece, resolving to follow him thither; presently determining to stand neuter; then bent on retiring to the Pompeians in Sicily; and when, after all, he had joined their camp in Greece, discovering such timidity and discontent as to draw from Pompey the bitter reproof, "cupo ad hostes Cicero transire, ut nos timeat." (Macrobius, Sat., 2, 3.)

After the battle of Pharsalia and the flight of Pompey, he refused to take the command of some troops then under the orders of Cato, but returned to Italy, which was governed by Antony, the representative of Cæsar. His return was attended with several unpleasant circumstances, until the conqueror wrote to him, and soon after received him in the most friendly spirit. Cicero now devoted himself entirely to literature and philosophy. The state of his private affairs, however, involved him in great embarrassment. A large sum, which he had advanced to Pompey, had impoverished him, and he was forced to stand indebted to Atticus for present assistance. These difficulties led him to a step which it has been customary to regard with great severity; the divorce of his wife Terentia, though he was then in his 62d year, and his marriage with his rich ward Publilia, who was of an age disproportionate to his own. Yet, in reviewing this proceeding, we must not adopt the modern standard of propriety, forgetful of the character of an age which reconciled actions even of moral turpitude with a reputation for honour and virtue. Terentia was a woman of a most imperious and violent temper, and (what is more to the purpose) had in no slight degree contributed to his present embarrassment by her extravagance in the management of his private affairs. By her he had two children, a son born the year before his consulship, and a daughter, whose loss he was now fated to experience. To Tullia he was tenderly attached, not only from the excellence of her disposition, but from her love of polite literature; and her death tore from him, as he so pathetically laments to Sulpicius, the only comfort which the course of public events had left him. (Ep. ad Fam., 4, 14.) His distress was increased by the unfeeling conduct of Publilia, whom he soon divorced for testifying joy at the death of her step-daughter. It was on this occasion that he wrote his treatise "On Consolation," with a view to mitigate the anguish of his sufferings. His friends were assiduous in their attentions; and Cæsar, who had treated him with the utmost kindness on his return from Egypt, signified the respect he bore his character by sending a letter of condolence from Spain, where the remains of the Pompeian party still engaged him. But no attentions, however considerate, could soften Cicero's vexation at seeing the country he had formerly saved by his exertions, now subjected to the tyranny of one master. His speeches, indeed, for Marcellus and Ligarius exhibit traces of inconsistency; but for the most part he retired from public business, and gave himself up to the composition of those works which, while they mitigated his political sorrows, have secured his literary celebrity. The assassination of Cæsar, which took place in the following year, once more brought him on the stage of public affairs. He hoped to regain great political influence: but Antony took Cæsar's place, and all that was left Cicero to do was to compose those admirable orations against him which are known by the name of Philippics, and are equally distinguished for eloquence and patriotism. His enmity towards Antony induced him to favour the young Octavius, although the pretended moderation of the latter by no means deceived him. With him originated all the energetic resolutions of the senate in favour of the war which the consuls and the young Cæsar were conducting against Antony in the name of the republic; and for a time the prospect seemed to brighten. At last, however, Octavius having possessed himself of the consulship, and having formed an alliance with Antony and Lepidus, Cicero became convinced that liberty was at an end. At Tusculum, whither he had retired with his brother and nephew, he learned that Octavius had basely deserted him, and that his name, at Antony's demand, had been added to the list of the proscribed. He repaired, in a state of indecision, to the seacoast, and embarked. Contrary winds, however, drove him back to the shore. At the request of his slaves he embarked a second time, but soon returned again to await his fate at his country-seat near Formiæ. "I will die," said he, "in that country which I have so often saved." Here, then, he was disposed to remain, and to meet his death; but his slaves, who were warmly attached to him, could not bear to see him thus sacrificed; and when the party of soldiers sent to murder him was advancing towards the villa, they almost forced him to put himself into his litter, and to allow them to carry him once more on board of the vessel, which was still lying at Caieta. But, as they were bearing the litter towards the sea, they were overtaken in the walks of his own grounds by the soldiers who were in search of him, and who were headed by one Herennius, a centurion, and by C. Popilius Lænas. Popilius was a native of Picenum, and had, on a former occasion, been successfully defended by Cicero, when brought to trial for some offence before the courts at Rome. As the assistance of advocates was given gratuitously, the connexion between them and their clients was esteemed very differently from what it is among us; and it was therefore an instance of peculiar atrocity, that Popilius offered his services to Antony to murder his patron, from no other motive than the hope of gaining his favour, by showing such readiness to destroy his greatest enemy. The slaves of Cicero, undismayed at the appearance of the soldiers, prepared to defend their master; but he refused to allow any blood to be shed on his account, and commanded them to set down the litter and await the issue in silence. He was obeyed; and when the soldiers came up, he stretched out his head with perfect calmness, and submitted his neck to the sword of Popilius. He died in his sixty-fourth year, B.C. 43. When the murder was accomplished, the soldiers cut off his two hands also, as the instruments with which he had written his Philippic Orations; and the head and hands were carried to Rome, and exposed together at the Rostra. Men crowded to see the mournful sight, and testified by their tears the compassion and affection which his unworthy death, and his pure and amiable character, had so justly deserved. On the whole, antiquity may be challenged to produce an individual so virtuous, so perfectly amiable as Cicero. None interest more in their lives, none excite more painful emotions in their deaths. Others, it is true, may be found of loftier and more heroic character, who awe and subdue the mind by the grandeur of their views or the intensity of their exertions. But Cicero engages our affections by the integrity of his public conduct, the purity of his private life, the generosity, placability, and kindness of his heart, the playfulness of his temper, the warmth of his domestic attachments. In this respect his letters are invaluable. Here we see the man without disguise or affectation, especially in his letters to Atticus, to whom he unbosomed every thought, and talked with the same frankness as to himself. It must, however, be confessed, that the publication of this same correspondence has laid open the defects of his political character. Everything seemed to point out Cicero as the fittest person of the day to be a mediator between contending factions. And yet, after the eventful period of his consulship, we see him resigning the high station in the republic which he himself might have filled, to the younger Cato, who, with only half his abilities, little foresight, and no address, possessed that first requisite for a statesman, firmness. Cicero, on the contrary, was irresolute, timid, and inconsistent. (Montesquieu, Grand. des Rom. c. 12.) He talked, indeed, largely of preserving a middle course (Ep. ad Att., 1, 19), but he was continually vacillating from one to the other extreme; always too confident or too dejected; incorrigibly vain of success, yet meanly panegyricizing the government of a usurper. His foresight, sagacity, practical good sense, and singular tact in directing men's measures, were lost for want of that strength of mind which points them steadily to one object. He was never decided, never (as has sometimes been observed) took an important step without afterward repenting of it. Nor can we account for the firmness and resolution of his consulate, unless we discriminate between the ease of resisting a party and that of balancing contending interests. Boldness in opposition differs widely from steadiness in mediation; the latter implying a coolness of judgment, which a direct attack is so far from requiring, that it ever inspires minds naturally timid with unusual excitement.—Let us now pass to Cicero as a public speaker and writer. The orations he is known to have composed amount in all to about eighty, of which fifty-nine, either entire or in part, are preserved. All those pronounced by him during the five years intervening between his election to the quaestorship and adulescence have perished, except that for M. Tullius, the exordium and narratio of which were brought to light by the discoveries of Maio, in the Ambrosian library at Milan. From the same quarter have been obtained many other reliques of the eloquence of Cicero, among the most important of which are, a large fragment of the oration for Scaurus, and detached portions of that delivered against Clodius for his profanation of the mysteries of the Bona Dea. Of all the lost orations, the two most regretted are, that in defence of Cornelius, and the speech delivered by him in the temple of Bellona, in quelling the disturbance excited by the law of Otho. This last is said to have been one of the most signal victories of eloquence over the turbulence of human passions, while to the former Cicero himself frequently alludes as among the most finished of his compositions. The oration for Marcellus is maintained by many to be a spurious performance. It would seem, however, after weighing all the arguments adduced by modern critics, that a part is actually genuine, but that much has been subsequently interpolated by some rhetorician or declaimer. Of the rhetorical works of Cicero, the most admired and finished is the dialogue De Oratore, of which Cicero himself highly approved, and which his friends were accustomed to regard as one of the happiest of his productions. In the Oratoria Partitiones, the subject is the art of arranging and distributing the parts of an oration so as to adapt them in the best manner to their proper end, that of moving and persuading an audience. In the dialogue on famous orators, entitled Brutus, he gives a short character of all who had ever flourished in Greece or Rome, with any considerable reputation for eloquence, down to his own time. It was intended as a fourth and supplemental book to the treatise De Oratore. The Orator, addressed to Brutus, and written at his solicitation, was intended to complete the two works just mentioned. It enlarges on the favourite topic of Cicero, which had already been partially discussed in the treatise De Oratore, the character of the perfect orator, and seeks to confirm his favourite proposition, that perfection in oratory requires an extensive acquaintance with every art. It is on the merits of this work in particular that Cicero, in a letter to a friend, asserts his perfect willingness that his reputation should be staked. The Topica are a compend of the Topica of Aristotle. The treatise De optimo genere Oratorum was originally intended as a preface to a translation of the celebrated orations of Demosthenes and Æschines De Corona. The work De Inventione was a youthful performance, and that addressed to Herennius, according to the best authorities, never proceeded from his pen. In all Cicero's rhetorical works, except, perhaps, the Orator, he professes to have digested the principles of the Aristotelic and Iso-cratean schools into one finished system, selecting what was best in each, and, as occasion might offer, adding remarks and precepts of his own. The subject is considered in three distinct lights, with reference to the case, the speaker, and the speech. The case, as respects its nature, is definite or indefinite; with reference to the hearer, it is judicial, deliberative, or descriptive; as regards the opponent, the division is fourfold; according as the fact, its nature, its quality, or its propriety is called in question. The art of the speaker is directed to five points; the discovery of persuasives (whether ethical, pathetic, or argumentative), arrangement, diction, memory, delivery. And the speech itself consists of six parts; introduction (or exordium), statement of the case, division of the subject, proof, refutation, and conclusion or peroration. Cicero's laudatory orations are among his happiest efforts. Nothing can exceed the taste and beauty of those for the Manilian Law, for Marcellus, for Ligarius, for Archias, and the ninth Philippic, which is principally in praise of Servius Sulpicius. But it is in judicial eloquence, particularly on subjects of a lively cast, as in his speeches for Cælius and Murena, and against Cæcilius, that his talents are displayed to the best advantage. To both kinds his amiable and pleasant turn of mind imparts inexpressible grace and delicacy; historical allusions, philosophical sentiments, descriptions full of life and nature, and polite railery, succeed each other in the most agreeable manner, without appearance of artifice or effort. Of this nature are his pictures of the confusion of the Catilinarian conspirators on detection (Or. in Cat., 3, 3); of the death of Metellus (Or. pro Cæl., 10); of Sulpicius undertaking the embassy to Antony (Philipp., 9, 3); the character he draws of Catiline (Or. pro Cæl., 6); and his fine sketch of old Appius frowning on his degenerate descendant Clodia (ib., 6). But, by the invention of a style which adapts itself with singular felicity to every class of subjects, whether lofty or familiar, philosophical or forensic, Cicero answers more exactly to his own definition of a perfect orator (Orat., 29), than by his plausibility, pathos, and vivacity. Among many excellences possessed by Cicero's oratorical diction, the greatest is its suitableness to the genius of the Latin tongue; though the diffuseness thence necessarily resulting has exposed it both in his own days, and since his time, to the criticisms of those, who have affected to condemn its Asiatic character, in comparison with the simplicity of Attic writers, and the strength of Demosthenes. Greek, however, is celebrated for copiousness in its vocabulary and perspicuity in its phrases, and the consequent facility of expressing the most novel or abstruse ideas with precision and elegance. Hence the Attic style of eloquence was plain and simple, because simplicity and plainness were not incompatible with clearness, energy, and harmony. But it was a singular want of judgment, an ignorance of the very principles of composition, which induced Brutus, Calvus, Sallust, and others, to imitate this terse and severe beauty in their own defective language, and even to pronounce the opposite kind of diction deficient in taste and purity. In Greek, indeed, the words fall, as it were, naturally into a distinct and harmonious order; and, from the exuberant richness of the materials, less is left to the ingenuity of the artist. But the Latin language is comparatively weak, scanty, and unmusical, and requires considerable skill and management to render it expressive and graceful. Simplicity in Latin is scarcely separable from baldness; and justly as Terence is celebrated for chaste and unadorned diction, yet even he, compared with Attic writers, is flat and heavy. (Quintil., 10, 1.) Again, the perfection of strength is clearness united to brevity, but to this combination Latin is utterly unequal. From the vagueness and uncertainty of meaning which characterize its separate words, to be perspicuous it must be full. What Livy, and much more Tacitus, have gained in energy, they have lost in perspicuity and elegance. Latin, in short, is not a philosophical language; not a language in which a deep thinker is likely to express himself with purity or neatness. Now Cicero rather made a language than a style, yet not so much by the invention as by the combination of words. Some terms, indeed, his philosophical subjects compelled him to coin; but his great art lies in the application of existing materials, in converting the very disadvantages of the language into beauties, in enriching it with circumlocutions and metaphors, in pruning it of harsh and uncouth expressions, in systematizing the structure of a sentence. This is that copia dicendi which gained Cicero the high testimony of Cæsar to his inventive powers (De Clar., Or., 72), and which, we may add, constitutes him the greatest master of composition the world has ever seen. If the comparison be not thought fanciful, he may be assimilated to a skillful landscape-gardener, who gives depth and richness to narrow and confined premises, by taste and variety in the disposition of his trees and walks.—We come next to Cicero's philosophical writings, after a brief enumeration of which we will offer a few remarks on the character of his philosophy itself. The treatise De Legibus has reached us in an imperfect state, only three books remaining, and these disfigured by numerous chasms that cannot be supplied. It traces the philosophic principles of jurisprudence to their remotest sources, sets forth a body of laws conformable to Cicero's idea of a well-regulated state, and is supposed to have treated in the books that are lost of the executive power of the magistrates and the rights of Roman citizens. The treatise De Finibus Bonorum et Malorum is written after the manner of Aristotle, and discusses the chief good and ill of man; in it Cicero explains the several opinions entertained on this subject by the sages of antiquity. The Academicæ Quæstiones relate to the Academic Philosophy, whose tenets Cicero himself had embraced. It is an account and defence of the doctrines of the Academy. In the Tusculanæ Disputationes, five books are devoted to as many different questions of philosophy, bearing the most strongly on the practice of life, and involving topics the most essential to human happiness. The Paradoxa contain a defence of six paradoxes of the Stoics. The work De Natura Deorum embraces a full examination of the various theories of heathen antiquity on the nature of the gods, to which the treatise De Divinatione may be regarded as a supplement. The essay De Officiis, on moral duties, has not unwaptly been styled the heathen Whole Duty of Man; nor have the dialogues De Senectute and De Amicitia been incorrectly regarded as among the most highly finished and pleasing performances of which any language can boast. We have to lament the loss of the treatises De Consolatione (that which we have under this title being a patched-up imposture of Sigonius), De Gloria, and the one entitled Hortensius, in which last Cicero undertook the defence of learning and philosophy, and left to his illustrious competitor the task of arraigning them. It was this book which first led St. Augustin to the study of Christian philosophy and the doctrines of Christianity. The treatise De Republica has been in part rescued from the destroying hand of time by the labours of Maio. Except the works on Invention and De Oratore, this was the earliest of Cicero's literary productions. It was given to the world A.U.C. 700, just before its author set out for his proconsular government in Cilicia. He was then in his fifty-third year. The object and spirit of the work were highly patriotic. He wished to bring the constitution back to its first principles by an impression expositive of its theory; to inflame his contemporaries with the love of virtue, by portraying the character of their ancestors in its primeval purity and beauty; and while he was raising a monument to all future ages of what Rome had been, to inculcate upon his own times what it ought still to be. We know it to have been his original purpose to make it a very voluminous work; for he expressly tells his brother (Ep. ad Q. Frat., 3, 5) that it was to be extended to nine books. Ernesti thinks that they were all given to the world (Ep. ad Att., 6, 1, in notis), although Cicero, in a letter to Atticus, on which that learned and accurate scholar makes this very remark, speaks of them as his six pledges or sureties for his good behaviour. —Cicero, as a philosopher, belongs, upon the whole, to the New Academy. It has been disputed whether he was really attached to this system, or had merely resorted to it as being the best adapted for furnishing him with oratorical arguments suited to all occasions. At first its adoption was subsidiary to his other plans. But, towards the conclusion of his life, when he no longer maintained the place he was wont to hold in the Senate or the Forum, and when philosophy formed the occupation "with which," to quote his own words, "life was just tolerable, and without which it would have been intolerable," he doubtless became convinced that the principles of the New Academy, illustrated as they had been by Carneades and Philo, formed the soundest system which had descended to mankind from the schools of Athens. The attachment, however, of Cicero to the Academic philosophy was free from the exclusive spirit of sectarianism, and hence it did not prevent his extracting from other systems what he found in them conformable to virtue and reason. His ethical principles, in particular, appear eclectic, having been in a great measure formed from the opinions of the Stoics. Of most of the Greek sects he speaks with respect and esteem. For the Epicureans alone he seems (notwithstanding his friendship for Atticus) to have entertained a decided aversion and contempt. The general purpose of Cicero's philosophical works was rather to give a history of the ancient philosophy, than dogmatically to inculcate opinions of his own. It was his great aim to explain to his fellow-citizens, in their own language, whatever the sages of Greece had taught on the most important subjects, in order to enlarge their minds and reform their morals. In theoretic investigation, in the development of abstract ideas, in the analysis of qualities and perceptions, Cicero cannot be regarded as an inventor or profound original thinker, and cannot be ranked with Plato and Aristotle. His peculiar merit, as a philosophical writer, lay in his luminous and popular exposition of the leading principles and disputes of the ancient schools; and no works transmitted from antiquity present so concise and comprehensive a view of the opinions of the Greek philosophers. The most obvious peculiarity of Cicero's philosophical writings is their form of dialogue. The idea was borrowed from Plato and Xenophon; but the nature of Cicero's dialogue is as different from that of the two Athenians, as was his object in writing. With them, the Socratic mode of argument could hardly be displayed in any other shape; whereas Cicero's aim was to excite interest, and he availed himself of this mode of composition for the life and variety, the ease, perspicuity, and vigour which it gave to his discussions. Nor does Cicero discover less skill in the execution of these dialogues, than address in their design. In the dignity of his speakers, their high tone of mutual courtesy, the harmony of his groups, and the delicate relief of his contrasts, he is inimitable. The majesty and splendour of his introductions, the eloquence with which both sides of a question are successively displayed, the clearness and terseness of his statements on abstract points, his exquisite allusions to the scene or time of the supposed conversation, his digressions in praise of philosophy, and, lastly, the melody and fulness of his style, unite to throw a charm around these productions which has been felt in every age.—Cicero's Epistles, about 1000 in all, are comprised in thirty-six books, sixteen of which are addressed to Atticus, three to his brother Quintus, one to Brutus, and sixteen to his different friends; and they form a history of his life from his fortieth year. Among those addressed to his friends, some occur from Brutus, Metellus, Plancus, Cælius, and others. For the preservation of this most valuable department of Cicero's writings, we are indebted to Tyro, the author's freedman, though we possess at the present day only a part of those originally published. The most interesting by far are the letters to Atticus, for they not only throw great light on the history of the times, but also give us a full insight into the private character of Cicero himself, who was accustomed at all times to unbosom his thoughts most freely to this friend of his. The authenticity of the correspondence with Brutus has been much disputed by modern scholars, and the general opinion is adverse to these letters being genuine.—His poetical and historical works have suffered a heavy fate. The latter class, consisting of his commentary on his consulship, and his history of his own times, are altogether lost. Of the former, which comprised the heroic poems Alcyones, Limon, Marius, his own consulate, the elegy of Tamelastris, translations of Homer and Aratus, Epigrams, &c., but little remains except some fragments of the Phænomena and Dioemeia of Aratus. It may, however, be questioned, whether literature has suffered much by these losses. We are far, indeed, from speaking contemptuously of the poetic powers of one who possessed so much fancy, so much taste, and so fine an ear. But his poems were principally composed in his youth; and afterward, when his powers were more mature, his occupations did not allow even his active mind the time necessary for polishing a language still more rugged in metre than it was in prose. His contemporary history, on the other hand, can hardly have conveyed more explicit, and certainly would have contained less faithful, information than his private correspondence; while, with all the penetration he assuredly possessed, it may be doubted, if his diffuse and graceful style of thought and composition was adapted for the depth of reflection and condensation of meaning, which are the chief excellences of historical composition.—The editions of the separate works of Cicero are too numerous to be mentioned here. The best editions of the entire works are: that of Ernesti, Hal., 1774, 8 vols. 8vo; that of Olivet, Paris, 1740, 9 vols. 4to; that of Schütz, Lips., 1814–20, 19 vols. (in 27) 12mo; and that of Nobbe, Lips., 1827, 1 vol. 4to, or 10 vols. 12mo. (Plut., in Vit.—Enc. Metropol., div. 3, vol. 2, p. 279, seqq.—Biog. Univ., vol. 8, p. 530, seqq.—Encyclop. Am., vol. 3, p. 190, seqq.—Dunlop, Rom. Lit., vol. 2, p. 275, seqq.—Bähr, Gesch. Röm. Lit., vol. 1, p. 487, seqq.)—H. Marcus, only son of the orator, and to whom the latter addressed his work De Officiis. He took part in the civil contest at an early age, and served under both Pompey and Brutus. After the battle of Philippi he retired to Sicily and joined the younger Pompey. Subsequently, however, he took advantage of the act of amnesty that was passed, and returned to Italy, where he lived some time in a private situation. Augustus, on attaining to sovereign power, made him his colleague in the consulship, and it was to Marcus Cicero, in his quality of consul, that he wrote an account of the victory at Actium and the conquest of Egypt. Marcus had the satisfaction of executing the decree which ordered all the statues and monuments that had been erected to Antony to be thrown down. After his consulship he was appointed governor of Syria, from which period history is silent respecting him. He died at an advanced age, and was notorious for dissipated and intemperate habits. He appears to have inherited little, if anything, of his father's virtue, patriotism, and talent. (Cic., Ep. ad Att., 1, 2.—Id., Ep. ad Fam., 13, 11.—Plut., Vit. Cic. extr.—Id., Vit. Brut., &c.)—III. Quintus, brother of the orator, and brother-in-law of Atticus. After having been prætor A.U.C. 692, he obtained the government of Asia. He was subsequently a lieutenant of Cæsar's in Britain, and only left that commander to accompany his brother Marcus Tullius, as lieutenant, into Cilicia. After the battle of Pharsalia, in which he took part on the side of Pompey, he was proscribed by the triumvirate, and put to death by the emissaries of Antony. He had a marked talent for poetry, and had planned a poem on the invasion of Britain by Cæsar. He also composed several tragedies, imitated or else translated from the Greek, but which have not reached us. Eighteen lines of his are preserved in the Corpus Poëtarum of Maittaire. He was the author of the piece entitled "de Petitioe Consulatus," usually printed along with Cicero's letters to him. It is addressed by Quintus to his brother when the latter was a candidate for the consulship, and gives advice with regard to the measures he should pursue to attain his object, particularly inculcating the best means to gain private friends and acquire general popularity. CICŌNES, a people on the coast of Thrace, near the spot where Marouca stood in a later age. Homer has placed here the scene of Ulysses' first disaster. Ismarus was the name of their city, which the poet supposes that chieftain to have taken and plundered; but the natives coming down from the interior in great force, he was driven off with severe loss of both men and ships. (Od., 1, 40, seqq.) Ismarus is known to later writers only as a mountain celebrated for its wine, which indeed Homer himself alludes to in another passage. (Od., 1, 197.)

CILICIA, a country of Asia Minor, on the seacoast, south of Cappadocia and Lycaonia, and to the east of Pisidia and Pamphilia. Herodotus says (7, 91), that the people of this country were anciently called Hypachæi, and that the appellation of Cilicians was subsequently derived from Cilix, son of Agenor, a Phœnician. This passage seems to point to a Phœnician or Syrian origin for the race, a supposition strengthened by the fact of the early commercial habits of the people of Cilicia. This country, though tributary to the Persian king, was nominally under the government of its native princes, with whom Syeunesis appears to have been a common name. (Consult Herod., 1, 74.—Id., 5, 118.—Xen., Anab., 1, 2.) Cilicia, more especially that part which consisted of plains, was a wealthy country; since we are informed by Herodotus (3, 90) that it yielded to Darius a revenue of 500 talents, equal to that of Mysia and Lydia together, besides 360 white horses. Xenophon also (Anab., 1, 2) describes it as a broad and beautiful plain, well watered, and abounding in wine and all kinds of trees, and yielding barley, millet, and other grain. In a military point of view, the importance of Cilicia was also very great, since it was surrounded by lofty mountains, presenting only one or two passes, and these easily secured by a small force against the largest armies. Had the Persians known how to defend these, the younger Cyrus would never have reached the Euphrates, nor would Alexander have been able to penetrate to the plains of Issus, which witnessed the overthrow of Darius. (Arrian, Exp. Al., 2, 4.) At a later period we learn from Cicero, during his command there, what importance the Romans attached to the province of Cilicia, when it became necessary to cover Asia against the growing power of the Parthians. (Ep. ad Att., 5, 20.) As a maritime country, too, Cilicia makes a considerable figure in history, since it furnished numerous fleets to the Persian monarchs, as well as to the Syrian and Egyptian successors of Alexander. But it was more especially from the formidable character of her piratical navy that Cilicia has obtained a name in the seafaring annals of antiquity. Some idea of the alarm inspired by these daring rovers can be formed from the language of Cicero, however exaggerated we may suppose it to be for a political purpose. (Or. pro Leg. Manil., 11.) The selection, too, which the Roman people made of Pompey, and the unusual powers confided to him, prove the importance of the contest. In less than 50 days, however, Pompey reduced the whole province either by force or the terror of his arms. More than 20,000 pirates are said to have fallen into his hands: these he settled in the interior, or removed to some distant countries, and thus entirely purged the shores of Asia of these nests of robbers. In the course of this war the Romans are said to have captured 378 ships, and burned 1300, conquered 120 towns and castles, and to have slain 10,000 of the enemy.—Cilicia was divided into Campestris and Trachæa. The former was the larger and more easterly portion, and derived its name from its champain character. Trachæa, on the other hand, was so called from its rugged aspect (τραχέια, "rough"). It was nearly all occupied by the broad ridge of Taurus, which leaves scarcely any room for level land towards the sea. (Cramer's Asia Minor, vol. 2, p. 315, seqq.)

CILIX, a son of Agenor, who gave his name to Cilicia, according to Herodotus. (Consult remarks under the article Cilicia.—Herodot., 7, 91.)

CILLA, a town of Troas, in the immediate vicinity of Adramyttium. (Hom., Il., 1, 37.—Strab., 612.)

CIMBER, L. Tilius, one of the conspirators against Cæsar. He was a man notorious for his drunkenness and low violence (Seneca, Ep. 83.—Id., de Ira, 3, 30), and he had been throughout the civil war a violent partisan of Cæsar's, who appointed him a short time before his assassination to the province of Bithynia. (Appian, Bell. Civ., 3, 2.—Cic., Ep. ad Fam., 12, 13.) Cimber was the one who gave the signal agreed upon with his associates for commencing the attack, by taking hold of Cæsar's robe, and pulling it down from his shoulders. (Plut., Vit. Cæs.)

CIMBRI, a people of Germany, who invaded the Roman empire with a large army, and were conquered by Marius and Catulus. (For an account of the war, consult the article Teutones.) The Cimbri are generally thought to have had for their original seat the Cimbric Chersonese, or modern Jutland. It would seem, however, that there is some curious connexion between their name and that of the ancient Cimærii, a point which may have some bearing on the question respecting the origin of the Germanic race. (Consult remarks under the article Cimærii, and compare Mannert, Geschichte der alten Deutschen, p. 11, and Pfister, Gesch. der Teutschen, vol. 1, p. 40.) Adelson, however, opposes this idea. (Mithradates, vol. 2, p. 143.)

CIMINUS, I. a range of hills in Etruria, lying to the south of Salpinum.—II. A lake at the foot of Mons Cimminus, now Lago di Vico, or Ronciglione. (Strabo, 225.) The Cimminian forest, whose almost impetrable shades served for a time as a barrier to Etruria against the attacks of Rome, is described as covering the adjacent country to a considerable extent. (Liv., 9, 36.—Front. Strat., 1, 2.—Plin., 2, 96.)

CIMMERII, a nomadic race of Upper Asia, who appear to have originally inhabited a part of what is now called Tartary. According to Herodotus (1, 15), they were driven from their primitive seats by the Scythians, and moved down, in consequence, upon Asia Minor, which they invaded and ravaged during the reign of Ardys, king of Lydia, the successor of Gyges. Strabo, however, places the incursion of the Cimmerians in the time of Homer, or a little before the birth of the poet. (Strab., 20.) Wesseling thinks the authority of Strabo inferior to that of Herodotus; but Larcher inclines to the opinion that two different incursions are spoken of, an earlier and a later one. He makes the former of these anterior even to the time assigned by Strabo, and thinks it preceded by a short period the siege of Troy. He supposes this, moreover, to be the one alluded to by Euripides. (Iph. in Taur., 1115, seqq.—Larcher, ad Herod., 1, 6.) According to this view of the subject, Herodotus speaks merely of the latter of these two inroads. Volney maintains, in like manner, that there were two incursions of the Cimmerians, but he places the first of these in the reign of Ardys (699 B.C.), to which he thinks Herodotus alludes in the fifteenth chapter of his first book; and the second one in the time of Alyattes and Cyaxares, which he supposes to be the inroad alluded to by Herodotus in the one hundred and third chapter of the same book. (Volney, Suppl. à l'Herod., de Larcher, p. 75, seqq.) It appears much more reasonable, however, to refer all to but one invasion on the part of the Cimmerian race, commencing in the time of Ardys, and continued until the reign of Alyattes (616, B.C.), when these barbarians were expelled from the Asiatic peninsula. (Bähr, ad Herod., 1, 6.)—The account given by Herodotus is, that the Cimmerians, when they came into Asia Minor, took Sardis, with the exception of the citadel, and that they were finally expelled by Alyattes, the contemporary of Cyaxares. (Herod., 1, 15, seq.) The same historian makes the Cimmerians to have dwelt originally in the neighbourhood of the Palus Mæotis and Cimmerian Bosphorus, and when driven out "from Europe," as he expresses himself (ἐκ τῆς Εὐρώπης), by the Scythians, to have fled along the upper shore of the Euxine to Colchis, and thence to have passed into Asia Minor. (Herod., 1, 103.) Niebuhr, with very good reason, insists that Herodotus has here fallen into an error, and that all the wandering races which have in succession occupied the regions of Scythia, have, when driven out by other tribes from the east, moved forth in a western direction towards the country around the Danube. The Cimmerians, therefore, must have come into Asia Minor from the east. As regards the name of the Cimmerian Bosphorus, the same acute critic supposes it to have arisen from the circumstance of a part of the Cimmerian horde having been left in this quarter, and having continued to occupy the Tauric Chersonese as late as the settlement of the Greek colonies in these parts. (Niebuhr, Kleine Schriften, p. 365, seqq.)—The ancients differed in opinion as regarded the orthography of the name Cimmeri, some being in favour of Κερίμριοι, others of Χερίμριοι. (Hesych., s. v.—Eustath., ad Od., 10, 14.—Schol., ad loc.—Aristoph., Ran., 189.—Etymol. Mag., p. 513.—Voss, Weltk., p. 14.) Modern scholars are in like manner divided as to the derivation of the term "Cimmerian" itself. It is maintained by some of these that the Greeks obtained their first knowledge of this race from the Phœnicians, and that hence, in all probability, the stories told of the gloom which enshrouded the Cimmerian land, and of the other appalling circumstances connected with this people, were mere Phœnician inventions to deter the Grecian traders from visiting them. In accordance with this idea, Bochart derives the word "Cimmerian" from the Phœnician kamar, or kimmer, "tenebrosus." (Geogr. Sacr., col. 591.—Compare Job, 3, 5.) Hence we read of Cimmerians, not only in Lower Asia, but also in the remotest west and north. "The Cimmerians," says Eustathius, "are a people in the west, on the Oceanus: they dwell not far from Hades." (Compare Tzet., ad Lycophr., 695, and consult the article Avernus.) Another class of etymologists, however, deduce the word in question from the Celtic, and make the Cimmerii identical with the Kimri, whence the later Cimbri. (Volney, Suppl., &c., p. 75.) The Cim-merians, therefore, who overran Asia Minor, will be a Celtic race. There is something extremely plausible in this supposition, and in this way, too, we may, without having recourse to Bochart's derivation, account for the existence of Cimmerii, or Celts, in the remote west. (Ukert, Geogr., vol. 1, p. 26, not.)

CIMMERIUM, a town in the interior of the Tauric Chersonese, northwest of Theodosia. It is now Eski-Krim (Old Krim), on the river Tschuruck. (Mela, 1, 19.)

CIMŌLUS, one of the Cyclades, northeast of Melos. Its more ancient name was Echinusa, or Viper's Island, from the number of vipers which infested it before it was inhabited. It produced what was called the Cimolia terra, a species of earth resembling, in some of its properties, fuller's earth, though not the same with it. (Theophrast., de Lapid., 2, 107.—Strabo, 484.) The ancients used it for cleaning their clothes. It was white, dense, of a loose texture, mixed with sand or small pebbles, insipid to the taste, and unctuous to the touch. The substance, according to Sir John Hill (ad Theophr., l. c.), which comes nearest to the Cimolian earth of antiquity, is the Steatite of the Soap-rock of Cornwall, which is the common matter of a great part of the cliff near the Lizard Point. Cimolus is now Kimoli, though more generally known by the name of Argentiera. (Cramer's Anc. Greece, vol. 3, p. 405.)

CIMON, I. son of Miltiades, and of Hegesipyle the daughter of Olorus, a Thracian prince. His education, according to Plutarch, was very much neglected, and he himself indulged, at first, in every species of excess. At his father's death he seems to have succeeded to a very scanty fortune, and he would perhaps have found it difficult to raise the penalty of fifty talents, which had been imposed upon his parent, and which the son was bound to pay to the public treasury, had not Callias, one of the wealthiest men of Athens, struck by the charms of his half-sister Elpinice, undertaken to discharge the sum as the price of her hand. (Vid. Callias, Elpinice.) Cimon, however, had attracted notice, and gained reputation, by the spirit which he displayed on the occasion of leaving the city on the approach of the Persians, when he was the foremost to hang up a bride in the Acropolis, as a sign that he placed all his hopes in the fleet; and also by the valour with which he fought at Salamis. Aristides, in particular, saw in him a fit coadjutor to himself and antagonist to Themistocles, and exerted himself in his favour; and the readiness with which the allied Greeks, when disgusted by the arrogance of Pausanias, united themselves with Athens, was owing in a great measure to Cimon's mild temper, and to his frank and gentle manners. The popularity of Themistocles was already declining, while Cimon, by a series of successful enterprises, was rapidly rising in public favour. He defeated the Persians in Thrace, on the banks of the Strymon, took Eion, and made himself master of the whole country. He conquered the island of Scyros, the inhabitants of which were addicted to piracy; and brought thence to Athens what were deemed the bones of the national hero Theseus. He next subdued all the cities on the coast of Asia Minor, and went against the Persian fleet which lay at the mouth of the Eurymedon. The Persians, although superior in number, did not dare to abide an engagement, but sailed up the river to place themselves under the protection of their land forces. Cimon, however, provoked them to a battle, and, having defeated and sunk or taken two hundred ships, landed his men, flushed with victory, and completely routed the Persian army. Returning to Athens after these two victories thus achieved in a single day, he employed the perquisites of his command, and the resources which he had acquired from his successes over the barbarians, in the embellishment of his native city, and in relieving the wants of the indigent. He laid a part of the foundations of the long walls with magnificent solidity at his own charge, and the southern wall of the citadel was built with the treasures which he brought from Asia into the coffers of the state. He also set the example of adorning the public places of the city with trees, and, by introducing a stream of water, converted the Academy, a spot about two miles north of the city, from an arid waste into a delightful grove. (Vid. Academus.) He threw down the fences of his fields and orchards, that all who wished might enter and partake of their produce: he not only gave the usual entertainments expected from the rich to the members of his own borough, but kept a table constantly open for them. He never appeared in public without a number of persons attending him in good apparel, who, when they met with any elderly citizen scantily clothed, would insist on exchanging their warm mantles for his threadbare covering. It was the office of the same agents, respectfully to approach any of the poorer citizens of good character, whom they might see standing in the market-place, and silently to put some small pieces of money into their hands. This latter kind of expenditure was certainly of a mischievous tendency; and was not the less that of a demagogue, because Cimon sought popularity, not merely for his own sake, but for that of his order and his party.—About 466 B.C., Cimon was sent to the Thracian Chersonese, of which the Persians still kept possession, and having driven them out, next reduced the island of Thasus, and took possession of the Thasian gold-mines on the neighbouring continent. Scarcely, however, had he returned to Attica, when an accusation was preferred against him of having been corrupted by the King of Macedonia, because he had refrained, not, according to the common account, from attacking the Macedonians then at peace with Athens, but from striking a blow at the Thracian tribes on the frontier of that kingdom, who had recently cut off the Athenian settlers on the banks of the Strymon. (Vid. Amphipolis.) From this accusation Cimon had a very narrow escape. Having been sent, however, after this, with a body of troops to aid the Spartans before Ithome, and the latter having, after some interval, sent back their Athenian allies, whom they suspected of not lending them any effectual assistance, the irritation produced by this national insult fell principally upon Cimon, who was known to be an admirer of the Spartan character and constitution, and he was accordingly driven into exile. Subsequent events, however, made the Athenians feel the want of this able commander, and he was recalled and sent on an expedition against Egypt and Cyprus; but he was carried off by illness, or the consequences of a wound, in the harbour of Citium, to which place he was laying siege. His spirit, however, still animated his countrymen; for the fleet, when sailing home with his remains, gained a naval victory over a large squadron of Phœnician and Cilician galleys near the Cyprian Salamis, and followed up this victory by another which they gained on shore, either over the troops which had landed from the enemy's ships, or over a land force by which they were supported.—Cimon was, beyond dispute, the ablest and most successful general of his day; and his victories shed a lustre on the arms of Athens, which almost dimmed the glories of Marathon and Salamis. In after times, Cimon's military renown was enhanced by the report of a peace which his victories had compelled the Persian king to conclude on terms most humiliating to the monarchy. These were, that the Persians had agreed to abandon at least the military occupation of Asia Minor, to the distance of three days' journey on foot, or one on horseback, from the coast, and to abstain from passing the mouth of the Bosphorus and the Chelidonian islands into the western sea. This peace, of which Isocrates, Demosthenes, Diodorus, and Plutarch speak, never took place. The silence of Thucydides is conclusive on the subject, to say nothing of the vague and contradictory statements of the very authors who do mention it. The fable seems to have sprung up, or to have acquired a distinct shape, in the rhetorical school of Isocrates, and to have been transmitted through the orators to the historians. (Plut., Vit. Cim.—Thirlwall's Greece, vol. 3, p. 2, seqq.)

CINCIA LEX, was proposed by M. Cincius, a tribune of the people, A.U.C. 549. It enacted, that no one should take money or a present for pleading a cause. (Liv., 34, 4.—Tac., Ann., 11, 5.)

CININNATUS, L. Quintius, a Roman patrician, whose name belongs to the earlier history of the republic, and has a well-known and spirit-stirring legend connected with it. His son, Kæso Quintius, had been banished on account of his violent language towards the tribunes, and the father had retired to his own patrimony, aloof from popular tumults. The successes of the Æqui and Volsci, however, rendered the appointment of a dictator necessary, and Cininnatus was chosen to that high office. The delegates who were sent to announce this unto him, found the Roman noble ploughing his own fields; and from the plough he was transferred to the highest magistracy of his native state. The dictator laid aside his rural habiliments, assumed the ensigns of absolute power, levied a new army, marched all night to bring the necessary succour to the consul Minucius, who was surrounded by the enemy and blockaded in his camp, and before morning surrounded the enemy's army, and reduced it to a condition exactly similar to that in which the Romans had been placed. The baffled Æqui were glad to submit to the victor's terms; and Cininnatus, thereupon returning in triumph to Rome, laid down his dictatorial power, after having held it only fourteen days, and returned to his farm. At an advanced age he was again appointed dictator, to restrain the power of Spurius Melius (vid. Melius), and again proved himself the deliverer of his country. (Val. Max., 4, 4, 7.—Liv., 3, 26.)

CINÆAS, a Thessalian, a minister and friend of Pyrrhus, and employed by the latter on many embassies. He had been a pupil of Demosthenes, and possessed considerable talents as an orator. Having been sent by Pyrrhus to Rome with proposals of peace, he compared the senate, on his return, to an assembly of kings, and a war with the Romans to a contest with another Læmæan hydra. (Plut., Vit. Pyrrh.)

CINGULUM, a town of Picenum, southwest of Ancona. It surrendered to Cæsar, though Labienus, then a great partisan of Pompey, had raised and constructed its fortifications at his own expense. The modern name is Cingolo. (Cæs., Bell. Civ., 1, 15.—Cic., Ep. ad Att., 7, 11.—Sil. Ital., 10, 34.)

CINNA, L. Cornelius, an adherent of Marius, who played a conspicuous part in the civil war between that leader and Sylla. Having attained to the consulship, after the proscription of Marius by his opponent, he began to exert himself for the recall of the former, and accused Sylla, who was just going as proconsul to Asia, of maladministration. That commander, however, took no notice of the complaint. After the departure of Sylla, he brought forward once more the law of Sulpicius, which admitted the Italians into all the thirty-five tribes without distinction. A violent riot ensued, numbers were slain, and Cinna, with his chief partisans, was driven from the city by his colleague Octavius. The Italian towns, regarding the cause of Cinna as their own, received him with the utmost cordiality. He collected thirty legions, called the proscribed to his support, and with Marius, Sertorius, and Carbo, marched upon and took possession of Rome. A scene of bloodshed and lawless rapine now ensued, which has perhaps no parallel in ancient or modern times, and has deservedly procured for those who were the actors in it the unmitigated abhorrence of all posterity. Cinna and Marius, by their own authority, now declared themselves consuls for the ensuing year; but Marius dying, after having only held that office for seventeen days, Cinna remained in effect the absolute master of Rome. During the space of three years after this victory of his, he continued to hold possession of the government at home, a period during which, as Cicero remarks (De Clar. Orat., 62), the republic was without laws and without dignity. At length, however, Sylla, after terminating the war with Mithradates, prepared to march home with his army and punish his opponents. Cinna, with his colleague Carbo, resolved thereupon to cross the Adriatic, and anticipate Sylla by attacking him in Greece; but a mutiny of their troops ensued, in which Cinna was slain, B.C. 77. Haughty, violent, always eager for vengeance, addicted to debauchery, precipitate in his plans, but always displaying courage in their execution, Cinna attained to a power little less absolute than that afterward held by Sylla or Cæsar: and it is somewhat remarkable, that his usurpation should have been so little noticed by posterity, and that he himself should be so little known, that scarcely a single personal anecdote of him is to be found on record. (Appian, Bell. Civ., 1, 64.—Vell. Patenc., 2, 43, seqq.—Appian, B. C., 1, 74, seqq.—Plut., Vit. Syll., 22.—Liv., Epit., 83, &c.)—II. One of the conspirators against Cæsar (Plut., Vit. Cæs.)—III. C. Helvius, a Roman poet, intimate with Cæsar, and tribune of the commons at the time when the latter was assassinated. According to Plutarch, he went to attend the obsequies of Cæsar, but, being mistaken by the populace for Cinna the conspirator, was torn in pieces by them. (Plut., Vit. Cæs.) Helvius composed a poem entitled Smyrna (or Zmyrna), on which he was employed nine or ten years. Four fragments of it have reached us. It appears to have been characterized by considerable obscurity of meaning until the grammarian Crassitius wrote an able commentary upon it. (Sueton., Illustr. Gram., 18.) Some other fragments have also reached us of other productions of this poet. (Wichert, de C. Helv. Cinna, poet. Comment.—Bahr, Gesch. Röm. Lit., vol. 1, p. 164.)

CINNIANA, a town of Lusitania, in the northern or northwestern section of the country. Its precise situation has given rise to much dispute. According to some, it corresponds to Sitania, a deserted spot, six leagues east of Braga. Others, however, make it the same with certain ruins, called at the present day Chalcedonia, and lying near Caldas de Gerez, on the northern confines of Portugal. (Val. Max., 6, 4, ext. 1.—Link, Reisen durch Portugal, vol. 2, p. 3, seqq.—Ukert, Geogr., vol. 2, p. 399.)

CINYS and CINYPHUS (Kίνυψ, Herod.—Κίνυφος, Ptol., Strab.—Κινύπιος, Suid.), a small river of Africa, below Tripolis, falling into the sea southwest of the promontory of Cephalæ. Herodotus (4, 198) speaks of the land around this river as being remarkably fertile, and equal to any other land in the production of corn. The water of this stream was conveyed by an aqueduct to the city of Leptis Magna. Bochart derives the name of the Cinyps or Cinyphus from the Phœnician Kinphod, "porcupine's river," the porcupine being found, according to Herodotus (4, 192), in parts of the country watered by this stream. (Bochart, Geogr. Sacr., 1, 24, col. 486.) The modern name of the Cinyps is Wadi Quaham, and travellers describe the soil in its neighbourhood as being still remarkable for its fertility. (Ritter, Erdkunde, vol. 1, p. 927.—Beechey's Travels, p. 71.)

CINYRAS, a king of Cyprus, father, by Myrrha, of Adonis. (Vid. Adonis and Myrrha.) He bears his part in the myth of the sun-god, and his name appears to come from the Phœnician Kinnor, whence the Greek κινύρα, and also κινερίζω, "to mourn" or "lament." (Keightley's Mythology, p. 143.)

CIRCEI, I. a promontory of Latium, below Antium, now Monte Circello. It was the fabled residence of Circe; the adjacent country being very low, and giving this promontory at a distance the appearance of an island. It would seem, that Hesiod's making the kings of the Tyrrheni to have been descended from Circe and Ulysses, led to the opinion that the island of that goddess was to be found on the Italian coast. An accidental resemblance in name also may have induced many to select this promontory as the place of her abode. Homer's account, however, of the isle of Circe does not at all suit this spot. The island was a low one, whereas this is a lofty promontory. The adjacent sea also is represented by the poet as boundless to the view, which is not the case as regards Circiæ. (Mannert, Geogr., vol. 9, pt. 1, p. 621.) But, in truth, it requires too great a stretch of the imagination to believe that Homer, and the other poets who have sung of the charms of Circe, were describing places which had an actual existence. It is more than probable, that the fiction relative to the abode of Circe, received its application to the Italian coast subsequently to the period in which Homer wrote, when, from the celebrity of his poems, it became a matter of belief. (Cluver., Ital. Ant., vol. 2, p. 1000.—Cramer's Anc. Italy, vol. 2, p. 91.) Niebuhr, however, makes the fable indigenous in the neighbourhood of the mountain. (Rom. Hist., vol. 1, p. 66, 2d ed., Cambridge transl.)—The promontory of Circiæ was famed for its oysters in the time of both Horace and Juvenal. (Horat., Sat., 2, 4, 33.—Juv., 4, 140)—II. A town of Latium, standing rather inland from the promontory just mentioned, probably on the site of the village of San Felice, where some ruins are said to be visible. (Corradini, Vet. Lat., 1, 9, p. 98.—Pratilli, Via Appia, 1, 16, p. 113.) We first hear of this place in the reign of Tarquinius Superbus; Dionysius informs us that it was colonized by his soldiers, as being an important place from its situation near the Pomætinus Campus and the sea. (4, 63.—Compare Livy, 1, 56.) It is uncertain, however, whether the town existed before this period. Circiæ appears to have been still extant in Cicero's time, for he mentions that Circe was worshipped there. (N. D., 3, 19.) It was assigned to Lepidus as the place of his exile by Augustus. (Suet., Aug., 16.)

CIRCE, sister of Æetes king of Colchis, and daughter of the Sun and Perse, one of the ocean-nymphs. (Homer gives the mother's name as Perse, but Hesiod, Apollodorus, and others, Perseis.) Circe is celebrated for her skill in magic arts, and for her knowledge of subtle poisons. According to Homer (Od., 10, 135, seqq.), she dwelt in an island, attended by four nymphs, and all persons who approached her dwelling were first feasted, and then, on tasting the contents of her magic cup, converted into swine. When Ulysses had been thrown on her shores, he deputed some of his companions to explore the country; these, incautiously partaking of the banquet set before them, were, by the effect of the enchanted potion, transformed as above. When Ulysses himself, on hearing of their misfortune from Eurylochus, set out to release them or share their fate, he was met by Hermes, who gave him a plant named Moly (Μόλυ), potent against her magic, and directed him how to act. Accordingly, when she reached him the medicated cup, he drank of it freely, and Circe, thinking it had produced its usual effect, striking him with her wand, bade him go join his comrades in their sty. But Ulysses, drawing his sword, threatened to slay her; and the terrified goddess bound herself by a solemn oath to do him no injury. She afterward, at his desire, restored his companions to their pristine form, and they all abode in her dwelling for an entire year. Circe is said to have had by Ulysses a son named Telegonus, who afterward unwittingly slew his own father. Hesiod, in his Theogony (1011), says Agrius and Latinus (not the king of Latium), "who, afar in the recess of the holy isles, ruled over all the renowned Tyrsenians." Later writers took great liberties with the narratives of Homer and Hesiod. Thus, for example, Dionysius, the cyclographer, makes Circe the daughter of Æetes by Hecate, the daughter of his brother Perses. He goes on to say, that she was married to the king of the Sarmatians, whom she poisoned, and seized his kingdom; but, governing tyrannically, she was expelled, and then fled to a desert isle of the ocean, or, as some said, to the headland named from her in Italy. (Vid. Circeii.) The Latin poets thence took occasion to connect Circe with their own scanty mythology. It was fabled, for example, that she had been married to King Picus, whom, by her magic art, she changed into a bird. (Diod. Sic., 4, 45.—Eudocia, 261.—Schol. ad Apoll. Rh., 3, 200.—Ovid, Met., 14, 320, seqq.) Another legend made her the mother of Faunus, by the god of the sea. (Nonnus, 13, 328.) The herb Moly is said, by these late writers, to have sprung from the blood of a giant slain by the Sun, in aid of his daughter in her island. Its name, we are told, comes from the fight (μῶλος). Its flower is white, as the warrior was the Sun. (Ptol., Hephaest. ap Phot., Cod., 190, vol. 1, p. 149, ed. Bekker.—Keightley's Mythology, p. 267.) Among other supernatural acts ascribed to Circe, was her converting Scylla into a hideous sea-monster. (Vid. Scylla.)—Various theories have been started for explaining the fable of Circe and her transformation of men into swine. Heyne (Excurs. 1, ad Virg., Æn., 7, p. 103) thinks, that Homer merely gave an historical aspect, as it were, to an allegory invented by some earlier poet, and in which the latter wished to show the brutalizing influence of sensual indulgences. (Compare Wachsmuth, ad Athen., 2, 2, p. 218.) Creuzer (Symbolik, vol. 4, p. 22) sees in the name Circe (Κίρκη) an allusion to some magic ring, since κίρκος is the Doric form for κρέκος, "a ring." (Greg. Corinth., § 165.—Koen, ad loc.) J. C. Wolf (Mul. Græc., &c., fragm. 312) is in favour of another explanation, in support of which he cites Bochart (Geogr. Sacr., 1, 33) and Fabricius (Bibl. Græc., vol. 13, p. 120). The historians from whom Diodorus Siculus (2, 106) derived his information, represent the knowledge of Circe and Medea as purely natural, and relating particularly to the efficacy of poisons and remedies. Hence, also, drugs which produced mental stupefaction, without impairing the physical powers, are thought by some to have given rise, in this and other cases, to the accounts of men being transformed into brutes. (Salverte, des Sciences Occultes, &c.—Foreign Quarterly Review, No. 12, p. 427 and 444.) Porphyry thought the meaning of the fable relative to Circe was this, that impure souls passed after death into the bodies of brutes, a doctrine taught by the school of Pythagoras. (Compare Heeren, ad Stob. Ecl. Phys. et Eth., 1, 52, vol. 1, p. 1047.)

CIRCUS, a violent wind blowing in the southern parts of Gaul, along the coast of the Mediterranean. Its fury was so great, that it carried off the roofs of dwellings, overthrew armed men, riders, and even loaded wagons. (Cato, Orig., lib. 3, ap. Aul. Gell., 2, 22.) It blew from the northwest. Its Gallic name was Kirk, i. e., "the impetuous" or "destructive." In Armoric, kirk means impetuosity, and also a hurricane. (Compare Adelung, Mithradates, vol. 2, p. 53.—Camden's Britannia, p. 19.) In Gaelic, Cuirrach means that which strikes or destroys. (Armstrong's Gaelic Diet., s. v.—Thierry, Histoire des Gaulois, vol. 2, p. 6.—Compare Favonius Gallus, ap. Gell., 2, 22.—Seneca, Quæst. Nat., 5, 17.—Plin., 2, 47.)

long-circular building, erected for exhibiting shows and games. The most ancient and celebrated of these structures, of which there were many in the Roman capital, was the Circus Maximus. It was built by Tarquinius Priscus, and afterward, at different times, magnificently adorned. This structure lay between the Palatine and Aventine hills. Its length was three stadia (2187½ feet), and the breadth a little over one stadium, with rows of seats all around, rising one above another. The lowest of these seats were of stone, and the highest of wood, and separate places were allotted to the senators and equites. It is said to have contained at least 150,000 persons, or, according to others, above double that number; according to Pliny, 250,000; some moderns say 380,000. Its circumference was one mile. It was surrounded with a ditch or canal, called Euripus, 10 feet broad and 10 feet deep, and with porticoes 3 stories high; both the work of Cæsar. The canal served to supply it with water in naval exhibitions. For some interesting remarks on the ancient Circi in general, consult the work of Burgess (Description of the Circus on the Via Appia, near Rome, &c., Lond., 1828, 12mo).

CIRRHA, a town of Phocis, at the head of the Crissæan Gulf. It served as the harbour of Delphi, and was situated close to the mouth of the river Pleistus, which descends from Parnassus. Pausanias (10, 37) reckoned sixty stadia from the city of Delphi to Cirrha. This writer, however, seems to have confounded the town of which we are here speaking with Crissa, a city that had ceased to exist in his time, but which formerly stood more inland, between Cirrha and Delphi. Strabo (418), who clearly distinguishes them, informs us that Cirrha was situate on the sea, and opposite to Sicyon; and that the distance thence to Delphi was eighty stadia. The Cirrhean plain and port, says Æschines (in Ctes., p. 69.—Compare Pausan., 10, 38), which are now accursed, were formerly inhabited by the Cirrhæi and Acragallidæ, a nefarious race, who violated the sanctity of the temple of Delphi, and ransacked its treasures. The oracle, on being consulted by the Amphictyons, declared that a war of extermination was to be carried on against these offenders, and that their land was never thereafter to be placed in a state of cultivation. This decree was executed in the time of Solon, who took an active part in the expedition. The port of Cirrha was then demolished, and its territory declared accursed, according to the form prescribed by the oracle; but this edict was afterward violated by the Amphiſſians, who tilled the land and repaired the port. It is evident that Cirrha still existed in the time of Pausanias, as he mentions the temples of Apollo, Diana, and Latona, as well as several statues worthy of notice. The ruins of Cirrha are pointed out by Sir William Gell, near the village of Xeno Pegadia, on a very gentle eminence on the coast, close to the many beds of the Pleistis. (Cramer's Ancient Greece, vol. 2, p. 153, seqq.)

CIRTHA and CIRTA, a city of Numidia, about 48 miles from the sea, on a branch of the river Ampsagas. It was intended as the royal residence, and being, in fact, the only city originally in the country and erected by Carthaginian workmen, it hence took the Punic name of Cartha, or "the city." It was the residence of Syphax, Masinissa, and the other rulers of the land. When Cæsar had landed in Africa, and was in great danger of being overpowered by Scipio and Juba, a certain Sittius, who had fled from Rome into Africa, and was roaming along the latter country with a predatory band, having made a sudden attack upon Cirta, took it, and compelled Juba to return and defend his kingdom. Cæsar being thus relieved, when the war was over, gave Cirta as a reward to Sittius, with a part of the adjacent country. The city now changed its name to Sittianorum Colonia. In the time of the Emperor Constantine, having suffered much on account of its fidelity to ¹ at prince, he repaired and re-embellished it, giving it the name of Constantina. This name remains, with a slight variation, to the present day, and the small city built upon the ruins of the ancient capital is still called Cosantina. (Appian, Bell. Pun., 7. —Id., Bell. Numid., 111. —Id., Bell. Civ., 2, 96. —Strabo, 831. —Mela, 1, 7. —Plin., 5, 3. —Mannert, Geogr., vol. 10, pt. 2, p. 310, seqq.)

CISALPINA GALLIA. Vid. Gallia.

CISPADANA GALLIA. Vid. Gallia.

CISSA. Vid. Susiana.

CISSEÏS, a patronymic given to Hecuba as daughter of Cisseus.

CISSEUS, I. a king of Thrace, father to Hecuba. (Virg., Æn., 7, 320.) — II. A son of Melampus, killed by Æneus. (Id., 10, 317.)

CISSIA, a country of Asia, having Media to the north, Babylonia to the west, the Persian Gulf to the south, and Persia to the southeast. Its capital was Susa. In Cissia was Ardericca, where Darius settled those of the Eretrians whom his naval commanders had brought to him as prisoners in obedience to his command. (Vid. Ardericca and Eretria.) Susiana is frequently confounded with Cissia. The former was merely a part of the latter, and was properly the territory adjacent to the city of Susa. (Larcher, Hist. d'Herod.—Table Géographique, vol. 8, p. 133.)

CISSUS, a town of Macedonia, in the vicinity of Thessalonica, which contributed, as Strabo asserts (Epit. 7, p. 330), to the aggrandizement of that city. The modern name is said to be Cismé. (French Strabo, vol. 3, p. 126.) Xenophon also speaks of a Mount Cissus, which was probably in this direction. (Cyneg., c. 11, 1.)

CITHÆRON, I. a king of Platæa in Bœotia, remarkable for his wisdom. By his advice, Jupiter pretended to be contracting a second marriage, when Jono had quarrelled with and left him. The scheme succeeded, and the goddess became reconciled to her spouse. (Pausan., 9, 3.) This monarch is said to have given name to the well-known mountain-range in Bœotia. (Pausan., 9, 1.) — II. An elevated ridge of mountains, dividing Bœotia first from Megaris, and afterward from Attica, and finally uniting with Mount Parnes and other summits which belong to the northeastern side of that province. (Strabo, 405.) It was dedicated, as Pausanias affirms (9, 2), to Jupiter Cithæronius, and was celebrated in antiquity as having been the scene of many events recorded by poets and other writers. Such were the metamorphosis of Actæon, the death of Pentheus, and the exposure of Œdipus. Here also Bacchus was said to hold his revels and celebrate his mystic orgies, accompanied by his usual train of satyrs and frantic Bacchantes. (Eurip., Bacchæ, 1381 — Soph., Œl. Tyr., 1451. — Id. ibid., 1391. — Eurip., Phœn., 809.) We know from Thucydides (2, 75), that this mountain was once supplied with forest timber, as the Peloponnesians are said to have derived from thence the supply they required for carrying on the siege of Platæa. But Dodwell says, "it is now shrouded by deep gloom and dreary desolation," and elsewhere he remarks, "it is barren, or covered only with dark stunted shrubs; towards the summit, however, it is crowned with forests of fir, from which it derives its modern name of Elateia, the modern Greek term for the fir-tree being, like the ancient, ἐλάτη." (Travels, vol. 1, p. 281. — Cramer's Ancient Greece, vol. 2, p. 218, seqq.)

CITRUM, one of the most ancient cities of Cyprus, on the southern shores of the island, northeast of Amathus. Josephus says it was built by Chittim, the son of Javan. (Ant. Jud., 1, 7. — Compare Epiphani., Her., 1, 30. — Hieron. in Jes., 5, 23.) It was the birthplace of the celebrated Zeno; and Diogenes Laertius, in his life of that philosopher, reports, that this town had been colonized by the Phœnicians, a circumstance which is confirmed by Cicero (de Fin., 4, 209) and Suidas (s. v. Ζήνων). Citium was besieged, at the close of the Persian war, by the Athenian forces under the command of Cimon. (Thucyd., 1, 112.) According to Diodorus Siculus (12, 3), the place surrendered; but it was the last exploit of that distinguished general, for he was soon after taken ill, and died on board his ship in the harbour. (Plut. et Corn. Nep., vit. Cim.) Citium was a bishopric under the Byzantine empire. The place still retains the name of Chiti. (Cramer's Asia Minor, vol. 2, p. 379, seq.)

CIES, I. a river of Thrace, rising in the northwestern part of the chain of Mount Rhodope, and falling into the Ister. It is now the Esker. D'Anville calls the river Cescus. — II. A river and town of Bithynia. The town was destroyed by Philip, father of Perseus, and rebuilt by Prusias, who called it, after his own name, Prusias. (Vid. Prusias.)

CIVILIS, a powerful Batavian, who raised a sedition against the Roman power during the controversy for empire between Vitellius and Vespasian. Tacitus has furnished us with interesting and copious details of this long-protracted conflict. (Tacit., Hist., 4, 13. — Id. ib., 5, 14, &c.)

CLANIS, a river of Etruria, now la Chiana, rising near Arretium, and falling into the Tiber northeast of Vulsinii. It may be seen from Tacitus that a project was once agitated for causing its waters, which formed large marshes near Clusium, to discharge themselves into the Arnus. (Tacit., Ann., 1, 79.) — II. (or Clanius), a river of Campania, falling into the sea near Liternum. It rises in the Apennines near Nola, and flows at no great distance from Acerre. The modern name is Lagno. By some writers the ancient name is given as Liternus. (Strabo, 243. — Liv., 32, 29.) This stream is apt to stagnate near its entrance into the sea, and to form marshes, anciently known as the Palus Literna, now Lago di Patria. The appellation Clanius is evidently derived from the Etrurian Clanis. (Müller, Etrusker, vol. 1, p. 146, in not.) Pliny names them both Clanis. (Plin., 3, 9.)

CLAROS, a city of Ionia, northeast of Colophon and southeast of Lebedus. It was famous for its temple, grove, and oracle of Apollo. This celebrated seat of divination is supposed to have been discovered soon after the siege of Troy, and the poets relate many tales with regard to a contention in prophetic skill which took place here between Calchas and Mopsus, and which ended in the defeat and death of the former. (Vid. Calchas.) Tacitus gives an account of the visit paid by Germanicus to this oracle. (Ann., 2, 54.) The priesthood was confined to certain families, principally of Miletus. The number and names of those who came to consult the oracle were announced to the seer, who, having descended into the cave and drunk of the spring, revealed in verse to each his most secret thoughts. On this occasion it is said that a speedy death was announced to Germanicus. The oracle continued to flourish in the time of Pliny (5, 29), and as late as the reign of Constantine. Considerable vestiges are still to be seen at Zille, which occupies the site of the ancient Claros. (Cramer's Asia Minor, vol. 1, p. 359, seq.)

CLASTIDIUM, a town of Liguria, northeast of Derthona, now Chinesteggio. It was celebrated as the spot where Claudius Marcellus gained the spolia opima, by vanquishing and slaying Viridomarus, king of the Gætæ. (Polybius, 2, 34. — Plut., Vit. Marcell. — Val. Max., 1, 1.) Clastidium was betrayed to Hannibal after the battle of Ticinum, with considerable magazines which the Romans had laid up there, and it formed the chief dépôt of the Carthaginian army while encamped on the Trebia. (Polyb., 3, 69. — Liv., 21, 48. — Cic., Tusc. Disp., 4, 22.) It was afterward burned by the Romans in a war with the Ligurians. (Liv., 32, 29, and 31.)

CLAUDIA GENS, a celebrated patrician house at Rome, from which came many distinguished men in the days of the republic. According to Suetonius (Vit. Tib., 1), this family could boast of 28 consuls, 5 dictators, 7 censors, 7 triumphs, and 2 ovations. The emperors Tiberius and Claudius were of this same line. The Claudian family claimed descent from Appius Claudius. There was also a plebeian branch of the Claudii, named the Claudii Marcelli. (Consult Glandorp, Onomast., p. 222, seqq.)

CLAUDIA, I. a vestal virgin, suspected of having violated her vow. She proved her innocence by drawing off from a shoal in the Tiber, with the aid of her girdle merely, a vessel which had been stranded there, and on board of which was the statue of Cybele, that had been brought to Italy from Asia Minor. (Ovid, Fast., 4, 305, seqq.—Sueton., Vit. Tib., c. 2.—Liv., 29, 14.)—II. A sister of Claudius Pulcher, fined by the people on account of an offensive remark made by her. It seems, that, as her vehicle (carpentum) was retarded in its progress through the streets of Rome by the pressure of the crowd, she exclaimed, in a moment of haughty irritation, strikingly characteristic of the Claudian race, “I wish my brother Pulcher were alive again, and would lose another fleet, that there might be less crowding and confusion at Rome!” (Sueton., Vit. Tib., c. 2.)—III. A vestal virgin, daughter of Appius Claudius Audax. When the tribunes of the commons endeavoured to pull her father from his chariot, in the midst of a triumph (A.U.C. 610), she ascended the triumphal car, took her place by her father's side, and rode with him to the Capitol, thus securing him by her sacred character from any further molestation. (Val. Max., 5, 4, 6.—Cic., pro. Coel., 14.) In Suetonius (Vit. Tib., c. 2), Appius is called her brother (fratrem), but this is evidently an error of the copyists for patrem. (Pigh. Ann., vol. 2, p. 473.)—IV. Augusta, a daughter of Nero and Poppæa. Her birth excited great joy in her profligate father, but she died at the end of four months. Divine honours were decreed unto the royal infant, and a temple and priestess. (Tacit., Ann., 15, 23.—Sueton., Vit. Ner., c. 35.)—V. (Via) a Roman road, which branched off from the Via Flaminia, at the Pons Mulvius, near Rome, and, proceeding through the more inland parts of Etruria, joined the Via Aurelia at Lucca. It appears to have fallen into disuse, when the central parts of Etruria, which it crossed, became unfrequented. (Cramer's Anc. Italy, vol. 1, p. 245.)—VI. Antonia, a daughter of the Emperor Claudius, married Cn. Pompey, whom Messalina caused to be put to death. Her second husband, Sylla Faustus, by whom she had a son, was killed by Nero, and she shared his fate when she refused to marry his murderer. (Sueton., Vit. Claud., c. 27.—Id., Vit. Ner., 35.)

CLAUDIA LEX, I. proposed by Claudius the consul, at the request of the allies, A.U.C. 573, that the allies and those of the Latin name should leave Rome, and return to their own cities. According to this law, the consul made an edict; and a decree of the senate was added, that, for the future, no person should be manumitted, unless both master and slave swore that the latter was not manumitted for the sake of changing his city. For the allies used to give their children as slaves to any Roman citizen, on condition of their being manumitted. (Liv., 41, 8, seq.—Cic., pro Balb., 23.)—II. Another by the consul Marcellus, A.U.C. 703, that no one should be allowed to stand candidate for an office while absent; thus taking from Cæsar the privilege granted by the Pompeian law; also, that the freedom of the city should be taken from the colony of Novumcomum, which Cæsar had planted. (Sueton., Vit. Jul., 28.—Cic., Ep. ad Fam., 13, 35.)—

III. Another, de usura, by the Emperor Claudius, which forbade people to lend money to minors on condition of payment after the decease of their parents. It is supposed to be the same with what was called the Senatus-consultum Macedonianum, enforced by Vespasian. (Tacit., Ann., 11, 13.)—IV. Another, passed A.U.C. 535, and forbidding any senator or father of a senator to have a vessel above a certain burden (300 amphoræ). The object it had in view was to prevent their engaging in commercial operations. A clause is supposed to have been added to this law, prohibiting the quaestors' clerks from trading. (Liv., 21, 63.—Compare Crusius, ad Sueton., Vit. Dom., c. 9.)

CLAUDIÆ AQUÆ, the first water brought to Rome by means of an aqueduct. This was one of 11 miles, erected by the censor Appius Claudius, A.U.C. 441. The supply was obtained from the river Anio. (Eutrop., 2, 4.—Liv., 9, 29.)

CLAUDIANUS, CLAUDIUS, a Latin poet, born at Alexandria in Egypt, probably about 365 A.D., in the first year of the reign of Valentinian I. His name indicates that his family was originally from Rome; but at Alexandria Greek was the language of every-day intercourse, and it was in this tongue that Claudian composed his first works. He received a distinguished literary education. It has been supposed, from some passages in his works, that in his youth he bore arms, and that he assisted, A.D. 394, in the battle between Theodosius and Eugenius. Gesner, however, has shown that these passages are susceptible of another interpretation. It is more certain, that, after having passed some time at Rome, he followed, A.D. 395, Stilicho, the minister and guardian of Honorius, to Mediolanum, which was, at this period, the residence of the Emperor of the West. The minister, a Vandal by nation, and his spouse, the Princess Serena, became the patrons of the young poet; and the latter expressed his gratitude in verses, which were recompensed by honours of the most exaggerated character. Not only was Claudian raised to stations of which his talents no doubt rendered him worthy, but, on the request of the senate, the two emperors of the East and West united in having a bronze statue raised to him in the forum, the pedestal of which, bearing an inscription in honour of the poet, was discovered at Rome in the 15th century. The authenticity of this monument is doubted by some, but without sufficient reason, since Claudian himself makes mention of the statue in one of his poems (25, 7.—Compare Schöll, Hist. Lit. Rom., vol. 3, p. 82, in notis). About A.D. 398, Claudian returned to Egypt, armed with a letter from his protector, demanding for the hard hand of a rich heiress in this province. The marriage was celebrated at Alexandria, and Claudian conducted his young bride to the imperial court. After having enjoyed, for the space of more than ten years, the favour of his powerful protectors, our poet was involved in one of those catastrophes so common at courts. Accused, probably without any reason, of a design to raise his own son to the imperial throne, Stilicho was delivered over to punishment in 408. Though we know not how far Claudian was involved in the disgrace of his protectors, still we cannot doubt that he lost his official stations, and also a part of his fortune. The period of his death is unknown.—The question is sometimes put, whether Claudian was a Christian or not. There is nothing in his works to indicate that he was; for some Christian epigrams that are found among his poems are evidently spurious. It is not a little surprising, indeed, that one who lived in a court which possessed a great zeal for Christianity, should have remained faithful to the religion of his fathers: the regrets, however, of St. Augustine and of Orosius, who state that Claudian was a pagan, are too positive in their character to admit of any doubt on this point. (Augustin., de Civ. Dei, 5, 26.—Oros., adv. Pagan. Hist., 7, 35.)—Claudian has left poems of various kinds: epic, panegyric, satirical, and also idylls and epigrams. The panegyrics in verse, composed by him, are the earliest with which we are acquainted, and may be regarded in the light of an innovation. Prose panegyrics had been in use from the second century of our era. These eulogiums in verse, composed by the poet, are as follows: 1st. A Panegyric on the consulship of Probinus and Olybrius, which took place in 395: 2d. Panegyrics on the third, fourth, and sixth consulships of Honorius, which took place in the years 396, 398, and 404: 3d. A Panegyric in honour of Mallius Theodorus, A.D. 399: 4th. A Eulogium on Stilicho, in three parts: 5th. A Eulogium on Serena. In reading these productions we are at a loss which to wonder at most, the base flattery of the poet, or the effrontery of those who received his gross adulation without a blush.—In epic poetry Claudian has left us a piece in three cantos or books, entitled “De Raptu Proserpinæ,” and the commencement of a second production, entitled “Gigantomachia,” the war of the Giants. As regards the first of these works, critics have considered the third book inferior in polish to the other two, and showing less of a finishing hand. The plan of the poem, moreover, is a defective one. Instead of hurrying us at once into the very midst of the action, as an epic bard should do, he recounts his fable from its very commencement, as an historian would relate an event. All the actors, too, being deities, and, consequently, elevated above the level of human nature, can only inspire a feeble interest. This defect Claudian seeks to remedy by a style always elevated, by striking imagery and brilliant descriptions: but this tone pervading the whole work, and the uniformity of the characters, have spread over it a monotony which becomes fatiguing in the extreme. Notwithstanding all this, however, Claudian is, perhaps, next to Statius, the Latin epic poet that has come nearest to Virgil, especially in some of his descriptions and comparisons, and his merit will no doubt appear in a much more favourable light if we take into consideration the period when he lived.—Two other works of Claudian may be ranked in the class of epic poems. One is entitled “De Bello Gildonico,” the other, “De Bello Getico, sive Pollentiuco.” Gildon, son of a king of Mauritania, had made himself independent in Africa during the reign of Theodosius the Great. The loss of this province, one of the granaries of the empire, was severely felt. Under Honorius, however, Africa was reconquered, and it is this exploit that Claudian celebrates in a poem, of which we have only the first canto, containing the cause and the preparations of the war. The poem “De Bello Getico” turns on the war with the Visigoths, called also the war of Pollentia, which occurred A.D. 402, when Honorius was consul for the fifth time with his brother Arcadius, emperor of the East. Alaric, king of this Germanic race, having entered Italy by the way of Pannonia, was defeated by Stilicho near Pollentia, among the Cottian Alps. This war is the subject of a poem by Claudian, in six hundred and forty-seven verses. Cassiodorus, it is true, and likewise Jornandes, say directly the contrary in relation to this affair; but in admitting the fact of the overthrow, as stated by Claudian, we do not intend to prejudice a question of history.—Claudian is the author also of some poems, which one would be tempted to rank in the class of satires, if the manner in which he treats his subject was not rather of an epic, or, if we may so speak, of a rhetorical character, and if these pieces were not composed with the same view as his panegyrics, namely, that of pleasing Stilicho. The productions to which we refer are his invectives against Rufinus and Eutropius, two enemies of the minister’s. These are, perhaps, Claudian’s chef-d’œuvres. Some critics, however, consider the poem against Eutropius superior to that against Rufinus. We have also two Epithalamia by Claudian; one on occasion of the marriage of Honorius and Maria, the daughter of Stilicho and Serena; the other on the marriage of Palladius and Celerina.

In both of these pieces Claudian shows imagination and talent. The first of these epithalamia is followed by a poem, to which the copyists have given the title of Fescennina. There exist also five poetical epistles of Claudian, which may be ranked among the feeblest of his productions. Under the name of Idyls, we have, moreover, seven didactic or descriptive poems. There are likewise some epigrams remaining, but many of them appear to have been written, not by Claudian, but by a Christian bard. To the works of Claudian it has been customary to join a poem in honour of Hercules. It is more correctly assigned, however, to Olympius Nemesianus. (Wernsdorff, Poet. Lat. Min., vol. 1, p. 275.) The best editions of Claudian are, that of Gesner, Lips., 1759, 8vo; and that of Burmann (secundus), Amst., 1760, 4to; and that of Artaud (in Lemaire’s collection), Paris, 1824, 2 vols. 8vo.

CLAUDIOPOLIS, I. a city of Bithynia, previously called Bithynium. It was situate above Tium, in a district named Salone, celebrated for its excellent pastures, and a cheese much esteemed at Rome. (Strab., 565.—Pliny, 11, 42.) From Pausanias (8, 9), it would appear to have been either on the banks of the Sangarius, or near them. It obtained the name of Claudiopolis in the reign of Tiberius. At a later period, as the birthplace of Antinoüs the favourite of Hadrian, it received several privileges from that emperor. (Dio Cass., 69, 11.) Under Theodosius it was made the capital of the province Honorias. Many years after, we learn from Anna Comnena (p. 967) and Leo Diaconus (4, 9), who describe it as the most wealthy and flourishing city of Galatia, that it was almost totally destroyed by an earthquake, attended with vast loss of lives. (Cramer’s Asia Minor, vol. 1, p. 209.)—II. A city of Cilicia Trachea, but assigned by Ammianus and Hierocles to Isauria. (Ammian. Marcell., 14, 25.—Hierocl., p. 709.) It was founded by Claudius the Roman emperor, and was situate in a plain between two summits of Mount Taurus, and probably also on the Calycadnus, or one of its branches. (Wesseling, ad Hierocl., l. c.—Cramer’s Asia Minor, vol. 2, p. 332.)

CLAUDIUS, I. Appius. (Vid. Appius.)—II. Pulcher, a Roman consul, in the first Punic war. When, previous to a naval engagement with the Carthaginians, the person who had charge of the sacred fowls told him that they would not eat, which was esteemed a bad omen, he ordered them to be thrown into the sea, exclaiming, “Then let them drink.” After this, joining battle with the foe, he was defeated with the loss of his fleet. Having been recalled by the senate, he gave another specimen of the haughty temper of the Claudian race, for, on being directed to nominate a dictator, he purposely named his own riator, an individual of the lowest rank. (Liv., Epit., 19.—Cic., N. D., 2, 3.—Id., de Dir., 1, 16.)—III. Nero, a Roman consul in the second Punic war, who, in conjunction with his colleague Livius Salinator, defeated Hasdrubal in Umbria, on the banks of the Metaurus. (Vid. Metaurus and Hasdrubal.)—IV. Tiberius Nero, father of the Emperor Tiberius. He was distinguished for his naval skill in the Alexandrine war, under Julius Cæsar. At a subsequent period he excited a sedition in Campania, by promising to restore the property of those who had suffered in the civil wars. This tumult, however, was soon quelled by the arrival of Octavius; and Tiberius, together with his wife Livia, took refuge in Sicily and Achaia until the establishment of the second triumvirate made it safe for him to return to Rome. Livia having after this engaged the affections of Octavius, Tiberius transferred to him the name and privileges of a husband. (Tacit., Ann., 5, 1.)—V. Tiberius Nero Cæsar, the successor of Augustus, and son of the preceding. (Vid. Tiberius.)—VI. Tiberius Claudius Drusus Cæsar, more commonly known by his historical name of Claudius, succeeded to the Roman empire on the death of Caligula. He was the second son of Drusus and Antonia, and, consequently, grand-nephew to Augustus. When the assassination of Caligula was made known, the first impulse of the court party and of the foreign guards was to massacre all who had participated in the murder. Several persons of distinction, who imprudently exposed themselves, became, in consequence, the victims of their fury. This violence subsided, however, upon their discovering Claudius, who had concealed himself in an obscure corner of the palace, and, being dragged from his hiding-place, threw himself at their feet in the utmost terror, and besought them to spare his life. The soldiers in the palace immediately saluted him emperor, and Claudius, in return, set the first example of paying the army for the imperial dignity by a largess from the public treasury. It is difficult to assign any other motive for the choice which the army made of Claudius than that which they themselves professed, "His relationship to the whole family of the Cæsars." Claudius, who was now fifty years old, had never done anything to gain popularity, or to display those qualities which secure the attachment of the soldiery. He had been a rickety child, and the development of his faculties was retarded by his bodily infirmities; and although he outgrew his complaints, and became distinguished as a polite scholar and an eloquent writer (Tacit., Ann., 13, 3.—Sueton., Vit. Claud., c. 41), his spirits never recovered from the effects of disease and of severe treatment, and he retained much of the timidity and indolence of his childhood. (Sueton., Vit. Claud., c. 2.) During the reign of Tiberius he gave himself up to gross sensuality, and consoled himself under this degradation by the security which it brought with it. Under Caligula also he found his safety consist in maintaining his reputation for incapacity, and he suffered himself to become the butt of court parasites, and the subject of their practical jokes. (Sueton., Vit. Claud., c. 7.) The excitement of novelty, on his first accession to the throne, produced efforts of sagacity and prudence, of which none who had previously known him believed him capable; and during the whole of his reign, too, we find judicious and useful enactments occasionally made, which would seem to show that he was not in reality "so silly an emperor" as historians have generally represented him to be. It is most probable, therefore, that the fatuity which characterizes some parts of his conduct was the result, not of natural imbecility, but of the early and unlimited indulgence of the grossest sensuality. Claudius embellished Rome with many magnificent works; he made Mauritania a Roman province; his armies fought successfully against the Germans; and he himself triumphed magnificently for victories over the Britons, and obtained, together with his infant son, the surname of Britannicus. But in other respects he was wholly governed by worthless favourites, and especially by his empress, the profligate and abandoned Messalina, whose cruelty and rapacity were as unbounded as her licentiousness. At her instigation it was but too common for the emperor to put to death, on false charges of conspiracy, some of the wealthiest of the nobles, and to confiscate their estates, with the money arising from which she openly pampered her numerous paramours. When the career of this guilty woman was terminated, Claudius was governed for a time by his freedman Narcissus, and Pallas, another manumitted slave, until he took to wife his own niece, Agrippina, daughter of Germanicus, a woman of strong natural abilities, but of insatiable avarice, extreme ambition, and remorseless cruelty. Her influence over the feeble emperor was boundless, and was displayed in the most glaring manner. She prevailed on him at last to set aside his own son Britannicus, and to adopt her son Domitius Ahenobarbus, by her former husband, giving him the name by which he is best known, Nero, and constituting him heir to the imperial throne. Claudius having afterward shown a disposition to change the succession and restore it to Britannicus, fell a victim to the ambition of Agrippina, who caused him to be poisoned. A dish of mushrooms was prepared for the purpose, a kind of food of which the emperor was known to be especially fond, and the effects of the poison were hastened by the pretended remedies exhibited by Xenophon, the physician of the palace. It was given out that Claudius had suffered from indigestion, which his habitual gluttony rendered so frequent that it excited no surprise; and his death was concealed till Domitian Nero had secured the guards, and had quietly taken possession of the imperial authority. Claudius died in the sixty-fourth year of his age, and the fourteenth of his reign, A.D. 54. (Sueton., Vit. Claud.—Dio Cass., lib. 60.—Encyclop. Metropol., div. 3, vol. 2, p. 443, seqq.)

CLAZOMENE, a city of Ionia, on the coast of the Ægean Sea, west of Smyrna. There were two places of this name; the more ancient stood on the continent, and was strongly fortified by the Ionians to resist the Persians. After the defeat of Cræsus, however, they were terrified, and withdrew to a neighbouring island, where they built the second Clazomene, so often mentioned in Roman history. (Strabo, 645.—Compare Pausanias, 7, 3.) Alexander joined it to the continent by a causeway 250 paces long; from which time it was reckoned among the cities on the continent. (Plin., 5, 29.) Augustus greatly embellished it, and was styled, on some medals, its founder, through flattery. Anaxagoras was born here. On or near its site stands the small town of Dourlak or Vourla. There are still some remains of the ancient causeway, by which one can reach, with some risk, however, from the force of the sea, the island of St. John. (Pococke, vol. 3, book 2, c. 2—Candler, c. 24.—Mannert, Geogr., vol. 6, pt. 3, p. 329.)

CLEANTHES, I. a Stoic philosopher of Assus in Lydia, disciple of Zeno. After the death of Zeno he presided over his school. His first appearance was in the character of a wrestler. In this capacity he visited Athens, where the love of philosophy was diffused through all ranks of people. He soon caught the general spirit, and though he was possessed of no more than four drachmae, he determined to put himself under the tuition of some eminent philosopher. His first master was Crates, the Academic. He afterward became a disciple of Zeno, and a celebrated advocate of his doctrines. By night he drew water as a common labourer in the public gardens, that he might have leisure in the daytime to attend the schools of philosophy. The Athenian citizens observing that, though he appeared strong and healthy, he had no visible means of subsistence, summoned him before the Areopagus, according to the custom of the city, to give an account of his manner of living. Upon this he produced the gardener for whom he drew water, and a woman for whom he ground meal, as witnesses to prove that he subsisted by the labour of his hands, and the judges of the court were struck with such admiration of his conduct, that they ordered ten mina to be paid him out of the public treasury; which, however, Zeno would not suffer him to accept. (Diog. Laert.—Val. Max., 8, 7.—Sen., Ep., 44.) Antigonus afterward presented him with three thousand mina. From the manner in which this philosopher supported himself, he was called φειάντρος, or "the well-drawer." For many years he was so very poor that he was compelled to write the heads of his master's lectures on shells and bones, for the want of money to buy better materials. He remained, however, notwithstanding every obstacle, a pupil of Zeno for nineteen years. His natural faculties were slow; but resolution and perseverance enabled him to overcome every difficulty; and at last he became so complete a master of the Stoic philosophy as to be perfectly well qualified to succeed Zeno. His fellow-disciples often ridiculed him for his dulness by calling him an ass; but his answer was, that if he were an ass he was the better able to bear the weight of Zeno's doctrine. He wrote much, but none of his writings remain except a most beautiful hymn to Jupiter, preserved in the Anthology. After his death, the Roman senate erected a statue in honour of him at Assus. It is said that he starved himself in his 90th year, B.C. 240. (Enfield's History of Philosophy, vol. 1, p. 354, seqq.)—II. A Corinthian painter, whom some make to have been the inventor of drawing in outline. (Plin., 35, 3.) Athenagoras mentions him among the first that practised this branch of the art. (Sillig. Dict. Art., s. v.)

CLEARCHUS, I. a tyrant of Ilacerlea Pontica, who was killed by Chion and Leonidas, Plato's pupils, during the celebration of the festival of Bacchus, after the enjoyment of the sovereign power for twelve years, 353 B.C. (Consult Memnon, fragm., c. 1, and Hoffmann's Prolegomena in Chionis Epist.—Compare also remarks under the article Chion.)—II. A Lacedæmonian, one of the Greek commanders in the army of Cyrus the younger, and held by that prince in the highest estimation of all the Greek leaders that were with him. A sketch of his character and history is given by Xenophon (Anab., 2, 6), in which many things appear to be softened down. He had been governor previously of Byzantium, under the orders of the Spartan Ephori, and had conducted himself so tyrannically that the government at home sent an armed force against him. Clearchus, anticipating the arrival of these troops, left Byzantium and seized upon Selymbria, and when the Spartan forces came he engaged in battle with them, but was defeated. After this he fled to Cyrus. He was entrapped along with the other Greek leaders, after the battle of Cunaxa, by the satrap Tissaphernes, and put to death in company with them. (Xen., Anab., 2, 5, 31, seqq.—Id. ib., 2, 6, 1, seqq.—Diod. Sic., 14, 12.)

CLEMENS, I. (commonly called Romanus, for distinction's sake from Clemens of Alexandria), one of the early Christians, the friend and fellow-traveller of St. Paul, and afterward bishop of Rome, to which station he was chosen A.D. 67, or, according to some, A.D. 91. He was the author of an epistle to the church of Corinth, printed in the "Patres Apostolici" of Le Clerc, Amst., 1698. Of this work, the only manuscript of which now extant is in the British Museum, Archbishop Wake printed a translation in 1705. The best edition of the original is Jacobson's, 2 vols. 8vo, Oxon., 1838. Clemens is supposed to have died at Rome about the close of the first century.—II. An eminent father of the church, who flourished between A.D. 192 and 217, and is commonly called Alexandrinus, to distinguish him from Clemens of Rome. He is supposed by some to have been a native of Athens, and by others of Alexandria, but of his real origin very little is known. He early devoted himself to study in the schools of the latter city, and had many preceptors. (Strom., 1, p. 274.—Euseb., Hist. Eccl., 5, 2.) His Hebrew preceptor, whom he calls "the Sicilian bee," was unquestionably Pantanus, a Jew by birth, but of Sicilian extraction, who united Grecian with sacred learning, and was attached to the Stoic philosophy. (Vales. ad Euseb., 5, 10.) Clemens so far adopted the ideas of this preceptor as to espouse the moral doctrine of the Stoics. In other respects he followed the Eclectic method of philosophizing. While the pagan philosophers pillaged the Christian stores to enrich the Eclectic system, this Christian father, on the contrary, transferred the Platonic, Stoic, and Oriental dogmas to the Christian creed, as relics of ancient tradition originating in Divine revelation. (Strom., 1, p. 313.) In hopes of recommending Christianity to his catechumens (for, after Pantenus, he had the charge of the Christian catechetical school in Alexandria), Clemens made a large collection of ancient wisdom, under the name of Stromata, an epithet borrowed from carpet-work, and intended to denote the miscellaneous nature of the philosophical and religious topics of which the work treats. He assigned this reason for the undertaking, that much truth is mixed with the dogmas of philosophers, or, rather, covered and concealed in their writings, like the kernel within its shell. This work is of great value, as it contains many quotations, and relates many facts, not elsewhere preserved. But, though the object of his labours was laudable, it must be confessed that his inclination to blend heathen tenets with Christian doctrines rendered his writings in many respects injurious to the Christian cause. His vast reading encumbered his judgment; and his injudicious zeal sometimes led him into credulity, if not into dishonesty. We frequently find him adopting Platonic and Stoic tenets as Christian doctrines, and thus sowing the seeds of error in the Christian church. Besides the Stromata, we have the following works of Clemens remaining: 1. Protrepticon, or an exhortation to the Pagans; 2. Paedagogus, or the instructor; 3. The fragments of a treatise on the use of riches, entitled, "What rich man shall be saved?"—In these works he approaches the strict standard of orthodoxy; but in one which is lost, and the title of which was Hypotyposes, or "Institutions," he is stated by Photius (Cod., 109.—vol. 1, p. 89, ed. Bekker) to have maintained sentiments which were unscriptural. The works of Clemens were first printed in Greek only, at Florence in 1550. Of the various editions with Latin versions, the best is that of Archbishop Potter, 2 vols. fol., 1715, Oxon. (Enfield's History of Philosophy, vol. 2, p. 274, seqq.)

CLEOBIS and BITON, two youths, sons of Cydippe, the priestess of Juno at Argos, and remarkable for physical prowess, having both carried off prizes in the public games. Solon, in his conversation with Cræsus on the subject of human felicity, related, according to Herodotus (1, 31), the following incident respecting them. Their mother Cydippe was required by sacred custom to be drawn to the temple of Juno, on a certain festival, by a pair of oxen. The animals happening not to be brought up from the field in due season, and Cydippe being pressed for time, her two sons put themselves under the yoke, drew the chariot in which their mother sat for the distance of forty-five stadia (nearly six miles), and brought her in that manner to the temple. The men of Argos who stood around commended the strength of the youths, and the women felicitated their mother on having such sons; while Cydippe herself, in a transport of joy, prayed to the goddess that Cleobis and Biton might obtain the greatest blessing man could receive. When she had finished her prayer, and her sons had sacrificed and feasted with her, they fell asleep in the temple, and awoke no more. The Argives, in commemoration of their filial piety, caused statues to be erected to them at Delphi. Servius (ad Virg., Georg., 3, 532) says, that the want of oxen on this occasion was owing to a pestilential malady, which had destroyed all the cattle belonging to Argos.—This touching little story is frequently alluded to by the ancient writers. (Compare Cic., Tusc. Quest., 1, 47.—Plut., Consol. ad Apoll., p. 108, F.—Id., Vit. Sol., c. 27.—Stobæus, p. 603, &c.)

CLEOBOTUS, a native of Lindus, in the island of Rhodes, son of Evagoras, monarch of that city, and claiming descent from Hercules. He was not less remarkable for strength than for beauty of person. After travelling in Egypt for the purpose of acquiring knowledge, he ascended the throne on the death of his father. Plutarch says he usurped it. The rest of his life is unknown: we are merely informed that he actained to the age of seventy years, and died about the 55th Olympiad. By some he is ranked among the wise men of Greece. His favourite maxim was "Ἀριστον μέτρον," "moderation is best," i. e., preserve a due mean in all things. (Diog. Laert. in Vit.)

CLEOMBROTUS, I. a king of Sparta, who succeeded his brother Agesipolis I. He was defeated by Epaminondas in the battle of Leuctra, and lost his life on that occasion. (Xen., Hist. Gr., 6, 4, 13.)—II. A son-in-law of Leonidas II., king of Sparta, who usurped the kingdom after the expulsion of that monarch, but was soon after expelled in turn and sent into banishment. (Plut., Vit. Ag. et Cleom.)

CLEOMÈDES, a Greek writer, supposed to have been the author of the work which has reached us, entitled "Cyclic Theory of Meteors," i. e., Circular Theory of the Stars. He is thought to have lived some years before the Christian era. (Delambre, in Biogr. Univ., vol. 9, p. 54.)

CLEOMÈNES I., king of Sparta, ascended the throne B.C. 519. At the beginning of his reign he undertook an expedition against the Argives, defeated them, and destroyed a large number who had taken refuge in a sacred grove. He afterward drove out the Pisistratidæ from Athens. This is the same Cleomenes whom Aristagoras endeavoured, but in vain, to involve in a war with the Persians. He afterward managed, by undue influence, to procure an oracular response from Delphi, pronouncing his colleague Demaratus illegitimate, and thus obtained his deposition. Becoming alarmed, subsequently, lest the fraud should be discovered, Cleomenes fled secretly to Thessaly, and from thence passing into Arcadia, he began to stir up the people of this latter country against Sparta. The Lacedæmonians, fearing his intrigues, recalled him, but he died soon after his return, in a fit of insanity, by his own hand. (Herod., 5, 64.—Id., 5, 49, seqq.—Id., 5, 65, &c.)—II. Cleomenes II., succeeded his brother Agesipolis II. on the throne of Sparta, B.C. 371. The power of his country was then on the decline, and he possessed not the requisite talents to restore it to its former state. He reigned sixty years and ten months without having done anything worthy the notice of posterity. (Paus., 3, 6.)—III. Cleomenes III., son of Leonidas II., ascended the Spartan throne B.C. 230. Dissatisfied at the prevailing manners of Sparta, he resolved to bring about a reform, and to restore the institutions of Lycurgus, after the example of Agis, who had lost his life in a similar attempt. Thinking that war would furnish the best opportunity for the execution of his design, he led his forces against the Achæans, who were commanded by Aratus, and greatly distinguished himself. Returning after this to Sparta, with a portion of his army, he put to death the Ephori, made a new division of the lands, and introduced again the old Spartan system of education. He also took his brother Euclidas as his colleague on the throne, and thus for the first and only time the Spartans had two kings of the same family. After a long, and in many respects successful, series of operations against the Achæans and Macedonians, the latter of whom had been called in by Aratus as allies, Cleomenes was defeated by Antigonus in the battle of Sellasia, and immediately after fled to Ptolemy Evergetes in Egypt. This monarch treated him with some degree of generosity, but his successor Ptolemy Philopator, a weak and suspicious prince, soon began to look upon him with an evil eye, and at last kept him in confinement. The Spartan monarch, in a fit of despair, and taking advantage of the temporary absence of Ptolemy from his capital, broke forth from the place where he had been kept in custody, along with thirteen of his friends, and endeavoured to arouse the inhabitants in the cause of freedom. But, finding their efforts fruitless, they fell by their own hands. Cleomenes had been sixteen years king of Laconia. With him ended the race of the Heraclidæ, which had so long sat on the throne of that country. Ptolemy ordered his body to be flayed and nailed to a cross, and his children to be put to death. (Plut., Vit. Cleom.)

CLEON, an Athenian, bred among the lowest of the people, the son of a tanner, and said himself to have exercised that trade. Of extraordinary impudence and little courage, slow in the field, but forward and noisy in the assembly, corrupt in practice as in principle, but boastful of integrity, and supported by a coarse but ready eloquence, he gained such consideration by flattering the lower orders and railing at the higher, that he stood in the situation of head of a party. By an extraordinary train of circumstances he came off victorious in the affair of Sphacteria, the Athenian populace having chosen him one of their generals. Elated upon this with the idea that he possessed military talents, he caused himself to be appointed commander of an expedition into Thrace. He was slain in a battle at Amphipolis against Brasidas, the Spartan general, 422 B.C. (Consult the remarks of Mitchell, in his edition of the Achæarnenses of Aristophanes, Appendix, note A, and compare Thucyd., 4, 28, seqq.—Id., 5, 2.—Id., 5, 8, seqq.)

CLEONÆ, I. a town of Argolis, northeast of Nemea. According to Strabo, it was 120 stadia from Argos and eighty from Corinth; he adds, that it was situated on a rock, and surrounded by walls, which justified the epithet applied to it by Homer (Il., 2, 570). Hercules was said to have defeated and slain the Elean chief called Moliones, near Cleonæ. (Pindar, Olymp., 10, 36.—Compare Apollodorus, 2, 5, 1.) We learn from Pindar that games were there solemnized. (Nem., 4, 26.—Ibid., 10, 78.) Dodwell states, that the ruins of Cleonæ are to be seen on the site now called Courtesse. They occupy a circular hill, which seems to have been completely covered with buildings. On the side of the hill are six ancient terrace-walls, rising one above another, on which the houses and streets were situated. (Tour, vol. 2, p. 206.—Chandler, vol. 2, p. 288.—Gell's Itin. of the Morea, p. 157.)—II. A town of Macedonia, in the peninsula of Athos, said to have been founded by a colony from Chalcis. (Herod., 7, 22.—Thucyd., 4, 109.—Cramer's Anc. Greece, vol. 1, p. 260.)

CLEOPATRA, I. a daughter of Idas and Marpessa, and the wife of Meleager. (Hom., Il., 9, 557.)—II. The wife of Philip of Macedon, whom that monarch married after he had repudiated Olympias. (Justin, 9, 5.) After the death of Philip, Olympias compelled her to destroy herself. (Justin, 9, 7.)—III. A daughter of Philip and Olympias, and sister to Alexander the Great. She married Alexander of Epirus, who fell in Italy. (Justin, 9, 6, 1.) After the death of Alexander of Macedon, her hand was sought by Perdiccas and others of his generals, but she was put to death by Antigonus. (Diod. Sic., 20, 37.—Compare Diod. Sic., 18, 23, and Wesseling, ad loc.)—IV. A daughter of Mithradates, and the wife of Tigranes. (Justin, 38, 3)—V. A daughter of Antiochus III. of Syria. She married Ptolemy V., king of Egypt, and was left guardian of her infant son Ptolemy VI., but she died soon after her husband, to the great regret of her subjects.—VI. A daughter of Ptolemy Philometor, was the wife of three kings of Syria, and the mother of four; namely, of Antiochus Dionysius, by her first husband Alexander Balas; of Seleucus V. and Antiochus VIII., by Demetrius Nicator; and, lastly, of Antiochus IX., surnamed Cyzicienus, by Antiochus Evergetes or Sidetes. She was compelled by her son, Antiochus VIII., to drink the poison which she had prepared for him, B.C. 120.—VII. The most famous of the name was the daughter of Ptolemy Auletes, and remarkable for her beauty and personal accomplishments. According to the usage of the Alexandrian court, she married her eldest brother Ptolemy XII., and began to reign with him in her seventeenth year. Both she and her husband, being minors, were placed by the will of their father under the guardianship of Rome, an office which the senate transferred to Pompey. An insurrection breaking out in the Egyptian capital soon after the commencement of this reign, Cleopatra was compelled to yield to the tide of popular fury, and to flee into Syria, where she sought protection in temporary exile. The flight of this princess, though mainly arising from the tumult just mentioned, was unquestionably accelerated by the designs of the young king and his ambitious ministers. Their object became manifest when Cleopatra, after a few months' residence in Syria, returned towards her native country to resume her seat on the throne. Ptolemy prepared to oppose her by force of arms, and a civil war would inevitably have ensued, had not Cæsar at that very juncture sailed to the coast of Egypt in pursuit of Pompey. A secret interview soon took place between Cleopatra and the Roman general. She placed herself on board a small skiff, under the protection of Apollodorus, a Sicilian Greek, set sail from the coast of Syria, reached the harbour of Alexandria in safety, and had herself conveyed into the chamber of the Roman commander in the form of a large package of goods. The stratagem proved completely successful. Cleopatra was now in her twentieth year, distinguished by extraordinary personal charms, and surrounded with all the graces which give to those charms their greatest power. Her voice sounded like the sweetest music; and she spoke a variety of languages with propriety and ease. She could, it is said, assume all characters at will, which all alike became her, and the impression that was made by her beauty was confirmed by the fascinating brilliancy of her conversation. The day after this singular meeting, Cæsar summoned before him the king, as well as the citizens of Alexandria, and made arrangements for the restoration of peace, procuring Cleopatra, at the same time, her share of the throne. Ptolemy, however, one of Ptolemy's ministers, in whose intriguing spirit all the dissensions of the court had originated, soon stirred up a second revolt, upon which the Alexandrian war commenced, in which Ptolemy was defeated, and lost his life by drowning. Cæsar now proclaimed Cleopatra queen of Egypt; but she was compelled to take her brother, the younger Ptolemy, who was only eleven years old, as her husband and colleague on the throne. The Roman general continued for some time at her court, and she bore him a son, called, from the name of his father, Cæsarion. During the six years which immediately followed these events, the reign of Cleopatra seems not to have been disturbed by insurrection, nor to have been assailed by foreign war. When her brother, at the age of fourteen, demanded his share in the government, Cleopatra poisoned him, and remained sole possessor of the royal authority. The dissensions among the rival leaders who divided the power of Cæsar, had no doubt nearly involved her in a contest with both parties; but the decisive issue of the battle of Philippi relieved her from the hesitation under which some of her measures appear to have been adopted, and determined her inclinations, as well as her interests, in favour of the conquerors. To afford her an opportunity of explaining her conduct, Antony summoned her to attend him in Cilicia, and the meeting which she gave him on the river Cydnus has employed the pen, not only of the historian, but of the prince of English dramatists. (Shakspeare, Antony and Cleopatra, act 1, scene 1.) The artifices of this fascinating princess, now in her twenty-fifth year, so far gained upon Antony, as not only to divert his thoughts from his original purpose of subjecting her kingdom to the payment of tribute, but entirely to lull his ambition to sleep, and make him sacrifice his great stake as a candidate for the empire of the world. After a fruitless attack upon the territory of Palmyra, he hastened to forget his disgrace in the society of the Egyptian queen, passing several months at Alexandria in the most foolish and puerile dissipation. The death of his wife, and his subsequent marriage with Octavia, delayed for a time the crisis which his ungoverned passions were preparing for him. But, though he had thus extricated himself from the snares of Alexandria, his inclinations too soon returned to that unhappy city; for we find that when he left Rome to proceed against the Parthians, he despatched in advance his friend Fonteius Capito, to conduct Cleopatra into Syria. On his return from this disgraceful campaign, he encountered still deeper disgrace by once more willingly submitting to that bondage which had rendered him contemptible in the eyes of most of his followers.—Passing over events which have been alluded to elsewhere (Vid. Augustus), we come to the period that followed the battle of Actium. When Octavius advanced against Egypt, and Antony had been a second time defeated under the walls of Alexandria, Cleopatra shut herself up with a few attendants, and the most valuable part of her treasures, in a strong building which appears to have been intended for a royal sepulchre. To prevent intrusion by friend or enemy, she caused a report to be circulated that she had retired into the monument to put herself to death. Antony resolved to follow her example, and threw himself upon his sword; but being informed, before he expired, that Cleopatra was still living, he caused himself to be carried into her presence, and breathed his last in her arms. Octavius, after this, succeeded in getting Cleopatra into his power, and the queen at first hoped to subdue him by her attractions; but finding at last that her efforts were unavailing, and suspecting that her life was spared only that she might grace the conqueror's triumph, she ended her days, if the common account is to be credited, by the bite of an asp. A small puncture in the arm was the only mark of violence which could be detected on the body of Cleopatra; and it was therefore believed that she had procured death either by the bite of a venomous reptile, or by the scratch of a poisoned bodkin. She was in her thirty-ninth year, having reigned twenty-two years from the death of her father. Octavius, it is said, though deprived by this act of suicide of the greatest ornament of his approaching triumph, gave orders that she should have a magnificent funeral, and that her body, as she desired, should be laid by that of Antony.—In the grave of Cleopatra was deposited the last of the royal race of the Ptolemies, a family which had swayed the sceptre of Egypt for two hundred and ninety-four years. Of the real character of this celebrated queen herself, it is not possible to speak, at this distance of time, with any degree of confidence. That she had beauty and talents of the highest order, is admitted by every historian who has undertaken to give the annals of her reign; and that she was accomplished in no ordinary degree, is established by the fact of her being a great proficient in music, and mistress of nearly all the languages which were cultivated in her age. She was well skilled, for example, in Greek and Latin, and she could converse with Ethiopians, Jews, Arabians, Syrians, Medes, and Persians, without an interpreter. If her conduct was not at all times strictly pure, we must seek for an apology in the religion and manners of her country, and must ascribe the most glaring of her frailties to the absurd institutions which regulated the matrimonial connexions of the Græco-Egyptian princes, and which paid no respect to the age, affections, or temper of the parties. (Plut., Vit. Cæs.—Id., Vit. Ant.—Encyclop. Metrop., div. 3, vol. 2, p. 345.)

CLIMAX, a narrow passage on the coast of Lycia, near Phaselis. (Vid. Phaselis.)

CLINIAS, I. a Pythagorean philosopher and musician, 520 years before the Christian era. (Ælian, V. H., 14, 23.)—II. An Athenian, said by Herodotus (8, 17) to have been the bravest of his countrymen in the battle fought against the Persian fleet at Artemisium; and the Athenians are said by the same writer to have conducted themselves on that occasion with the greatest valour of any of the Greeks.—This Clinias was the father of the celebrated Alcibiades. He married Dinomache, the daughter of Megacles, grandson to Agariste, the daughter of Clisthenes, tyrant of Sicily. He fell at the battle of Coronea. Consult the learned note of Valckenaer (ad Herodot., l. c.) for other particulars respecting this Clinias.—III. The father of Aratus, killed by Abantidas, B.C. 263. (Vid. Aratus II.)

CLIO, one of the Muses. She presided over history, and was generally represented as holding a half-opened roll. The invention of the cithara was ascribed to her. Having drawn on herself the anger of Venus, by taunting her with her passion for Adonis, Clio was inspired by the goddess with love for Pierus, the son of Magnes, and bore him a son named Hyacinthus. (Apollod., 1, 3, 2, seqq.) Her name (Κλειώ) is derived from κλέιος (Ionic for κλέος), glory, renown, &c., because she celebrates the glorious actions of the good and brave.

CLITOMACHUS, a native of Carthage. (Diog. Laert., 4, 67, seqq.) In his early years he acquired a fondness for learning, which induced him to visit Greece for the purpose of attending the schools of the philosophers. From the time of his first arrival in Athens he attached himself to Carneades, and continued his disciple until his death, when he became his successor in the academic chair. He studied with great industry, and made himself master of the systems of the other schools; but professed the doctrine of suspension of assent, as it had been taught by his master. Cicero relates, that he wrote four hundred books upon philosophical subjects. At an advanced age he was seized with a lethargy. Recovering in some measure the use of his faculties, he said, "The love of life shall deceive me no longer," and laid violent hands upon himself. He entered, as we have said, upon the office of preceptor in the academy immediately after the death of Carneades, and held it thirty years. According to Cicero, he taught that there is no certain criterion by which to judge of the truth of those reports which we receive from the senses, and that, therefore, a wise man will either wholly suspend his assent, or decline giving a peremptory opinion; but that, nevertheless, men are strongly impelled by nature to follow probability. His moral doctrine established a natural alliance between pleasure and virtue. He was a professed enemy to rhetoric, and thought that no place should be allowed in society to so dangerous an art. (Sext. Emp. adv. Rhét., § 20.—Enfield's History of Philosophy, vol. 1, p. 258.)

CLITUANUS, a river of Umbria, rising in the vicinity of Spoletum, and falling into the Tinea, and both together into the Tiber. The modern name of the Clituanus is Cliturno. It was famous, according to Virgil, for its milk-white herds, selected as victims in the celebration of the triumph. (Virg., Georg., 2, 146.—Propert., 2, el. 19, 25.—Sil. Ital., 8, 452.—Juv., 12, 13.—Claud., 6, Cons. Hon., 506.) The beautiful description which the younger Pliny (Ep., 8, 8) has left us of this sacred river and its little temple, the ruins of which are still to be seen near the posthouse of Le Verre, between Foligno and Spoleto, will be read with most pleasure in the original. (Compare Vernuti, Osservazioni sopra il fiume Cliturno, del suo Culto e Tempio, Rom., 1773, 4to.—Cramer's Ancient Italy, vol. 1, p. 270.) According to Eustace, white herds are still seen wandering over the rich plain watered by this river. (Classical Tour, vol. 1, p. 322.)

CLITUS, a familiar friend and foster-brother of Alexander, who had saved the king's life in battle. Alexander killed him with a javelin in a fit of inebriety, because, at a feast, he preferred the actions of Philip to those of his son. (Vid. Alexander.)

CLOACINA, a goddess at Rome, who presided over the cloacæ. These cloacæ were sewers for carrying off the filth of the city. The main one was called Cloaca Maxima. From what remains of the Cloaca Maxima at the present day, we may infer that the praise which the ancients bestowed on the Roman cloacæ generally was not unmerited. The first cloacæ were constructed by the two Tarquins. Tarquinius Priscus drained the low grounds of the city about the Forum, and the valleys lying between the hills (the Palatine and Capitoline), by cloacæ, which were carried into the Tiber. (Liv., 1, 38.) But the draining was imperfect, and the Cloaca Maxima was in consequence built by Tarquinius Superbus. (Liv., 1, 56.) It crossed the Roman Forum beneath the level of the pavement, and in ancient times it is said that the tunnel was so large that a wagon loaded with hay could easily pass under it. (Strabo, 235.) Pliny expresses his wonder at the solidity and durability of this great undertaking, which, after a lapse of 800 years, still remained uninjured and entire (36, 15). At the present day, however, all that we see of it is the upper part of a gray massy arch of peperin stone, as solid as the day it was built, through which the water almost imperceptibly flows. Though choked up nearly to its top by the artificial elevation of the surface of modern Rome, it is curious to see it still serving as the common sewer of the city, after the lapse of nearly three thousand years. When the Tiber, into which it flows, is flooded, the water in the cloacæ is driven back so as to rise above the keystone of the arch, and hide it from view. When the Tiber is low, not only this arch, but also the arch through which it discharges its sordid flood into the river, may be seen from the Ponte Rotto, or still more distinctly from the river itself. Dionysius informs us (3, 67), that it cost the state the enormous sum of 1000 talents to have the cloacæ cleaned and repaired. We hear also of other sewers being made from time to time on Mount Aventine and other places, by the censors M. Cato and Valerius Flaccus (Liv., 39, 44), but more especially, by Agrippa, who, according to Pliny (l. c.), is said to have introduced whole rivers into these hollow channels, on which the city was, as it were, suspended, and thus was rendered subterraneously navigable. (Compare Strabo, l. c.—Cassiod., Var. Ep., 3, 30.) It would seem, according to the common account, that the early cloacæ were at first carried through the streets; but that, through want of regularity in rebuilding the city after it was burned by the Gauls, they in many places passed under private houses.—Some architects, in order to support their improbable theory that the construction of the arch was not known even in Greece (where the art had reached a perfection it will never more attain) till about a hundred years before the Christian era, have attempted to controvert the antiquity of the Cloaca Maxima, and attribute it to a much later period. (Compare Hirt, Gesch. der Baukunst, vol. 2, p. 123, and Müller, Etrusker, vol. 1, p. 259.) But if it had really been rebuilt, as a late learned antiquary chose to imagine, by Augustus, would it have escaped the notice of Suetonius! or would Livy, that minute and accurate historian, who extols its grandeur and antiquity, and carefully chronicles the erection of every temple and basilica, have failed to record such a work as this, which must have been executed before his own eyes, and by the very prince in whose court he was living? On the contrary, he expressly says, "that Tarquin made the great subterranean cloaca to carry off the filth of the city, a work so vast that even the magnificence of the present age has not been able to equal it." (Liv., 1, 56.) Pliny also, who records its repair in the reign of Augustus, expressly says, that, after 800 years, this opus omnium maximum continued as strong as when first built by Tarquin. It may, indeed, seem incredible, that the Romans, in that rude age, should have been capable of executing so noble a piece of architecture; but Livy tells us, "that Tarquin sent for artists from every part of Etruria," for this and his other public works. Nothing can be clearer than this evidence of the Cloaca Maxima being the work of the Tarquins; and its denial only affords one of the many proofs, that antiquaries will pervert or overlook facts when they interfere with their favourite theories. This cloaca, therefore, is doubly interesting, not only from its extraordinary grandeur and antiquity, but from being, perhaps, the sole, and certainly the finest, remains of Etruscan architecture that have come down to our times. (Rome in the 19th Century, vol. 1, p. 219, not.—Compare Burgess, Antiquities of Rome, vol. 2, p. 223.)

CLOANTHUS, one of the companions of Æneas, from whom the family of the Cluentii at Rome claimed descent. (Virg., Æn., 5, 122.)

CLODIA, I. a sister of Clodius the tribune, and a female of the most abandoned character. She married Q. Metellus Celer, and was suspected of having poisoned him.—II. The younger sister of the preceding, and equally infamous in character. She married Lucullus, but was repudiated by him for her scandalous conduct. (Plut., Vit. Lucull.)

CLODIA LEX, I. de Cypro, was brought forward by the tribune Clodius, A.U.C. 695, that Cyprus should be taken from Ptolemy and made a Roman province. This was done in order to punish that monarch for having refused Clodius money to pay his ransom when taken by the pirates, and to remove Cato out of the way by appointing him to see the law executed.—II. Another, de Magistratibus, A.U.C. 695, by the same. It forbade the censors to put a stigma or mark of infamy upon any person who had not been actually accused and condemned by both of them.—III. Another, A.U.C. 695, which required the same distribution of corn among the people gratis, as had been given them before at six asses and a triens the modius.—IV. Another, A.U.C. 695, by the same, de Judiciis. It called on an account such as had executed a Roman citizen without a judgment of the people, and all the formalities of a trial. Cicero was aimed at by this law, and soon after, by means of a hired mob, was actually banished.

CLODIUS, Publius, a Roman descended from an illustrious family, but notorious as a bold and reckless demagogue, and a man of the most corrupt morals. Besides being guilty of the most revolting turpitude in the case of his nearest female relatives, he introduced himself, in woman's clothing, into the house of Julius Cæsar, with improper designs against Pompeia, the wife of Cæsar, of whom he was enamoured, and who was then celebrating the mysteries of the Bona Dea, at which no male was allowed to be present. He was tried for the sacrilege, but escaped punishment by bribing the judges. In order to be eligible to the tribuneship, he relinquished his patrician rank, and had himself adopted into a plebeian family. While filling the office of tribune he had numerous laws passed, favourable to the people and adverse to the patricians. He procured for Cato, whom he detested, the government of Cyprus, in order that he might lose his reputation in this difficult office, and along with it the influence which he enjoyed at Rome. He cherished equal hatred towards Cicero, whom he finally succeeded in driving from the city. So troublesome at last did he become even to his own party, that, in order to keep him in check, Pompey procured the recall of Cicero from exile, which he could not effect, however, without the strenuous aid of the tribune Milo; and not long after Clodius was slain in a conflict that took place between his followers and those of Milo. (Cic., Or. pro Mil.—Plut., Vit. Cic.)

CLOELIA, a Roman virgin, given as a hostage to Porsenna. According to the old Roman legend, when Porsenna and the Romans made a peace after the affair of Mucius Sævola, the latter people gave hostages to the king, ten youths and ten maidens, children of noble parents, as a pledge that they would truly keep the peace which had been made. It happened, as the camp of the Etrurians was near the Tiber, that Cloelia, one of the maidens, escaped with her companions, and fled to the brink of the river; and, as the Etrurians pursued them, they all rushed into the water and swam in safety across the stream. But the Romans, jealous of their reputation for good faith, sent them all back to the camp of Porsenna. Not to be outdone in generosity, the monarch gave her and her female companions their freedom, and permitted her to take with her half of the youths; whereupon, with the delicacy of a Roman maiden, she selected those only who were of tender years. The Romans raised an equestrian statue in honour of her, on the highest part of the Sacred Way. (Liv., 2, 13.) She was also rewarded with a horse and arms. (Fragm. Dion. Cass., 4.—Bekker, Anecd., 1, p. 133, 8.) There is another story, that Tarquinius fell upon the hostages as they were conducted into the Etrurian camp; and, with the exception of Valeria, who fled back to the city, massacred them all. (Plin., 34, 13.)

CLOTHO, the youngest of the three Parcæ, daughters of Jupiter and Themis. (Vid. Parcæ.) She held the distaff, and spun the thread of life, whence her name (κλωθεῖν, to spin).

CLOVENTUS, a Roman, who, at his mother's instigation, was accused of having poisoned his stepfather Oppianicus. He was defended with great ability by Cicero, in an oration which is still extant. (Vid. Cicero.)

CLUSIUM, now Chiusi, a town of Etruria, on the banks of the Clanis. Its more ancient name was Camers. (Liv., 10, 25.—Compare Muller, Etrusker, vol. 1, p. 102, where the name Camers or Camars is regarded as a proof of the place's having been originally possessed by the Umbrian race of the Camertes. Consult also Cluver, It. Ant., vol. 2, p. 567.) The Gauls under Brennus besieged it, but marched to Rome without taking it. It was at Clusium that Porsenna held his court; and near this city he erected for himself the splendid mausoleum of which Pliny has transmitted to us a description on the authority of Varro. (Plin., 36, 13.) The whole account seems to bear no small appearance of fiction; for, had such a stupendous work really existed, some traces of it would surely have remained, not merely in Pliny's day, but even in the present age.—Pliny (3, 5) makes a distinction between Clusium Vetus and Novum; and a village, named Chiusi, supposed to represent the latter, is pointed out at the foot of the Apennines, north of Arezzo, in confirmation of this distinction. (Cramer's Anc. Italy, vol. 1, p. 219.)

CLUSIUS, I. or CLESIVS, a river of Gallia Transpadana, rising among the Euganei, and flowing between the Lake Benacus and the river Mela. It is now the Chiese, or Chiso, one of the tributaries of the Oglio.—II. The surname of Janus, when his temple was shut. (Ovid, Fast., 1, 130.)

CLYMENE, I. a daughter of Oceanus and Tethys, who married Iapetus, by whom she had Atlas, Prometheus, Menætes, and Epimetheus. (Hesiod, Theog., 598, seqq.)—II. The mother of Phæthön (Ovid, Met., 1, 756.)—III. A female servant of Helen, who ac-accompanied her mistress to Troy when she eloped with Paris. (Orid. Heroid., 17, 267.—Hom., Il., 3, 144.)

CLYMENEIDES, a patronymic given to Phaethon's sisters, who were daughters of Clymene.

CLYPEA (called by the Greek writers ASPIS), now Aklba, a town of Africa Propria, 22 miles east of Carthage. It was built upon a promontory which was shaped like a shield. Agathoeles seized upon this place when he landed in Africa, fortified it, and gave it, from the shape of the promontory, the name of Aspis ("a shield" in Greek, same as Clypeus in Latin). The natives called the promontory Taphitis. This town served as a stronghold to Regulus in the first Punic war. (Lucan, 4, 586.—Liv., 27, 29.—Cæs., B. C., 2, 23.)

CLYTEMNESTRA, a daughter of Tyndarus, king of Sparta, by Leda. She was born, together with her brother Castor, from one of the eggs which her mother brought forth after her amour with Jupiter, under the form of a swan. She married Agamemnon, king of Mycenæ. When this monarch went to the Trojan war, he left his wife and family, and all his affairs, to the care of his relation Ægisthus. But the latter proved unfaithful to his trust, corrupted Clytemnestra, and usurped the throne. Agamemnon, on his return home, was murdered by his guilty wife, who was herself afterwards slain, along with Ægisthus, by Orestes, son of the deceased monarch. (Consult, for a more detailed account, the articles Agamemnon and Orestes.)

CNIDUS, a town and promontory of Doris in Caria, at the extremity of a promontory called Triopium. The founder of the place is said to have been Triopas. (Diod., 5, 61.—Pausan., 10, 2.) From him it received at first the name of Triopium, which at a later period was confined merely to the promontory on which it stood. (Scylax, p. 38.—Hærodot., 1, 174.) Venus was the chief deity of the place, and had three temples erected to her, under the several surnames of Doritis, Acræa, and Euplora. In the last of these stood a celebrated statue of the goddess, the work of Praxiteles. (Pausan., 1, 1.—Plin., 36, 5.—Hor., Od., 3, 28.—Call., 36, 11.) Nicomedes of Bithynia wished to purchase this admirable production of the chisel, and actually offered to liquidate the debt of Cnidus, which was very considerable, if the citizens would cede it to him; but they refused to part with what they esteemed the glory of their city. (Plin., l. c.) A drawing of the Venus of Cnidus, from an antique statue found near Rome, is given by Flaxman, at the end of his lectures on sculpture (pl. 22). The shores of Cnidus furnished in ancient times, as they do now, a great abundance of fishes. The wines were famous, and Theophrastus speaks of the Cnidian onions as of a particular species, being very mild, and not occasioning tears. Cnidus was the birthplace of the famous mathematician and astronomer Eudoxus; of Agatharchidas, Theopompus, and Ctesias. It is now a mere heap of ruins; and the modern name of the promontory is Cape Crio. (Mannert, Geogr., vol. 6, pt. 3, p. 236.) An account of the ruins of Cnidus is given in Clarke's Travels, vol. 3, p. 261, from Walpole's MS. Journal.

CNOSUS (Κνωσός, more correct than Cnosus, Κνωσός, if we follow the language of coins and inscriptions), the royal city of Crète, on the northern coast, at a small distance from the sea. Its earlier name was Cæratus, which appellation was given also to the inconsiderable stream that flowed beneath its walls. (Strab., 476.) It was indebted to Minos for all its importance and splendour. That monarch is said to have divided the island into three portions, in each of which he founded a large city; and fixing his residence at Cnosus, it became the capital of the kingdom. (Diod. Sic., 5, 78.) It was here that Dædalus cultivated his art, and planned the celebrated labyrinth. Cnosus long preserved its rank among the chief cities of Crète, and by its alliance with Gortyna, obtained the dominion of nearly the whole island. The vestiges of this city are discernible at the present day, to the east of the town of Candia, which has communicated to the island its present name. The precise site of the ruins is called Long Candia. (Cramer's Anc. Greece, vol. 3, p. 368, seqq.) The name of this city is sometimes written with an initial G, as Gnosus, and the Γ occurs actually on some coins, but the more common initial letter in Greek inscriptions and on coins is the K. (Compare Rasche, Lex. Rei Num., vol. 2, col. 649, seqq.)

COCYLUS, a king of Sicily, who hospitably received Dædalus, when he fled before Minos. When Minos arrived in Sicily, the daughters of Cocylus destroyed him. (Orid. Met., 8, 261.)

COCCEIUS NERVA. Vid. Nerva I.

COCCEGIUS, a mountain of Argolis, between Halice and Hermione. Its previous name was Thornax; but it received the appellation of Coccegius from the circumstance of Jupiter's having been metamorphosed there into the bird called Coccyx (Κόκκυξ) by the Greeks. On its summit was a temple sacred to that god, and another of Apollo at the base. (Pausanias, 2, 36.)

COCINTUM PROMONTORIUM, a promontory of Bruttium in Lower Italy, below the Sinus Scylacius. The modern name is Cape Stilo. It marked the separation between the Ionian and Sicilian seas. (Polyb., 2, 14.)

COCELES, Publius Horatius (or, as Niebuhr gives it, Marcus Horatius), a Roman who, alone, opposed the whole army of Porsenna at the head of a bridge, while his companions behind him were cutting off the communication with the other shore. When the bridge was destroyed, Cocles, after addressing a short prayer to the god of the Tiber, leaped into the stream, and swam across in safety with his arms. As a mark of gratitude, every inhabitant, while famine was raging within the city, brought him all the provisions he could stint himself of; and the state afterward raised a statue to him, and gave him as much land as he could plough round in a day. (Liv., 2, 10.—Dion. Hal., 1, 24.) Whatever we may think of the other parts of the story, that portion of it which relates to the land is evidently mere poetic exaggeration. Polybius (6, 53) makes Cocles to have perished in the river. (Consult, as regards the whole legend, the remarks of Niebuhr, Rom. Hist., vol. 1, p. 476, seqq., Cambr. transl.)—The name Cocles properly means—"a person blind of one eye." It appears to be the old form ocles (from oculus), with a harsh initial aspiration. (Varro, L. L., 6, 3.)

COCYRUS, a river of Epirus, which, according to Pausanias (1, 17), blended its nauseous waters with those of the Acheron. Its fancied etymology (from κακῶς, "to lament," "to wail"), the unwholesomeness of its waters, and, above all, its proximity to the Acheron, induced the poets to make it one of the rivers of the lower world. (Virg., Georg., 3, 38.—Id., Æn., 6, 297, &c.)—"Leaving Potamia," observes an intelligent traveller, "we passed over a marsh or bog formed by the overflowing of the river Vara, which is probably the Cocytus of antiquity. It flows from below the mountains of Margariti, opposite Paramithia, and, after skirting the opposite side of the plain, empties itself into the Acheron, at a small distance from its mouth, below the village of Theukmides. Pausanias, in his description of the Acheron, intimates that the Cocytus also flows in the same plain; and no other river except the Acheron, now called the ποταμὸς τοῦ Σούλι, and the Vara, is to be discovered in the Phanari. The very appellation Vara (Babii), which is an expression of grief or aversion, seems to strengthen the conjecture; and not only this, but the water of the Vara exactly coincides with the expression of Pausanias, ἰδὼν ἀρεπίστατον, for it flows slowly over a deep muddy soil, imbibing noxious qualities from innumerable weeds upon its banks, and occasions the greatest part of the malaria of the plain." (Hughes, Travels in Greece, &c., vol. 2, p. 311.—Compare Wordsworth's Greece, p. 254, seqq.)

CODANUS SINUS, one of the ancient names of the Baltic. Mela (3, 3, 6) represents it as full of large and small islands, the largest of which he calls Scandinavia; so also Pliny (4, 13). The name Codanus seems to have some reference to that of the Goths in sound. The modern term Baltic appears to be derived from the Celtic Balt or Belt, denoting a collection of water; whence also the name of the straits, Great and Little Belt. (Malte-Brun, Dict. Geogr., p. viii.)

CODOMANNUS, a surname of Darius the Third, king of Persia. (Vid. Darius III.)

CODRUS, the last king of Athens. He received the sceptre from his father Melanthus, and was now far advanced in years, having reigned for a considerable time, when some of the Dorian states united their forces for the invasion of Attica. The Dorian army marched to Athens, and lay encamped under its walls; and the oracle at Delphi had assured them of success, provided they spared the life of the Athenian king. A friendly Delphian, named Cleomantis, disclosed the answer of the oracle to the Athenians, and Codrus resolved to devote himself for his country in a manner not unlike that which immortalized among the Romans, at a later date, the name of the Decii. He went out at the gate disguised in a woodman's garb, and, falling in with two Dorians, killed one with his bill, and was killed by the other. The Athenians thereupon sent a herald to claim the body of their king, and the Dorian chiefs, deeming the war hopeless, withdrew their forces from Attica—This story, which continued for centuries to warm the patriotism of the Athenians, has been regarded by some as altogether improbable. It would seem, however, to be confirmed by the fact mentioned by the orator Lycurgus (contra Leocr., p. 158), that Cleomantis, and his posterity, were honoured with the privilege, of sharing the entertainment provided in the Prytaneum at Athens for the guests of the state. But we scarcely know how the current tradition is to be reconciled with another preserved by Pausanias (7, 25), that a part of the Dorian army effected their entrance by night within the walls, and, being surrounded by their enemies, took refuge at the altars of the Eumenides on the Areopagus, and were spared by the piety of the Athenians. If, however, either must be rejected as a fabrication, this last has certainly the slighter claim to credit.—After the death of Codrus, the nobles, taking advantage, perhaps, of the opportunity afforded by a dispute between his sons, are said to have abolished the title of king, and to have substituted for it that of archon. This new office was to be held for life, and then transmitted to the son of the deceased. The first of these hereditary archons was Medon, son of Codrus, from whom the thirteen following archons were called Medontidae, as being his lineal descendants. (Vid. Archontes.—Thirlwall's Hist. of Greece, vol. 1, p. 275, vol. 2, p. 15.)

COELE (Κοῖλη), or, the Hollow, I. the northern division of Elis.—II. a quarter in the suburbs of Athens, appropriated to sepulchres. Cimon and Thucydides were both interred in this place. (Herodot., 6, 103.—Plut., Vit. Cimon.—Pausan., 1, 23.) Coele is classed by Hesychius among the Attic demi or boroughs. Col. Leake places, with great probability, this hollow way or gate "to the south of the acropolis, near the gate of Lumbardhari, which answers to the Porte Melitenses." (Cramer's Ancient Greece, vol. 2, p. 336.)

CELESYRIA (Κοῖλη Συρία), or, the "Hollow Syria," a tract of country between the ranges of Libanus and Antilibanus; in Syria, and stretching inland from the coast as far as the country around Damascus. In the time of Dioclesian it received the name of Phœnicia Libanensis. The modern appellation is given by some as El-Bokah. (Mela, 1, 11.—Plin., 5, 12.—Jornand., de Regn. Success., p. 65, &c.)

CELIA LEX, a law passed A.U.C. 630, that in trials for treason the people should vote by ballot, which had been excepted by the Cassian law. (Consult Cic., de Leg., 3, 16.)

CELIUS, a young Roman of considerable talents and acquirements, but of dissolute character, who had been intrusted to the care of Cicero on his first introduction to the Forum. Having imprudently engaged in an intrigue with Clodia, the well-known sister of Clodius, and having afterward deserted her, she accused him of an attempt to poison her, and of having borrowed money from her in order to procure the assassination of Dio, the Alexandrian ambassador. He was defended by Cicero in a speech still extant, and obtained an acquittal. We find him subsequently attaining to the praetorship, and engaging eventually in the civil contest, in which he lost his life. In this, as in most other prosecutions of the period, a number of charges, unconnected with the main one, seem to have been accumulated in order to give the chief accusation additional force and credibility. Cicero had thus to defend his client against the suspicions arising from the general libertinism of his conduct. Middleton has pronounced this to be the most entertaining of the orations which Cicero has left us, from the vivacity of wit and humour with which he treats the gallantries of Clodia, her commerce with Cælius, and, in general, the gayeties and licentiousness of youth. This oration was a particular favourite with the celebrated Mr. Fox. (Dunlop's Roman Literature, vol. 2, p. 309, seqq.—Correspondence of Wakefield and Fox, p. 50.)

CEÛS, one of the earlier deities, and the spouse of Terra. He is the same with the Grecian Uranus. (Vid. Uranus.)

CEÛS (Κεῖος), one of the Titans, son of Cœlus and Terra, or, to adopt the Grecian phraseology, of Uranus and Gê (Gea). His name indicates his cosmogonical character, being derived from καίω, "to burn." (Vid. Titanes.) He was the father of Latona by Phœbe. (Hesiod., Theog., 404, seqq.)

COHORS. Vid. Legio.

COLCHI, the inhabitants of Colchis.

COLCHUS, a country of Asia, having Iberia on the east, the Euxine on the west, Caucasus on the north, and Armenia on the south. It is famous in poetic legends as having been the land to which the Argonautic expedition was directed in quest of the golden fleece. (Vid. Argonautæ.) It corresponds at the present day to what is called Mingrelia. Colchis abounded, according to Strabo, with fruit of every kind, and every material requisite for navigation. Its only exceptionable produce was the honey, which had a bitter taste. The linen manufactured here was in high repute, and was made, according to Herodotus (2, 105), after the manner of Egypt; the two kinds, however, being distinguished from each other by name, since the Greeks called the Colchian by the name of Sardonian, but that which came from Egypt by the proper name of the country. This species of manufacture, together with the dark complexion and crisped locks of the natives, were so many arguments with the ancients to prove them of Egyptian origin, independently of other proofs drawn, according to Herodotus, from their language and mode of life. The historian farther informs us, that, being struck by the resemblance between the Colchians and Egyptians, he inquired, from motives of curiosity, of both nations, and discovered that the Colchians had more recollection of the Egyptians than the Egyptians had of the Colchians. The Egyptians, however, told him, that they believed the Colchians to have been descended from a part of the army of Se sostis, left behind by him in this quarter to guard the passes when he was going on his Scythian expedition, and who were finally established here as a military colony. Another argument, in favour of the identity of the Colchians and Egyptians, is drawn by Herodotus from the singular circumstance of the rite of circumcision being common to both. (Compare Michælis, Mos. Recht., vol. 4, § 185.—Meiners, in Comment. Soc. Reg. Gotting., vol. 14, p. 207. seqq., p. 211, seqq.)—The account here given by Herodotus of the Colchians has elicited a great diversity of opinion among modern scholars. Heeren, for example, thinks that the Egyptian colony in Colchis owed its existence to the Eastern custom of transplanting vanquished nations, either in whole or part, to other and more distant regions; and he supposes the Colchian settlement to have been the result of some such transplantation by Nebuchadnezzar, or some other of the Asiatic monarchs, who penetrated into Egypt. (Ideen, vol. 1, pt. 1, p. 405, not.) Holstenius makes the Colchians to have been a colony of Jews, transported to the shores of the Euxine by some Assyrian king. (Ep. ad divers. ed. Boissonad., p. 510.) Michælis views them as of Syrian origin, led out from home after the overthrow of the kingdom of Damascus. (Mos. Recht., vol. 4, § 185, p. 18, not.) Ritter maintains a theory altogether different from any of the preceding. He makes the Colchians of Indian origin, and in this way explains their acquaintance with the manufacture of linen. According to him they were a mercantile colony, established on the shores of the Euxine for the purposes of traffic, and the very name of Sardonian, as applied to the Colchian linen, he traces, along with the term Sindon (Σινδών, "fine linen"), to the land of Serhind (Sind) or India. (Ritter, Vorhalle, p. 35, seqq.)

COLIAS PROMONTORIUM, a promontory of Attica, about twenty stadia from Phalerum, and still retaining its ancient name, though occasionally designated by that of Trispyrgoi. Here was a temple consecrated to Venus, another to the goddesses named Genetyllides (Pausan., 1, 1.—Strab., 398), and also chapels of Pan and Ceres. (Meurs., de Præo, c. 11, p. 574.) Colias was also celebrated for its earthenware. (Plut., de Audit.—Op., ed. Reiske, vol. 6, p. 153.—Etym. Mag.—Suid.) Ritter indulges in some curious speculations on the name Colias, and finds in it a connecting link between the religious systems of the eastern and western world. (Vorhalle, p. 54, seqq.)

COLLATIA, I. a town of Latium, to the north of Gabii, and colonized from Alba. It was rendered famous in Roman history by the self-immolation of the chaste Lucretia. (Liv., 1, 58.) In the time of Strabo (229) it was little more than a village. The ruins of this place are still to be traced on a hill, which from thence has obtained the name of Castellacio. (Nibby, Viaggio Antiquario, vol. 1, p. 240.)—II. A town of Apulia, near Mount Garganus, now Collatini. (Plin., 3, 11.—Front., de Col.)

COLLATINUS, L. Tarquinius, grandson of Aruns elder brother of Tarquinius Priscus. He derived his surname from Collatia, where he resided, and with the principality of which he was invested. Collatinus was the husband of the celebrated Lucretia; and, after the expulsion of the Tarquins, he and Brutus were elected the first consuls. His relationship, however, to the Tarquin family excited distrust, and when a law was passed banishing the whole Tarquinian house, he was forced to lay down his office and depart from Rome. He ended his days at Lavinium. (Liv., 1, 60.—Id., 2, 2.)

COLLINA, I. one of the gates of Rome, on Mount Quirinalis, so called, a colibus Quirinali et Viminali.—It was called also Quirinalis. To this gate Hannibal rode up and threw a spear within the city. (Ovid, Fast., 4, 871.) II. The name of one of the four regions or wards into which Rome was divided by Servius Tullius. The other three were Palatina, Suburana, and Esquilina. (Liv., 5, 41.—Id., 36, 10.—Plin., 34, 6.)

COLŌNÆ, I. a city of Troas, north of Larissa. It is placed on the coast by Scylax and others. Pliny, however, assigns it a position inland. Strabo makes it the residence of a Thracian prince, who ruled over the adjacent country, and also the island of Tenedos. (Mannert, Geogr., vol. 6, pt. 3, p. 465.)—II. A town of Mysia, in the territory of Lampsaacus. (Arrian, 1, 13.—Strabo, 589.)

COLONIA AGRIPPINA, a city of Germany, on the Rhine. (Vid. Agrippina III.)

COLŌNUS, a demus of Attica, to the northwest of the Academy, near Athens. It was named Hippocles, from the altar erected there to the Equestrian Neptune, and is rendered so celebrated by the play of Sophocles (Œdipus at Colonus) as the scene of the last adventures of Œdipus. It was the native borough of the poet, and is beautifully described by him in one of the choruses of the same play. From Thucydides we learn that Colonus was distant ten stadia from the city, and that assemblies of the inhabitants were on some occasions convened at the temple of Neptune. (Thucyd., 8, 67.)

COLŌPHON, a city of Ionia, northwest of Ephesus. It was founded by Andræmon, son of Codrus, and was situate about two miles from the coast, its harbour, called Notium, being connected with the city by means of long walls. Colophon was destroyed by Lysimachus, together with Lebedus, in order to swell the population of the new town he had founded at Ephesus. (Pausan., 1, 9.—Diod. Sic., 20, 107.) The Colophonians are stigmatized by several ancient writers as very effeminate and luxurious (Athenæus, 12, p. 526), and yet Strabo says, that, at one period, this place possessed a flourishing navy, and that its cavalry was in such repute, that victory followed wherever they were employed. Hence arose the proverb Κολοφῶνα ἐπιτιθεῖναι, "to add a Colophonian," i. e., to put the finishing hand to an affair. The scholiast on Plato, however, gives another explanation of the saying, which appears somewhat more probable, though its authority is not so good. He states, that the Colophonians had the right of a double vote in the general assembly of the Ionians, on account of the service they had rendered the confederacy by inducing the city of Smyrna to join it. Hence they were frequently enabled to decide points left undetermined from a parity of suffrages. (Schol. ad Plat. Theætet., p. 319.) It arose from this old saying, that, in the early periods of the art of printing, the account which the printer gave of the place and date of the edition, being the last thing printed at the end of the book, was called the Colophon. This city was one of the places which contended for the birth of Homer, and was unquestionably the native place of Minnæmus and Hermesianax. It was also famed for its resin, whence the name of Colophony, otherwise called Spanish wax, and Grecian resin. (Cramer's Asia Minor, vol. 1, p. 357, seqq.)

COLOSSÆ, a large and flourishing city of Phrygia Pacatiana, in an angle formed by the rivers Lycus and Mæander. Strabo speaks of the great profits accruing from its wool-trade. One of the first Christian churches was established here, and one of St. Paul's epistles was addressed to it. In the tenth year of the reign of Nero, or about two years after the epistle of St. Paul was sent, this city was nearly destroyed by an earthquake. Under the Byzantine emperors, Colossæ, being in a ruinous state, made way for a more modern town named Chonæ, which was built at a short distance from it. Some remains of Colossæ and its more modern successor are to be seen near each other on the site called Khonas, or Kanassi, by the Turks. (Arundell's Seven Churches, p. 92.)—Hierocles writes the name of this place Κολοσσαί, a reading given also by numerous MSS. of St. Paul's Epistles. But Herodotus, Xenophon, and Strabo give the more customary forms, and they have also on their side the evidence of coins, the authority of which is not to be disputed. (Cramer's Asia Minor, vol. 2, p. 44.)

Colossus, a celebrated brazen image at Rhodes, which passed for one of the seven wonders of the world. It was the workmanship of Chares, a pupil of Lysippus, who was employed twelve years in making it. Its height was 105 Grecian feet; there were few persons who could encompass the thumb with their arms, and its fingers were larger than most statues. It was hollow, and in its cavities were large stones, placed there to counterbalance its weight, and render it steady on its pedestal. The cost was 300 talents (nearly $317,000), and the money was obtained from the sale of the machines and military engines which Demetrius Poliorcetes had left behind him when he raised the siege of Rhodes. (Plin., 34, 18.) The Colossus is generally supposed to have stood with distended legs upon the two moles which formed the entrance of the harbour. As the city, however, had two harbours, the main one, and a second one much smaller, within which their fleets were secured, it seems more natural to suppose that this Colossus was placed at the entrance of this latter one, inasmuch as the space between the legs at the base could not have greatly exceeded fifty feet; a space too narrow to be the entrance to the main harbour. There was a winding staircase to go up to the top of the statue, from whence one might discover Syria, and the ships that went to Egypt. It was erected B.C. 300, and, after having stood about fifty-six years, was broken off below the knees, and thrown down by an earthquake. (Plin., l. c.) Eusebius says that this occurred in the second year of the 139th Olympiad; but Polybius seems to place it a little later, in the 140th Olympiad (5, 88). The same writer adds, that the greater part of the walls and docks were thrown down at the same time. It remained in ruins for the space of 894 years; and the Rhodians, who had received several large contributions to repair it, divided the money among themselves, and frustrated the expectations of the donors, by saying that the oracle of Delphi forbade them to raise it up again from its ruins. (Strab., 652.) In the year 672 of the Christian era, it was sold, according to Cedrenus, by the Saracens, who were masters of the island, to a Jewish merchant of Edessa, who loaded 900 camels with the brass. Allowing 800 pounds' weight for each load, the brass, after the diminution which it had sustained by rust, and probably by theft, amounted to about 720,000 pounds' weight. The city of Rhodes had, according to Pliny, 100 other colossuses, of inferior size, in its different quarters.—Compare the remarks of Ritter in relation to the worship of the sun, which prevailed in the earliest periods of Rhodes, and the connexion between this and the Colossus. He finds also his accustomed root (Col-) in the name of the statue. (Vorhalle, p. 104, seqq.)

COLUMELLA (L. Junius Moderatus), an ancient writer, born at Gades, in the reign of Augustus or Tiberius, and a contemporary, according to his own account, of Seneca and Celsus. The elder Pliny also frequently makes mention of him. His father, Marcus Columella, had possessions in the province of Bætica. The son betook himself at an early period to Rome, where he passed his life, with the exception of a few journeys to Syria and Cilicia. It is not ascertained whether he visited these latter countries as a simple traveller, or on some mission of government, for we know nothing very particularly of the circumstances of his life. We have two works of his remaining: one, entitled "De Re Rustica," in twelve books; the other, "De Arboribus." This last made, very probably, part of a work on agriculture, in four books, which Columella had published as the first edition of that which we now have in twelve books. On this supposition Cassiodorus was correct in saying that Columella had written a work in sixteen books on rural economy. This author appears to have been but little read. Among the ancients, Servius, Cassiodorus, and Isidorus are the only ones that cite him. He fell into almost complete neglect after Palladius had made an abridgment of his work. (Vid. Palladius II.) Hence Vincent de Beauvais and Petrus de Crescentiis, the latter of whom Schneider calls "diligentissimum veterum rei rustica scriptorum lectorem," were not acquainted with him. (Compare Script. Rei Rust., ed. Schneider, vol. 2, p. 5.) The style of Columella is pure and elegant; if any reproach can be made against him, it is that of being too studied in his language on the subject of which he treats. The best edition is that of Schneider, in the Scriptores Rei Rusticae, Lips., 1794-97, 4 vols. 8vo. That of Gesner is also in deservedly high repute, Lips., 1773, 2 vols. 4to.

COLUMNÆ HERCŪLIS, "The Pillars of Hercules," a name often given to Calpe and Abyla, or the heights on either side of the Straits of Gibraltar. The tradition was, that the Mediterranean had no outlet in this quarter until Hercules broke through the mountain barrier, and thus formed the present straits. The rocky height on either side of the opening was fabled to have been placed there by him as a memorial of his achievement, and as marking the limits of his wanderings towards the west. (Vid. Calpe, Abyla, and Mediterranean Mare.—Odyss., 4, 351.—Virg., Æn., 11, 262.)

COLŪTHUS, a native of Lycopolis in Egypt, supposed to have lived about the beginning of the sixth century. He wrote a poem in six cantos, entitled "Cal-ydoniācs" (Καλυδωνικά), as well as other pieces that are now lost. He is believed also, though without any great degree of certitude, to have been the author of a poem, in three hundred and eighty-five verses, which bears the title of "the Rape of Helen" (Ἑλένης ἄρπαγῇ). This most unfortunate imitation of Homer commences with the nuptials of Peleus and Thetis. The poet goes on, without any animation, sentiment, or grace whatsoever, to recount the judgment of Paris, the voyage of this prince to Sparta, and the abduction of Helen, which takes place after the first interview. This poem of Coluthus was discovered by Cardinal Bessarion along with that of Quintus Smyrnaeus. The best editions are, that of Van Lennep, Leopard, 1747, 8vo, improved by Shaeffer, Lips., 1825, 8vo, and that of Bekker, Berol., 1816, 8vo.

COMAGÈNE. Vid. Cominagene.

COMANA (orum), i. a city of Pontus, surnamed Pontica, to distinguish it from the Cappadocian city of the same name. It was situate to the northeast of Zela, and not far from the source of the Iris. (Strabo, 547.) This place was celebrated for the worship of the goddess Mâ, supposed to answer to the Bellona of the West. She was likewise revered with equal honours in the Cappadocian Comana. The priesthood attached to the temple was an office of the highest emolument and dignity, and was sought after by kings and princes. The city itself was large and populous, and kept up a considerable traffic with Armenia. The festivals of the goddess, which were held twice a year, drew thither an immense concourse from the surrounding countries and towns, as well as from more distant parts. There were no less than 6000 slaves attached to the service of the temple, and most of these were courtesans. Hence it was remarked, that the citizens were generally addicted to pleasure, and the town itself was styled by some the little Corinth. The chief produce of the country was wine. When the Romans, under Lucullus, invaded Pontus, a report was spread, probably by Mithradates, that they were come for the express purpose of plundering the shrine of Comana. (Cic., Or. pro Leg. Manil., § 9.) Some remains, at the present day, not far from Tokat, under the name of Komanak, sufficiently indicate the ancient site. (Cramer's Asia Minor, vol. i., p. 307, seq.) —II. A city of Cappadocia, on the river Sarus, and the principal place in the district of Cataonia. It was celebrated, like its Pontic namesake (No. I.), for the worship of Mâ, the Cappadocian Bellona. The population consisted, in a great degree, of soothsayers, priests, and slaves, belonging to the sacred institution; the latter of these amounted, in the time of Strabo, to more than 6000 of both sexes. These belonged exclusively to the high-priest, who stood next in rank to the King of Cappadocia, and was generally chosen from the royal family. The territory annexed to the temple was very considerable, and furnished a large income for the pontiff. (Cic., Ep. ad Fam., 15, 4.) It was asserted that the worship of Bellona, like that of Diana Tauropolis, had been brought from Tauris by Orestes and Iphigenia, and it was even pretended that the former had deposited within the temple his mourning locks (κρίνον), whence the city was called Comana. (Strab., 535.) These, of course, are fables of Greek invention. The Bellona of Comana was probably no other than the Anaitis of the Persians and Armenians, and perhaps the Agdistis and Cybele of the Phrygians. The Cappadocian Comana was distinguished from the Pontic by the epithet of Χρυσή. The Turkish town of El Bostan is thought to represent the ancient city. (Kinncir's Travels, Append., p. 560.—Cramer's Asia Minor, vol. 2, p. 138, seq.)

COMARIA PROMONTORIUM, a promontory forming the southern extremity of India intra Gangem. It is now Cape Camorin (or Comari). Al-Edrissi, the Arabian geographer, confounds this cape with Comar, or the island of Madagascar. (Arrian, Periplus Mar. Erythr.—Vincent's Anc. Commerce, vol. 2, p. 498.)

COMMAGENE, a district of Syria, in the northeastern extremity of that country, bounded on the north by Mount Taurus, on the west by Amanus, on the east by the Euphrates, and on the south by Cyrhestica. Its chief city was Samosata. This tract of country had at one time rulers of its own, but became a Roman province under Domitian. Its modern name is Camash or Kamask. (Plin., 5, 12.—Eutrop., 7, 19.—Amm. Marcell., 14, 26.) The name often occurs as Comagene, but the more correct form is Commagene. (Consult Rasche, Lex. Rei Num., vol. 2, col. 723.)

COMMÖDUS, L. AURELIUS ANTONINUS, son and successor of M. Aurelius Antoninus, ascended the imperial throne A.D. 180. The reign of this prince is a scene of guilt and misery, which the historian contemplates with disgust, and is glad to dismiss with brevity. He appears, indeed, to have inherited all the vices of his mother Faustina; and his father, in selecting him for his successor, allowed the feelings of the parent to triumph over the wisdom of the magistrate. He had accompanied his father on the expedition against the Marcomanni and Quadi, but no sooner was Aurelius dead than his degenerate son became anxious to proceed to Rome, and soon concluded a hasty and disgraceful peace with the very barbarians whom his father was on the point of completely subjugating when he was cut off by disease. Notwithstanding the care which Antoninus had bestowed upon his education, Commodus was ignorant to an extreme degree, having neither abilities nor inclination for profiting by the imperial example and instruction. On his return to Rome he speedily showed the bias of his natural disposition, giving himself up to unrestrained indulgence in the grossest vices. That he might do so without impediment, he intrusted all power to Perennis, præfect of the prætorian guard, a man of stern and cruel temper, who was at last slain by his soldiers for his severity. A conspiracy against the life of Commodus having failed, was followed by a long succession of judicial murders, to gratify the vengeance of the cowardly and vindictive tyrant. He was next threatened by a new danger: disaffection had spread over the legions, and an attempt of Maternus, a private soldier, who headed a band of deserters, and projected the assassination of Commodus during the celebration of the festival of Cybele, was so ably conceived, that he must have been successful but for the treachery of an accomplice. But neither duty nor danger could draw Commodus from the sports of gladiators or the pleasures of debauchery. Cleander, a Phrygian slave, soon succeeded to the place and influence of Perennis, and for three years the empire groaned beneath his cruelty and rapacity. At length a new insurrection burst forth, which nothing could allay, the prætorian cavalry being defeated in the streets by the populace, until the head of Cleander was, by the emperor's command, thrown to the insurgents. In the mean time, Commodus was indulging his base tastes and appetites, not only by gross sensuality, but by endeavouring to rival the gladiators in their sanguinary occupation. Being a very skilful archer, and of great personal strength, he delighted in killing wild beasts in the amphitheatre, and thus pretending to rival the prowess of Hercules. In the gladiatorial contests, he publicly engaged so often, that he was the conqueror in 735 combats. Though luxurious in his dress, frequently resorting to the baths eight times in the day, scattering gold dust in his hair, and, from the fear of admitting the approach of a razor in the hand of another, singing off his beard, he was especially proud of exhibitions of personal strength, and frequently butchered victims with his own hands in the garb of a sacrificer. Among the flatteries of the obsequious senate, none pleased him more than the vote which styled him the Hercules of Rome, not even that which annexed to him the titles of Pius and Felix, or which offered to abolish the name of the eternal city, and substitute for it Colonia Commodiana!—After thirteen years of unmitigated oppression, his favourite Martia ultimately became the instrument by which the Roman world was delivered from its odious master. She discovered, from some private notes of Commodus, that herself, Lætus the prætorian præfect, and Electrus the chamberlain, were on the list devoted to death: a conspiracy was immediately formed, Martia administered poison to the emperor, and, lest the measure should not prove effectual, the deed was completed by suffocation, A.D. 192. (Lamprid., Vit. Com.—Encyclop. Metropol., div. 3, vol. 2, p. 684.)

COMPSA, a city of Samnium, on the southern confines of the Hirpini. It revolted to Hannibal after the battle of Cannæ, and it was here that this general left all his baggage and part of his army when advancing towards Campania. (Liv., 23, 1.) Compsa was retaken by the Romans under Fabius two years afterwards. (Liv., 24, 20.) Vellicus Paterculus says, that Milo, the opponent of Clodius, met his death before the walls of Compsa, which he was at that time besieging (Vell. Paterc., 2, 68); but, according to Cæsar and Pliny, this event took place near Cossa in Lucania. The modern Conza occupies the site of the ancient city. (Cramer's Anc. Italy, vol. 2, p. 253.)

COMUM, a city of Gallia Cisalpina, at the southern extremity of the Lacus Larius, or Lago di Como. It was originally a Gallic settlement, and continued to be an inconsiderable place until a Greek colony was established here by Pompeius Strabo and Cornelius Scipio, and subsequently by Julius Cæsar. Commum thenceforth took the name of Novum Comum. (Strabo, 212.—Porcacchi Nobilità della Città di Como, vol. 1, p. 10.) The enemies of Cæsar, among whom were the consuls Cl. Marcellus and L. Cornelius Lentulus, appear to have taken the lead, and used every endeavor our to ruin the colony, and even went so far as to propose a law which should deprive it of its municipal rights. (Appian, Bell. Civ., 2, 26.—Plut., Vit. Cæs.—Suet., Vit. Jul., 28.) If they succeeded in their designs, it was only for a short time; since we may collect from the letters of the younger Pliny, who was born at Comum, that his native city was in his time in a very flourishing state, and in the enjoyment of all the privileges which belonged to a Roman corporation, independently of the prosperity and affluence it would naturally derive from the peculiar advantages of its situation. (Plin., Ep., 3, 6.—Id. ibid., 4, 13.—Id. ibid., 4, 24.) Comum is now Como. (Cramer's Anc. Italy, vol. 1, p. 60.)

COSCĀNI, a people of Spain, among the Cantabri. According to Horace (Ode, 3, 4, 34), they delighted in mingling the blood of horses with their drink. This same trait is mentioned by Silius Italicus (3, 360, seqq.), who makes them of Scythian origin, tracing them up to the parent stock of the Massagetæ. Strabo likewise speaks of a resemblance between them and the Scythians in certain customs. The Scythian Massagetæ, according to Dionysius Periegetes (v. 743, seqq.), drank milk mixed with horse's blood; which is also ascribed to the Geloni by Virgil (Georg., 3, 463); while Pliny states, that the Sarmatæ mixed millet with the milk of mares, or with the blood drawn out of their legs. Their chief town, Concana, is now called Santilana, or Cangas de Onis. (Virg., G., 3, 463.—Sil. Ital., 3, 361.—Horat., Od., 3, 4, 34.)

CONDRŪSI, a people of Gallia Belgica, to the south of the Eburones. Their country answers at the present day to the archdeaconry of Condros, forming part of the bishopric of Liege. (Cæs., B. G., 2, 4.—Lemaire, Ind. Geogr. ad Cæs., vol. 4, p. 239.)

CONFLUENTES, a city of the Treviri, at the confluence of the Moselle and Rhine, now Coblentz. This town, in the time of the Romans, was the station of the first legion; and afterward became the residence of the successors of Charlemagne. (Anton., Itin.—Tab. Peut.—Cæs., B. G., 4, 15.—Amm. Marcell., 16, 3.)

CONIMBRICA, a town of Lusitania, near the seacoast, on the river Munda, now Coimbra in modern Portugal. As regards the termination of the ancient name (-brica), consult remarks under the article Mesembria.

CONON, I. a distinguished Athenian commander, was one of the generals who succeeded Alcibiades in the command of the fleet during the Peloponnesian war. Having engaged with Callicratidas, the Spartan admiral, he lost thirty vessels, and was compelled to take shelter in the harbour of Mytilene, where he was blockaded by his opponent. The victory gained by the Athenians at the Arginusæ released him at length from this situation. Being subsequently appointed along with five others to the command of a powerful fleet, he proceeded to the Hellespont, where Lysander had charge of the Lacedæmonian squadron. The negligence of his fellow-commanders, the result of overweening confidence in their own strength, led to the fatal defeat at Ægos Potamos, and the whole Athenian fleet was taken, except nine vessels of Conon's division, with eight of which, thinking that the war was now desperate, he sailed to Salamis in the island of Cyprus. The ninth vessel was sent to Athens with the tidings of the defeat. In Cyprus, Conon remained at the court of Evagoras, watching for an opportunity to prove of service to his country. Such a state of affairs soon presented itself. The Lacedæmonians, having no more rivals in Greece, sent Agesilaus with an army into Asia, to make war upon the Persian king. Conon immediately repaired to Pharnabazus, the satrap of Lydia and Ionia, aided him with his counsels, and suggested to him the idea of exciting the Thebans and other Grecian communities against Sparta, so as to compel that state to recall

Agesilaus from the East. The plan was approved of by the King of Persia, and Conon, at the head of a Persian fleet, B.C. 398, attacked the Spartan admiral Pisander near Cnidus, and defeated him, with the loss of the greater part of his ships. Lacedæmon immediately lost the empire of the sea, and her power in Asia Minor ceased. Conon thereupon, after ravaging the coasts of Laconia, returned to Attica, rebuilt the city walls as well as those of the Piræus, with means which had been furnished by Pharnabazus, and gave on this occasion a public entertainment to all the Athenians. The Lacedæmonians, dispirited by the success of Conon, and alarmed at the re-establishment of the Athenian fortifications, sent Antalcidas to Tiribazus, one of the Persian generals, to negotiate a peace. The Athenians, on their part, deputed Conon and some others to oppose this attempt; but Tiribazus being favourably inclined towards Sparta, and in all probability jealous of Pharnabazus, imprisoned Conon, under the pretext that he was endeavouring to excite an insurrection in Æolis and Ionia. The Persian king, however, disapproved of the conduct of his satrap, and Conon was released. The latter thereupon returned to the island of Cyprus, where he fell sick and died, about B.C. 390. His remains were conveyed to Athens. (Corn. Nep., in Vit.—Xen., Hist. Gr., 1, 4, 10.—Id. ib., 2, 1, 21, &c.—Diod. Sic., 13, 78.—Id., 14, 39.—Id., 14, 83, &c.)—II. A native of Samos, distinguished as an astronomer and geometer. None of his works have reached us; he is mentioned, however, with eulogiums, by Archimedes, Virgil, Seneca, and others. Conon lived between about 300 and 260 years before our era. Apollonius, in the fourth book of his Conic Sections, does not speak as favourably of him as Archimedes has done. He thinks that many of his demonstrations might be rendered more concise. This is nearly all that we know respecting Conon as a geometer. He is mentioned as an astronomer by one of the commentators on Ptolemy, who speaks of his having made observations in Italy. Seneca (Quæst. Nat., 7, 3) informs us, that he had made out a list of the eclipses of the sun that had been visible in Egypt. He is mentioned also by Virgil (Elog., 3, 40), and by Catullus in his translation of the Greek poem of Callimachus, on the tresses of Berenice. The Greek piece itself, in which he bore a conspicuous part, is lost. (Vid. Berenice.) Delambre expresses considerable doubt as to the correctness of the story, which makes Conon to have named a new constellation after the locks of the Egyptian queen. (Delambre, in Biogr. Univ., vol. 9, p. 427.)

CONSENTES, the name which the Romans gave to the twelve superior deities, or Dii Majorum Gentium. The best derivation of the name is that which traces it to the participle of the obsolete verb conso, "to advise" or "counsel," the Dii Consentes being they who formed the council of the sky. (Voss., Etym. s. r.) Ennius has expressed their names in the two following lines:

"Juno, Vesta, Ceres, Diana, Minerva, Venus, Mars, Mercurius, Jovis, Neptunus, Vulcanus, Apollo."

(Ennii, Fragm., ed. Hessel., p. 164.—Compare Colonna, ad loc.)

CONSENTIA, a town of the Brutii, the capital of that people according to Strabo (255), and situated at the sources of the river Crathis. It was taken by Hannibal after the surrender of Petilia (Liv., 23, 30), but again fell into the hands of the Romans towards the end of the war. (Liv., 29, 38.) It is now represented by Cosenza. (Cramer's Anc. Italy, vol. 2, p. 434.)

CONSTANS, a son of Constantine. (Vid. Constantinus.)

CONSTANTIA, a granddaughter of Constantine, who married the Emperor Gratian.

CONSTANTINA, a princess, wife of the Emperor Gallus.

CONSTANTINOPOLIS. Vid. Byzantium.

CONSTANTINUS (Caius Flavius Valerius Aurelius Claudius), surnamed the Great, son of the Emperor Constantius Chlorus, was born A.D. 272, or, according to some authorities, A.D. 274, at Naisus, a city of Dacia Mediterranea. When Constantine's father was associated in the government by Dioclesian, the son was retained at court as a kind of hostage, but was treated with great kindness at first, and was allowed several opportunities of distinguishing himself. After the abdication of Dioclesian, Constantius and Galerius were elevated to the rank of Augusti, while two new Cæsars, Severus and Maximin, were appointed to second them. Constantine was not called to the succession. Dioclesian, partial to Galerius, his son-in-law, had left the nomination of the two new Cæsars to the latter; and the son of Constantius, whose popularity and talents had excited the jealousy of Galerius, and whose departure, although earnestly solicited by his father, was delayed from time to time under the most frivolous pretences, with difficulty at length obtained permission to join his parent in the West, and only escaped the machinations of the emperor by travelling with his utmost speed until he reached the western coast of Gaul. He came just in time to join the Roman legions, which were about to sail under his father's command to Britain, in order to make war upon the Caledonians. Having subdued the northern barbarians, Constantius returned to York, where he died in the month of July, in the year 306. Galerius, sure of the support of his two creatures, the Cæsars, had waited impatiently for the death of his colleague, to unite the whole Roman empire under his individual sway. But the moderation and justice of Constantius had rendered him the more dear to his soldiers from the contrast of these qualities with the ferocity of his rival. At the moment of his death, the legions stationed at York, as a tribute of gratitude and affection to his memory, and, according to some, at his dying request, saluted his son Constantine with the title of Cæsar, and decorated him with the purple. Whatever resentment Galerius felt at this, he soon perceived the danger of engaging in a civil war. As the eldest of the emperors, and the representative of Dioclesian, he recognised the authority of the colleague imposed upon him by the legions. He assigned unto him the administration of Gaul and Britain, but gave him only the fourth rank among the rulers of the empire, and the title of Cæsar. Under this official appellation, Constantine administered the prefecture of Gaul for six years (A.D. 306–312), perhaps the most glorious, and certainly the most virtuous, period of his life.—The title and rank of Augustus, which his soldiers had conferred upon Constantine, but which Galerius had not allowed him to retain, the latter gave to Severus, one of his own Cæsars. This dignity had been expected by Maxentius, son of the abdicated Emperor Maximian, the former colleague of Dioclesian. Indignant at his disappointment, Maxentius caused himself to be proclaimed emperor by his army; and, to colour his usurpation, he induced his father to leave his retreat and resume the imperial title. A scene of contention followed, scarcely paralleled in the annals of Rome. Severus marched against the two usurpers; but was abandoned by his own troops, yielded, and was slain. Galerius levied a great army, and marched into Italy against Maximian and Maxentius, who, dreading his power, retired to Gaul, and endeavoured to procure the support of Constantine. This politic prince did not consider it expedient to provoke a war at that time, and for no better cause; and Galerius having withdrawn from Italy and returned to the East, Maximian and Maxentius returned to Rome. To aid him in the struggle, Galerius conferred the title of emperor on his friend Licinius; and thus there were at once six pretenders to the sovereignty of the empire, namely, Galerius and Licinius, Maximian and his son Maxentius, Maximin, who had been nominated Cæsar by Galerius, and Constantine, the son and successor of Constantius. Among these rivals Constantine possessed a decided superiority in prudence and abilities, both military and political. The harsh temper of Maximian soon led to a quarrel between him and his son Maxentius. Quitting Rome, he went to Gaul, to Constantine, who had become his son-in-law when he and his son were endeavouring to make head against Galerius. Here also Maximian found himself disappointed of that power which he so greatly longed to possess, and, having plotted against Constantine, was detected and put to death. Galerius died not long after, leaving his power to be divided between his Cæsars Maximin and Licinius; and there were now four competitors for the empire, Constantine, Maxentius, Maximin, and Licinius. Maxentius speedily provoked open hostilities with Constantine, who marched at the head of a powerful army towards Rome. It was while Constantine was proceeding on this momentous expedition that he made an open and public declaration in favour of Christianity. Before that time, the persecuting edicts of Dioclesian had been much mitigated by the forbearance and leniency of Constantius; and Constantine not only followed his father's example in being merciful to the persecuted Christians, but even showed them some marks of positive favour. Very considerable numbers of them, in consequence, flocked to his standard, and swelled the ranks of his army. Their peaceful, orderly, and faithful conduct, contrasting most favourably with the turbulent and dissolute behaviour of those who formed the mass of common armies, won his entire confidence. To what extent this led Constantine to form a favourable opinion of Christianity, or inclined him to view with esteem and respect the tenets which had produced such results, cannot be ascertained. How far his avowed reception of Christianity was influenced by the prudence of the politician, how far by the conviction of the convert, it is impossible to determine. The accounts of his dream and his vision (vid. Labarum), which united to enforce his trust in Christianity, bear too much the aspect of fiction, or of having been the illusive consequences of mental anxiety, brooding intently on the possible results of a great religious revolution, to be woven into the narrative of sober history. This, at least, is certain: Constantine caused the cross to be employed as the imperial standard, and advanced with it to promised victory. After the armies of Maxentius, led by his generals, had sustained two successive defeats, that emperor himself, awakening from his sensual and inactive life at Rome, advanced against his formidable assailant, and met him near the little river Cremera, about nine miles from the city. Maxentius lost the day, after a bloody conflict, and, in endeavouring to enter the city by the Milvian bridge, was precipitated into the Tiber, where he perished. Constantine was received at Rome with acclamations; Africa acknowledged him, as well as Italy; and an edict of religious toleration, issued at Milan, extended the advantages, hitherto enjoyed by Gaul alone, to this prefecture also. After a brief stay at Rome, during which he restored to the senate their authority, disbanded the prætorian guard, and destroyed their fortified camp, from which they had so long availed the city and given rulers to the empire, Constantine proceeded to Illyricum to meet Licinius, with whom he had formed a secret league before marching against Maxentius. The two emperors met at Milan, where their alliance was ratified by the marriage of Licinius to Constantine's sister. During this calm interview, Constantine prevailed upon Licinius to repeal the persecuting edicts of Dioclesian, and to issue a new one, by which Christianity was encouraged, its teachers were honoured, and its adherents advanced to places of trust and influence in the state. After the overthrow of Maximin by Licinius, and his death at Nicomedia, Constantine and his brother-in-law were now the only two that remained of the six competitors for the empire; and the peace between them, which had seemed to be established on so firm a basis, was soon interrupted by a strife for sole supremacy. In the first war (A.C. 315) Constantine wrested Illyricum from his competitor. After an interval of eight years the contest was renewed. Licinius was beaten before Adrianople, the 3d July, 323, and Constantine the Great was recognised as sole master of the Roman world.—The seat of empire was now transferred to Byzantium, which took from him the name of Constantinople. Several edicts were issued for the suppression of idolatry; and their churches and property restored to the Christians, of which they had been deprived during the last persecution. A re-construction of the empire was effected upon a plan entirely new, and this renovated empire was pervaded by the worship and the institutions of Christianity. That much of the policy of the statesman was mixed up with this patronage of the new religion can easily be imagined. But still it would be wrong to make him, as some have done, a mere hypocrite and dissembler. The state of his religious knowledge, as far as we have any means of judging, was certainly very inadequate and imperfect; but he was well aware of the characters of the two conflicting religions, Christianity and Paganism, and the purity of the former could not but have made some impression upon his mind.—The private character of Constantine has suffered, in the eyes of posterity, from the cruel treatment of Crispus, his son by his first wife, whom he had made the partner of his empire and the commander of his armies. Crispus was at the head of the administration in Gaul, where he gained the hearts of the people. In the wars against Licinius he had displayed singular talents, and had secured victory to the arms of his father. But, from that moment, a shameful and unnatural jealousy stifled every paternal feeling in the bosom of the monarch. He detained Crispus in his palace, surrounded him with spies and informers, and at length, in the month of July, 326, ordered him to be arrested in the midst of a grand festival, to be carried off to Pola in Istria, and there put to death. A cousin of Crispus, the son of Licinius and Constantine's sister, was at the same time sent, without trial, without even accusation, to the block. His mother implored in vain, and died of grief. Fausta, the daughter of Maximian, the wife of Constantine, and the mother of the three princes who succeeded him, was shortly after stifled in the bath by order of her husband.—Constantine died at the age of sixty-three, at Nicomedia, May 22, 337, after a reign of thirty-one years from the death of his father, and of fourteen from the conquest of the empire. (Hetherington, Hist. of Rome, p. 236, seqq.—Sismondi, Fall of the Roman Empire, p. 76, seqq.—Encyclop. Metropol., div. 3, vol. 3, p. 74, seqq.)—Constantine left three sons, Constantine, Constans, and Constantius, among whom he divided his empire. The first, who had Gaul, Spain, and Britain for his portion, was conquered by the armies of his brother Constans, and killed in the twenty-fifth year of his age, A.D. 340. Magnentius, the governor of the provinces of Rhatia, murdered Constans in his bed, after a reign of thirteen years; and Constantius, the only surviving brother, now became the sole emperor, A.D. 353, punished his brother's murderer, and gave way to cruelty and oppression. He visited Rome, where he displayed a triumph, and died in his march against Julian, who had been proclaimed emperor by his soldiers.

CONSTANTIUS, I. CALORUS, son of Eutropius, and father of Constantine the Great, merited the title of Caesar, which he obtained, by his victories in Britain and Germany. He became the colleague of Galerius on the abdication of Dioclesian; and, after bearing the character of a humane and benevolent prince, he died at York, and had his son for his successor, A.D. 306.—II. The third son of Constantine the Great, (Vid. Constantinus).—III. The father of Julian and Gallus, was son of Constantius by Theodora, and died A.D. 337.—IV. A Roman general, who married Placidia, the sister of Honorius, and was proclaimed emperor, an honour he enjoyed only seven months. He died universally regretted, 421 A.D., and was succeeded by his son Valentinian in the West.

CONSUALIA, the festival of the god Consus. (Vid. Consus.)

CONSULES, two chief magistrates at Rome, chosen annually by the people. The office commenced after the expulsion of the kings, and the first two consuls were L. Junius Brutus and L. Tarquinius Collatinus, A.U.C. 244. In the first ages of the republic the two consuls were always chosen from patrician families; but the people obtained the privilege, A.U.C. 388, of electing one of the consuls from their own body; and sometimes both were plebeians. The first consul from the plebeians was L. Sextius.—It was required that every candidate for the consulship should be forty-three years of age. He was always to appear at the election as a private man, without a retinue; and it was requisite, before he canvassed for the office, to have discharged the inferior functions of quaestor, aedile, and praetor. Sometimes, however, these qualifications were disregarded. M. Valerius Corvus was made a consul in his twenty-third year; Scipio Africanus the Elder in his twenty-fourth, and the Younger in his thirty-eighth; T. Quinctius Flamininus when not quite thirty; Pompey before he was full thirty-six.—The consuls were at the head of the whole republic; all the other magistrates were subject to them, except the tribunes of the commons. They assembled the people and senate, laid before them what they pleased, and executed their decrees. The laws which they proposed and got passed were usually called by their name. They received all letters from the governors of provinces, and from foreign kings and states, and gave audience to ambassadors. The year was named after them, as it used to be at Athens from one of the archons. Their insignia were the same with those of the kings (except the crown), namely, the toga praetexta, sella curulis, the sceptre or ivory staff, and twelve lictors with the fasces and securis. Within the city, the lictors went before only one of the consuls, and that commonly for a month alternately. A public servant, called accensus, went before the other consul, and the lictors followed. He who was eldest, or had most children, or who was first elected, or had most suffrages, had the fasces first. When the consuls commanded different armies, each of them had the fasces and securis; but when they both commanded the same army, they commonly had them for a day alternately. Valerius Poplicola took away the securis from the fasces, i. e., he took from the consuls the power of life and death, and only left them the right of scourging. Out of the city, however, when invested with military command, they retained the securis, i. e., the right of punishing capitally. Their provinces used anciently to be decreed by the senate after the consuls were elected or had entered on their office. But by the Sempronian law, passed A.U.C. 631, the senate always decreed two provinces to the future consuls before their election, which they, after entering upon their office, divided by lot or agreement. Sometimes a certain province was assigned to some one of the consuls, both by the senate and people, and sometimes again the people reversed what the senate had decreed respecting the provinces. No one could be consul two following years; an interval of ten years must have elapsed previous to the second application; yet this regulation was sometimes broken, and we find Marius re-elected consul, after the expiration of his office, during the Cimbrian war. The office of consul became a mere matter of form under the emperors; although, as far as appearance went, they who filled the station indulged in much greater pomp than had before been customary: they wore the toga picta or palmata, and had their fascæ wreathed with laurel, which used formerly to be done only by those who triumphed. They also added the securis or axe to the fascæ of their lictors.—Cæsar introduced a custom, which became a common one after his time, of appointing consuls for merely a part of a year. The object was to gratify a larger number of political partisans. Those chosen on the first day of January, however, gave name to the year, and were called ordinarii; the rest were termed suffecti. Under Commodus there were no less than twenty-five consuls in the course of a single year. Constantine renewed the original institution, and permitted the consuls to be a whole year in office.

CONSUS, a Roman deity, the god of counsel, as his name denotes. His altar was in the Circus Maximus, and was always covered, except on his festival-day, the 18th August, called Consualia. Horse and chariot races were celebrated on this occasion, and the working-horses, mules, and asses were crowned with flowers, and allowed to rest. (Dion. Hal., 1, 33.—Plut., Quest. Rom., 48.) Hence Consus has probably been confounded with Neptunus Equestris. It was at the Consualia that the Sabine maidens were carried off by the Romans. (Keightley's Mythology, p. 529.)

COPÆ, a small town of Bœotia, on the northern shore of the Lake Copais, and giving name to that piece of water. It was a town of considerable antiquity, being noticed by Homer in the Catalogue of the ships. (Il., 2, 502.) Pausanias remarks here the temples of Bacchus, Ceres, and Serapis (9, 24.—Compare Thucyd., 4, 94.—Strab., 406 and 410). Sir W. Gell points out, to the north of Karditza (the ancient Acræphia), “a triangular island, on which are the walls of the ancient Copæ, and more distant, on another island, the village of Topolias, which gives the present name to the lake.” (Gell's Itin., p. 143.) And Dodwell speaks of a low insular tongue of land projecting from the foot of Ptois, and covered with the ruins of a small ancient city, the walls of which are seen encircling it to the water's edge. (Dodwell's Tour, vol. 2, p. 56.)

COPÆIS LACUS, a lake of Bœotia, which, as Strabo informs us, received different appellations from the different towns situated along its shores. At Haliartus it was called Haliartius Lacus (Strabo, 410); at Orchomenus, Orchomenius. (Plin., 16, 36.) Pindar and Homer distinguish it by the name of Cephissus. That of Copais, however, finally prevailed, as Copæ was situate near the deepest part of it. It is by far the most considerable lake of Greece, being not less than three hundred and eighty stadia, or forty-seven miles in circuit, according to Strabo (407). Pausanias states, that it was navigable from the mouth of the Cephissus to Copæ (9, 24). As this considerable extent of water had no apparent discharge, it sometimes threatened to inundate the whole surrounding country. Tradition indeed asserted, that near Copæ there stood, in the time of Cecrops, two ancient cities, Eleusis and Athenæ, the latter of which was situated on the river Triton, which, if it is the torrent noticed by Pausanias, was near Alalcomenæ. (Strabo, 407.—Pausan., l. c.) Stephanus Byzantinus reports, that when Crates drained the waters which had overspread the plains, the latter town became visible (s. v. Ἀθήναι). Some writers have asserted, that it occupied the site of the ancient Orchomenus. (Strabo,

l. c.—Steph. Byz., v. c.) Fortunately for the Bœotians, nature had supplied several subterranean canals, by which the waters of the lake found their way into the sea of Eubœa. Strabo supposes they were caused by earthquakes. Their number is uncertain; but Dodwell, who seems to have inquired minutely into the subject, was informed by the natives that there were as many as fifteen. He himself only observed four, one at the foot of Mount Ptois, near Acræphia, which conveys the waters of Copais to the Lake Hylicæ, a distance of about two miles. The other katabothra, as they are called by the modern Greeks, are on the northeastern side of the lake. Dodwell speaks of these subterranean canals as being in a calcareous rock, of a hard though friable quality, and full of natural caverns and fissures. (Dodwell's Tour, vol. 1, p. 238.) In consequence of some obstructions in these outlets, an attempt was made to cleanse them in the time of Alexander, and for this purpose square pits were cut in the rock in the supposed direction of this underground stream. Mr. Raikes saw some of these remaining. (MS. Journal.—Walpole's Memoirs, vol. 1, p. 304.) According to Dodwell (vol. 1, p. 240), “the general size of these pits is four feet square; the depth varies according to the unevenness of the ground under which the water is conducted to its outlet. It is impossible to penetrate into these deep recesses, which are most of them filled with stones or overgrown with bushes; but it would not be difficult to ascertain their depth, and their direction might be traced by following the shafts, which extend nearly to the sea.”—Mr. Raikes gives the following account of the outlets where they empty into the sea. “From the mouth of the Larni I rode along its banks, until, in about three miles, I came to a spot covered with rocks and bushes, in the middle of which the whole river burst with impetuosity from holes at the foot of a low cliff, and immediately assumed the form of a considerable stream. Above this source there is a small plain under cultivation, bounded to the west by a range of low rocky hills. From these a magnificent view of the Copaic Lake and the mountains of Phocis presents itself to the eye.” The same writer remarks, that “when the undertaking for clearing the katabothra, in the time of Alexander, was proposed, the rich and flourishing towns of the plain were reduced to a state of desolation by the encroachments of the lake, and under the despondency occasioned by a universal monarchy, sunk into complete decay. At present the rising of the waters in winter has turned a great portion of the richest soil in the world into a morass, and should any permanent internal obstruction occur in the stream, the whole of this fertile plain might gradually become included in the limits of the Copaic Lake.”—The Copaic Lake was especially famed for its eels, which grew to a large size, and were highly esteemed by the epicures of antiquity. (Archestr. ap. Athen., 7, 53.) We know from Aristophanes that they found their way to the Athenian market (Acharn., v. 880, seq.—Lyssistr., v. 36); and we are informed by Dodwell (vol. 1, p. 237), “that they are as much celebrated at present as they were in the time of the ancients; and, after being salted and pickled, are sent as delicacies to various parts of Greece.” Some which were extraordinarily large were offered up as sacrifices, and decorated like victims. (Athen., 7, 50.—Compare Pausan., 9, 24.—I. Poll., 6, 63.—Cramer's Ancient Greece, vol. 2, p. 256.)

COPHAS, a harbour in Gedrosia, supposed by some to be the modern Gondel. (Compare the remarks of Vincent, Commerce of the Ancients, vol. 1, p. 252, seq.)

COPÏA, the goddess of plenty among the Romans, represented as bearing a horn filled with fruits, &c.

CORVUS, a city of Egypt, in the northern part of the Thebais, and to the east of the Nile, from which river it stood some distance back in a plain. Under the Pharaohs its true name appears to have been Chemnis, and it would seem to have been at that time merely a place connected with the religious traditions of the Egyptian nation. Under the Ptolemies, on the other hand, not only the appellation for the place assumed more of a Greek form, but the city itself rose into commercial importance. The Arabian Gulf beginning to be navigated by the Greeks, and traffic being pushed from this quarter as far as India, Coptus became the centre of communication between this latter country and Alexandria, through the harbour of Berenice on the Red Sea. It was well situated for such a purpose, since the Arabian chain of mountains, which elsewhere forms a complete barrier along the coast, has here an opening which, after various windings, conducts to the shore of the Red Sea. Along this route the caravans proceeded; and camels were also employed between Coptus and the Nile. The road from Coptus to Berenice was the work of Ptolemy Philadelphus, and 258 miles in length. It was raised above the level of the surrounding country.—Coptus was destroyed by the Emperor Dioclesian, for having sided with his opponent Achilleus. (Theophan. Chronogr., p. 4, ed. Paris.—Euseb., Chron., p. 178.) Its favourable situation for commerce, however, soon caused it again to arise, and Hierocles speaks of Coptus in the sixth century.—The modern name is Keft or Kuypt, a name which exhibits, according to some, the simple form of that word which the Greeks corrupted or improved into Aegyptus. Plutarch states (De Is. et Os., p. 356.—Op., ed. Reiske, vol. 7, p. 405), that Isis, upon receiving the news of the death of Osiris, cut off one of her locks here, and that hence the place was called Coptus, this term signifying, in the Egyptian language, want or privation. Mannert suggests, that Coptus may have denoted in the Egyptian tongue a mixed population, a name well suited to the inhabitants of a large commercial city; and he conjectures, that the modern appellation of Koptis, as given to the present mingled population, which is supposed to be descended in part from the ancient Egyptians, may have reference to the same idea. (Mannert, Geogr., vol. 10, pt. 1, p. 365.)

CORA, a town of Latium, southwest of Anagnia. It was a place of great antiquity, and has preserved its name unchanged to the present day. Virgil (Æn., 6, 773) makes it to have been a colony from Alba, while Pliny (3, 5) says, it was founded by Dardanus, a Trojan. Cora suffered greatly during the contest with Spartacus, being taken and sacked by one of his wandering bands. (Flor., 3, 20.) It apparently, however, recovered from this devastation, as there are some fine remains of ancient buildings to be seen here, which must have been erected in the reigns of Tiberius and Claudius. But Propertius and Lucan speak of Cora as the seat of ruin and desolation. (Propert., 4, 11.—Lucan., 7, 392.—Nitlby, Viag. Antiq., vol. 2, p. 207.—Cramer's Anc. Italy, vol. 2, p. 105.)

CORACESIUM, a maritime town of Pamphylia, south-east of Side. It is described by Strabo as a strong and important fortress, situate on a steep rock. Pompey took Coracesium in the piratical war. It is also incidentally noticed by Livy (33, 20.—Compare Scylax, p. 40.—Plin., 5, 27). Hierocles assigns Coracesium to Pamphylia, and D'Anville's map agrees with this. Others, however, to Cilicia; and Cramer's map places it in this latter country, just beyond the confines of Pamphylia. The site of Coracesium corresponds with that of Alaya. Capt. Beaufort describes it as a promontory rising abruptly from a low sandy isthmus. Two of its sides are cliffs of great height, and absolutely perpendicular; and the eastern side, on which the town is placed, is so steep, that the houses seem to rest on each other. It forms, according to him, a natural fortress that might be rendered impregnable; and the numerous walls and towers prove how anxiously its former possessors laboured to make it so. (Beaufort's Karamania, p. 172.—Cramer's Asia Minor, vol. 2, p. 320.)

CORALLI, a savage people of Sarmatia Europea, who inhabited the shores of the Euxine, near the mouths of the Danube. (Ovid, ex Pont., 4, 2, 37.)

CORAS, a brother of Catillus and Tiburtus (vid. Tibur), who fought against Æneas. (Virg., Æn., 7, 672.)

CORAX, a Sicilian, whom the ancients regarded as the creator of the rhetorical art. Cicero, following Aristotle, says, that when the tyrants were driven out of Sicily, and private affairs began again to be taken cognizance of by the tribunals of justice, Corax and Tisias wrote on the rhetorical art, and penned precepts of oratory. In this way, according to him, the eloquence of the bar arose, the Sicilians being naturally an acute race and given to disputation. (Cic., Brut., c. 12.—Compare De Orat., 1, 20, and 3, 21.) Corax and Tisias must have lived, consequently, about 473 B.C., since this is the period when the Sicilians regained their freedom, of which they had been deprived by Gelon and the other tyrants who were contemporaneous with him. (Clavier, in Biog. Univ., vol. 9, p. 556.)

CORBULO, Cn. Domitius, a celebrated Roman commander, under Claudius and Nero. He was famed for his military talent, his rigid observance of ancient discipline, and for the success of his arms, especially against the Parthians. On account of his great reputation, he became an object of jealousy and suspicion to Nero, who recalled him, under pretence of rewarding his merit. When Corbulo reached Corinth, he met there an order to die. Reflecting on his own want of prudence and foresight, he fell upon his sword, exclaiming, "I have well deserved this!" Thus perished, A.D. 67, the greatest warrior, and one of the most virtuous men of his time. Corbulo had written Memoirs of the wars carried on by him, after the manner of Cæsar's Commentaries; but they have not reached our day. (Tacit., Ann., 11, 18.—Id. ib., 13, 35.—Id. ib., 13, 14, &c.)

CORBULONIS MONUMENTUM, a place in the north-western part of Germany, among the Frisii, near the confines of the Chauci. It is supposed to answer to the modern Groningen. (Tacit., Ann., 11, 19.)

CORCYRA, an island in the Ionian Sea, off the coast of Epirus, in which Homer places the fabled gardens of Alcinoüs. It is said to have been first known under the name of Drepane, perhaps from its similarity of shape to a scythe. (Apollon., Argon., 4, 982.) To this name succeeded that of Scheria, always used by Homer, and by which it was probably known in his time. From the Odyssey we learn, that this island was then inhabited by Phæacians, a people who, even at that early period, had acquired considerable skill in nautical affairs, and possessed extensive commercial relations, since they traded with the Phœnicians, and also with Eubœa and other countries.—Corcyra was in after days the principal city of the island, and was situated precisely where the modern town of Corfu stands. Scylax speaks of three harbours, one of which is depicted as beautiful. Homer describes the position of the city very accurately (Od., 6, 262). In the middle ages, the citadel obtained the name of Κορυφώ, from its two conical hills or crests, which appellation was, in process of time, applied to the whole town, and finally to the island itself. Hence the modern name of Corfu, which is but a corruption of the former. (Wordsworth's Greece, p. 263.) As, however, the island is designated in Boccaccio by the appellation of Gurfo, and as the modern Greek term is Korfo, some have imagined that the name Corfu originated in a Romaic corruption of the ancient word for Κόλπος (κόλπος), "gulf" or "bay," which might well be applied to the harbour beneath the double summits. (Wordsworth, l. c.) Corfu forms at the present day one of the Ionian islands, and is the most important of the number. It is 70 miles in length by 30 in breadth, and contains a population of 30,000 souls. The olive arrives at greater perfection here than in any other part of Greece; but the oil obtained from it is acrid.—Corfu was for a long time considered as the stronghold of Italy against the attacks of the Mussulmans. The following is a sketch of the history of this island. Its earlier periods are enveloped in the mist of uncertainty and conjecture. A colony of Colchians is said to have settled there about 1349 years before our era. It was afterward governed by kings of whom little is known. Homer has, indeed, immortalized the name of Alei-nous. But it is not easy to draw a map of the Homeric Phœacia, which shall coincide in its details with the localities of Corfu; nor will the topographer find it a simple task to discover the natural objects connected in the Odyssey with the city of the Phœacian king. In process of time, Corcyra, enriched and aggrandized by its maritime superiority, became one of the most powerful nations in Greece. (Thucyd., 1, 1.) The Corinthians, under Chersicrates, formed a settlement here in 753 B.C., and 415 years afterward it was captured by Agathocles of Syracuse, who gave it to his daughter Lanessa upon her marriage with Pyrrhus of Epirus. It was occupied by the troops of the Illyrian queen Teuta, about fifty-eight years after its seizure by Agathocles, but was soon after taken from her by the Romans, under the consul Cn. Flavius; and, although it had the privileges of a free city, it remained under the Romans for many centuries. In the time of Strabo it was reduced to extreme misery, owing to the vices of its administration and its want of moderation in prosperity. Corfu has for several centuries been celebrated for its powerful fortresses, to which great additions were made by the French, and subsequently by the English, in the hands of which latter people it, together with the other Ionian islands, at present remains. (Dodwell's Tour, vol. 1, p. 36, seqq.)—II. An island in the Adriatic, on the coast of Illyricum, termed Nigra ("Black"), in Greek Μέλαινα, to distinguish it from the more celebrated island of the same name. It is now Curzola. Apollonius accounts for the epithet just mentioned from the dark masses of wood with which it was crowned. (Argon., 4, 571.) Scymnus attributes to this island the honour of having received a colony from Cnidus in Asia Minor. (Scymn., v. 426.—Compare Scylax, p. 8.—Strabo, 315.)

CORRUBA, a city of Hispania Bætica, on the right bank of the river Bætis, and about 1200 stadia from the sea. The river being navigable to this quarter, Corduba became, in consequence, a large and opulent commercial place. It was the birthplace of both the Senecas, and of the poet Lucan, and is now Cordoba. (Strab., 141.—Plin., 3, 3.—Wernsdorff, Poet. Lat. Min., vol. 5, pt. 3, p. 1366.)

CORË I. (Κόρη, "the maiden"), an Attic name for Proserpina. Some, not very correctly, derive the term from κείρω, "to cut," &c., and make it have reference to "the harvest." (Journal Royal Institution, No. 1, p. 59.)—II. A Corinthian female, said to have been the inventress of plaster-casts. (Athenag., Leg. pro Christ., 14, p. 59.—Sillig, Dict. Art., s. c.)

CORFINUM, the capital of the Peligni, in Italy, about three miles from the Aternus. During the Social war it took the name of Italica, and had the honour of being styled the capital of Italy. This arrangement, however, was of short continuance, as Corfinum appears to have seceded from the confederacy before the conclusion of the war. (Diod. Sic., Fragm., 37.) In later times we find it still regarded as one of the most important cities of this part of Italy, and one which Cæsar was most anxious to secure in his enterprise against the liberties of his country. It surrendered to him after a short defence. (Bell. Civ., 1, 16.—Compare Florus, 4, 2.—Appian, Bell. Civ., 2, 38.) The church of S. Pelino, about three miles from the town of Popoli, stands on the site of this ancient city, and the little hamlet of Pertinia occupies probably the place of its citadel. (D'Anville, An. Geogr., vol. 1, p. 173.—Mannert, Geogr., vol. 9, pt. 1, p. 500.)

CORINNA, a poetess of Thebes, or, according to others, of Tanagra, distinguished for her skill in lyric verse, and remarkable for her personal attractions. She was the rival of Pindar, while the latter was still a young man; and, according to Ælian (V. H., 13, 25), she gained the victory over him no less than five times. Pausanias, in his travels, saw at Tanagra a picture, in which Corinna was represented as binding her head with a fillet of victory, which she had gained in a contest with Pindar. He supposes that she was less indebted for this victory, to the excellence of her poetry than to her Bœotian dialect, which was more familiar to the ears of the judges at the games, and also to her extraordinary beauty. Corinna afterward assisted the young poet with her advice; it is related of her, that she recommended him to ornament his poems with mythical narrations; but that, when he had composed a hymn, in the first six verses of which (still extant) almost the whole of the Theban mythology was introduced, she smiled and said, "We should sow with the hand, not with the whole sack." (Pausan., 9, 22.—Plut., de Glor. Ath.—Op., ed. Reiske, vol. 7, p. 320.) She was surnamed "the Fly" (Μύια), as Erinna had been styled "the Bee." This appellation of Μεΐα has deceived Clement of Alexandria, who speaks of a poetess named Myia. (Strom., 4, 19.) The poems of Corinna were all in the Bœotian or Æolic dialect. Too little of her poetry, however, has been preserved to allow of our forming a safe judgment of her style of composition. The extant fragments refer mostly to mythological subjects, particularly to heroines of the Bœotian legends. These remains were given by Ursinus, in his Carmina novem illustrium feminarum, 1568; by Wolf in his Pœtriarum octo fragmenta, 1734; and by Schneider in his Μοσχαῶν ἀνθ., Gies., 1802, 8vo. (Schöll, Hist. Lit. Gr., vol. 1, p. 295.—Möhnike, Gesch. Lit. der Gr. und R., p. 317.)

CORINTHI ISTHMUS, or Isthmus of Corinth, between the Saronicus Sinus and Corinthiacus Sinus, and uniting the Peloponnesus to the northern parts of Greece, or Græcia Propria. The ancients appear to have been divided in their opinions concerning the exact breadth of the isthmus. Diodorus (11, 16) and Strabo (335) say it was forty stadia, and Mela (2, 3) five miles, with which last Pliny agrees (4, 5). The real distance, however, in the narrowest part, cannot be less than six miles (or not quite five British miles), as the modern name of Hexamilion sufficiently denotes. Ships were drawn, by means of machinery, from one sea to the other, near the town of Schœnus, over the narrowest part of the isthmus, which was called Diolkos. This could only be accomplished, however, with the vessels usually employed in commerce, or with lembi, which were light ships of war, chiefly used by the Illyrians and Macedonians. The tediousness and expense attending this process, and still more probably the difficulty of circumnavigating the Peloponnesus, led to frequent attempts, at various periods, for effecting a junction between the two seas; but all proved equally unsuccessful. According to Strabo (51), Demetrius Poliorcetes abandoned the enterprise, because it was found that the two gulfs were not on the same level. We read of the attempt having been made before his time by Periander and Alexander, and, subsequently to Demetrius, by Julius Cæsar, Caligula Nero, and Herodes Atticus. "It appears somewhat surprising," remarks Mr. Dodwell, "that these successive attempts should have failed or been relinquished

The art of perforating rocks was well understood and dexterously practised both in Italy and Greece at a very early period, and, therefore, no difficulty of this kind could have occasioned the abandonment of so useful a project, though Pausanias is of a different opinion. It was afterward begun with the greatest energy, and abandoned without any plausible motive, as no doubt the quantity of rock or earth to be removed, and all the associated impediments, must have been the subject of previous calculation. And if Demetrius was really convinced that the level of the Corinthian Gulf was higher than that of the Saronic, and that the adjacent shore, with the neighbouring islands, would be inundated by the union of the two seas, those who came after him would not have persevered in so destructive an undertaking. Sesostrius, and afterward Darius, were in the same manner deterred from finishing a canal from the Red Sea to the Nile, by an apprehension that Egypt would be inundated. (Strab., 38.—Id., 804.) Dio Cassius tells nearly the same story about digging the isthmus as that which is related to travellers at this day. He says that blood issued from the ground; that groans and lamentations were heard, and terrible apparitions seen. In order to stimulate the perseverance of the people, Nero took a spade and dug himself. (Dio Cass., 63, 16.—Compare Suet., Vit. Ner., 19.—Lucian, de perfoss. Isthm.) Lucian informs us, that Nero was said to have been deterred from proceeding, by a representation made to him, similar to that which Demetrius received respecting the unequal levels of the two seas. He adds, however, a more probable reason; the troubles, namely, that were excited by Vindex in Gaul, and which occasioned the emperor's hasty return from Greece to Italy. (Lucian, de perfoss. Isthm.—Op., ed. Bip., vol. 9, p. 298.) It is probable, as far as the supernatural appearances went, that the priests at Delphi had some influence in checking the enterprise." (Dodwell's Tour, vol. 2, p. 184.) Travellers inform us, that some remains of the canal undertaken by the Roman emperor are yet visible, reaching from the sea, northeast of Lechæum, about half a mile across the isthmus. It terminates on the southeast side, where solid rock occurs, which, as Dr. Clarke thinks, must have opposed an insurmountable obstacle. (Trav., vol. 6, p. 562.) Sir W. Gell remarks, that the vestiges of the canal may be traced from the port or bay of Schœnus, along a natural hollow at the foot of a line of fortifications. There are also several pits, probably sunk to ascertain the nature of the soil, through which the canal was to be carried. The ground, however, is so high, that the undertaking would be attended with enormous expense. (Itin. of the Morea, p. 208.)—We hear also of various attempts made to raise fortifications across the Isthmus for the Peloponnesus when threatened with invasion. The first undertaking was made before the battle of Salamis, when, as Herodotus relates, the Peloponnesian confederates, having blocked up the Scironian way, collected together a vast multitude, who worked night and day, without intermission, on the fortifications. Every kind of material, such as stones, bricks, and timber, were employed, and the interstices filled up with earth and sand. (Herodot., 8, 73.) Many years after, the Lacedæmonians and their allies endeavoured to fortify the isthmus from Cenchreæ to Lechæum against Epaminondas; but this measure was rendered fruitless by the conduct and skill of that general, who forced a passage across the Oncian Mountains. (Xen., Hist. Gr., 7, 1.) Cleomenes also threw up trenches and lines from Acrocorinthus to the Oncian Mountains, in order to prevent the Macedonians, under Antigonus Doson, from penetrating into the peninsula. (Polyb., 2, 52.—Plut., de Cleom.)—The Isthmus of Corinth derived great celebrity from the games which were celebrated there every five years in honour of Palæmon or Melicerta, and subsequently of Neptune. (Pausan., 1, 41.

—Plut., Vit. Thes.) These continued in vogue when the other gymnastic exercises of Greece had fallen into neglect and disuse; and it was during their solemnization that the independence of Greece was proclaimed, after the victory of Cynoscephalæ, by order of the Roman senate and people. (Polyb., 18, 29.—Liv., 33, 32.) After the destruction of Corinth, the superintendence of the Isthmian games was committed to the Sicyonians by the Romans; on its restoration, however, by Julius Cæsar, the presidency of the games again reverted to the Corinthian settlers. (Pausan., 2, 2.)

CORINTHIÆCUS SINUS, or Gulf of Lepanto, an arm of the sea running in between the coast of Achaia and Sicyonia to the south, and that of Phocis, Locris, and Ætolia to the north. Its gulf had the general appellation of Corinthian as far as the Isthmus, but it was divided into smaller bays, the names of which were sometimes poetically used for the entire gulf. Its different names were the Crissæan, Cirrhæan, Delphic, Calydonian, Rhian, and Halcyonian. Besides being now called the Gulf of Lepanto, the Sinus Corinthiacus is often known by the name of the Gulf of Nepaktos or Salona. The victory of Don John of Austria, in 1571, over the Turks, has immortalized the name of the Gulf of Lepanto in modern history. (Dodwell's Tour, vol. 1, p. 111.)

CORINTHUS, a famous city of Greece, now Corito or Corinth, and situate on the isthmus of the same name. Commanding by its position the Ionian and Ægean seas, and holding, as it were, the keys of Peloponnesus, Corinth, from the pre-eminent advantages of its situation, was already the seat of opulence and the arts, while the rest of Greece was sunk in comparative obscurity and barbarism. Its origin is, of course, lost in the night of time; but we are assured that it already existed under the name of Ephyræ long before the siege of Troy. According to the assertions of the Corinthians themselves, their city received its name from Corinthus, the son of Jove; but Pausanias does not credit this popular tradition, and cites the poet Eumelus to show that the appellation was really derived from Corinthus, the son of Marathon (2. 1). Homer certainly employs both names indiscriminately. (Il., 2, 570; 13, 663.) Pausanias reports, that the descendants of Sysiphus reigned at Corinth until the invasion of their territory by the Dorians and Heraclidae, when Doridas and Hyanthidas, the last princes of this race, abdicated the crown in favour of Aletes, a descendant of Hercules, whose lineal successors remained in possession of the throne of Corinth during five generations, when the crown passed into the family of the Bacchiadæ, so named from Bacchis, the son of Prumnis, who retained it for five other generations. After this the sovereign power was transferred to annual magistrates, still chosen, however, from the line of the Bacchiadæ, with the title of Prytanes. Strabo affirms that this form of government lasted 200 years; but Diodorus limits it to ninety years: the former writer probably includes within that period both the kings and Prytanes of the Bacchiadæ, Diodorus only the latter. (Strabo, 378.—Diod. Sic., Frag.—Larcker. Chronol. d'Herodote, vol. 7, p. 519, 531.) The oligarchy so long established by this rich and powerful family was at length overthrown, about 629 B.C., by Cypselus, who banished many of the Corinthians, depriving others of their possessions, and putting others to death. (Herodot., 5, 92.) Among those who fled from his persecution was Demaratus, of the family of the Bacchiadæ, who settled at Tarquinii in Etruria, and whose descendants became sovereigns of Rome. (Strabo, 378.—Polyb., 6, 2.—Dion. Hal., 3, 46.—Liv., 1, 34.) The reign of Cypselus was more prosperous than his crimes deserved; and the system of colonization, which had previously succeeded so well in the settlements of Corcyra and Syracuse, was actively pursued by that prince, who added Ambracia, Anactorium, and Leucas to the maritime dependencies of the Corinthians. (Strabo, l. c.—Aristot., Polit., 5, 9.) Cypselus was succeeded by his son Periander. On the death of this latter, after a reign of forty-four years, according to Aristotle, his nephew Psammetichus came to the throne, but lived only three years. At his decease Corinth regained its independence, when a moderate aristocracy was established, under which the republic enjoyed a state of tranquillity and prosperity unequalled by any other city of Greece. We are told by Thucydides, that the Corinthians were the first to build war-galleys or triremes; and the earliest naval engagement, according to the same historian, was fought by their fleet and that of the Corcyreans, who had been alienated from their mother-state by the cruelty and impolicy of Periander. (Thucyd., 1, 13.—Compare Herodot., 3, 48.) The arts of painting and sculpture, more especially that of casting in bronze, attained to the highest perfection at Corinth, and rendered this city the ornament of Greece, until it was stripped by the rapacity of a Roman general. Such was the beauty of its vases, that the tombs in which they had been deposited were ransacked by the Roman colonists whom Julius Cæsar had established there after the destruction of the city; these, being transported to Rome, were purchased at enormous prices. (Strabo, 381.) An interesting dissertation on these beautiful specimens of art will be found in Dodwell's Tour (vol. 2, p. 196).—When the Achæan confederacy, owing to the infatuation of those who presided over its counsels, became involved in a destructive war with the Romans, Corinth was the last hold of their tottering republic; and, had its citizens wisely submitted to the offers proposed by the victorious Metellus, it might have been preserved; but the deputation of that general having been treated with scorn, and even insult, the city became exposed to all the vengeance of the Romans. (Polyb., 40, 4, 1.—Strabo, 381.) L. Mummius, the consul, appeared before its walls with a numerous army, and, after defeating the Achæans in a general engagement, entered the town, now left without defence, and deserted by the greater part of the inhabitants. It was then given up to plunder, and finally set on fire; the walls also were razed to the ground, so that scarcely a vestige of this once great and noble city remained. Polybius, who witnessed its destruction, affirmed, as we are informed by Strabo (381), that he had seen the finest paintings strewn on the ground, and the Roman soldiers using them as boards for dice or draughts. Pausanias reports (7, 16), that all the men were put to the sword, the women and children sold, and the most valuable statues and paintings removed to Rome. (Vid. Mummius.) Strabo observes (l. c.), that the finest works of art which adorned that capital in his time had come from Corinth. He likewise states, that Corinth remained for many years deserted and in ruins; as also does the poet Antipater of Sidon, who describes in verse the scene of desolation. (Anat., vol. 2, p. 20.) Julius Cæsar, however, not long before his death, sent a numerous colony thither, by means of which Corinth was once more raised from its state of ruin. (Strabo, 381.) It was already a large and populous city, and the capital of Achaia, when St. Paul preached the gospel there for a year and six months. (Acts, 18, 11.) It is also evident that, when visited by Pausanias, it was thickly adorned by public buildings, and enriched with numerous works of art (Pausan., 2, 2); and as late as the time of Hierocles, we find it styled the metropolis of Greece. (Synecd., p. 646.) In a later age, the Venetians received the place from a Greek emperor; Mohammed II. took it from them in 1458; the Venetians recovered it in 1687, and fortified the Acrocorinthus again; but the Turks took it anew in 1715, and retained it until driven from the Peloponnesus.—An important feature in the scenery around Corinth, was the Acrocorinthus, an account of which has been given in a previous article. (Vid. Acrocorinthus.) On the summit of this hill was erected a temple of Venus, to whom the whole of the Acrocorinthus, in fact, was sacred. In the times of Corinthian opulence and prosperity, it is said that the shrine of the goddess was attended by no less than one thousand female slaves, dedicated to her service as courtesans. These priestesses of Venus contributed not a little to the wealth and luxury of the city; whence arose the well-known expression, ὅν παντός ἀνδρὸς εἰς Κόρινθον ἴστ' ὁ πλοῖος, or, as Horace expresses it (Epist., 1, 17, 36), "Non cuius homini contingit adire Corinthum," in allusion to its expensive pleasures.—Corinth was famed for its three harbours, Lechæum, on the Corinthian Gulf, and Cenchreæ and Schœnus on the Saronic. Near this last was the Diolcos, where vessels were transported over the isthmus by machinery. (Vid. Corinthi Isthmus.) The first of these is now choked with sand, as is likewise the port of Cenchreæ. The shallow harbour of Schœnus, where was a quay in ancient times, has now almost disappeared. All these harbours are mere morasses, and corrupt the air of the city.—Before leaving this subject, it may not be amiss to say a few words in relation to the well-known Corinthian brass of antiquity. The common account is, that when Corinth was destroyed by the Romans, all the metals that were in the city melted and mixed together during the conflagration, and formed that valuable composition, known by the name of "Corinthian brass," Æs Corinthium. This, however, bears the stamp of improbability on its very face. Klaproth rejects the account. He seems to think, and adduces the authority of Pliny in his favour, that it was merely a term of art, and applied to a metallic mixture in high estimation among the Romans, and, though of a superior quality, nearly resembling aurichalcum. This last was composed of either copper and zinc, or of copper, tin, and lead; the former of a pale yellow, the latter of a darker colour, resembling gold. The mixture by means of calamine was rendered tough and malleable. (Crombie's Gymnasium, vol. 2, p. 127, not.)

CORIOLANUS, Caius Marcius, a distinguished Roman of patrician rank, whose story forms a brilliant legend in the early history of Rome. His name at first was Caius Marcius, but having contributed, mainly by his great personal valour, to the capture of Corioli, and the defeat of a Volscian army, assembled for its aid, on the same day, he received for this gallant exploit the surname of Coriolanus. Not long after this, however, during a scarcity at Rome, he opposed the distribution of a supply of provisions, in part sent by Gelon, of Sicily, and advised the patricians to make this a means of recovering the power which had been wrested from them by the commons. For this and other conduct of a similar nature, he was tried in the Comitia Tributa, and condemned to perpetual banishment. Resolving, upon this, to gratify his vindictive spirit, Coriolanus presented himself as a suppliant to Tullius Aufidius, the leading man among the Volsci, was well received by him and the whole nation, and, war being declared, was invested, along with Aufidius, with the command of the Volscian forces. By his military skill and renown Coriolanus at once defeated and appalled the Romans, till, having taken almost all their subject cities, he advanced at the head of the Volscian army against Rome itself, and encamped only five miles from it, at the Fossæ Cluiliæ. All was thereupon terror and confusion in the Roman capital. Embassy after embassy was sent to Coriolanus, to entreat him to spare his country, but he remained inexorable, and would only grant peace on condition that the Romans restored all the cities and lands which they had taken from the Volsci, and granted to the latter the freedom of Rome, as had been done in the case of the Latins. After all other means of conciliation had failed, a number of Roman females, headed by the mother and the wife of Coriolanus, proceeded to his tent, where the lofty remonstrances of his parent were more powerful than all the arms of Rome had proved, and the son, after a brief struggle with his irritated and vindictive feelings, yielded to her request, exclaiming at the same time, "Oh mother, thou hast saved Rome, but destroyed thy son!" The Volscian forces were then withdrawn, and Rome was thus saved, by female influence alone, from certain capture. On returning to the Volsci with his army, Coriolanus, according to one account, was summoned to trial for his conduct, and was slain in a tumult during the hearing of the cause, a faction having been excited against him by Tullius Aufidius, who was jealous of his renown. (Dion. Hal., Ant. Rom., 8, 59.) According to another statement, he lived to an advanced age among the Volscian people, often towards the close of his life exclaiming, "How miserable is the state of an old man in banishment!" (Plut., in Vit.—Liv., 2, 33, seqq.) Niebuhr, who writes the name Cnæus Marcius, on what he considers good authority, indulges in some acute speculations on the legend of Coriolanus. He thinks that poetical invention has here most thoroughly stilled the historical tradition. He regards the name Coriolanus as of the same kind merely with such appellations as Camerinus, Collatinus, Mugillanus, Vibulanus, &c., which, when taken from an independent town, were assumed by its πρόεδρος, when from a dependant one by its patronus. The capture of Corioli belongs merely, in his opinion, to a heroic poem. As for Coriolanus himself, he thinks that he merely attended the Volscian standard as leader of a band of Roman exiles. He admits, however, that a recollection like the one which remained of him could not rest on mere fable, and that, in all probability, his generosity resigned the opportunity afforded him of taking the city, when Latium was almost entirely subdued, and when Rome was brought to a very low ebb by pestilence. (Niebuhr, Rom. Hist. vol. 2, p. 234, seqq., Cambr. transl.)

CORIOLI, an ancient city of the Volsci, between Velutæ and Lanuvium, from the capture of which C. Marcius obtained the surname of Coriolanus, according to the common account. (Vid., however, remarks at the end of the article Coriolanus.) We collect from Livy that it was situated on the confines of the territory of Ardea, Aricia, and Antium. (Liv., 2, 33, and 3, 71.) Dionysius speaks of Corioli as one of the most considerable towns of the Volsci. (Ant. Rom., 6, 92.) Pliny (3, 5) enumerates Corioli among the towns of Latium of which no vestiges remained. A hill, now known by the name of Monte Giove, is thought, with some degree of probability, to represent the site of Corioli. (Cramer's Ancient Italy, vol. 2, p. 84.)

CORNELIA LEX, I. de Religione, enacted by L. Cornelius Sylla, A.U.C. 677. It restored to the sacerdotal college the privilege of choosing the priests, which, by the Domitian law, had been lodged in the hands of the people.—II. Another, de Municipiis, by the same; that the free towns which had sided with Marius should be deprived of their lands and the right of citizens; the last of which Cicero says could not be done. (Pro Dom., 30.)—III. Another, de Magistratibus, by the same; which gave the privilege of bearing honours and being promoted before the legal age, to those who had followed the interest of Sylla, while the sons and partisans of his enemies, who had been proscribed, were deprived of the privilege of standing for any office in the state.—IV. Another, de Magistratibus, by the same, A.U.C. 673. It ordained, that no person should exercise the same office until after an interval of ten years, or be invested with two different magistracies in one year; and that no one should be prætor before being quæstor, nor consul before being prætor.—V. Another, de Magistratibus, by the same, A.U.C. 673.

It ordained, that whoever had been tribune should not afterward enjoy any other magistracy; that there should be no appeal to the tribunes; that they should not be allowed to assemble the people and make harangues to them, nor to propose laws; but should only retain the right of intercession. (Cic., de Leg., 3, 9.)—VI. Another, by the same. It allowed an individual, accused of having taken away the life of another by weapons, poison, false accusation, &c., the privilege of choosing whether he wished the judges to decide his case by voice or by ballot.—VII. Another, by the same, imposing the punishment of aque et ignis interdictio on all such as were found guilty of forging testaments or any other writings, of debasing or counterfeiting the public coin, &c.—VIII. Another, imposing the same punishment as the preceding on all who had been guilty of extortion, &c., in their provinces. (Consult, as regards other "Cornelian Laws," Heineccius, Antiq. Rom., ed. Haubold, p. 650, &c.—Ernesti, Clav. Cic., s. v.—Adam's Rom. Antiq., p. 162, ed. Boyd.)

CORNELIA, I. daughter of Cinna. She was Julius Cæsar's second wife, and mother of Julia the wife of Pompey. She died young. Plutarch says, it had been the custom at Rome for the aged women to have funeral panegyrics, but not the young. Cæsar first broke through this custom, by pronouncing one upon Cornelia. This, adds the biographer, contributed to fix him in the affections of his countrymen: they sympathized with him, and considered him a man of good feeling, who had the social duties deeply at heart. (Plut., Vit. Cæs., c. 5.)—II. Daughter of Metellus Scipio, married to Pompey after the death of her first husband Publius Crassus. She was remarkable for the variety of her accomplishments and the excellence of her private character. Plutarch makes her to have been versed, not only in the musical art, but in polite literature, in geometry, and in the precepts of philosophy. (Plut., Vit. Pomp., c. 55.) After the battle of Pharsalia, when Pompey joined her at Mytilene, Cornelia with tears ascribed all his misfortunes to her union with him, alluding at the same time to the unhappy end of her first husband Crassus in his expedition against the Parthians. (Compare Lucan., 8, 88.) She was also a witness, from her galley, of the murder of her husband on the shores of Egypt. (Plut., Vit. Pomp., c. 79.)—III. Daughter of Scipio Africanus Major, and mother of Tiberius and Caius Gracchus. Cornelia occupies a high rank for the purity and excellence of her private character, as well as for her masculine tone of mind. She was married to Sempronius Gracchus, and was left on his death with a family of twelve children, the care of whom devolved entirely upon herself. After the loss of her husband, her hand was sought by Ptolemy, king of Egypt, but the offer was declined. Plutarch speaks in high terms of her conduct during widowhood. Having lost all her children but three, one daughter, who was married to Scipio Africanus the younger, and two sons, Tiberius and Caius, she devoted her whole time to the education of these, and, to borrow the words of Plutarch, she brought up her two sons in particular with so much care, that, though they were of the noblest origin, and had the happiest dispositions of all the Roman youth, yet education was allowed to have contributed still more than nature to the excellence of their characters. Valerius Maximus relates an anecdote of Cornelia, which has often been cited. A Campanian lady, who was at the time on a visit to her, having displayed to Cornelia some very beautiful ornaments which she possessed, desired the latter, in return, to exhibit her own. The Roman mother purposely detained her in conversation until her children returned from school, when, pointing to them, she exclaimed, "These are my ornaments!" (Hæc ornamenta mea sunt—Val. Max., 4, imit.) Plutarch informs us, that some persons blamed Cornelia for the rash conduct of her sons in after life, she having been accustomed to reproach them that she was still called the mother-in-law of Scipio, not the mother of the Gracchi. (Plut., Vit. T. Gracch., c. 8.) She bore the untimely death of her sons with great magnanimity, and a statue was afterward erected in honour of her by the Roman people, bearing for an inscription the words "Cornelia, mother of the Gracchi." (Plut., Vit. C. Gracch., c. 4.)

CORNELIUS, a name indicating a member of the gens Cornelia. The greater part of the individuals who bore it are better known by their surnames of Cossus, Dolabella, Lentulus, Scipio, Sylla, &c., which see.

CORNICŪLUM, a Sabine town, which gave its name to the Corniculani Colles. It is one of those places of which no trace is left, and is only interesting in the history of Rome as being the most accredited birth-place of Servius Tullius. (Liv., i, 39.—Dion. Hal., 3, 50.—Plin., 3, 5.) The Corniculani hills are those of Monticelli and Sant' Angelo; and Corniculum itself may have stood on the site of the latter village, if we place Cænina at Monticelli. (Cramer's Ancient Italy, vol. 1, p. 308.)

CORNIFICIUS, I. Quintus, a contemporary of Cicero's, distinguished for talents and literary acquirements, who attained to some of the highest offices in the state. Catullus and Ovid both speak of his poetic abilities, and he appears to have been the friend of both. (Catull., 38.—Ovid, Trist., 2, 436.—Burmann. ad Or., l. c.) Cornificius distinguished himself as Proprietor in the Illyrian war, and also as governor of Syria, and afterward of Africa. In this latter province he espoused the cause of the senate after Cæsar's death, and received and gave protection to those who had been proscribed by the second triumvirate. He lost his life, however, while contending in this quarter against Sextus, who had been sent against him by Octavius. (Appian, Bell. Civ., 3, 85.—Id. ib., 4, 36; 4, 53; 4, 56.—Compare the account given by Eusebius, Chron. An. m̄cccclxxvi.) Some modern scholars make this Cornificius to have been the author of the Treatise to Herennius, commonly ascribed to Cicero. (Val. Herennius.) He is said also to have been an enemy of Virgil's, but this supposition violates chronology, since the poet only became eminent subsequent to the period when Cornificius died. (Heyne, ad Donat. Vit. Virg., § 67, p. clxxii.)—II. Lucius, a partisan of Octavius, by whom he was appointed to accuse Brutus, before the public tribunal at Rome, of the assassination of Cæsar. (Plut., Vit. Brut., c. 27.) He afterward distinguished himself, as one of Octavius's lieutenants, by a masterly retreat in Sicily during the war with Sextus Pompeius. (Appian, Bell. Civ., 5, 111, seqq.)

CORNIGER, a surname of Bacchus.

CORNŪTUS, I. Annaeus, a Greek philosopher, born at Leptis in Africa, who lived and taught at Rome during the reign of Nero. The appellation I. Annaeus appears to indicate a client or freedman of the Seneca family. His tenets were those of the Stoic sect, and his name was not without distinction in that school of philosophy. He excelled in criticism and poetry; but his principal studies were of a philosophical character. His merits as a teacher of the Stoic doctrine sufficiently appears from his having been the preceptor of that honest advocate for virtue, the satirist Persius. Persius, dying before his master, left him his library, with a considerable sum of money; but Cornutus accepted only the books, and gave the money to the sisters of his pupil. The poet Lucan was also one of his pupils. Under Nero, Cornutus was driven into exile for his freedom of speech. The emperor having written several books in verse on the affairs of Rome, and his flatterers advising him to continue the poem, the honest Stoic had the courage to remark, that he doubted whether so large a work would be read; and when it was urged that Chrysippus had written as much, he replied, "His writings were useful to mankind." After so unpardonable an offence against imperial vanity, the only wonder was that Cornutus escaped with his life. He composed some tragedies, and a large number of other works, the only one of which that has come down to us is the "Theory concerning the Nature of the Gods" (Θεωρία περί τῆς τῶν θεῶν φύσεως), or, as it is entitled in one of the MSS., "concerning Allegories" (περί Ἀλληγορίων). Cornutus, in fact, in this production, seeks to explain the Greek mythology on allegorical and physical principles. The best edition is that given by Gale in his Opuscula (Cantabr., 1670, 12mo).—The name of this philosopher is sometimes, though less correctly, written Phurnutus. (Consult the remarks of Gale, Praf. ad Opusc., p. 2, seqq., and Martini, Disputatio de Cornuto, Lugd. Bat., 1825, 8vo.—Aul. Gell., 6, 2.—Euseb., Eccl. Hist., 6, 19.—Enfield's Hist. Phil., vol. 2, p. 110.)

CORŒBUS, I. a foot-racer of Elis, who carried off the prize at the Olympic games, B.C. 776. This date is remarkable, as being the one from which the Greeks began to count their Olympiads. Not that the Olympic games were now for the first time established, but the names of the victors were now first inscribed on the public registers. Some writers calculate the Greek Olympiads from the period of their re-establishment by Lycurgus, Iphitus, and Cleosthenes, and hence they make the first Olympiad of Coræbus correspond to the twenty-eighth of Iphitus. (Pausan., 5, 8.—Siebelis, ad loc.—Larcher, Tabl. Chronol., vol. 7, p. 590.—Id., Essai de Chronologie, p. 307.) According to Athenæus, Coræbus was by profession a cook! (Athen., 9, p. 382, b.—Compare Casaubon, ad loc.) The Arundel Marbles make the first Olympiad of Coræbus coincide with the year 806 of the Athenian era, when Æschylus, the twelfth perpetual archon, was in his third year of office. (L'Art de Verifier les Dates, vol. 3, p. 173, Paris, 1819.) Delalande makes the true summer-solstice of the year 776 B.C., under the meridian of Pisa in Elis, to have taken place at 11h 15' 33" of the morning. (L'Art de Verifier, &c., vol. 3, p. 170.)—II. An architect, who lived in the age of Pericles. (Plut., Vit. Pericl., c. 13.)—III. A son of Mygdon, king of Thrace, who, from his love for Cassandra, offered his services to Priam, under the hope of obtaining the hand of his daughter. The prophetic, however, knowing the fate that awaited him, implored him to retire from the war; but he was inflexible, and fell by the hand of Peneleos the night that Troy was taken. (Virg., Æn., 2, 425.)

CORŒNE, a city of Messenia, on the western shore of the Sinus Messeniacus. It is now Coron, and the gulf is called after it, the Gulf of Coron. Its original name was Æpea; but this was changed to Corone after the restoration of the Messenians. It was in attempting to take this town, during the war occasioned by the secession of Messene from the Achæan league, that Philopemen was made prisoner. (Liv., 39, 49.) Strabo reports that this place was regarded by some as the Pedasus of Homer. The haven of Corone was called the Port of the Achæans. (Cramer's Anc. Greece, vol. 3, p. 139.)

CORONŒA, a city of Bœotia, to the southeast of Chæronea, on a branch of the Cephissus. It was a place of considerable antiquity and importance, and was said to have been founded, together with Orchomenus, by the descendants of Atlas who came from Thessaly. (Pausan., 9, 34.—Strabo, 411.) Several important actions took place at different times in its vicinity. Tolmides, who commanded a body of Athenian troops, was here defeated and slain by the Bœotians, which led to the emancipation of the whole province, after it had been subject to the Athenians since the victory tacy obtained at Cœnophytæ. (Thucyd., 1, 113.) The battle of Coronea was gained by Agesilaus and the Spartans against the Thebans and their allies in the second year of the 96th Olympiad, 394 B.C. (Xen., Hist. Gr., 4, 3, 8, seqq.—Plut., Vit. Agesil., 17.) This city was also twice taken by the Phocians under Onomarchus, and afterward given up to the Thebans by Philip of Macedon. (Demosth., de Pac., p. 62.—Philip., 2, p. 69.) The Coroneans, in the Macedonian war, having adhered to the cause of Perses, suffered severely from the resentment of the Romans. (Polyb., 27, 1, 8, and 5, 2.—Liv., 42, 44, and 67.—Id., 43, Suppl., 1, 2.) The ruins of Coronea are observable near the village of Korumis, on a remarkable insulated hill, where there are "many marbles and inscriptions. On the summit or acropolis are remains of a very ancient polygonal wall, and also a Roman ruin of brick." (Gell., Itin., p. 150.—Dodwell, vol. 1, p. 247.)

CORONIS, daughter of Phlegyas, and mother of Æsculapius by Apollo. She was put to death by the god for having proved unfaithful to him, but the offspring of her womb was first taken from her and spared. (Vid. Æsculapius.)

CORSI, I. the inhabitants of Corsica.—II. The inhabitants of part of northern Sardinia, who came originally from Corsica. (Mannert, Geogr., vol. 9, pt. 2, p. 479.)

CORSICA, an island of the Mediterranean, called by the Greeks Κύπρος. Its inhabitants were styled by the same people Κύπριοι; by the Latins, Corsi. In later times the island took also the name of Corsis. (ἡ Κορσίς.—Compare Steph. Byz., s. v. Κορσίς.—Dionys. Perieg., v. 459, et Eustath., ad loc.) The ancient writers represent it as mountainous and woody, and only well cultivated along the eastern coast, where the Romans had settlements. (Dionys. Perieg., v. 460.) Its natural products were resin, honey, and wax. (Diod. Sic., 5, 13.) The honey, however, had a bitter taste, in consequence of the bees deriving it from the yew-trees with which the island abounded. (Virg., Eclog., 9, 30.—Ovid, Am., 1, 12.—Diod. Sic., 5, 14.) It was to their feeding abundantly on this honey, however, that the longevity of the Corsicans was ascribed. (Compare Eustath. ad Dionys. Perieg., v. 458.) The inhabitants were a rude race of mountaineers, indebted for their subsistence more to the produce of their flocks than to the cultivation of the soil. Seneca, who was banished to this quarter in the reign of Claudius, draws a very unfavourable picture of the island and its inhabitants; describing the former as rocky, unproductive, and unhealthy, and the latter as the worst of barbarians. He writes, however, under the influence of prejudiced feelings, and many allowances must be made. (Senec. de Consol. ad Helv., c. 6, 8.) The Corsi appear to have derived their origin from Ligurian and Iberian (called by Seneca Spanish) tribes. Eustathius says that a Ligurian female, named Corsia, having pursued in a small boat a bull which had taken to the water, accidentally discovered the island, which her countrymen named after her. (Eustath., ad Dionys. Perieg., v. 458.—Compare Isidori Origines, 14, 6.) The Phœcæans, on retiring from Asia, settled here for a time, and founded the city Aleria, but were driven out finally by the Tyrrhenians and Carthaginians. (Diod. Sic., 5, 13.) The Romans took the island from this latter people B.C. 231, and subsequently two colonies were sent to it; one by Marius, which founded Mariana, and another by Sylla, which settled on the site of Aleria. Mantinorum Oppidum, in the same island, is now Bastia; and Urcinium, Ajaccio, was the birthplace of Napoleon. (Mannert, Geogr., vol. 9, pt. 2, p. 505, seqq.)

CORSÔTE, a city of Mesopotamia, on the river Masca. D'Anville places it at the confluence of the Masca and Euphrates. The Masca, according to Xenophon (Anab., 1, 5, 4), flowed around the city in a circular course. Mannert supposes it to have been nothing more than a canal cut from the Euphrates. (Vid. Masca, where notice is taken of an error in D'Anville's chart.) The site of Corsote appears to correspond, at the present day, to a spot where are the ruins of a large city, named Erzi or Irsah. (Rennell, Illustrations of the Anabasis, &c., p. 103.)

CORTONA, a town of Etruria, a short distance north-west of the Lacus Thrasymenus, and fourteen miles south of Arretium. Its claims to antiquity were equalled by few other places of Italy. It is thought to have been built on the ruins of an ancient town called Corythus, and is known by that appellation in Virgil. (Æn., 3, 170.—Id. ibid., 7, 209; 9, 10; 10, 719.—Compare Silius Italicus, 5, 123.) From the similarity of names, it was supposed by some to owe its origin to Corythus, the father of Dardanus. Others deduced the name from the circumstance of Dardanus having lost his helmet (κόρυς) there in fighting. Both, however, are pronounced by Heyne to be mere fables. (Heyne, Excurs., 6, ad Æn., 3.) Perhaps the opinion most entitled to credit is that of Mannert, who makes the place to have been of Pelasgic origin. This, in fact, is strongly corroborated by the massy remains of the ancient walls, evidently of Pelasgic structure. Dionysius of Halicarnassus, moreover, who quotes from Hellanicus of Lesbos, an author somewhat anterior to Hesiod, states that the Pelasgi, who had landed at Spina on the Po, subsequently advanced into the interior of Italy, and occupied Cortona, which they fortified, and from thence formed other settlements in Tyrrenia. On this account Cortona is styled the metropolis of that province. (Steph. Byz., s. v.—Compare Sil. Ital., 7, 174.) Cortona was one of the twelve cities of Etruria. (Müller, Etrusker, vol. 1, p. 345.) The Greek name of the place was Gortyn (Γόρτυν), and the Etrurian one Kortun, from which the Romans made Cortona. (Müller, Etrusker, vol. 2, p. 268.) The city still retains its ancient appellation of Cortona. It was colonized by the Romans (Dionys., 1, 26), at what period is uncertain; probably in the time of Sylla, who colonized several towns of Etruria. Cramer thinks, that some confusion of names must have given rise to the story of Dardanus coming from Italy to Troy, as alluded to by Virgil (Æn., 7, 205). It is known that there were several towns in antiquity of the name of Gyrtun, Gyrtone, and Gortyna, in Thessaly, Bœotia, Arcadia, and Crete; countries all more or less frequented at one time by the Pelasgi. This, he thinks, was the original form by which Cortona was first named; for Polybius calls it Cyrtone (3, 82), and it is known that the Etruscans and Umbri, who took their letters from the Pelasgi, never used the letter O. Now, according to some accounts, Dardanus came from Arcadia, and according to others, from Crete. Cramer suspects, however, that the Thessalian Gyrtun ought to have the preference; for this city, in a passage of Strabo, though it is supposed to be mutilated, is entitled the Tyrrenian (Strab., 330), and this might prove the key to the Italian origin of Dardanus, besides confirming the identity of the Tyrrheni with the Thessalian Pelasgi. (Cramer's Anc. Italy, vol. 1, p. 215, not.)

CORVINUS, I. or CORVUS, a name given to M. Valerius, from his having been assisted by a crow (corvus) while engaged in combat with a Gaul. (Vid. Valerius).—II. Messala, a distinguished Roman in the Augustan age. (Vid. Messala.)

CORYBANTES, the priests of Cybele, called also Galli. (Vid. Cybele.) In celebrating the festivals of the goddess, they ran about with loud cries and howlings, beating on timbrels, clashing cymbals, sounding pipes, and cutting their flesh with knives. Some derive the name from their moving along in a kind of dance, and tossing the head to and fro (ἀπὸ τοῦ κορυπτόντας βαίνειν). According to Strabo (479), and Freret (Mem. de l'Acad. des. Inser., &c., vol. 18, p. 34), the word Corybas is a Phrygian one, and refers to the wild dances in which the Corybantes indulged.—As regards the assertion commonly made, that the Corybantes were originally from Mount Ida, it may be remarked, that more correct authorities make Phrygia to have been their native seat. (Compare Rolle, Recherches sur le Culte de Bacchus, vol. 1, p. 246, seqq.)—The dance of the Corybantes is thought to have been symbolical of the empire exercised by man over metals, as also of the movements of the heavenly bodies. (Constant, de la Religion, vol. 2, p. 375, seqq.) The Corybantes are said to have been the first that turned their attention to metallurgy. (Sainte Croix, Mystères du Paganisme, vol. 1, p. 79.)

CORYBAS, son of Iasion and Cybele, who introduced the rites of the mother of the gods into Phrygia, from the island of Samothrace. (Diod. Sic., 5, 49.)

CORYCIONS, a name applied to the nymphs who were supposed to inhabit the Corycian cave on Mount Parnassus. They were the daughters of the river-god Pleistus. (Ovid, Met., 1, 320.—Apoll. Rh., 2, 711.—Gierig, ad Ovid, l. c.)

CORYCIUM ANTRUM, I. a cave or grotto on Mount Parnassus, about two hours from Delphi, and higher up the mountain. It is accurately described by Pausanias, who states, that it surpassed in extent every other known cavern, and that it was possible to advance into the interior without a torch. The roof, from which an abundance of water trickles, is elevated far above the floor, and vestiges of the dripping water (i. e., stalactites) are to be seen attached to it, says Pausanias, along the whole extent of the cave. The inhabitants of Parnassus, he adds, consider it as sacred to the Corycian nymphs and the god Pan. (Pausan., 10, 32.—Compare Strabo, 417.) Herodotus relates (8, 36), that on the approach of the Persians, the greater part of the population of Delphi ascended the mountain, and sought refuge in this capacious recess. We are indebted for an account of the present state of this remarkable cave to Mr. Raikes, who was the first modern traveller that discovered its site. He describes the narrow and low entrance as spreading at once into a chamber 330 feet long by nearly 200 wide. The stalactites from the top hung in the most graceful forms the whole length of the roof, and fell like drapery down the sides. (Raikes's Journal, in Walpole's Collection, vol. 1, p. 312.)—II. A cave in Cilicia, near Coryceus. (Vid. Coryceus, II.)

CORYCUS, I. a promontory of Ionia, southeast of the southern extremity of Chios. The high and rugged coast in this quarter harboured at one time a wild and daring population, greatly addicted to piracy; and who, by disguising themselves, and frequenting the harbours in their vicinity, obtained private information of the course and freight of any merchant vessel, and concerted measures for the purpose of intercepting it. The secrecy with which their intelligence was procured gave rise to the proverb, Τοῦ δ' ἄρ' ὁ Κωρυκαῖος ἡκροῦζετο, "This, then, the Corycean overheard," a saying that was used in cases where any carefully-guarded secret had been discovered. (Compare Erasmus, Chil. 1, cent. 2, col. 76.) The modern name of the ridge of Mount Coryceus is the Table Mountain, but the ancient appellation is still preserved in that of Kourko, which belongs to a bold headland forming the extreme point of the Erythrean peninsula towards Samos. Pliny (5, 31) calls it Corycean Promontorium. (Cramer's Asia Minor, vol. 1, p. 351.)—II. A small town of Cilicia Trachea, near the confines of Cilicia Campestris, on the seacoast, and to the east of Seleucia Trachea. It appears to have been a fortress of great strength, and a mole of vast unhewn rocks is carried across the bay for about a hundred yards. It served at one time as the harbour of Seleucia, and was then a place of considerable importance. The modern name is Korghoz. About twenty stadia inland was the Corycian cave, celebrated in mythology as the fabled abode of the giant Typhæus. (Pind., Pyth., 1, 31.—Id. ib., 8, 20.—Æschyl., P. v., 350, seqq.) In fact, many writers, as Strabo reports, placed Arima or Arimi, the scene of Typhæus's torments, alluded to by Homer, in Cilicia, while others sought it in Lydia, and others in Campania. The description which Strabo has left us of this remarkable spot leads to the idea of its having been once the crater of a volcano. He says it was a deep and broad valley, of a circular shape, surrounded on every side by lofty rocks. The lower part of this crater was rugged and stony, but covered nevertheless with shrubs and evergreens, and especially saffron, of which it produced a great quantity, regarded as the best of all antiquity. There was also a cavity from which gushed a copious stream, which, after a short course, was again lost, and reappeared near the sea, which it joined. It was called the "bitter water." (Strab., 671.) The account of Pomponius Mela is still more minute and elaborate. (Mela, 1, 13.—Cramer's Asia Minor, vol. 2, p. 336.)—III. A naval station, on the coast of Lycia, about thirty stadia to the north of Olympus. Strabo makes it a tract of shore (Κόρυκος αἰγιαλός.—Strab., 666).

CORYPHASIUM, a promontory on the western coast of Messenia, north of Methone, now Cape Zouchio. There was a town of the same name on it, to which the inhabitants of Pylos retired after their town was destroyed. (Pausan., 4, 36.)

Cos, an island of the Ægean, one of the Sporades, west of the promontory of Doris. Its more ancient names were Cea, Staphylus, Nymphæa, and Meropis, of which the last was the most common. (Thucyd., 8, 41.) The colonizing of this island must have taken place at a very early date, since Homer makes mention of it as a populous settlement. (Il., 2, 184, 14, 255.) The inhabitants were of Dorian origin, and closely connected with the Doric colonies on the main land. It is now called Stan-Co. Its chief city was Cos, anciently called Astypalæa. Strabo remarks, that the city of Cos was not large, but very populous, and seen to great advantage by those who came thither by sea. Without the walls was a celebrated temple of Æsculapius, enriched with many admirable works of art, and, among others, two famous paintings of Apelles, the Antigonos and Venus Anadyomene. The latter painting was so much admired that Augustus removed it to Rome, and consecrated it to Julius Cæsar; and in consideration of the loss thus inflicted on the Coans, he is said to have remitted a tribute of one hundred talents which had been laid on them. Besides the great painter just mentioned, Cos could boast of ranking among her sons the first physician of antiquity, Hippocrates. The soil of the land was very productive, especially in wine, which vied with those of Chios and Lesbos. It was also celebrated for its purple dye, and for its manufacture of a species of transparent silk stuff, against the use of which by the Romans Juvenal in particular so strongly inveighs. The modern island presents to the view fine plantations of lemon-trees, intermixed with stately maples. (For a more particular account of it, consult Turner's Tour in the Levant, vol. 3, p. 41, seqq.—Cramer's Asia Minor, vol. 2, p. 220.)

COSSA, I. (or COSSÆ), a town of Etruria, near the coast, on the promontory of Mount Argentarius, northwest of Centum Cellæ. It was situated at a little distance from the modern Ansedonia, which is now itself in ruins. For a plan of this ancient city, consult Micali, L'Italia, &c., tav. 10, who gives also a representation of parts of its walls built of polygonal stones. (Compare Micali, Storia degli Antichi Popoli Italiani, tav. 4.) According to him, this is the only specimen of such construction to be found in Etruria. From Pliny (3, 5), we learn that Cossa was founded by the people of Volci, an Etruscan city, and Virgil has named it in the catalogue of the forces sent by Etruria to the aid of Æneas. (Æn., 10, 167.) Cosa became a Roman colony A.U.C. 480. (Vell. Patere., 1, 14.—Liv., Epit., 14.—Cramer's Anc. Italy, vol. 1, p. 195.)—II. A city of Lucania, in Italy, near the sources of the river Cylistamus. (Steph. Byz., s. v. Κόστα.) Cæsar, who calls it Cosa, states that Titus Annius Milo was slain before its walls when besieging the place in Pompey's cause. (Bell. Civ., 3, 22.) Cluverius was nearly correct in his supposition, that Cassano might occupy the site of this ancient town (Ital. Ant., vol. 2, p. 1205), for more modern topographers have in fact discovered its ruins at Civita, a village close to the former place. (Anton., Lucan. p. 3, disc. 1.—Romanelli, vol. 1, p. 240.—Cramer's Ancient Italy, vol. 2, p. 354.)

Cossus, I. a surname of the familia Maluginensis, a branch of the gens Cornelia.—II. Aulus Cornelius, a Roman, and military tribune, who slew in battle with his own hands Jar Tolumnius, king of the Veientes, for which he offered up the Spolia Opima to Jupiter Feretrius, being the only one who had done this since the time of Romulus. (Liv., 4, 20; where consult the discussion into which Livy enters on this subject, and also the note of Crevier.)

CORES, a promontory of Mauritania, now Cape Es-partel. The form in Greek is generally given as plural, αἱ Κώριες. Ptolemy, however, has the singular, Κώρις ἄκρον. The name is Punic, and signified "a vine;" and hence the Greeks sometimes translated the term by Ampelusia. (Mela, 1, 5.—Mannert, Geogr., vol. 10, pt. 2, p. 465.)

CORTHON, a name given to a small but elevated island in the inner harbour of Carthage, commanding a view of the sea, and on which the Carthaginian admiral resided. Around the whole island numerous ships of war were laid up under cover of spacious halls or arsenals, with all the necessary stores for fitting them out at the shortest notice. (Appian, Pun., 96.—Strabo, 572.) The term appears to indicate a harbour made by art and human labour; and hence Festus states that artificial harbours were called Corthones. (Fest., s. v. Catonnes, with the emendation of Scaliger.) The word appears to be derived from the Punic (Hebrew) Kēton, with its primary reference to cutting, lopping off, &c. (Gesenius, Phœn. Mon., p. 422.)

CORTISO, a king of the Daci, whose army invaded Pannonia, and was defeated by Corn. Lentulus, the lieutenant of Augustus. (Sueton., Aug., 21.—Florus, 4, 12.—Horat., Od., 3, 8, 18.)

CORRA, I. Caius Aurelius, a celebrated Roman orator, of the school of Crassus, and who flourished about A.U.C. 661. He failed, observes Cicero, in his pursuit of the tribuneship by the envious opposition which he encountered. Being accused before the people, he spoke with great force against the violent and unjust mode in which the equites dispensed justice, and then went into voluntary exile, without waiting for his condemnation. This happened in the stormy times of Marius and Sylla. He was recalled by the latter. When consul in 677, Cotta had a law passed, which gave the tribunes of the commons the right of holding other offices, of which they had been deprived by Sylla.—II. L. Aurelius, flourished at the Roman bar when Cicero was yet a young man, and the latter states that none kindled in him more emulation than Hortensius and Cotta. The eloquence of this individual was calm and flowing, and his diction elegant and correct. He was elevated to the consulship in 687 A.U.C., and in the year following to the censorship. In the debate respecting the recall of Cicero, Cotta, who was first called upon for his opinion, distinguished himself for the manly frankness with which he censured the proceedings against Cicero. (Cic., de Div., 2, 21.—Ep. ad Att., 12, 23 &c.)—III. M. Aurelius, a Roman commander in the Mithradatic war, sent by the senate to guard the Propontis and to protect Bithynia. His eagerness to engage in battle with Mithradates before Lucullus came up, led to his defeat by both sea and land, after which he was shut up in Chalcedon until relieved by Lucullus. (Plut., Vit. Lucull.)—IV. L. Aurunculeus, a lieutenant of Cæsar's in Gaul, cut off along with Titurius by the Eburones. (Cæs., B. G., 5, 26, seqq.)

COTTIÆ ALPES, now Mont St. Genèvre, generally, though erroneously, supposed to be the place where Hannibal crossed into Italy. (Vid. Alpes.) They took their name from Cottius. (Vid. Cottius.)

COTTIUS, a chieftain, who held a kind of sovereignty over several valleys among the Alps. It appears to have been hereditary, as we also hear of King Donnus, his father. (Œvid, Ep. Pont., 4, 7.) Cottius is represented as lurking in the fastnesses of his Alps, and even defying the power of Rome, till Augustus thought it worth while to conciliate him with the title of prefect. (Dio Cassius, 9, 24.—Amm. Marcell., 15, 10.) Claudius, however, restored to him the title of king. Under Nero, the Cottian Alps became a Roman province. (Suet., Ner., 18.) The extent of the territory which Cottius possessed cannot now be easily defined; for though all the people which composed his dominions are enumerated in the inscription of the arch at Susa, many of them remain unknown, notwithstanding great pains have been taken to identify their situation. (Consult Millen, Voyage en Italie, vol. 1, p. 105.) Enough, however, is known of them to make it appear, that the territory of Cottius extended much farther on the side of Gaul than of Italy. In Gaul, he seems to have held under him all the eastern part of Dauphiné, and the northeastern portion of Provence. (Compare D'Anville, Not. de l'Anc. Gaule, art. Caturiges, Savinates, Esubiani, &c.)

COTTUS, a giant, son of Cælus and Terra, who had one hundred hands and fifty heads. (Hesiod, Theog., 149.) His brothers were Gyes (Γύγης, the form Γύγης is less correct: Götting, ad loc.) and Briareos. The most recent expounders of mythology consider these three as mere personifications, relating to the winter season. Thus Cottus (Κόττος, from κόπρω, "to smite") is the Smiter, and is an epithet for the hail: Gyes (Γύγης, the part of the plough to which the share is fixed), is the Furrower, or the ram: and Briareos (Βριάρεος, akin to βριάω, βριαρός, βριθώ, βριθός, all denoting weight and strength) is the Presser, the snow which lies deep and heavy on the ground. They were naturally named Hundred-handed (ἐκατόχρῃστες, centumani), from their acting so extensively at the same moment of time. (Hermann, über das Wesen, &c., p. 84.)—Welcker understands by the Hundred-handed the water. (Welck, Tril., 147.—Keightley's Mythology, p. 46.)

COTYÆUM, a town of Phrygia, south of Dorylaeum, on the Thymbrius, a branch of the Sangarius. Suidas says, that, according to some accounts, it was the birthplace of Æsop the fabulist. Alexander, a grammarian of great learning, and a voluminous writer, was also a native of Cotyæum. Late Byzantine writers term it the metropolis of Phrygia. (M. Duc., p. 7, a.) Kutaya or Kulaich, a Turkish town of about eight thousand souls, has succeeded to the ancient Cotiaum. The name of this is sometimes given as Cotyæum, which, judging from ancient coins, is the more correct mode of writing it, the legend being always ΚΟΤΙΑΕΙΣΝ. (Sestini, p. 121.—Rasche, Lex Rei. Num., vol. 3, col. 1052.—Cramer's Asia Minor, vol. 2, p. 17.)

COTVS, a name borne by several kings of Thrace, and also by some other princes.—I. A king of Thrace, contemporary with Philip, father of Alexander. He was a very active and inveterate foe to the Athenians, and did them considerable mischief in the Chersonese. Cotsys was assassinated by Python and Heracles, who received each from the Athenians, as a recompense for the deed, the rights of citizenship and a golden crown. (Demosth., contra Aristocr.—Aristot., Polit., 5, 10.—Palmer., ad Demosth., contr. Arist., 30.)—II. A king of Thrace, who sent his son Sadales, at the head of five hundred horse, to the aid of Pompey, in his contest with Cæsar. (Cæs., Bell. Civ., 3, 4.—Compare Lucan, 5, 54, and Curtius, ad loc.)—III. A king of Thrace in the time of Augustus, slain by his uncle Rhescuporis, B.C. 15. He was a prince of a literary turn, and Ovid addressed to him one of his epistles from the Euxine (Ep. ex Ponto, 2, 9.—Tacit., Ann., 2, 66, &c.)—IV. Son of Manes, succeeded his father on the throne of Lydia. (Herod., 4, 45.—Consult Ritter, Vorhalle, p. 365)—V. A king of the Odrææ, in Thrace, who favoured the interests of Perses against the Romans. (Liv., 42, 29.)

COTYTTO, or COTYS, a goddess worshipped by the Thracians, and apparently identical with the Phrygian Cybele. Her worship was introduced at Athens and Corinth, where it was celebrated, in private, with great indecency and licentiousness. The priests of the goddess were called Bapteæ. A full account of all that the ancients have left us in relation to this deity, may be found in Buttmann (Mythologus, vol. 2, c. 19, p. 159, seqq., "Ueber die Korymbia und die Bapte") and in Lobeck (Aglaophamus, p. 1007, seqq.—Epimætrum xi, ad. c. 8.)

CRAGUS, I. a chain of mountains running along the coast of Lycia. It rises precipitously from the sea, and, from the number of detached summits which it offers to the spectator in that direction, it has not unaptly been called by the Turks Yedi Bouroun, or the Seven Capes. Strabo, however, assigns to it eight summits. (Strab., 665.) This same writer also places in the range of Cragus the famed Chimæra. (Vid. Chimæra.) Seclax calls Cragus, however, a promontory, and makes it the separation of Lycia and Caria (p. 39.—Compare Plin., 5, 28.)—II. A town of Lycia, in the vicinity of the mountain-ranges of the same name. (Strab., 665.) The authority of Strabo is confirmed by coins. (Sestini, p. 92.—Cramer's Asia Minor, vol. 2, 245, seqq.)

CRANÆI, a surname of the Athenians, from their King Cranaus. (Vid. Cranaus.)

CRANÆUS, the successor of Cecrops on the throne of Attica. He married Pedias, and the offspring of their union was Athis. (Consult remarks under the article Cecrops.)

CRANÏ, a town of Cephallenia, situate, according to Strabo, in the same gulf with Pale. (Strab., 456.—Thucyd., 2, 34.—Liv., 38, 28.) The Athenians established the Messenians here, upon the abandonment of Pylos by the latter, when that fortress was restored to the Lacedæmonians. (Thucyd., 5, 35.) Dr. Holland says, "this city stood on an eminence at the upper end of the bay of Argostoli; and its walls may yet be traced nearly in their whole circumference," which he conceives to be nearly two miles. The structure is that usually called Cyclopiæan. (Vol. 1, p. 55.—Dodwell, vol. 1, p. 75.)

CRANON and CRANNON, a city of Thessaly, on the river Onchestus, southeast of Pharsalus. Near it was a fountain, the water of which warmed wine when mixed with it, and the heat remained for two or three days. (Athenæus, 2, 16.)

CRANTOR, a philosopher of Soli, among the pupils of Plato, B.C. 310. He was the first who wrote commentaries on the works of Plato. Crantor was highly celebrated for the purity of his moral doctrine, as may be inferred from the praises bestowed by the ancients, especially by Cicero, upon his discourse "on grief." Horace also (Ep., 1, 2, 3) alludes to his high reputation as a moral instructor. (Enfield's History of Philosophy, vol. 1, p. 248, seqq.)

CRASSUS, I. Lucius Licinius, a Roman orator and man of consular rank. In A.U.C. 633, being only twenty-one years of age, he made his debut in the Forum, in a prosecution against C. Carbo. Cicero says, that he was remarkable, even at this early period, for his candour and his great love of justice. Crassus was but twenty-seven years old when his eloquence obtained the acquittal of his relation, the vestal Licinia. Being elevated to the consulship in 657, he was the author of a law, by which numbers of the allies, who passed for Roman citizens, were sent back to their respective cities. This law alienated from him the affections of the principal Italians, so that he was regarded by some as the primary cause of the social war, which broke out three years after. Having Hither Gaul for his province, Crassus freed the country from the robbers that infested it, and for this service had the weakness to claim a triumph. The senate were favourable to his application; but Scævola, the other consul, opposed it, on the ground that he had not conquered foes worthy of the Roman people. Crassus conducted himself, in other respects, with great wisdom in his government, and not only did not remove from around him the son of Carbo, who had come as a spy on his conduct, but even placed him by his side on the tribunal, and did nothing of which the other was not a witness. Being appointed censor in 659, he caused the school of the Latin rhetoricians to be closed, regarding them as dangerous innovators for the young. Crassus left hardly any orations behind him; and he died while Cicero was yet in his boyhood: but still that author, having collected the opinions of those who had heard him, speaks with a minute, and apparently perfect, intelligence of his style of oratory. He was what may be called the most ornamental speaker that had hitherto appeared in the Forum. Though not without force, gravity, and dignity, these were happily blended with the most insinuating politeness, urbanity, ease, and gayety. He was master of the most pure and accurate language, and of perfect elegance of expression, without any affectation, or unpleasant appearance of previous study. Great clearness of language distinguished all his harangues; and, while descanting on topics of law or equity, he possessed an inexhaustible fund of argument and illustration. Some persons considered Crassus as only equal to Antonius, his great contemporary; others preferred him as the more perfect and accomplished orator. The language of Crassus was indisputably preferable to that of Antonius; but the action and gesture of the latter were as incontestably superior to those of Crassus. As a public speaker Crassus was remarkable for his diffidence in the opening of a speech, a diffidence which never forsook him; and, after the practice of a long life at the bar, he was frequently so much agitated in the exordium of a discourse, as to grow pale and tremble in every joint of his frame. The most splendid of all the efforts of Crassus was the immediate cause of his death, which happened A.U.C. 662, a short while before the commencement of the civil wars of Marius and Sylla, and a few days after the time in which he is supposed to have borne his part in the dialogue "De Oratore." The consul Philippus had declared, in one of the assemblies of the people, that some other advice must be resorted to, since, with such a senate as then existed, he could no longer direct the affairs of the government. A full senate being immediately summoned, Crassus arraigned, in terms of the most glowing eloquence, the conduct of the consul, who, instead of acting as the political parent and guardian of the senate, sought to deprive its members of their ancient inheritance of respect and dignity. Being farther irritated by an attempt, on the part of Philippus, to force him into compliance with his designs, he exerted, on this occasion, the utmost effort of his genius and strength; but he returned home with a pleuritic fever, of which he died seven days after. This oration of Crassus, followed, as it was, by his almost immediate death, made a deep impression on his countrymen; who, long afterward, were wont to repair to the senate-house for the purpose of viewing the spot where he had last stood, and where he fell, as it may be said, in defence of the privileges of his order. (Dunlop's Rom. Lit., vol. 2, p. 215, seqq.)—II. Marcus, was prætor A.U.C. 648. (Cic. de Fin., 5, 30.) He was surnamed by his friends Agellastus (Ἀγέλαστος), because, according to Pliny (7, 19), he never laughed during the whole course of his life; or because, according to Lucilius, he laughed but once. (Cic. de Fin., 5, 30.)—III. Marcus Licinius, surnamed the Rich, grandson of the preceding, and the most opulent Roman of his day, was of a patrician family, and the son of a man of consular rank. His father and brother perished by the proscriptions of Marius and Cinna while he was still quite young, and, to avoid a similar fate, he took refuge in Spain until the death of Cinna, when he returned to Italy and served under Sylla. Crassus proved very serviceable to this commander in the decisive battle that was fought near Rome; but afterward, making the most unjust and rapacious use of Sylla's proscriptions, that leader, according to Plutarch, gave him up, and never employed him again in any public affair. The glory which was then beginning to attend upon Pompey, though still young and only a simple member of the equestrian order, excited the jealousy of Crassus, and, despairing of rising to an equality with him in warlike operations, he betook himself to public affairs at home, and, by paying court to the people, defending the impeached, lending money, and aiding those who were candidates for office, he attained to an influence almost equal to that which Pompey had acquired by his military achievements. It was at the bar, in particular, that Crassus rendered himself extremely popular. He was not, it would seem, a very eloquent speaker, yet by care and application he eventually exceeded those whom nature had more highly favoured. When Pompey, and Cæsar, and Cicero declined speaking in behalf of any individual, he often arose, and advocated the cause of the accused. Besides this promptness to aid the unfortunate, his courteous and conciliating deportment acquired for him many friends, and made him very popular with the lower orders. There was not a Roman, however humble, whom he did not salute, or whose salutation he did not return by name. The great defect, however, in the character of Crassus, was his inordinate fondness for wealth; and, although he could not strictly be called an avaricious man, since he is said to have lent money to his friends without demanding interest, yet he allowed the love of riches to exercise a paramount sway over his actions, and it proved at last the cause of his unhappy end. Plutarch informs us, that his estate at first did not exceed three hundred talents, but that afterward it amounted to the enormous sum of seven thousand one hundred talents (nearly $7,500,000). The means by which he attained to this are enumerated by the same writer, and some of them are singular enough. Observing, says Plutarch, how liable the city was to fires, he made it his business to buy houses that were on fire and others that joined upon them; and he commonly got them at a low price, on account of the fear and distress of the owners about the result. A band of his slaves thereupon, regularly organized for the purpose, exerted themselves to extinguish the flames, and, after this was done, rebuilt what had been destroyed, and in this way Crassus gradually became the owner of a large portion of Rome. He gained large sums also by educating and then selling slaves. Plutarch, in fact, regards this as his principal source of revenue. With all this eager grasping after wealth, however, Crassus appears to have been no mean soldier, even though he displayed so few of the qualities of a commander in his Parthian campaign. Created prætor A.U.C. 680, he was sent to terminate the war with Spartacus. He accordingly met, defeated him in several encounters, and at last bringing him to a decisive action, ended the war by a single blow, Spartacus and forty thousand of his followers being left on the field. Not venturing to demand a triumph for a victory over gladiators and slaves, he contented himself with an ovation. In 682 Crassus obtained the consulship, having Pompey for his colleague. At a subsequent period we find him implicated by an informer in the conspiracy of Catiline, but acquitted by acclamation the moment the charge was heard by the senate. We now come to the closing scene in the career of Crassus. When Cæsar, on returning from his government to solicit the consulship, found Pompey and Crassus at variance (which had been the case also during almost all the time that they were colleagues in the consular office), and perceived, that, for the furtherance of his own ambitious views, the aid of these two individuals would be needed by him for opposing the influence of the senate, as well as that of Cicero, Cato, and Catulus, he managed to reconcile them, and soon, in conjunction with both of them, formed the well-known league usually styled the First Triumvirate, which proved so fatal to the liberties of the Roman people. By the terms of this compact Crassus obtained the government of Syria. In the law that was passed relative to this government of Crassus, no mention was indeed made of any war in its neighbourhood; still every one knew that he had connected with it an immediate invasion of Parthia. Plutarch even states, that he had fixed upon neither Syria nor Parthia as the limits of his expected good fortune, but intended to penetrate even to Bactria, India, and the shores of the Eastern Ocean. The only motive to this memorable and unfortunate undertaking was the rapacious love of wealth. It was not, however, without considerable opposition from the people and the tribunes that Crassus was allowed to proceed on this expedition. All the influence of Pompey was necessary to prevent an expression of popular wrath, for no good was expected to result from hostilities against a people who had done the Romans no injury, and who were, in fact, their allies. When Crassus, moreover, had reached the gate of the city, the tribune Ateius attempted to stop him by force; but, failing in this, he immediately proceeded to perform a religious ceremony of the most appalling nature, by which he devoted the commander himself, and all who should follow him on that service, to the wrath of the infernal gods and a speedy destruction. Undismayed, however, by either denunciations or omens (vid. Caenus), Crassus, embarking at Brundisium, proceeded into Asia by Macedonia and the Hellespont. As the enemy were not prepared for this unprovoked invasion, the Romans met with no resistance. At first Crassus overran the greater part of Mesopotamia; and, had he taken advantage of the consternation into which his sudden appearance had thrown the Parthians, he might, with the greatest ease, have extended his conquest to Babylonia itself. But the season being far advanced, he did not think it expedient to proceed. On the contrary, having left in the different towns and strongholds a detachment of 7000 foot and 1000 horse, he returned into Syria, and took up his winter quarters in that province. This retrograde movement was a fatal error. His occupations, too, during the winter were highly censurable, having more of the trader in them than the general. Instead of improving the discipline of the soldiers, and keeping them in proper exercise, he spent his time in making inquiry relative to the revenues of the cities, and in weighing the treasures which he found in the temple of Hierapolis. In the spring the Roman commander took the field, on the frontiers of Syria, with seven legions, four thousand horse, and an equal number of light or irregular troops. With this force he again passed the Euphrates, when he was joined by an Arabian chief, whom Plutarch calls Ariamnes, but who is elsewhere named Acbarus or Abgarus; and in this barbarian, owing to his knowledge of the country, and his warm and frequent expressions of attachment to the Romans, Crassus unfortunately placed the utmost confidence. The result may easily be foreseen. Crassus intended to have followed the course of the Euphrates till he should reach the point where it approaches nearest to Seleucia and Ctesiphon, the capital of the Parthian empire; but, being dissuaded from this by his crafty guide, and directing his march across the plains, he was led at last into a sandy desert, where his army was attacked by the Parthian forces under Surena. An unequal conflict ensued. The son of Crassus, sent with a detachment of Gallic horse to repel the Parthian cavalry, lost his life after the most heroic exertions; and his loss was first made known to his father by the barbarians carrying his head on a spear. Crassus himself, not long after, being compelled by his own troops to meet Surena in a conference, was treacherously slain by the barbarians, and his head and right hand sent to the Parthian king, Orodes. The whole loss of the Romans in this disastrous campaign was 20,000 killed and 10,000 taken prisoners. (Plut., Vit. Crass.—Dio Cass., 40, 13, seqq.—Appian, Bell. Parth.)

CRATER, or SINUS CRATER, the ancient name of the Gulf of Naples, given to it from its resembling the mouth of a large bowl or mixer (κρατήρ). It is about twelve miles in diameter.

CRATÉRUS, one of Alexander's generals, distinguished for both literary and warlike acquirements. He was held in high esteem by Alexander, whose confidence he obtained by the frankness of his character; and the monarch used to say, "Hephæstion loves Alexander, but Craterus the king." After the death of Alexander, he was associated with Antipater, in the care of the hereditary states. He afterward crossed over into Asia along with Antipater, in order to contend against Eumenes, but was defeated by the latter, and lost his life in the battle. (Nep., Vit. Eum., 2.—Justin, 13, 6, &c.)

CRATES. I. a philosopher of Bœotia, son of Ascandus, and disciple of Diogenes the Cynic, B.C. 324. He is considered as the most distinguished philosopher of the Cynic sect, after Diogenes. In his natural temper, however, he differed from his master, and, instead of being morose and gloomy, was cheerful and facetious. Hence he obtained access to many families of the most wealthy Athenians, and became so highly esteemed, that he frequently acted as an arbiter of disputes and quarrels among relations. He was honourably descended, and inherited large estates; but when he turned his attention to philosophy, he sold them, and distributed the money among the poorer citizens. He adopted all the singularities of the Cynic sect. His wife Hipparchia, who was rich and of a good family, and had many suitors, preferred Crates to every other, and, when her parents opposed her inclinations, so determined was her passion that she threatened to put an end to her life. Crates, at the request of her parents, represented to Hipparchia every circumstance in his condition and manner of living which might induce her to change her mind. Still she persisted in her resolution, and not only became the wife of Crates, but adopted all the peculiarities of the Cynic profession. (Enfield's History of Philosophy, vol. 1, p. 313.)—II. A philosopher of Athens, who succeeded in the school of his master Polemon. Crates and Polemon had long been attached to each other from a similarity of dispositions and pursuits. While they lived, their friendship continued inviolate, and they were both buried in the same grave. (Diog. Laert., 4, 21.)—III. An Athenian, originally an actor, and who in that capacity performed the principal part in the plays of Cratinus. He could not, however, have followed this profession very long, for we learn from Eusebius that he was well known as a comic writer in 450 B.C., which was not long after Cratinus began to exhibit. Crates, according to Aristotle (Poet., 4, 6), was the first Athenian poet who abandoned the iambic or satiric form of comedy, and made use of general stories or fables. Perhaps the law, passed B.C. 440, restraining the violence and license of comedy, might have some share in giving his plays this less offensive turn. His style is said to have been gay and facetious; yet the few fragments of his writings which remain are of a serious cast; such are, for example, his reflections on poverty, and his beautiful lines on old age. From the expressions of Aristophanes (Equit., 538), the comedies of Crates seem to have been marked by elegance of language and ingenious ideas. Yet, with all his endeavours to please his fastidious auditors, the poet had, in common with his rivals, to endure many contumelies and vexations. He nevertheless, with unwearied resolution, continued to compose and exhibit during a varied career of success and reverses. (Theatre of the Greeks, 2d ed., p. 170.)

CRATHIS, I. a river of Arcadia, rising in a mountain of the same name, and flowing through Achaia into the Sinus Corinthiacus, to the west of Ægira. It was from this stream that the Italian Crathis, which flowed between Crotona and Sybaris, derived its appellation. (Herodot., 1, 146.—Strabo, 386.)—II. A river of Lucania, flowing into the Sinus Tarentinus, between Crotona and Sybaris. It is now the Crati. The ancients ascribed to this stream the property of turning white the hair of those who bathed in its waters, which were, however, accounted salutary for various disorders. (Strabo, 263.)

CRATINUS, an Athenian comic poet, born B.C. 519. It was not till late in life that he directed his attention to comic compositions. The first piece of his on record is the Ἀρχιζόχοι, which was represented about 448 B.C., at which time he was in his seventy-first year. In this play, according to Plutarch (Vit. Cim.), he makes mention of the celebrated Cimón, who had died the preceding year, B.C. 449, and from the language employed by the poet, it may be inferred that he was on terms of close intimacy with the Athenian general. Soon after this, comedy became so licentious and virulent in its personalities, that the magistracy were obliged to interfere. (Schol. in Aristoph., Acharn., 67.—Compare Clinton's Fasti Hellenici, B.C. 440 and 437.) A decree was passed, B.C. 440, prohibiting the exhibitions of comedy; which law continued in force only during that year and the two following, being repealed in the archonship of Euthymenes. Three victories of Cratinus stand recorded after the recommencement of comic performances. With the Χειμαίονες he was second, B.C. 425 (Argum. Acharn.), when the Ἀγάρεις of Aristophanes won the prize, and the third place was adjudged to the Νουμπία of Eupolis. In the succeeding year he was again second with the Σάρυροι, and Aristophanes again first with the Ἰππείς. (Argum. Equit.) In a parabasis of this play that young rival makes mention of Cratinus; where, having noticed his former successes, he insinuates, under the cloak of an equivocal piety, that the veteran was becoming doting and superannuated. The old man, now in his ninety-fifth year, indignant at this insidious attack, exerted his remaining vigour, and composed, against the contests of the approaching season, a comedy entitled Πυρίων, or The Flagon, which turned upon the accusations brought against him by Aristophanes. The aged dramatist had a complete triumph. (Argum. Nub.) He was first; while his humbled antagonist was vanquished also by Ameipsias with the Kóρρος, though the play of Aristophanes was his favourite Νεφέλαι. Notwithstanding his notorious intemperance, Cratinus lived to an extreme old age, dying B.C. 422, in his ninety-seventh year. (Lucian, Macrob., 25.) Aristophanes alludes to the excesses of Cratinus in a passage of the Equites (v. 526, seqq.). In the Pax (v. 700, seqq.), he humorously ascribes the jovial old poet's death to a shock on seeing a cask of wine staved and lost. Cratinus himself made no scruple of acknowledging his failing: (Ὅτι δὲ φίλοις οὐ Κρατίνος καὶ αὐτός ἐν τῇ Πυτρίῃ λέγει σαφές.—Schol. in Pac., 703). Horace, also, opens one of his epistles (1, 19) with a maxim of the comedian's, in due accordance with his practice. The titles of thirty-eight of the comedies of Cratinus have been collected by Meursius, Kœnig, &c. His style was bold and animated (Persius, 1, 123), and, like his younger brethren, Eupolis and Aristophanes, he fearlessly and unsparingly directed his satire against the iniquitous public officer and the profligate of private life. (Horat., Sat., 1, 4, 1, seqq.) Nor yet are we to suppose, that the comedies of Cratinus and his contemporaries contained nothing beyond broad jest or coarse invective and lampoon. They were, on the contrary, marked by elegance of expression and purity of language; elevated sometimes into philosophical dignity by the sentiments which they declared, and graced with many a passage of beautiful idea and high poetry: so that Quintilian deems the Old Comedy, after Homer, the most fitting and beneficial object of a young pleader's study. (Quint., 10, 1.—Theatre of the Greeks, 2d ed., p. 166, seqq.)

CRATIPPUS, a peripatetic philosopher of Mytilene, who, among others, taught Cicero's son at Athens. He first became acquainted with Cicero at Ephesus, whither he had gone for the purpose of paying his respects to him. Afterward, being aided by the orator, he obtained from Cæsar the rights of Roman citizenship. On coming to Athens, he was requested by the Arcopagus to settle there, and become an instructor of youth in the tenets of philosophy, a request with which he complied. He wrote on divination and on the interpretation of dreams. (Cic., Off., 1, 1.—Id., de Div., 1, 3.—Id., Ep. ad Fam., 12, 16.)

CRATYLUS, a Greek philosopher, and disciple of Heraclitus. According to Aristotle (Metaph., 1, 6), Plato attended his lectures in his youth. Diogenes Laertius, however (3, 8), says that this was after the death of Socrates. Cratylus is one of the interlocutors in the dialogue of Plato called after his name. (Compare Schleiermacher's Introduction to the Cratylus, Dobson's transl., p. 245.)

CRATAULIDEÆ, a nation who occupied at one period a part of the Cithræan plain. They are described by Æschines (in Ctes., p. 405) as very impious, and as having plundered some of the offerings of Delphi. They were exterminated by the Amphictyons. The name is erroneously given by some as Acragallide, and they are thought by Wolf, who adopts this lection, to have been a remnant of the army of Brennus. (Consult Taylor, ad Æsch., l. c.)

CREMERA, a small river of Tuscany, running between Veii and Rome, and celebrated for the daring but unfortunate enterprise of the gallant Fabii. (Ovid, Fast., 2, 193, seqq.) The Cremera is now called la Valca, a rivulet which rises in the neighbourhood of Baccano, and falls into the Tiber a little below Prima Porta. (Cramer's Anc. Italy, vol. 1, p. 239.)

CRENNA, I. a strong place in the interior of Pisidia, lying, according to Ptolemy, on the declivity of Taurus, nearly six miles north of Selgia. According to Strabo (569), it had been long looked upon as impregnable; but it was at length taken by the tetrarch Amyntas, with some other places, in his wars against the Pisidians. This fortress was considered afterward by the Romans to be of so much consequence, that they established a colony here. (Ptol., p. 124.—Herod., p. 681.—Zosim., 1, 60.) It is generally supposed, that this town is represented by the modern fort of Kebrinaz, occupying a commanding situation between Isbarth and the lake Egreder. (Cramer's Asia Minor, vol. 2, p. 300.)—II. A commercial place on the Palus Mæotis. Mannert supposes the name to be one of Greek origin, and to have reference to its rocky situation. He locates the place at the mouth of the Tanais, near the modern Taganrock. (Mannert, Geogr., vol. 4, p. 115.)

CREMŌNA, a city of Cisalpine Gaul, northeast of Placentia, and a little north of the Po. Cremona and Placentia were both settled by Roman colonies, A.U.C. 535. (Polyb., 3, 40.) After the defeat on the Trebia, we find the consul P. Scipio retiring to Cremona (Liv., 21, 56), and it appears that the Romans retained the place throughout the whole of the second Punic war, though it suffered so much during its continuance, and afterward from the attacks of the Gauls, that it was found necessary to recruit its population by a fresh supply of colonists. (Liv., 37, 46.) The colony, being thus renewed, continued to prosper for nearly a hundred and fifty years; when the civil wars, which ensued after the death of Cæsar, materially affected its interests. Cremona unfortunately espoused the cause of Brutus, and thus incurred the vengeance of the victorious party. The loss of its territory, which was divided among the veteran soldiers of Augustus, is well known from the line of Virgil (Eclog., 3, 28), "Mantua ræ misera nimium vicina Cremonæ," which is nearly repeated by Martial (8, 55), "Jugera perdidit misera vicina Cremona." The effect of this calamity would seem, however, to have been but temporary: and, in fact, we learn from Strabo (216), that Cremona was accounted in his time one of the most considerable towns in the north of Italy. The civil wars, which arose during the time of Otho and Vitellius, were the source of much severer affliction to this city than any former evil, as the fate of the empire was more than once decided between large contending armies in its immediate vicinity. After the defeat of Vitellius's party by the troops of Vespasian, it was entered by the latter, and exposed to all the horrors that fire, the sword, and the ungoverned passions of a licentious soldiery can inflict upon a city taken by storm. The conflagration of the place lasted four days. The indignation which this event excited throughout Italy seems to have been such, that Vespasian, afraid of the odium it might attach to his party, used every effort to raise Cremona from its ruins, by recalling the scattered inhabitants, reconstructing the public edifices, and granting the city fresh privileges. (Tacit., Hist., 3, 33 and 34.—Plin., 3, 19.—Ptol., p. 63.—Cramer's Ancient Italy, vol. 1, p. 66, seqq.)

CREMUTIUS CORNUS, an historian who wrote an account of the achievements of Augustus. He gave offence to Tiberius, and his prime minister Sejanus, by stating in his history that "Cassius was the last of the Romans." (Tacit., Ann., 4, 34.) Suetonius, however, makes him to have called both Cassius and Brutus by this title. (Sueton., Vit. Tib., 61.—Dic Cass., 57, 24.)

CREON, I. king of Corinth, and father of Creüsa or Glauce, the wife of Jason. (Vid. Creüsa and Medea).—II. The brother of Jocasta, mother and wife of Œdipus. (Vid. Œdipus.) He ascended the throne of Thebes after Eteocles and Polyneices had fallen in mutual combat, and gave orders that the body of the latter should be deprived of funeral rites, on which circumstance is founded the plot of the Antigone of Sophocles. (Vid. Eteocles, Polyneices, Antigone, &c.)

ΚΡΕΘΗΝΥΤΗΣ, a native of Samos, who composed, under the title of Οὐχάλιος ὕμνος, "The conquest of Æchalia," an epic poem commemorative of the exploits of Hercules. According to an ancient tradition, Homer himself was the author of this piece, and gave it to Creophylus as a return for the hospitable reception which he had received under his roof. (Strabo, 638.) In an epigram of Callimachus, however, Creophylus is named as the real author. (Strab., l. c.) It was among the descendants of Creophylus that Lycurgus found, according to Plutarch (Vit. Lycurg., 4), the Iliad and Odyssey. (Schöll, Hist. Lit. Gr., vol. 1, p. 166.)

CRESFONTES, a son of Aristomachus, who, with his brothers Temenus and Aristodemus, conquered the Peloponnesus. This was the famous conquest achieved by the Heraclidae. (Vid. Aristodemus and Heraclidae.)

CRESTONE, I. or Creston, a city of Thrace, the capital probably of the district of Crestonia. Dionysius of Halicarnassus, and most of the commentators and translators of Herodotus, confound this city with Cortona in Umbria. (Compare Müller, Etrusker, vol. 1, p. 95.—Larcher, Hist. d'Herodote.—Table Geogr., vol. 8, p. 149.) Herodotus speaks of Crestone as situated beyond the Tyrrenians, and inhabited by Pelasgi (1, 67), speaking a different language from their neighbours. Renard thinks that the reading Tyrrenians is a mistake, and that Thermaans should be substituted for it, as Therma, afterward Thessalonica, agrees with the situation mentioned by the historian. (Geography of Herodot., p. 45.) If, however, the text be correct as it stands, it shows that there was once a nation called Tyrrenians in Thrace. This is also confirmed by Thucydides (4, 109.—Compare the elaborate note of Larcher, ad Herodot., l. c.)—II. A district of Thrace, to the north of Anthemus and Bolbe, chiefly occupied by a remnant of Pelasgi. (Herodot., 1, 57.) We are informed by Herodotus, that the river Ethedorus took its rise in this territory; and also that the camels of the Persian army were here attacked by lions, which are only to be found in Europe, as he remarks, between the Nestus, a river of Thrace, and the Achelous (7, 124, and 127). Thucydides also mentions the Crestonians as a peculiar race, part of whom had fixed themselves near Mount Athos (4, 109). The district of Crestone is now known by the name of Caradagh. (Cramer's Anc. Greece, vol. 1, p. 240.)

CRETA, one of the largest islands of the Mediterranean Sea, at the south of all the Cyclades. Its name is derived by some from the Curetes, who are said to have been its first inhabitants; by others, from the nymph Crete, daughter of Hesperus; and by others, from Cres, a son of Jupiter, and the nymph Idæa. (Steph. Byz., s. v. Κρήνη.) It is also designated among the poets and mythological writers by the several appellations of Æria, Doliche, Idæa, and Telchinia. (Pliny, 4, 12.—Steph. Byz., s. v. Ἀερία.) According to Herodotus, this great island remained in the possession of various barbarous nations till the time of Minos, son of Europa, who, having expelled his brother Sarpedon, became the sole sovereign of the country (1, 173.—Compare Hoeck, Kreta, vol. 1, p. 141). These early inhabitants are generally supposed to be the Eteocretes of Homer, who clearly distinguishes them from the Grecian colonists subsequently settled there. (Od., 19, 172.) Strabo observes that the Eteocretes were considered as indigenous; and adds, that Staphylus, an ancient writer on the subject of Crete, placed them in the southern side of the island. (Strab., 475.) Other authors, who concur in this statement of the geographer, would lead us to establish a connexion between this primitive Cretan race and the Curetes, Dactyli, Telchines, and other ancient tribes, so often alluded to with reference to the mystic rites of Crete, Samothrace, and Phrygia. (Strab., 466.) Minos, according to the concurrent testimony of antiquity, first gave laws to the Cretans, and, having conquered the pirates who infested the Ægean Sea, established a powerful navy. (Herodot., 1, 171.—Id., 3, 122.—Thucyd., 1, 4, seqq.—Ephor., ap. Strab., 476.—Aristot., Polit., 2, 12.) In the Trojan war, Idomeneus, sovereign of Crete, led its forces to the war in eighty vessels, a number little inferior to that commanded by Agamemnon himself. According to the traditions which Virgil has followed, Idomeneus was afterward driven from his throne by faction, and compelled to sail to Iapygia, where he founded the town of Salernum. (Æn., 3, 121 and 399.) At this period the island appears to have been inhabited by a mixed population of Greeks and barbarians. Homer enumerates the former under the names of Achæi, Dorians, surnamed Trichaïces, and Pelasgi. The latter, who were the most ancient, are said to have come from Thessaly, under the conduct of Teutamus, posterior to the great Pelasgic emigration into Italy. (Andron., ap. Steph. Byz., s. v. Δόριον.) The Dorians are reported to have established themselves in Crete, under the command of Althamenes of Argos, after the death of Codrus and the foundation of Megara. (Strabo, 481.—Eusiat., ad Il., 2, 645.) After the Trojan war and the expulsion of Idomeneus, the principal cities of Crete formed themselves into several republics, for the most part independent, while others were connected by federal ties. These, though not exempted from the dissensions which so universally distracted the Greek republics, maintained for a long time a considerable degree of prosperity, owing to the good system of laws and education which had been so early instituted throughout the island by the decrees of Minos. The Cretan code was supposed by many of the best-informed writers of antiquity to have furnished Lycurgus with the model of his most salutary regulations. It was founded, according to Ephorus, as cited by Strabo (480), on the just basis of liberty and an equality of rights; and its great aim was to promote social harmony and peace by enforcing temperance and frugality. On this principle, the Cretan youths were divided into classes called Agelæ, and all met at the Andraia, or public meals. Like the Spartans, they were early trained to the use of arms, and inured to sustain the extremes of heat and cold, and undergo the severest exercise; they were also compelled to learn their letters and certain pieces of music. The chief magistrates, called Cosmi (Κόσμοι), were ten in number, and elected annually. The Gerontes constituted the council of the nation, and were selected from those who were thought worthy of holding the office of Cosmus (Κόσμος). There was also an equestrian order, who were bound to keep horses at their own expense. (Compare Aristot., Polit., 2, 7.—Polyb., 6, 46.) But though the Cretan laws resembled the Spartan institutions in so many important points, there were some striking features which distinguished the legislative enactments of the two countries. One of these was, that the Lacedæmonians were subject to a strict agrarian law, whereas the Cretans were under no restraint as to the accumulation of moneyed or landed property; another, that the Cretan republics were for the most part democratical, whereas the Spartan was decidedly aristocratical. Herodotus informs us, that the Cretans were deterred by the unfavourable response of the Pythian oracle from contributing forces to the Grecian armament assembled to resist the Persians (7, 169). In the Peloponnesian war, incidental mention is made of some Cretan cities as allied with Athens or Sparta; but the island does not appear to have espoused collectively the cause of either of the belligerent parties. (Thucyd., 2, 85.) The Cretan soldiers were held in great estimation as light troops and archers, and readily offered their services for hire to such states, whether Greek or barbarian, as needed them. (Thucyd., 7, 57.—Xen., Anab., 3, 3, 6.—Polyb., 4, 8.—Id., 5, 14)

In the time of Polybius the Cretans had much degenerated from their ancient character, for he charges them repeatedly with the grossest immorality and the most hateful vices. (Polyb., 4, 47.—Id. ibid., 53.—Id., 6, 46.) We know also with what severity they are reproved by St. Paul, in the words of one of their own poets, Epimenides (Ep. Tit., 1, 12), Κρήτες ἀεὶ φεύσονται, κακὰ θύπια, γαστέρες ἀργαί.—The Romans did not interfere with the affairs of Crete before the war with Antiochus, when Q. Fabius Labco crossed over into the island from Asia Minor, under pretence of claiming certain Roman captives who were detained there. (Liv., 37, 60.) Several years after, the island was invaded by a Roman army commanded by M. Antonius, under the pretence that the Cretans had secretly favoured the cause of Mithradates; but Florus more candidly avows, that the desire of conquest was the real motive which led to this attack (3, 7.—Compare Liv., Epit., 97). The enterprise, however, having failed, the subjugation of the island was not effected till some years later, by Metellus, who, from his success, obtained the agnomen of Creticus. (Liv., Epit., 99.—Appian, Excerpt. de Reb. Cret.—Flor., 3, 7.) It then became annexed to the Roman empire, and formed, together with Cyrenaica, one of its numerous provinces, being governed by the same procurator. (Dio Cassius, 53, 12.—Strabo, 1198.)—Crete forms an irregular parallelogram, of which the western side faces Sicily, while the eastern looks towards Egypt; on the north it is washed by the Mare Creticum, and on the south by the Libyan Sea, which intervenes between the island and the opposite coast of Cyrene. The whole circumference of Crete was estimated at 4100 stadia by Artemidorus; but Sossicrates, who wrote a very accurate description of it, did not compute the periphery at less than 5000 stadia. Hieronymus also, in reckoning the length alone at 2000 stadia, must have exceeded the number given by Artemidorus. (Strabo, 474.) According to Pliny, the extent of Crete from east to west is about 270 miles, and it is nearly 539 in circuit. In breadth it nowhere exceeds 50 miles. Strabo observes, that the interior is very mountainous and woody, and intersected with fertile valleys. Mount Ida, which surpasses all the other summits in elevation, rises in the centre of the island; its base occupies a circumference of nearly 600 stadia. To the west it is connected with another chain, called the white mountains (Λευκὰ ὄρη), and to the east its prolongation forms the ridge anciently known by the name of Diete. (Strabo, 475, 478.) The island contains no lakes, and the rivers are mostly mountain-torrents, which are dry during the summer season.—It has been remarked by several ancient writers, that Homer in one passage ascribes to Crete 100 cities (Il., 2, 649), and in another only 90 (Od., 19, 174), a variation which has been accounted for on the supposition, that ten of the Cretan cities were founded posterior to the siege of Troy; but, notwithstanding this explanation, which Strabo adopts from Ephorus, it seems rather improbable, that the poet should have paid less attention to historical accuracy in the Iliad than in the Odyssey, where it was not so much required. The difficulty may be solved by assuming, what has every appearance of being true, that the Odyssey was not the composition of Homer, but the work of a later age. Others affirmed, that during the siege of Troy the ten deficient cities had been destroyed by the enemies of Idomeneus. (Strabo, 479.—Compare Hoeck, Kreta, vol. 2, p. 437.) The modern name of Crete is Candia. Chalk was produced in great abundance here, and was hence called Creta Terra, or simply Creta. The valleys or sloping plains in modern Candia are very fertile. The greater portion of the land is not cultivated, but it might produce sugarcane, excellent wine, and the best kind of fruit; the exports are salt, grain, oil, honey, silk, and wool. Crete abounds in wild fowl and different kinds of game. (Malte-Brun, Geogr., vol. 6, p. 166, Am. ed.—Cramer's Ancient Greece, vol. 3, p. 356, seqq.) The best work on the history of ancient Crete is that of Hoeck (Kreta, 3 vols. 8vo, Göttingen, 1823-29).

CRÊTÊ, I. the wife of Minos. (Apollod., 3, 1.)—II. A daughter of Deucalion. (Id., 3, 3.)

CRÊTES, the inhabitants of Crete. (Virg., Æn., 4, 146.)

CRÊUSA, I. a daughter of Creon, king of Corinth, and wife of Jason. She received from Medea, as bridal presents, a diadem and robe, both of which had been prepared with magic art, and saturated with deadly poisons. On arraying herself in these, flames burst forth, and fed upon and destroyed her. Creon, the father of the princess, perished in a similar way, having thrown himself upon the body of his dying daughter, and being afterward unable to extricate himself from the embrace of the corpse. (Eurip., Med., 781, seqq.—Id. ib., 1156, seqq.) According to the scholiast, she was also called Glaucæ. (Schol. ad Eurip., Med., 19.)—II. Daughter of Priam and Hecuba, and wife of Aeneas. When Troy was surprised by the Greeks, she fled in the night with her husband, but they were separated during the confusion, nor was her absence observed until the other fugitives arrived at the spot appointed for assembling. Aeneas a second time braved the perils of the burning city in quest of his wife. While he was distractedly seeking for her through every quarter of Troy, Crêusa appeared to him as a deified personage, and appeased his alarm by informing him, that she had been adopted by Cybele among her own attendant nymphs; and she then exhorted him to pursue his course to Italy, with an intimation of the good fortune that awaited him in that land. (Virg., Æn., 2, 562, seqq.)

CREUSIS or CREUSA (Κρεῦσις or Κρεῦσα), a town of Boeotia, which Pausanias (9, 32) and Livy (36, 21) term the harbour of Thespiæ. It was on the confines of the Megarean territory, and a difficult and dangerous road led along the shore from thence to Ægostheneæ, a seaport belonging to the latter. Xenophon, on two occasions, describes the Lacedæmonians as retreating from Boeotia by this route, with great hazard and labour, before the battle of Leuctra, when under the command of Cleombrotus, and again subsequent to that bloody conflict. (Hist. Gr., 5, 4, 17.—Ibid., 6, 4, 25.) Pausanias describes the navigation from the coast of the Peloponnesus to Creusa as dangerous, on account of the many headlands which it was necessary to double, and also from the violence of the winds blowing from the mountains (9, 32.—Compare Strabo, 405 and 409.—Ptol., p. 86). The position of Creusa seems to correspond with that of Livadostro, a well-frequented port, situated in a bay running inland towards the north, to which it gives its name. From Livadostro to Psato there is a path which winds around the western shore of the bay, at the base of Mount Cithæron, and agrees very well with Xenophon's description. (Cramer's Ancient Greece, vol. 2, p. 202, seqq.)

CRIMISUS or CRIMISSUS, I. a river of Sicily, in the western part of the island, flowing into the Hypsa. D'Anville makes the modern name Cattabellotta; but Mannert, the San Bartolomæo. The orthography of the ancient word is given differently in different editions of Virgil. The true reading is Crimisus or Crimissus. (Consult Heyne, in Var. Lect., ad Virg., Æn., 5, 38.—Cellarius, Geogr. Ant., vol. 1, p. 794.)—II. or Crimisa, a promontory, river, and town of Brutium, north of Crotona. The modern name of the promontory is Capo dell' Alice; of the river, the Fiumenica; the modern Ciro answers to the city. This place was said to have been founded by Philoctetes after the siege of Troy. (Strabo, 254.—Steph Byz., s. v.—Lycophr., 911.)—III. The god of the river Crimisus in Sicily. He became, by a Trojan female, the father of Aëstes or Ægestes. (Vid. Ægestes, and compare Scrv., ad Virg., Æn., 1, 550.)

CRISPINUS, I. a native of Alexandria in Egypt, of mean, if not servile, origin. According to the scholiast on Juvenal (1, 26), he was at first a paper-vender (χαρτοπώλης), but became afterward a great favourite with Domitian, and was raised to equestrian rank. He was a man of infamous morals. (Schol., in cod. Schurz., ad Juv., l. c.—Scholl., Obs., 5, 35.)—II. A ridiculous philosopher and poet in the time of Horace, and noted for garrulity. According to the scholiast (ad Horat., Serm., 1, 1, 120), he wrote some verses on the Stoic philosophy, and, on account of his verbosity and loquacity, received the appellation of ἀρετάλογος. (Compare Döring., ad Horat., l. c.)

CRISPUS, SALLUSTIUS. Vid. Sallustius.

CRISÆUS SINUS, an arm of the Sinus Corinthiacus, on the northern shore. It extends into the country of Phocis, and had at its head the town of Crissa, whence it took its name. Its modern name is the Gulf of Salona, from the modern city of Salona, the ancient Amphissa, which was the chief town of the Loeri Ozola, and lay to the northeast of Delphi. (Cramer's Anc. Greece, vol. 2, p. 151.)

CRITHÆIS, the reputed mother of Homer. (Vid. Homerus.)

CRITIÆS, one of the thirty tyrants set over Athens by the Spartans. He was of good family, and a man of considerable talents, but of dangerous principles. He applied himself with great success to the culture of eloquence, which he had studied under Gorgias, and Cicero cites him among the public speakers of that day. (Brut., 7.—De Orat., 2, 22.) He appears also to have had a talent for poetry, if we may judge from some fragments of his which have reached us. Critias turned his attention likewise to philosophical studies, and was one of the disciples of Socrates, whom, however, he quarrelled with and left. (Xen., Mem., 1, 2.) Being after this banished from Athens for some cause that is not known, he retired to Thessaly, where he excited an insurrection among the Penestæ or serfs. (Consult Schneider., ad Xen., Hist. Gr., 2, 3, 36, et ad Xen., Mem., 1, 2, 24.) Subsequently to this he visited Sparta, and wrote a treatise on the laws and institutions of that republic. Returning to Athens along with Lysander, B.C. 404, he was appointed one of the thirty, his pride of birth and hatred of demagogues having pointed him out as a fit person for that office. After a cruel and oppressive use of the power thus conferred upon him, he fell in battle against Thrasybulus and his followers. Plato, who was a relation of his, has made him one of the interlocutors in his Timæus and Critias. (Xen., Hist. Gr., 2, 3.—Id., 2, 4.)

CRITO, I. a wealthy Athenian, the intimate friend and disciple of Socrates. When that philosopher was accused, he became security for him; and, after his condemnation, succeeded in bribing the keeper of the prison, so that Socrates, had he felt inclined, might easily have escaped. He is introduced, therefore, by Plato as an interlocutor in the dialogue called Crito, after his name. The remainder of his life is not known; but, as he was nearly of the same age with Socrates, he could not have long survived him. Crito wrote seventeen dialogues, which are lost. (Plat., Crit.—Suid., &c.)—II. A Macedonian historian, who wrote an account of Pallene, of Persia, of the foundation of Syracuse, of the Getæ, &c. (Suid., s. v.)—III. An Athenian sculptor, who, with Nicolaus, one of his fellow-citizens, made a statue intended as a support to a building. This work, belonging to the class of Caryatides, is still extant, and forms part of the collection at the Villa Albani. Winckelmann (vol. 6, p. 203) thinks he flourished about the time of Cicero. (Sillig., Dict. Art., s. v.)

CRITOLÆUS, I. a native of Phaselis in Lycia, who came to Athens to study philosophy, and became there, after the death of Ariston of Ceos, the head of the peripatetic school. He was sent by the Athenians, along with Carneades and Diogenes, on an embassy to Rome, B.C. 158, and acquired great reputation in that city, during his stay there, for his ability in speaking; a circumstance, however, which did not prevent his declaiming against the rhetorical art, which he considered prejudicial rather than useful. He lived more than eighty years. Critolaus strove to confirm, by new arguments, the doctrine of Aristotle respecting the eternity of the world. (Plut., de Exil., p. 605.—Cic., de Fin., 5, 5.—Stobæus., Eclog. Phys., 1, 1.—Philo., Mund. Incompact., p. 943.)—II. A general of the Achæans, and one of the principal authors of the war between the Romans and his countrymen, which ended in the subjugation of the latter. (Polyb., 38, 2.—Id., 38, 5, &c.)

CRIV-METOPON (Κριού Μέτωπον, i. e., “Ram's Front”), I. a promontory of the Tauric Chersonese and the most southern point of that peninsula. It is now called Karadjebouroun, according to D'Anville which signifies, in the Turkish language, Black-nose Mannert, however, makes the modern name to be Ajadag, or the Holy Mountain.—II. A promontory of Crete, forming its southwestern extremity, now Cape Crio. (Plin., 4, 11.)

CRÖBZI, a people between Mount Hæmus and the Danube, in Lower Mæsia. Their territory lay in a northeastern direction from Philippopolis on the Hebrus. (Plin., 4, 12.)

CROCODILOPOLIS, a city of Egypt. (Vid. Arsinoë V.)

CROCUS, a youth who, being unable to obtain the object of his affections, the nymph Smilax, pined away, and was changed into the crocus, or “safron.” Smilax herself was metamorphosed into the smilax, or “Oriental bindweed.” (Ovid., Met., 4, 283.)

CRÆSUS, son of Alyattes, king of Lydia, and born about 591 B.C. He was the fifth and last of the Merinnadæ, a family which began to reign with Gyges, who dethroned Candaules. (Herod., 1, 14.) According to the author just quoted, Cræsus was the son of Alyattes by a Carian mother, and had a half-brother, named Pantaleon, the offspring of an Ionian female. An attempt was made by a private foe of Cræsus to hinder his accession to the throne, and to place the kingdom in the hands of Pantaleon; but the plot failed (Herod., 1, 92), although Stobæus (Serm., 45) informs us, that Cræsus, on coming to the throne, divided the kingdom with his brother. Plutarch states, that the second wife of Alyattes, wishing to remove Cræsus, gave a female baker in the royal household a dose of poison to put into the bread she made for Cræsus. The woman informed Cræsus, and gave the poisoned bread to the queen's children, and the prince, out of gratitude, consecrated at Delphi a golden image of this female three cubits high. (Plut., de Pyth. Orac.—Op., ed. Reiske, vol. 7, p. 580.—Herod., 1, 51.) Cræsus ascended the throne on the death of his father, B.C. 560, and immediately undertook the subjugation of the Greek communities of Asia Minor (the Æolians, Ionians, and Dorians), whose disunited state, and almost continual wars with one another, rendered his task an easy one. He contented himself, however, after reducing them beneath his sway, with merely imposing an annual tribute, and left their forms of government unaltered. When this conquest was effected, he turned his thoughts to the construction of a fleet, intending to attack the islands, but was dissuaded from his purpose by Bias of Priene. (Herod., 1, 27.) Turning his arms, upon this, against the nations of Asia Minor, he subjected all the country lying west of the river Halys, except Cilicia and Lyeia; and then applied himself to the arts of peace, and to the patronage of the sciences and of literature. He became famed for his riches and munificence. Poets and philosophers were invited to his court, and, among others, Solon, the Athenian, is said to have visited his capital, Sardis. Herodotus relates the conversation which took place between the latter and Cræsus on the subject of human felicity, in which the Athenian offended the Lydian monarch by the little value which he attached to riches as a means of happiness. (Herod., 1, 30.) This anecdote, however, appeared encumbered with chronological difficulties, even to the ancients (Plut., Vit. Sol., c. 27), and has given rise to considerable discussions in modern times. (Consult Larcher, Chronol. d'Herod., vol. 7, p. 205, seqq.—Clavier, Histoire des premiers temps de la Grèce, vol. 2, p. 324.—Schultz, Appar. ad Annal. Crit. Rer. Græc., p. 16, seqq.—Bähr, ad Herodot., 1, 30.) Not long after this, Cræsus had the misfortune to lose his son Atys (ind. Atys); but the deep affliction into which this loss plunged him was dispelled in some degree, after two years of mourning, by a feeling of disquiet relative to the movements of Cyrus and the increasing power of the Persians. Wishing to form an alliance with the Greeks of Europe against the danger which threatened him, a step which had been recommended by the oracle at Delphi (Herod., 1, 53), he addressed himself, for this purpose, to the Lacedæmonians, at that time the most powerful of the Grecian communities, and having succeeded in his object, and made magnificent presents to the Delphic shrine, he resolved on open hostilities with the Persians. The art of the crafty priesthood who managed the machinery of the oracle at Delphi is nowhere more clearly shown than in the history of their royal dupe, the monarch of Lydia. He had lavished upon their temple the most splendid gifts; so splendid, in fact, that we should be tempted to suspect Herodotus of exaggeration if his account were not confirmed by other writers. And the recipients of this bounty, in their turn, put him off with an answer of the most studied ambiguity when he consulted their far-famed oracle on the subject of a war with the Persians. The response of Apollo was, that if Cræsus made war upon this people, he would destroy a great empire; and the answer of Amphiaraus (for his oracle, too, was consulted by the Lydian king), tended to the same effect. (Herod., 1, 53.) The verse itself, containing the response of the oracle, is given by Diodorus (Excerpt., 7, § 28), and is as follows: Κρόσιος, Ἄλυν διαβάς, μεγάλῃν ἀρχὴν καταΐσσει, “Cræsus, on having crossed the Halys, will destroy a great empire,” the river Halys being, as already remarked, the boundary of his dominions to the east. (Compare Cic., de Div., 2, 56.—Aristot., Rhet., 3, 4.) Cræsus thought, of course, the kingdom thus referred to was that of Cyrus; the issue, however, proved it to be his own. Having assembled a numerous army, the Lydian monarch crossed the Halys, invaded the territory of Cyrus, and a battle took place in the district of Pteria, but without any decisive result. Cræsus, upon this, thinking his forces not sufficiently numerous, marched back to Sardis, disbanded his army, consisting entirely of mercenaries, and sent for succour to Amasis of Egypt, and also to the Lacedæmonians, determining to attack the Persians again in the beginning of the next spring. But Cyrus did not allow him time to effect this. Having discovered that it was the intention of the Lydian king to break up his present army, he marched with all speed into Lydia, before a new mercenary force could be assembled, defeated Cræsus (who had no force at his command but his Lydian cavalry), in the battle of Thymbra, shut him up in Sardis, and took the city itself after a siege of fourteen days, and in the fourteenth year of the reign of the son of Alyattes. With Cræsus fell the empire of the Lydians. Herodotus relates two incredible stories connected with this event; one having reference to the dumb son of Cræsus, who spoke for the first time when he saw a soldier in the act of killing his father, and, by the exclamation which he uttered, saved his parent's life, the soldier being ignorant of his rank, and the other being as follows: Cræsus having been made prisoner, a pile was erected, on which he was placed in order to be burned alive. After keeping silence for a long time, the royal captive heaved a deep sigh, and with a groan thrice pronounced the name of Solon. Cyrus sent to know the reason of this exclamation, and Cræsus, after considerable delay, acquainted him with the conversation between himself and Solon, in which the latter had discoursed with so much wisdom on the instability of human happiness. The Persian monarch, relenting upon this, gave orders for Cræsus to be released. But the flames had already begun to ascend on every side of the pile, and all human aid proved ineffectual. In this emergency Cræsus prayed earnestly to Apollo, the god on whom he had lavished so many splendid offerings; that deity heard his prayer, and a sudden and heavy fall of rain extinguished the flames! (Herod., 1, 86, seqq.) This story must be decidedly untrue, as it is not possible to conceive that the Persians would employ fire, which to them was a sacred element, in punishing a criminal. Cræsus, after this, stood high in the favour of Cyrus, who profited by his advice on several important occasions; and Ctesias says that the Persian monarch assigned him for his residence a city near Ecbatana. This prince, in his last moments, recommended Cræsus to the care of his son and successor Cambyses, and entreated the Lydian, on the other hand, to be an adviser to his son. Cræsus discharged this duty with so much fidelity as to give offence to the new monarch, who ordered him to be put to death. Happily for him, they who were charged with this order hesitated to carry it into execution; and Cambyses, soon after, having regretted his precipitation, Cræsus was again brought into his presence, and restored to his former favour. The rest of his history is unknown. As he was advanced in years, he could not have long survived Cambyses. (Herod., 3, 36, seqq.—Compare Bähr, ad Ctes., p. 102, seqq.—Cruizer, Fragm. Hist., p. 207, seqq.—Nic. Damasc., in Excerpt. Vales., p. 457, seqq.) The wealth of Cræsus was proverbial in the ancient world, and one source of supply was in the gold ore washed down by the Pactolus from Mount Tmolus in Lydia. (Compare Erasmus, chil. 1, cent. 6, ed. 216.—Strab., 610, 625.—Virg., Æn., 10, 141.—Senec., Phœn., 604.—Juvenal., Sat., 14, 298.)

ΚΡΟΜΙ or ΚΡΟΜΝΙ, a town of Arcadia, in the district Cromitis, mentioned by Xenophon as a place of some strength. It is thought by Sir W. Gell to correspond with Crano, two hours and forty-seven minutes from Sinano, or Megalopolis. (Itin. of the Morea, p. 99.)

ΚΡΟΜΜΥΟΝ, a small place in Corinthia, on the shore of the Saronic Gulf, south of the Megarean frontier. It was celebrated in mythology as the haunt of a wild boar destroyed by Theseus. (Plut., Vit. These., Plat., Lach., p. 196.—Strabo, 380.) Pausanias says it was named after Crommus, son of Neptune. From Thucydides (4, 44) it appears that Crommyon was 120 stadia from Corinth. The little hamlet of Cancetta or Kinetta is generally thought to occupy the site of this ancient town. (Chandler's Travels, vol. 2, ch. 43.—Gell's Itin., p. 209.)

ΚΡΟΝΗ, a mountain of Egypt, between Elephantina and Syene. Between this mountain and another called Mophi were the sources of the Nile, according to a foolish statement made to Herodotus by an Egyptian priest at Sais. (Herodot., 2, 28.)

ΚΡΟΤΩΝΑ or ΚΡΟΤΟ (Κρότων), now Cotrone, a powerful city of Italy, in the Brutiorum ager, on the coast of the Sinus Tarentinus. Its foundation is ascribed to Myscellus, an Achaean leader, soon after Sybaris had been colonized by a party of the same nation, which was about 715 A.C. (Antioch., Syrac., ar.

Strab., 262.) According to some traditions, the origin of Crotona was much more ancient, and it is said to derive its name from the hero Croton. (Ovid, Metam., 15, 53.—Compare Hecraet., Pont. Fragm., p. 20.—Diod. Sic., 4, 24.) The residence of Pythagoras and his most distinguished followers in this city, together with the overthrow of Sybaris which it accomplished, and the exploits of Milo and of several other Crotonian victors in the Olympic Games, contributed in a high degree to raise its fame. Its climate, also, was proverbially excellent, and was supposed to be particularly calculated for producing in its inhabitants that robust frame of body requisite to ensure success in gymnastic contests. Hence it was commonly said, that the last athlete of Crotona was the first of the other Greeks. (Strabo, 262.) This city was also celebrated for its school of medicine, and was the birthplace of Democedes, who long enjoyed the reputation of being the first physician of Greece. (Herodot., 3, 131.) However brilliant an epoch in the history of Crotona its triumph over Sybaris may appear, that event must be regarded also as the term of her greatness and prosperity; for from this period it is said that luxury and the love of pleasure, the usual consequences of great opulence, soon obliterated all the good effects which had been produced by the wisdom and morality of Pythagoras, and conspired to enervate that hardihood and vigour for which the Crotoniatae had hitherto been so peculiarly distinguished. (Polyb., Fragm., 7, 1, and 10, 1.—Tim., ap. Athen., 12, 4.) As a proof of the remarkable change which took place in the warlike spirit of this people, it is said that, on their being subsequently engaged in hostilities with the Locrians, an army of 130,000 Crotoniatae were routed by 10,000 of the enemy on the banks of the Sagras. Such was, indeed, the loss they experienced in this battle, that, according to Strabo, their city henceforth rapidly declined, and could no longer maintain the rank it had long held among the Italiot republics. (Strabo, 261.) According to Justin (20, 2), it is true, a much earlier date ought to be assigned to this event; but the accounts which Strabo has followed evidently regarded it as subsequent to the fall of Sybaris, and probability rather favours such an arrangement in the order of events. (Consult Heyne, de Creit. Graec., prolus. 10, in Op. Acad., vol. 2, p. 184.) Dionysius the elder, who was then aiming at the subversion of all the states of Magna Graecia, having surprised the citadel, gained possession of the town, which, however, he did not long retain. (Liv., 24, 3.) Crotona was finally able to assert its independence against his designs, as well as the attacks of the Brutii; and when Pyrrhus invaded Italy, it was still a considerable city, extending on both banks of the Æsarus, and its walls embracing a circumference of twelve miles. But the consequences of the war which ensued with that king proved so ruinous to its prosperity, that above one half of its extent became deserted; the Æsarus, which flowed through the town, now ran at some distance from the inhabited part, which was again separated from the fortress by a vacant space. Such is the picture which Livy draws of the state of this city after the battle of Canne, at which period almost all the Greek colonies abandoned the Roman cause. Crotona was then occupied by the Brutii, with the exception of the citadel, in which the chief inhabitants had taken refuge; these being unable to defend the place against a Carthaginian force, soon after surrendered, and were allowed to withdraw to Locri. (Liv., 24, 2 and 3.) Crotona eventually fell again into the hands of the Romans, A.U.C. 560, and a colony was established here. Pliny merely speaks of it as an Oppidum, without adding a single remark respecting its unimportance. It became a place of some consequence in the time of Belisarius, who made it, on account of its position, a chief point in his operations along the coast. (Procop., B. Goth., 3, 28, et

4, 26.) Its harbour, however, does not seem to have been any of the best, or well calculated to afford protection against storms and winds. It was rather what Polybius calls (10, 1) a summer-harbour. (Cramer's Anc. Italy, vol. 2, p. 391, seqq.—Mannert, Geogr., vol. 9, pt. 2, p. 210.)

CROTONIATAE, the inhabitants of Crotona. (Cic., de Inv., 2, 1.)

CROTONIATIS (ἡ Κροτωνιάτις χώρα), a part of Italy, of which Crotona was the capital. (Thucyd., 7, 35.)

CRUSTUMERIUM or CRUSTUMIUM, a town of the Sabines, in the vicinity of Fidenæ, and, like Fidenæ, founded by a colony from Alba. (Dion. Hal., 2, 53.) Its great antiquity is also attested by Virgil (Æn., 7, 629), and by Silius Italicus (8, 367). From Pliny (3, 5) we learn that the Crustumini were vanquished by Romulus, and that a settlement was formed in their territory. The fertility of their lands is extolled by more than one writer. Their city, however, was not finally conquered till the reign of the elder Tarquin. (Liv., 1, 38) The name of Crustumini Colles appears to have been given to the ridge of which the Mons Sacer formed a part, since Varro, speaking of the secession of the Roman people to that hill, terms it Secessio Crustumina. (L. L., 3, 1.) The tribe called Crustumina evidently derived its name from this ancient city. (Liv., 42, 34.) The ruins of Crustumium are said to exist in a place now called Marcigliano Vecchio. (Vulp., Vet. Lat., lib. 18, c. 17.—Cramer's Ancient Italy, vol. 1, p. 303, seqq.)

CTESIAS, I. a Greek historian and physician of Cnidus, who flourished in the time of Artaxerxes Mnemon. (Suidas, s. v.—Xen., Anab., 1, 8, 27.—Diod. Sic., 1, 32.) He was of the family of the Asclepiades, who possessed the art of healing as a patrimony, inherited from their great progenitor Æsculapius. (Galen. vol. 5, p. 652, l. 51, ed. Basil.) Ctesias assisted at the battle of Cunaxa, B.C. 401, but it is not precisely known whether he was in the army of Cyrus or in that of Artaxerxes. He merely states that he healed the wound received by the latter during the conflict. In speaking, however, of the death of Clearchus, the Grecian commander, which took place a short time after the battle, he informs us, that he was then the physician of Parysatis, the mother of Artaxerxes, which would render it very probable that he was from the first in the suite of the king, and not in that of his brother. (Compare Bähr, ad Ctes., p. 16, Proleg.) He passed, after this, seventeen years at the court of Persia. Ctesias composed a History of Assyria and Persia, entitled Ἱστορίαι, in 23 books, written in the Ionic dialect. In writing this, he obtained great assistance, as well from the oral communications of the Persians as from the archives of the empire, to which he states that he had access, and in which appear to have been deposited those royal documents which Diodorus Siculus calls βασιλικά διόθρηται. These annals contained rather the history of the court and the monarchs of Persia than that of the state itself. What we possess at present of the history of Ctesias, induces the belief, that it was precisely in this circle of events that the work of Ctesias just mentioned was principally taken up. It is by means of quotations given by Athenæus, and more particularly by Plutarch, that we are made acquainted with some fragments of the first six books, which turned entirely on the history of Assyria. We have an extract, in a somewhat more complete order, from the seventeen books that immediately follow: Photius has placed it in his Bibliotheca. Ctesias wrote also a history of India (Ἰνδική), in one book, from which Photius has also copied an extract.—On many points Ctesias is in contradiction with Herodotus, whom he accuses of dealing in fable; and also with Xenophon. He has been charged, in his turn, with being, on many occasions, negligent of the truth. What has principally injured the reputation of:

Ctesias is his system of chronology, which is more difficult to be reconciled with that of the Scriptures than the one adopted by Herodotus. It must be observed, however, that, among the ancient writers, Plutarch is the only one who shows little respect for Ctesias; whereas Dionysius of Halicarnassus, Diodorus Siculus, Strabo, Pliny, and even Xenophon himself, his contemporary, cite him with praise, or at least without contradicting him. It may reasonably be asked, moreover, which of the two ought to have been better acquainted with the subject of which they treat, Herodotus or Ctesias? Herodotus, who speaks only of the affairs of Persia on the testimony of others, and who wrote at a period when the Greeks had as yet but little intercourse with Persia; or Ctesias, who had passed many years at Susa, where he enjoyed so high a reputation as to be charged with the management of some important negotiations? (Gedoy, Mem. de l'Acad. des Inscrip., &c., vol. 14, p. 247, seqq.)—What has just been said, however, refers merely to the work of Ctesias on Persia. His history of India is crowded with fables. Heeren (Ideen, vol. 1, p. 323) seeks to justify Ctesias, on the ground that he details merely those of the myths of India which were in the mouths of the vulgar in Persia. Cuvier also observes, that Ctesias has by no means imagined the fantastic animals of which he speaks, but that he has fallen into the mistake of ascribing an actual existence to the hieroglyphic figures, which are remarked at the present day among the ruins of Persepolis. We there find, for example, the martichora, that fabulous animal which was the symbol or hieroglyphic of royal power. Many other fables are to be explained by the ignorance of the laws of nature, which was so great among the ancients.—The fragments of Ctesias are to be found appended to various editions of Herodotus. A separate edition was given by Lion, in 1825, 8vo, Götting., and another by Bähr, in 1824, 8vo, Francof. This last is decidedly the best. The editor has not contented himself with giving an accurate text, corrected by the aid of manuscripts, but in his commentary he explains the text, with reference to history, geography, &c., and seeks also to justify Ctesias against most of the charges alleged to his discredit. (Schöll, Hist. Lit. Gr., vol. 2, p. 176, seqq.—Id., vol. 7, p. 436.)—II. An Ephesian, who also wrote on Persian affairs. (Consult Vossius, de Hist. Græc., 3, p. 349.)—III. An artist, mentioned by Pliny (34, 29) as having flourished, along with other carvers in silver, after the time of Myron.—IV. A spendthrift and debauched person. Some verses of the comic poets Anaxilas and Phileterus against him are preserved in Athenæus (10, p. 416, d.)

CTESIBIUS, a native of Asera, and contemporary of Archimedes, who flourished during the reigns of Ptolemy II. and Ptolemy III., or between 260 and 240 B.C. He was the son of a barber, and for some time exercised at Alexandria the calling of his parent. His mechanical genius, however, soon caused him to emerge from obscurity, and he became known as the inventor of several very ingenious contrivances for raising water, &c. The invention of clepsydreæ, or water clocks, is also ascribed to him. (Compare Vitruvius, 9, 9.) He wrote a work on hydraulic machines, which is now lost. (Schöll, Hist. Lit. Gr., vol. 3, p. 363.)

CTESIPHON, I. an Athenian, who brought forward the proposition respecting the crown of gold, which the Athenians, on his motion, decreed to Demosthenes for his public services. He was accused and brought to trial for this by Æschines, but was successfully defended by Demosthenes. This controversy gave rise to the two famous and rival orations concerning "the Crown." (Vid. Æschines, Demosthenes.)—II. A city of Parthia, situate on the eastern bank of the Tigris, opposite to, and distant three miles from Seleucia. It was founded by Vardanes, fortified by Pacorus, and became the metropolis of the whole Parthian empire. Ctesiphon was at first an inconsiderable village, but the camp of the Parthian monarchs being frequently pitched in its vicinity, caused it gradually to become a large city. In A.D. 165 it was taken by the Romans, and again 33 years after by the Emperor Severus. (Dio Cass., 75, 9.—Spartian., Vit. Sev., 16.—Herodian, 3, 30.) Notwithstanding, however, its losses, it succeeded to Babylon and Seleucia as one of the great capitals of the East. In the time of Julian, Ctesiphon was a great and flourishing city; and Coche, as the only remaining part of Seleucia was called, was merely its suburb. To these two have been assigned the modern epithet of "Al Modain," or "the cities." They are now both in ruins. Ctesiphon never recovered its sack by the Saracens, A.D. 637. This place was the winter residence of the Parthian and Persian monarchs. In summer they dwelt at Ecbatana in Media. (Strabo, 743.—Plin., 6, 26.—Mannert, Geogr., vol. 5, p. 406.)

CULÆRO, a city of the Allobroges, in Gallia Narbonensis, on the banks of the Isara. On being rebuilt by Gratian, it took the name of Gratianopolis, and is now Grenoble. (Cic., Ep. ad Fam., 10, 23.—Paul Warnefr., de Gest. Longob., 3, 8.)

CUMÆ, I. a city of Æolis, in Asia Minor. (Vid. Cyme.)—II. A city of Campania in Italy, northwest of Neapolis. It was placed on a rocky hill washed by the sea; and the same name is still attached to the ruins which lie scattered around its base. Whatever doubt may have been thrown on the pretensions of many other Italian towns to a Greek origin, those of Cumæ seem to stand on grounds too firm and indisputable to be called in question. It is agreed upon by all ancient writers who have adverted to this city, that it was founded at a very early period by some Greeks of Eubœa, under the conduct of Hippocles of Cumæ and Megasthenes of Chalcis. (Strabo, 243.—Thucyd., 6, 4.—Liv., 8, 22.) The Latin poets, moreover, with Virgil at their head, all distinguish Cumæ by the title of the Euboic city. (Æn., 6, 2.—Ovid, Met., 14, 154.—Lucan., 5, 195.—Martial, 9, 30.—Statius, Sylv., 4, 3.)—The period at which Cumæ was founded is stated in the chronology of Eusebius to have been about 1050 B.C., that is, a few years before the great migration of the Ionians into Asia Minor. (Compare Scaliger, ad Euseb., Chron., and Prideaux, Not. ad Marm. Oxon., p. 146.) We have also the authority of Strabo (l. c.) for considering it as the most ancient of all the Grecian colonies in both Italy and Sicily. The colonization of Cumæ at this early period is a remarkable event, as showing the progress already made by the Greeks in the art of navigation, and proving also that they were then well acquainted with Italy. (Compare Müller, Etrusker, vol. 1, p. 167.) Hence Blum is of opinion, that to an early intercourse between Rome and Cumæ, by means of commercial operations, is to be ascribed the Æolic character which so clearly develops itself in the forms of the most ancient Latin. (Einklebung in Roms alte Geschichte, p. 89.) Strabo also informs us, that from its commencement the state of the colony was most flourishing. The fertility of the surrounding country, and the excellent harbours which the coast afforded, soon rendered it one of the most powerful cities of southern Italy, and enabled it to form settlements along the coast, and to send out colonies as far as Sicily. When Campania placed itself under the protection of Rome, Cumæ followed the example of that province, and obtained soon after the privileges of a municipal city. (Liv., 8, 14, and 23, 31.) In the second Punic war it was attacked by Hannibal, but, by the exertions of Tiberius Sempronius Gracchus, it was vigorously and successfully defended. (Liv., 23, 37.) This city became a Roman colony in the reign of Augustus but, owing to the superior attractions of Baiæ and Neapolis, it did not attain to any degree of prosperity, and in Juvenal's time it appears to have been nearly deserted. (Sat., 3, 1.) But Cumæ was, perhaps, still more indebted for its celebrity to the oracular sibyl, who, from the earliest ages, was supposed to have made her abode in the Cumæan cave, from which she delivered her prophetic lore. Every one is acquainted with the splendid fictions of Virgil relative to this sibyl, but it is not so generally known that the noble fabric of the poet was raised on a real foundation. The temple of Apollo, or, as it was more generally called, the cavern of the sibyl, actually existed; it consisted of one vast chamber, hewn out of the solid rock; but was almost entirely destroyed in a siege which the fortress of Cumæ, then in the possession of the Goths, maintained against Narses; that general, by undermining the cavern, caused the citadel to sink into the hollow, and thus involved the whole in one common ruin. (Agath., Hist. Goth., 1.) There is also a description of this cave in Justin Martyr. (Orat. Paræn.—Cramer's Ancient Italy, vol. 2, p. 148, seqq.)

CUNAXA, a place in Babylonia, where the battle was fought between Cyrus the younger and his brother Artaxerxes Mnemon, and in which the former lost his life. Plutarch (Vit. Artax., c. 8) says, it was 500 stadia distant from Babylon. D'Anville places it within the limits of Mesopotamia, near Is, the modern Hit. But Mannert, with more propriety, assigns it to Babylonia, and fixes its location a few miles south of the entrance of the wall of Media. (Geogr., vol. 5, pt. 2, p. 331.)

CUNEUS, I. AGER, a region in the southernmost part of Lusitania, between the river Anas and the Sacrum Promontorium and Atlantic. It is now Algarve. The appellation Cuneus is generally thought to have been given it by the Romans from its resemblance to "a wedge" (cuneus); Ukert, however, thinks that the name is to be traced to the Conii (Kovioi), of whom Polybius (10, 7) speaks as dwelling to the west of the straits, and who were probably inhabitants of the southwestern part of Iberia. Appian (Reb. Hisp., c. 57) calls them Cunei (Kovvέoi), and makes their capital to have been Conistorgis. It is very probable that this name, in the time of the Roman sway, reminding that people of their own term cuneus, gave rise to the idea of ascribing a wedgelike form to the country in the southern parts of Lusitania. (Ukert, Geogr., vol. 2, p. 309.)—II. or CUNÆUM PROMONTORIUM, a promontory of the Cuneus Ager, in Lusitania, to the west of the mouth of the Anas, now Cape Santa Maria. It is the southernmost point of Portugal. (Plin., 4, 22.)

CURIPO, the god of love. (Vid. Eros.)

CURÆS, a town of the Sabines, to the north of Eretum, celebrated as having given birth to Numa Pompilius. (Virg., Æn., 6, 811.) Antiquaries are divided in opinion as to the site occupied by this ancient place. Cluverius fixed it at Vesconio di Sabini (Ital. Ant., 1, 675), about twenty-five miles from Rome; the Abbé Chaupy at Monte Maggiore, on the Via Salaria, and twenty miles from that city. (Dec. de la Maison d'Hor., vol. 3, p. 576.) The opinion of Holstenius ought, however, to be preferred; he places it at Corese, a little town on a river of the same name, which bears an evident similarity to that of the ancient city, and where, according to the same accurate observer, many remains were still visible when he examined the spot. (Adnot. ad Steph. Byz., p. 106.—Compare D'Anville, Geogr. Anc., vol. 1, p. 195.—Cramer's Ancient Italy, vol. 1, p. 310.)

CRÉTES, an ancient people, who would seem to have been a branch of the Leleges, and to have settled at an early period in the island of Crete. (Compare Euseb., Chron., 1, p. 14.—Mannert, Geogr., vol. 8, p. 21.) Being piratical in their habits, we find them, in process of time, occupying many of the islands of the Archipelago, and establishing themselves also along the coasts of Acarnania and Ætolia. It is from them that the latter country first received the name of Curetis. Strabo (465) derives their appellation from Kovπά, tonsura, from the circumstance of their cutting off the hair in front, to prevent the enemy from taking hold. (Compare remarks under the article Abantes.) Others deduce their name from the town of Curium in Ætolia, in the vicinity of Pleuron. Ritter, however, finds in the name Curetes the key-word of his system (Kor), which traces everything to an early worship of the Sun and other heavenly bodies; just as he deduces the name Creta from Cor-eta. (Vorhalle, p. 410.)—The name Curetes is also applied, in a religious sense, to a class of priests in the island of Crete, who would seem, however, to be identical with the early inhabitants already spoken of. To them was confided by Rhea the care of Jupiter's infancy, and, to prevent his being discovered by his father Saturn, they invented a species of Pyrrhic dance, and drowned the cries of the infant deity by the clashing of their arms and cymbals. Some writers among the ancients pretended, that the Dactyli were the progenitors of the Curetes, and that Phrygia had been the cradle of their race. Others maintained, that Minos brought them with him into Crete. (Compare Ephorus, ap. Diod. Sic., 5, 64.) The president De Brosses, in order to clear up this obscure point, advances the opinion, that the Curetes were the ancient priesthood of that part of Europe which lies in the vicinity of Asia, and resembled the Druids among the Celts, and the Salii among the Sabines, as well as the sorcerers and jugglers of Lapland, Nigritia, &c. Hence he infers, that it would be idle to seek for their native country, since we find this class of priests everywhere existing where popular belief was based on gross superstition. The most celebrated college of these jugglers would be in Crete. (Hist. de la Republ. Rom. de Salluste restitue, vol. 2, p. 564, in notis.) But, whoever they may have been, one thing is certain, that the Curetes exerted themselves successfully to civilize the rude inhabitants of Crete. (Compare Servius, ad Virg., Æn., 3, 131.—"Curetes primi cultores Creta esse dicuntur.") They taught them to keep flocks and herds, to raise bees, to work metals. They made them acquainted also with some of the leading principles of astronomy. (Theon, ad Arat., 1, 35.) To the Curetes, too, must no doubt be attributed what is said of Melisseus, the first king of Crete, that he was the first to sacrifice to the gods, to introduce new rites and sacred processions unknown before his time; and that his daughter Melissa was the first priestess of the Mother of the Gods. (Lactant., dir. Inst., 1, 22, 19.) Melisseus, whose daughters Amalthea and Melissa nourished the infant Jupiter with milk and honey, was of necessity contemporaneous with the Curetes, and may be regarded without doubt as one of them. In a word, so well grounded a reputation did the Curetes leave behind them, that, in process of time, it became customary in Crete, when an inhabitant of the island had rendered himself conspicuous by talent or acquirements, to call him, as is proved by the example of Epimeides, a new Curete, or simply a Curete. (Plut., Vit. Solon. 84.—Diog. Laert., 1, 114.) The title of Ἐγγεγεῖς, or "children of the Earth," also given to the Curetes (Diod. Sic., 5, 65), and likewise that of "Companions of Rhea" (Strabo, 465), suffice to prove that they worshipped this divinity. The founders of Cnosus, they raised in that city a temple, and consecrated a grove, unto the Mother of the Gods. (Diod. Sic., 5, 66.—Synell., Chron., p. 125.)—For other remarks on the Curetes, consult Sainte-Croix, Mystères du Paganisme, vol. 1, p. 71, seqq.

CRÉTIS, I. a name given to Crete, as being the residence of the Curetes. (Onid., Met., 8, 136.)—II. The earlier name of Ætolia. (Vid. Curetes.)

CURIA, I. a subdivision of the early Roman tribes, each tribe containing ten curiæ. This arrangement commenced, as is said, with Romulus, at which time the number of tribes amounted to three, so that the curiæ at their very outset were thirty. This number of curiæ always remained the same, whereas that of the tribes was increased subsequently to thirty-five. Each curia anciently had a chapel or temple for the performance of sacred rites. He who presided over one curia was called Curio; he who presided over them all, Curio Maximus.—II. A name given to a building where the senate assembled. These curiæ were always consecrated, and, being thus of a religious character, were supposed to render the debates of the senate more solemn and auspicious. The senate appear at first to have met in the chapels or temples of the curiæ, and afterward to have had buildings specially erected for this purpose. Varro, therefore, distinguishes the curiæ into two kinds; the one where the priests took care of divine matters, and the other where the senate took counsel for human affairs. (Varro, L. L., 4, 32.—Burgess, Antiquities of Rome, vol. 1, p. 360.)

CURIATII, a family of Alba. The three Curiatii, who engaged the Horatii and lost the victory, belonged to it. (Liv., 1, 24.)

CURIO, I. Caius, was prætor A.U.C. 632, but did not attain to the consulship. Cicero speaks with praise of his oratory, an opinion founded, not on personal knowledge, but on the speeches he had left. (Cic., Brut., 32.)—II. C. Scribonius, was consul with Cneus Octavius, A.U.C. 677. On returning from the province of Macedonia, he triumphed over the Dardani, as præconsul, A.U.C. 681. (Sigon., Fast. Cons. ad Ann. dcxcv.—Id., Comment. in Fast., p. 454, ed. Oxon.) Cicero often mentions him, and in his Brutus (c. 49) enumerates him among the Roman orators, along with Cotta and others.—III. C. Scribonius, son of the preceding, a turbulent and unprincipled man, and an active partisan of Julius Cæsar's. Being deeply involved in debt when tribune of the commons, Cæsar gained him over by paying for him what he owed (Plut., Vit. Pomp., c. 58), and Curio immediately exerted himself with great vigour in his behalf. Cæsar, it seems, was under obligations to him before this, since Curio is said to have saved his life when he was leaving the senate-house after the debate about Catiline's accomplices, his personal safety being endangered by the young men who stood in arms around the building. (Plut., Vit. Cæs., c. 8.) Plutarch ascribes Antony's early initiation into licentious habits to his acquaintance with Curio. (Vit. Ant., c. 2.—Compare, Cic., Phil., 2, 2.) Cicero speaks very favourably of his natural qualifications as an orator, but denies him the praise of application. (Cic., Brut., 81.) On the breaking out of the civil war, Cæsar, after having possessed himself of Rome, sent Curio to take charge of Sicily. The latter subsequently crossed over from this island into Africa, with an armed force, against Juba and the followers of Pompey, but was defeated and slain. (Appian, Bell. Cie., 2, 41, seqq.)

CURIOSOLITÆ, a people of Gaul, forming part of the Armorica. Their territory lay to the northeast of the Veneti, and answers to what is now the territory of St. Malo, between Douart and Lamballe, in the department des Côtes-du-Nord. (Lemaire, Ind. Geogr., ad Cæs., p. 244.)

CURIUM, a city of Cyprus, on the southern coast, or rather, according to the ancients, at the commencement of the western shore, at a small distance from which, to the southeast, there is a cape which bears the name of Curias. Curium is said to have been founded by an Argive colony, and it was one of the nine royal cities of Cyprus. (Herod., 5, 113.—Strab., 683.) The site seems to correspond with what is now Episcopia, implying the existence of a bishop's see, a circumstance which applies to Curium in the middle ages. (Hierocl., p. 706.) Ancient writers report, that the hills around Curium contained rich veins of copper ore. (Theophr., de Vent.—Sero., ad Virg., Æn., 3, 111.—Cramer's Asia Minor, vol. 2, p. 376.)

CURIUS DENTATUS, Manius, a Roman, celebrated for his warlike achievements, and also for the primitive simplicity of his manners. In his first consulship (A.U.C. 463) he triumphed twice, once over the Samnites and then over the Sabines, and in this same year also he obtained an ovation for his successes against the Lucanians. (Aurcl. Viet., c. 33.—Compare the remarks of Sigonius, ad Fast. Cons., p. 142, seqq., ed. Oxon.) He afterward (A.U.C. 478), in his third consulship, triumphed over Pyrrhus and the Samnites. (Sigon., p. 164.) It was on this occasion that the Roman people first saw elephants led along in triumph (Flor., 1, 18.—Pliny, 8, 6.—Eutrop., 2, 14.—Tzschucke, ad Eutrop., l. c.), and it was this victory that drove Pyrrhus from Italy. The simple manners of this distinguished man are often referred to by the Roman writers. When the ambassadors of the Samnites visited his cottage, they found him, according to one account, sitting on a bench by the fireside, and supping out of a wooden bowl (Val. Max., 4, 3, 5), and, according to another, boiling turnips (ἐψοντα γογυήδας.—Plut., Vit. Cat. Maj., c. 2). On their attempting to bribe him with a large sum of gold, he at once rejected their offer, exclaiming, that a man who could be content to live as they saw him living, had no need whatever of gold; and that he thought it more glorious to conquer the possessors of it than to possess it himself.—His scanty farm and humble cottage, moreover, were in full accordance with the idea which Curius had formed of private wealth; for, after so many achievements and honours, he declared that citizen a pernicious one who did not find seven acres (jugera) sufficient for his subsistence. (Plin., 18, 3.—Compare Schott., ad Aurcl. Viet., c. 33.) Seven acres was the number fixed by law on the expulsion of the kings. (Plin., l. c.)—According to Pliny, Dentatus was so named because born with teeth (eum dentibus.—Plin., 7, 15).

CURTIVS, M., a Roman youth, who devoted himself, for his country, to the gods Manes, B.C. 359. According to the account given by Livy (7, 6), the ground near the middle of the Forum, in consequence, as the historian remarks, either of an earthquake or some other violent cause, sank down to an immense depth, forming a vast aperture; nor could the gulf be filled up by all the earth which they could throw into it. At last the soothsayers declared, that, if they wished the Roman commonwealth to be everlasting, they must devote to this chasm what constituted the principle strength of the Roman people. Curtius, on hearing the answer, demanded of his countrymen whether they possessed anything so valuable as their arms and courage. They yielded a silent assent to the question put them by the heroic youth; whereupon, having arrayed himself in full armour and mounted his horse, he plunged into the chasm, and the people threw after him their offerings, and quantities of the fruits of the earth. Valerius Maximus (5, 6, 2) states, that the earth closed immediately over him. Livy, however, speaks of a lake occupying the spot, called Lacus Curtius. In another part of his history (1, 13), he mentions this same lake as existing in the time of Romulus, and as having derived its name from Mettius Curtius, a Sabine in the army of Titus Tatius. In all probability it was of volcanic origin, since the early accounts speak of its great depth, and was not produced merely by the inundations of the Tiber, as Burgess thinks. (Antiquities of Rome, vol. 2, p. 219.) Tarchinius Priscus is said to have filled up this lake, at the time that he drained the whole of this district and constructed the Cloaca Maxima. Possibly he may have been aided in this by a natural tunnel gradually formed through the basin of the lake itself. (Compare Arnold's History of Rome, vol. 1, p. 511.)—II. Quintus Rufus, a Latin historian. (Vid. Quintus I.)

CURŪLIS MAGISTRĀTUS, the name given to a class of magistratures which conferred the privilege of using the sella curulis or chair of state. This was anciently made of ivory, or, at least, adorned with it. The magistrates who enjoyed this privilege were the dictator, consuls, prætor, censors, and curule ædiles. They sat on this chair in their tribunals on all solemn occasions. Those commanders who triumphed had it with them in their chariot. Persons whose ancestors, or themselves, had borne any curule office, were called nobiles, and had the jus imaginum. They who were the first of the family that had raised themselves to any curule office, were called homines novi, new men.—As regards the origin of the term curulis, Festus deduces it from currus, “a chariot,” and says, that “curule magistrates” were so called because they were accustomed to be borne along in chariots (“quia curru vehantur”). Aulus Gellius (3, 18) also remarks, quoting, at the same time, Gabius Bassus, that those senators who had borne any curule magistracy were accustomed, as a mark of honour, to be conveyed to the senate in chariots, and that the seat in the chariot (sella in curru) was hence denominated “curule” (sella curulis). He may be correct as regards the mere derivation of the term, but he is certainly wrong in the explanation which he gives, since Pliny expressly states (7, 43), that L. Metellus, who had enjoyed the highest honours in the state, having become deprived of sight, had the privilege allowed him of being conveyed to the senate in a chariot, a favour granted to no one before his time.—The common derivation of the word is from Cures, a town of the Sabines, whence this official badge is said by some to have been borrowed. Lipsius favours this latter etymology. (De Magistr. Vet. P. R., c. 12.)

CUSSÆI or COSSÆI, a nation occupying the southern declivity of the mountains which separated Susiana from Media. The Elymæi possessed the northern declivities. The Cussæi or Cossæi were a brave people, and the kings of Persia were frequently compelled to purchase a passage over these mountains from them. Alexander effected one by taking them by surprise. Antigonus lost a large portion of his army in crossing over. According to Mannert, this people, together with the Carduchi and some other neighbouring tribes, were the ancestors of the modern Curds. (Mannert, Geogr., vol. 5, p. 493.)

CUSUS, a river of Hungary, falling into the Danube; now the Vag, according to D'Anville. Mannert, however, makes it the same with the Granna or Gran. (Mannert, Geogr., vol. 3, p. 380, in notis.)

CUTILÆ, a town of the Sabines, east of Reate, and on the right bank of the Velinus, famed as an aboriginal city of great antiquity (Dion. Hal., 1, 14 and 2, 49), and celebrated for its lake, now Pozzo Ratignano, and the floating island on its surface. (Scnce., Nat. Quæst., 3, 25.—Plin., 2, 95.) This lake was farther distinguished by the appellation of the Umbilicus, or “Navel” (i. e., centre) of Italy. (Varro, ap. Plin., 3, 12.) This statement is found by D'Anville (Anal. Geogr., p. 165) to be correct, when referred to the breadth of Italy; the distance from Ostia to Cutilæ, the ruins of which are to be seen close to Paterno, a village near Civita Ducale, being seventy-six miles, and the same from thence to Castrum Truentinum on the Adriatic. If Cluverius is right in reading Κοτύλη for Κοσιότη in Stephanus of Byzantium, who quotes the name from the Periegesis of Ctesias, as belonging to a city of the Umbri, we may adduce the authority of that early historian in proof of the antiquity of this town. Cutilæ is also noticed by Strabo (228) for its mineral waters, which were accounted salutary for many disorders; they failed, however, in their effect upon Vespasian, who is stated to have died here. (Suet., Vesp., 24.—Cramer's Anc. Italy, vol. 1, p. 317, seqq.)

CYANE, according to Ovid, a fountain-nymph of Sicily, whose stream flowed into the Anapus, near Syracuse. She attempted, but in vain, to stop the ear of Pluto, when that god was carrying off Proserpina. The irritated deity made a passage for himself to the lower world through the very waters of the fountain. (Ovid, Met., 5, 409, seqq.)—Claudian, on the other hand, makes Cyane one of the attendants of Proserpina, and to have been gathering flowers with her at the time she was carried off. According to this poet, she pined away, and dissolved into a fountain after the abduction of the goddess. (Claudian, de rapt. Proserp., 2, 61.—Id. ib., 3, 246, seqq.) Diodorus Siculus gives a third legend, by which the fountain Cyane is made to have come forth from the opening through which Pluto descended with Proserpina to the shades. (Diod. Sic., 5, 4.)—The modern name of the fountain is said to be the Pisma. On the banks of this stream grows the papyrus, which is thought by Hoare to have been brought hither from Egypt by the orders of Hiero. (Hoare's Classical Tour, vol. 2, p. 163.)

CYANÆÆ, two small, rugged islands at the entrance of the Euxine Sea, and forty stadia from the mouth of the Thracian Bosphorus. (Arrian, Peripl. Mar. Eux., ad fin., p. 137, ed. Blanc.) According to Strabo, one was near the European, the other near the Asiatic side, and the space between them was about twenty stadia. (Strab., 319.) There was an ancient fable relative to these islands, that they floated about, and sometimes united to crush to pieces those vessels which chanced at the time to be passing through the straits. (Pomp. Mela, 2, 7.) Pliny gives the same fable (4, 13), but assigns, at the same time, the true cause of the legend. It arose from their appearing, like all other objects, to move towards, or from each other, when seen from a vessel in motion itself. The Argo, we are told by Apollonius Rhodius (2, 601), had a narrow escape in passing through, and lost the extremity of her stern (ἀφλάστοιο ἄκρα κόρυμβα). Pindar says, that they were alive, and moved to and fro more swiftly than the blasts, until the expedition of the Argonauts brought death upon them. (Pyth., 4, 371, seqq.) On which passage the scholiast remarks in explanation, that it was decreed by the fates they should become “rooted to the deep” whenever a vessel succeeded in passing through them: (Εἴμαρτο, διαπλευσάσης νεὺς ῥιζοθῆναι τὰς πέτρας τῷ πελάγει). The prediction was accomplished by the Argo. Phineus (vid. Argonautæ) had directed Jason and his companions to let fly a pigeon when they were near these islands, telling them that, if the bird came safely through, the Argo might venture to follow her. They obeyed the directions of the prophet-prince; the pigeon passed through safely with the loss of its tail; and then the Argonauts, watching the recession of the rocks, and aided by Juno and Minerva, rowed vigorously on, and passed through with the loss of a part of the stern-works of their vessel.—The term “Cyanææ” (Κυνεαί), i. e., “dark blue” or “azure,” is referred by the scholiasts on Euripides (Med., 2) and Apollonius Rhodius (2, 317), to the colour of these rocks. In the description of Homer, however, as will be seen presently, a more poetic turn is given to the appellation. To the name Cyanææ is frequently joined that of “Symplegades” (Συμπληγάδες), i. e., “the Dashers,” in allusion to their supposed collision when vessels attempted to pass through. (Compare Eurip., Med., 2.—Κυνεαίς Συμπληγάδας.) Juvenal calls them “concurrentia saxa, Cyanæas” (15, 19), and Ovid (Met., 7, 62) has, “Qui mediis concurrere in undis dicuntur montes.” Homer (Od., 12, 61) calls them Πλαγκταί, “The Wanderers,” and gives the following description of them: “There there are lofty rocks; and near them the vast wave of the dark Amphitrite resounds: the blessed gods call them the Wanderers. Here neither birds pass by, nor do fearful doves which carry ambrosia to father Jove; but the smooth rock always takes away some one of them, while the father supplies another to make up their number. From this not yet has any ship of men escaped, whichever has come to it, but the waves of the sea, and the storms of pernicious fire take away planks of ships and bodies of men together. That ship, indeed, only, which passes over the sea, has sailed beyond, the Argo, a care to all, which sailed from Æta. . . But as to the two rocks, the one reaches the wide heaven with its sharp top, and a dark cloud surrounds it: this, indeed, never goes away, nor does clearness ever hold possession of its top, either in summer or in autumn; nor could a mortal man ascend it, or descend, not if he had twenty hands and feet; for the rock is smooth like one polished around."—It is not difficult, from the accounts here given, adorned though they be with the garb of poetry, to deduce the inference that the Cyanæan isles were originally volcanic. The "storms of pernicious fire" (πυρὸς ὀλοστό θύελλαι) and the dark cloud (καυρὴ νεφέλη) point at once to this. Hence, in the discussions which have arisen relative to the formation of the Thracian Bosphorus, and the enlargement of the Mediterranean Sea (vid. Mediterraneum Mare), the agency of volcanoes is generally asserted by the one party. (Compare Olivier, Voyage, &c., vol. 1, p. 62.—Géographie Physique de la Mer Noire, par Dureau de la Malle, p. 255, seqq.) Their opponents, on the other hand, maintain, that the only probable change in the region of the Bosphorus must have been produced by a gradual sinking of a barrier of rocks, and that even this must have occurred at a period antecedent to all historical and geographical records. They add, that the pretended volcanic substances brought from the Bosphorus have been proved to be merely fragments of ordinary rocks. (Malte-Brun, Geogr., vol. 3, p. 397, Brussels ed.) It is difficult, however, to reconcile this assertion with the strong and decided language of Dr. Clarke, relative to the structure of the rock of which the Cyanæan isles consist, as well as to the general appearance of the shore along the line of the Bosphorus. "The Cyanææ," he remarks, "are each joined to the main land by a kind of isthmus, and appear as islands when this is inundated; which always happens in stormy weather. But it is not certain that the isthmus, connecting either of them with the continent, was formerly visible. The disclosure has been probably owing to that gradual sinking of the level of the Black Sea before noticed. The same cause continuing to operate, may hereafter lead posterity to marvel what is become of the Cyanææ; and this may also account for their multiplied appearance in ages anterior to the time of Strabo. For some time before we reached the entrance to the Canal, steering close along its European side, we observed in the cliffs and hills, even to their summits, a remarkable aggregate of heterogeneous stony substances, rounded by attrition in water, imbedded in a hard natural cement, yet differing from the usual appearance of breccia rocks; for, upon a nearer examination, the whole mass appears to have undergone, first, a violent action of fire; and, secondly, that degree of friction in water to which their forms must be ascribed. Breccia rocks do not commonly consist of substances so modified. The stratum formed by this singular aggregate, and the parts composing it, exhibited, by the circumstances of their position, a striking proof of the power of an inundation; having dragged along with it the constituent parts of the mixture, over all the heights above the present level of the Black Sea, and deposited them in such a manner as to leave no doubt but that a torrent had there passed towards the Sea of Marmora. All the strata of the mountains, and each individual mass composing them, lean from the north to the south. At the point of the European lighthouse, we found the sea tempestuous, beating against immense rocks of a hard and compact lava: these rocks have separated prismatically, and they exhibit surfaces tinged by the oxide of iron. From this point we passed to the Cyanæan isle, upon the European side of the strait, and there landed. The structure of the rock, whereof the island consists, corresponds with the nature of the strata already described: but the substances composing it were perhaps never before associated in any mineral aggregate. They all appear to have been more or less modified by fire, and to have been cemented during the boiling of a volcano. In the same mass may be observed fragments of various-coloured lava, of trap, of basalt, and of marble. In the fissures appear agate, chalcedony, and quartz; but in friable and thin veins, not half an inch in thickness, deposited posterior to the settling of the stratum. The agate appeared in a vein of considerable extent, occupying a deep fissure not more than an inch wide, and coated by a green earth, resembling some of the lavas of Ætna, which have been decomposed by acidiferous vapours. The summit of this insular rock is the most favourable situation for surveying the mouth of the canal; thus viewed, it has the appearance of a crater, whose broken sides were opened towards the Black Sea, and, by a smaller aperture, towards the Bosphorus. The Asiatic side of the strait is distinguished by appearances similar to those already described; with this difference, that, opposite to the island, a little to the east of the Anatolian lighthouse, a range of basaltic pillars may be discerned, standing upon a base inclined towards the sea; and, when examined with a telescope, exhibiting very regular prismatic forms. From all the preceding observations, and after due consideration of events recorded in history, as compared with the phenomena of nature, it is, perhaps, more than probable, that the bursting of the Thracian Bosphorus, the deluge mentioned by Diodorus Siculus, and the draining of the waters once uniting the Black Sea to the Caspian, were all the consequence of an earthquake caused by subterranean fires, which were not extinct at the time of the passage of the Argonauts, and the effects of which are still visible." (Clarke's Travels—Russia, Tartary, and Turkey—vol. 2, p. 430, seqq.)

CYAXARES, I. a king of the Medes, grandson of Dejeos, son of Phraortes, and father of Astyages. He was a prince of violent character (Herodot., 1, 73.—Compare Larcher, ad loc.), and this trait displayed itself in his treatment of the Scythians, a body of whom had taken refuge in his territories in consequence of a sedition. He received them kindly, allowed them settlements, and even went so far as to intrust some children to their care, in order to have them taught the Scythian language and the art of bending the bow. After some time had elapsed, the Scythians, accustomed to go forth to the chase, and to bring back to the king some of the game obtained by the hunt, returned one day with empty hands. Cyaxares gave vent to his temper by punishing them severely. The Scythians, indignant at this treatment, which they knew to be unmerited, resolved to slay one of the children confided to their care, and, after preparing the flesh like the game they had been accustomed to bring, to serve it up before Astyages, and betake themselves immediately unto Alyattes at Sardis. The horrid plan succeeded but too well. Cyaxares demanded the fugitives from the Lydian monarch, and on his refusal a war ensued. This war lasted for five years: in the sixth, an eclipse of the sun, which had been predicted by Thales, separated the contending armies. Peace was soon restored through the mediation of Labyntus, king of Babylon, and Syennesis, king of Cilicia. (Herodot., 1, 73, seqq.) Herodotus also informs us

(1, 103), that Cyaxares was superior in valour to his ancestors; that he was the first who regularly trained the Asiatics to military service; dividing the troops, which had been imbedded promiscuously before his time, into distinct companies of lancers, archers, and cavalry. The historian then adds parenthetically, ("this was he who waged war with the Lydians; when, during a battle, the day became night"). This parenthetical remark evidently refers to the foregoing account of the eclipse. We are next informed, that, having subdued all Asia above the river Halys, he marched with all that were under his command against Nineveh, resolving to avenge the death of his father by the destruction of that city. After he had defeated the Assyrians, he laid siege to the city; but was forced to raise it by a sudden invasion of his territories. For a numerous army of Scythians, headed by Madyas, made an irruption into Media, defeated him in a pitched battle, and reduced him and all Upper Asia, under subjection to them, for eight-and-twenty years. (Herodot., 1, 103, seqq.) Then, in revenge for their galling impositions and exactions, he slew their chieftains, when intoxicated, at a banquet to which he had invited them, and, expelling the rest, recovered his former power and possessions. (Herodot., 1, 196) After this, the Medes took Nineveh and subdued the Assyrian provinces, all except the Babylonians, their confederates in the war. Cyaxares died after having reigned forty years, including twenty-eight years of the Scythian dominion.—Hale fixes the time of the eclipse that was predicted by Thales, as above stated, on the 18th of May, B.C. 603, at 9 hours and 30 minutes in the morning. He makes this eclipse to have been a total one, and the moon's shadow to have traversed the earth's disk, near the mouth of the river Halys, the boundary of the two contending kingdoms at a later day. (Hale's Analysis of Chronology, vol. 4, p. 84, 2d ed.) The same learned writer makes Cyaxares I. to have been the same with Kai Kobad, whom Mirkhond, and other Persian historians give as the founder of the second or Kaianian dynasty. He identifies him also with the Ahasuerus of Scripture. (Hale's Analysis, vol. 4, p. 76, 81.) According, however, to another modern writer, Cyaxares is the same with the monarch styled Gustasp. (Höfly. Djemschid, Feridun, &c., p. 53, seqq., Hanov., 1829.)—II. Son of Astyages, succeeded his father at the age of 49 years. Being naturally of an easy, indolent disposition, and fond of his amusements, he left the burden of military affairs and the care of the government to Cyrus, his nephew and son-in-law, who married his only daughter, and was, therefore, doubly entitled to succeed him. Xenophon notices this marriage as taking place after the conquest of Babylon. (Cyrop., 8, 28.) But to this Sir Isaac Newton justly objects: "This daughter, saith Xenophon, was reported to be very handsome, and used to play with Cyrus when they were both children, and to say that she would marry him; and, therefore, they were much of the same age. Xenophon saith, that Cyrus married her after the taking of Babylon; but she was then an old woman. It is more probable that he married her while she was young and handsome, and he a young man." (Chron., p. 210.) Newton supposes that Darius the Mede was the son of Cyaxares, and cousin of Cyrus; and that Cyrus rebelled against, and dethroned him two years after the capture of Babylon. But this is unfounded: for Darius the Mede was sixteen years older than Cyrus. We may therefore rest assured that he was Cyaxares himself, and none else. (Hale's Analysis of Chronology, vol. 4, p. 88, 2d ed.)

CYBELE, a name of Cybele, used by the poets when a long penult is required. The form Cybelle is sometimes, though with less propriety, employed for a similar purpose. (Compare the Greek forms Κυβέλη and Κυβήθη, and consult Drakenborch, ad Sil. Ital., 17, 8.—Hyne, ad Virg., Æn., 3, 111.—Döring, ad Catull., 63, 9.—Heinsius, ad Prudent., περὶ στροφ. 10, 196.—Brouckhus., ad Propert., 3, 15, 35.—Forcellini, Lex. Tot. Lat., s. v. Cybele.)

CYBELE (for the quantity of the penult, vid. Cybele), a goddess, daughter of Cælus and Terra, and distinguished by the appellation of "Mother of the Gods," or "Great Mother." The Phrygians and Lydians regarded her as the goddess of nature or of the earth. Her temples stood on the summits of hills or mountains, such as Dindymus, Berecynthus, Sipylus, and others. She was particularly worshipped at Pessinus, in Galatia, above which place rose Mount Dindymus, whence her surname of Dindymene. Her statue in this city was nothing more than a large ærolite, which was held to be her heaven-sent image, and which was removed to Rome near the close of the second Punic war. The legend of Cybele and Atys has already been alluded to, in its various forms (vid. Atys), and the explanation given on that occasion may here be repeated, that Atys was, in fact, an incarnation of the sun. The account of Diodorus, as usual, is based upon the system of Euhemerus, by which a mortal origin was sought to be established for all the heathen divinities. According to this writer, Cybele was daughter to King Mæon and his queen Dindyme. She was exposed by her father on Mount Cybelus, where she was suckled by panthers and lionesses, and was afterward reared by shepherdesses, who named her Cybele. When she grew up, she displayed great skill in the healing art, and cured all the diseases of the children and cattle. They thence called her the mountain-mother. While dwelling in the woods she formed a strict friendship with Marsyas, and had a love-affair with a youth named Atys or Attis. She was afterward acknowledged by her parents; but her father, on discovering her intimacy with Atys, seized that unhappy youth and put him to death. Grief deprived Cybele of her reason; with dishevelled locks she roamed to the sound of the drums and pipes which she had invented, over various regions of the earth, even as far as the country of the Hyperboreans, teaching mankind agriculture: her companion was still the faithful Marsyas. Meantime a dreadful famine ravaged Phrygia; the oracle, being consulted, directed that the body of Atys should be buried, and divine honours be paid to Cybele. A stately temple was accordingly erected to her at Pessinus by King Midas. (Diod. Sic., 3, 58, seq.) It is apparent from this account, pragmatized as it is, that Cybele, Marsyas, and Atys were all ancient Phrygian deities.—Like Asiatic worship in general, that of Cybele was enthusiastic. Her priests, named Galli and Corybantes, ran about with dreadful cries and howlings, beating on timbrels, clashing cymbals, sounding pipes, and cutting their flesh with knives. The box-tree and cypress were considered as sacred to her; as from the former she made the pipes, and Atys was said to have been changed into the latter. We find from Pindar and the dramatists, that the worship and the mysteries of the Great Mother were common in Greece, particularly at Athens, in their time. (Pind., Pyth., 3, 137.—Schol., ad loc.—Eurip., Hippol., 143.—Id., Bacch., 78.—Id., Hel., 1321.) The worship of Cybele, as has already been remarked, was introduced into Rome near the close of the second Punic war, A.U.C. 547, when a solemn embassy was sent to Attalus, king of Pergamus, to request the image at Pessinus, which had fallen from heaven. The monarch readily yielded compliance, and the goddess was conveyed to the Italian capital, where a stately temple was built to receive her, and a solemn festival, named the Megalesia, was celebrated every year in her honour. (Liv., 29, 14.—Orid., Fast., 4, 179, seqq.) As the Greeks had confounded her with Rhea, so the Latins made her one with their Ops, the goddess of the earth. (Lucret., 2, 598, seqq.—Virg., Æn., 3, 104; 6, 785, &c.)

—In works of art Cybele exhibits the matronly air and composed dignity, which distinguish Juno and Ceres. Sometimes she is veiled, and seated on a throne with lions at her side; at other times riding in a chariot drawn by lions. Her head is always crowned with towers. She frequently beats on a drum, and bears a sceptre in her hand. (Keightley's Mythology, p. 223, seqq.)—The name Cybele is derived, by some, from the cymbals (κύμβος, κύμβαλα) used in the worship of the goddess. It is better, however, to suppose her so called, because represented usually in her more mysterious character, under a globular or else square form: (ζέγεται δὲ καὶ Κυβέλη ἀπὸ τοῦ κυβικῶν σχήματος, κατὰ γεωμετρίαν, ἢ γῆ.—Lex. Antiq., Frag. in Herm. Gramm.—Knight's Inquiry, § 42, Class. Journ., vol. 23, p. 233.—For an explanation of the myth of Cybele, which cannot, of course, be given here, consult Guignaut, vol. 2, pt. 1, p. 67, seqq.)

CYBISTRA, a town of Cappadocia, in the district of Cataonia, and at the foot of Mount Taurus. (Cic., Ep. ad Fam., 15, 2 et 4—Ep. ad Att., 5, 20.) Cicero made it his headquarters during his command in Cilicia. Leake is inclined to place Cybistra at Karahissar, near Mazaca, but this position does not agree with Strabo's account. D'Anville had imagined, from a similarity of name, that Cybistra might be represented by Bustereh, a small place near the source of one of the branches of the Ilalys; but it is not said whether there are any remains of antiquity at Bustereh, and, besides, Leake affirms, that, according to the Arabian geographer Hadji Khalfa, the true name of the place is Kostere. (Asia Minor, p. 63.) Cybistra is mentioned by Hierocles among the Episcopal cities of Cappadocia. (Hierocl., p. 700.—Mannert, Geogr., vol. 6, pt. 2, p. 236, 262.)

CYCLADES, a name applied by the ancient Greeks to that cluster (κύκλος) of islands which encircled Delos. Strabo (485) says, that the Cyclades were at first only twelve in number, but were afterward increased to fifteen. These, as we learn from Artemidorus, were Ceos, Cytinos, Seriphos, Melos, Siphnos, Cimolos, Prepesinθος, Olearos, Paros, Naxos, Syros, Myconos, Tenos, Andros, and Gyaros, which last, however, Strabo himself was desirous of excluding, from its being a mere rock, as also Prepesinθος and Olearos.—It appears from the Greek historians, that the Cyclades were first inhabited by the Phœnicians, Carians, and Leleges, whose piratical habits rendered them formidable to the cities on the continent, till they were conquered and finally extirpated by Minos. (Thucyd., 1, 4.—Herodot., 1, 171.) These islands were subsequently occupied for a short time by Polycrates, tyrant of Samos, and the Persians. (Herodot., 5, 28.) But, after the battle of Mycale, they became dependant on the Athenians. (Thucyd., 1, 94.)

CYCΛICI POETÆ, a name given by the ancient grammarians to a class of minor bards, who selected, for the subjects of their productions, things transacted as well during the Trojan war, as before and after; and who, in treating of these subjects, confined themselves within a certain round or cycle of fable (κύκλος, circulus). In order to understand the subject more fully, we must observe, that there was both a Mythic and a Trojan cycle. The former of these embraced the whole series of fable, from the genealogies of the gods down to the time of the Trojan war. The latter comprised the fables that had reference to, or were in any way connected with, the Trojan war. Of the first class were Theogonies, Cosmogonies, Titanomachies, and the like; of the second, the poems of Arctinus, Lesches, Stasinus, and others. At a later period, the term cyclic was applied, as a mark of contempt, to two species of poems; one, where the poet confined himself to a trite and hackneyed round (κύκλος) of particulars (compare Horat., Ep. ad Pis., 132); the other, where, from an ignorance of the true nature of epic poetry and of the art itself, the author, with tedious minuteness, recounted all the attendant circumstances of an event, from the earliest beginnings of the same; as, for example, the history of the Trojan war, from the story of Leda and the eggs. (Compare Heyne, Excurs. 1, ad Æn., 2, vol. 2, p. 268, ed. Lips.)

CYCLÔRES, a fabled race, of gigantic size, having but one eye, large and round, placed in the centre of their forehead, whence, according to the common account, their name was derived, from κύκλος, "a circular opening," and ὤψ, "an eye." Homer makes Ulysses, after having left the country of the Lotus-eaters (Lotophagi), to have sailed on westward, and to have come to that of the Cyclopes, which could not have been very far distant, or the poet would in that case, as he always does, have specified the number of days occupied in the voyage. The Cyclopes are described by him as a rude and lawless race, who neither planted nor sowed, but whose land was so fertile as to produce for them, of itself, wheat, barley, and vines. They had no social institutions, neither assemblies nor laws, but dwelt separately, each in his cave, on the tops of lofty mountains, and each, without regard to others, governed his own wife and children. The adventure of Ulysses with Polyphemus, one of this race, will be found under the latter article. Nothing is said by Homer respecting the size of the Cyclopes in general, but every effort is made to give an exaggerated idea of that of Polyphemus. Hence some have imagined that, according to the Homeric idea, the Cyclopes were not in general of such huge dimensions or cannibal habits as the bard assigns to Polyphemus himself. For the latter does not appear to have been of the ordinary Cyclops-race, but the son of Neptune and a sea-nymph; and he is also said to have been the strongest of the Cyclopes. (Od., 1, 70.) Later poets, however, lost no time in supplying whatever the fable wanted in this respect, and hence Virgil describes the whole race as of gigantic stature, and compares them to so many tall forest-trees. (Æn., 3, 680.) It is not a little remarkable, that neither in the description of the Cyclopes in general, nor of Polyphemus in particular, is there any notice taken of their being one-eyed; yet, in the account of the blinding of the latter, it seems to be assumed as a thing well known. We may hence, perhaps, infer, that Homer followed the usual derivation of the name.—Thus much for the Homeric account of the Cyclopes. In Hesiod, on the other hand (Theog., 139, seqq.), we have what appears to be the earlier legend respecting these fabled beings, a circumstance which may tend to show that the Odyssey was composed by a poet later than Hesiod, and not by the author of the Iliad. In the Theogony of Hesiod, the Cyclopes are only three in number, Brontes, Steropes, and Arges. They are the sons of Uranus and Gæa (Cælus and Terra), and their employment is to fabricate the thunderbolt for Jove. They are said to be in every other respect like gods, excepting the one, single eye, in the middle of their foreheads, a circumstance from which Hesiod also, like Homer, deduces their general name: "Their name," says the poet, "was Cyclopes, because a single, round eye lay in their forehead." (Theog., 144, seq.) In the individual names given by Hesiod, we have evidently the germe of the whole fable. The Cyclopes are the energies of the sky, the thunder, the lightning, and the rapid march of the latter (Brontes, from βροντή, thunder; Steropes, from στεροπή, the lightning;—Arges, from ἀργός, rapid). In accordance with this idea, the term κύκλωψ (Cyclops) itself may be regarded as a simple, not a compound term, of the same class with μάγωψ, Κέρκωψ, Κέκρωψ, Πέλωψ; and the word κύκλος being the root, we may make the Cyclopes to be the Whirlers, or, to designate them by a Latin name, the Volventi. (Compare Hermann, de Mythol. Græc. Antiquiss.—Opusc., vol. 2, p. 176.)

When the Thunder, the Lightning, and the rapid Flame had been converted by poetry into one-eyed giants, and localized in the neighbourhood of volcanoes, it was an easy process to convert them into smiths, the assistants of Vulcan. (Callim. H. in Dian., 46, seqq.—Virg., Georg., 4, 173.—Æn., 8, 416, seqq.) As they were now artists in one line, it gave no surprise to find them engaged in a task adapted to their huge strength, namely, that of rearing the massive walls of Tiryns, for which purpose they were brought by Prætus from Lycia. (Schol. ad Eurip., Orest., 955.—Keightley's Mythology, p. 259, seqq.) Hence, too, the name Cyclopiæ, is applied to this species of architecture, respecting which we will give some explanation at the close of this article.—This last-mentioned circumstance has led some to imagine, that the Cyclopes were nothing more than a caste or race of miners, or, rather, workers in quarries, who descended into, and came forth from, the bowels of the earth, with a lamp attached to their foreheads, to light them on their way, and which at a distance would appear like a large, flaming eye: an explanation more ingenious than satisfactory. (Hirt, Geschichte der Baukunst, vol. 1, p. 198.—Agatharch., ap. Phot., Cod., 250.) Another solution is that which refers the name Cyclops to the circular buildings constructed by the Pelægi, of which we have so remarkable a specimen in what is called the Treasury of Atreus, at Mycenæ. From the form of these buildings, resembling within a hollow cone or beehive, and the round opening at the top, the individuals who constructed them are thought to have derived their appellation. (Kruse, Hellas, vol. 1, p. 440.—Compare Gell's Argolis, p. 34.)—As regards the country occupied by the Homeric Cyclopes, it may be remarked, that this is usually supposed to have been the island of Sicily. But it would be very inconsistent in the poet to place the Cyclopes, a race condemning the gods, in an island sacred to, and in which were pastured the herds of, the Sun. The distance, too, between the land of the Lotophagi and that of the Cyclopes, could not have been very considerable; since, as has already been remarked, it is not given in days and nights, a mode of measurement always adopted by Homer when the distance mentioned is a great one. Everything conspires, therefore, to induce the belief, that the Cyclopes of Homer were placed by him on the coast of Africa, a little to the north of the Syrtis Minor. (Compare Mannert, Geogr., vol. 4, p. 9, seqq.) They who make them to have dwelt in Sicily blend an old tradition with one of more recent date. This last probably took its rise when Ætna and the Lipari islands were assigned to Vulcan, by the popular belief of the day, as his workshops; which could only have happened when Ætna had become better known, and Mount Moschylus, in the isle of Lemnos, had ceased to be volcanic.—Before we conclude this article, a few remarks will be made on the subject of Cyclopiæan architecture. This style of building is frequently alluded to by the ancient writers. In fact, every architectural work of extraordinary magnitude, to the execution of which human labour appeared inadequate, was ascribed to the Cyclopes. (Eurip., Iph. in Aul., 534.—Id., Herc. Fur., 15.—Id., Troad., 108.—Strabo, 373.—Senec., Herc. Fur., 996.—Statius, Theb., 4, 151.—Pausan., 2, 25.) The general character of the Cyclopiæan style is immense blocks of stone, without cement, placed upon each other, sometimes irregularly, and with smaller stones filling up the interstices, sometimes in regular and horizontal rows. The Cyclopiæan style is commonly divided into four eras. The first, or oldest, is that employed at Tiryns and Mycenæ, consisting of blocks of various sizes, some of them very large, the interstices of which are, or were once, filled up with small stones. The second era is marked by polygonal stones, which nevertheless fit into each other with great nicety. Specimens exist at Delphi, Iulis, and at Cosa in Etruria. In this style there are no courses. The third era appears in the Phocian cities, and in some of Bœotia and Argolis. It is distinguished by the work being made in courses, and the stones, though of unequal size, being of the same height. The fourth and youngest style presents horizontal courses of masonry, not always of the same height, but formed of stones which are all rectangular. This style is chiefly confined to Attica. (Hamilton, Archaeolog., 15, 320.) Drawings of Cyclopiæan walls are given in Gell's Argolis, pl. 7.—Micali, Antichi Monumenti, tav. 9, 10, 11, 12.—Hirt, Geschichte der Baukunst, taf. 7, fig. 5, 6, 8, 9, 10. The most rational opinion relative to the Cyclopiæan walls of antiquity, is that which ascribes their erection to the ancient Pelægi. (Dodwell, Tour, vol. 2, p. 219.—Hirt, Gesch. der Bauk., vol. 1, p. 199, &c.)

CYCNUS, I. a son of Mars, killed by Hercules. As the latter was passing by the temple of Apollo at Pagasæ, he was opposed by Cygnus, who was in the habit of plundering those who brought the sacrifices to the god. Both Cygnus and his parent Mars were standing in the same chariot ready for the conflict. Hercules engaged, and slew the former; and when Mars, who had witnessed the fate of his son, would avenge him, he received a wound in the thigh from the spear of the hero. The two combats are described in the Hesiodæan fragment called the "Shield of Hercules." (Vid. Hesiod.)—II. A son of Neptune, whom his father had made invulnerable. He fought on the side of the Trojans at the landing of the Greeks, and had Achilles for an antagonist. When the latter saw that his weapons were of no effect, he took advantage of a fall on the part of Cygnus, occasioned by a stone with which he came in contact, as he was retreating before the Grecian hero, and choked him to death by means of the strap of his helmet. Neptune immediately changed the corpse of his son into a swan (κύκνωσ, cygnus.—Ovid, Met., 12, 72, seqq.)—III. Son of Stenæleus, and king of the Ligurians. He was a relation and friend of Phaethon's, and was standing on the banks of the Po when the sisters of the latter were transformed into poplars. While mourning at the sight he was himself changed into a swan. (Ovid, Met., 2, 367.)

CYΘΙΑΣ, a painter, born in the island of Cythnus, one of the Cyclades, and who flourished Olymp. 104. Hortensius, the orator, purchased his painting of the Argonauts for 144,000 sesterces (nearly $5600). This same piece was afterward transferred by Agrippa to the portico of Neptune. (Plin., 35, 40.—Dio Cass., 53, 27.)

CYDIPPE. Vid. Acontius.

CYDNIUS, a river of Cilicia Campestris, rising in the chain of Mount Taurus, and falling into the sea a little below Tarsus, which stood on its banks. (Xen., Anab., 1, 2.) Its waters were extremely cold, and Alexander nearly lost his life by bathing in them when overheated and fatigued. The illness of Alexander resulting from this, is connected with the well-known story of the physician Philip. (Arrian, Exp. Alex., 2, 4.—Quint. Curt., 3, 4, 7, seqq.) The river Cydnus expanded about a mile below Tarsus, near the sea, and formed a port for the city, called Rhagma, or the aperture. (Strabo, 672.) The Geogr. Nub. Clima, 4, p. 5, gives the castle of Arlow as the harbour of Tarsus. (Mannert, Geogr., vol. 6, pt. 2, p. 65.) The Cydnus is now the Terssoos, and, according to Captain Beaufort, is at present inaccessible to any but the smallest boats; though within the bar that obstructs the entrance, it is deep enough, and about 160 feet wide. That this river was navigable, however, anciently, we learn from Plutarch's description of Cleopatra's splendid pageant in sailing down its stream; a passage so well known to the English reader from Shakspeare's beautiful version. (Plut., Vit. Ant., c 25.) Capt. Beaufort observes, that the sea must have retired considerably from the mouth of the Cydnus; since, in the time of the crusades, it is reported to have been six miles from Tarsus, and now that distance is more than doubled. (Karamania, p. 275.—Cramer's Asia Minor, vol. 2, p. 344.)

CYDŌNIA, the most ancient city in the island of Crete. (Strabo, 476.) It is said to have been founded by the Cydones of Homer (Od., 3, 292), whom Strabo considered as indigenous. But Herodotus ascribes its origin to a party of Samians, who, having been exiled by Polycrates, settled in Crete when they had expelled the Zacynthians. Six years afterward, the Samians were conquered in a naval engagement by the Æginetæ and Cretans, and reduced to captivity: the town then probably reverted to its ancient possessors the Cydonians. (Herodot., 3, 59.) It stood on the northern coast of the northwestern part of Crete, and was the most powerful and wealthy city of the whole island, since, in the civil wars, it withstood the united forces of Cnosus and Gortyna after they had reduced the greater part of Crete. From Cydonia the quince-tree was first brought into Italy, and thence the fruit was called malum Cydonium, or Cydonian apple. Its inhabitants were the best of the Cretan archers. The ruins of this ancient city are to be seen on the site of Jerami. (Cramer's Ancient Greece, vol. 3, p. 365, seq.)

CYDRARA, a city of Phrygia. Mannert supposes it to have been the same with Laodicea, on the confines of three provinces, Caria, Phrygia, and Lydia, and situate on the Lycus, which flows into the Mæander. (Geogr., vol. 6, pt. 3, p. 131.) Herodotus speaks of a pillar erected in Cydrara by Cræsus, with an inscription defining the boundaries of Phrygia and Lydia; so that it must have been on the confines of these two countries at least. (Herodot., 7, 30.)

CYLLARUS, a celebrated horse of Castor, according to Seneca, Valerius Flaccus, Claudian, and Martial, but, according to Virgil, of Pollux. (Virg., G., 3, 90.) The point is gravely discussed by La Cérda and Martyn, in their respective commentaries, and the conclusion to which both come is, what might have easily been surmised, that the steed in question was the common property of the two Dioscuri. Statius, in his poem on Domitian's horse, mentions Cyllarus as serving the two brothers alternately. (Sylve, 1, 154.) Stesichorus also, according to Suidas, says that Mercury gave Phlogæus, and Harpagus, and Cyllarus to both Castor and Pollux. (Suid., s. v. Κύλλαρος.) In the Etymol. Mag. it is stated, that Mercury gave them Phlogæus and Harpagus, but Juno, Exalithus and Cyllarus. (Etymol. Mag., p. 544, 54.)

CYLLÈNE, I. the port of Elis, the capital of the district of Elis in the Peloponnesus. It is supposed to be the modern Chiaerenza.—II. the loftiest and most celebrated mountain of Arcadia, rising between Styngphalus and Pheneos, on the borders of Achaia. It was said to take its name from Cyllen, the son of Elatus, and was, according to the poets, the birthplace of Mercury, to whom a temple was dedicated on the summit. Hence the epithet Cyllenius applied to him. (Pausan., 8, 17.—Hom., Hymn. in Merc., 1.—Pind., Olymp., 6, 129.—Il., 2, 603.—Virg., Æn., 8, 138.) The perpendicular height of this mountain was estimated by some ancient geographers at twenty stadia, by others at fifteen. (Strabo, 388.) The modern name is Zyria. (Gell's Inn., p. 168.) Pouqueville calls it Chelmos. (Voyage de la Grèce, vol. 5, p. 339.)

CYLLENIUS, an epithet applied to Mercury, from his having been born on Mount Cyllene.

CYMA, the most considerable of the cities of Æolis, in Asia Minor, and lying to the northeast of Phocæa. This place, sometimes, but less correctly, called Cuma, was surnamed Phriconis, because its founders had settled for some time around Mount Phricium in Locris, previous to crossing over into Asia. On their arrival in Æolis, they found that country in the possession of the Pelasgi; but the latter, who had sustained great losses during the Trojan war, were unable to offer any resistance to the invaders, who successively founded Neontichos and Cyma, though, according to some traditions, there existed already a place of that name, so called from Cyne, one of the Amazons. (Strabo, 623.—Steph. Byz., s. v. Κίμυς.) Cyma was one among the many cities which laid claim to the honour of having given birth to Homer. Hesiod's father was born in this place, the poet himself, however, in Ascrea in Bœotia. Ephorus, also, one of the most distinguished historians of Greece, but whose works are unfortunately lost, was a native of Cyma. And yet this city, notwithstanding the celebrity it derived from the birth of such talented individuals, was by no means generally famed for the genius and wit of its citizens. On the contrary, they were proverbially taxed with stupidity and slowness of apprehension. (Strabo, 622.—Suid., Ὀπός εἰς Κυμαίους.—Plut., Vit. Cas., c. 61.)—In the reign of Tiberius, Cyma suffered, in common with the other cities of Asia, from the terrible earthquake which desolated that province. (Tacit., Ann., 2, 47.) Its site is near the Turkish village of Sanderly. D'Anville is in favour of Nemourt, but this is more probably the ancient Myrina. (Mannert's Geogr., vol. 6, pt. 1, p. 390.—Cramer's Asia Minor, vol. 1, p. 147, seq.)

CYMOŌNE, one of the Nereides, represented by Virgil as assisting the Trojans, with Triton, after the storm with which Æolus, at the request of Juno, had afflicted the fleet. (Æn., 1, 148.—Hesiod., Theog., 245.)

CYNÆGIRUS, an Athenian, celebrated for his extraordinary courage. He was brother to the poet Æschylus. After the battle of Marathon, he pursued the flying Persians to their ships, and seized one of their vessels with his right hand, which was immediately severed by the enemy. Upon this he seized the vessel with his left hand, and when he had lost that also, he still kept his hold with his teeth. Herodotus merely relates that he seized one of the Persian vessels by the stern, and had his hand cut off with an axe. The more detailed account is given by Justin. Phasis, an obscure painter, represented Cynægirus with both his hands, which Cornelius Longinus made the subject of a very neat epigram, preserved in the Anthology. (Herodot., 6, 114.—Justin., 2, 9.—Anthol. Palat., vol. 2, p. 660, ed. Jacobs.)

CYNÆTHÆ, a town of Arcadia, on the river Crathis, near the northern borders, and some distance to the northwest of Cyllene. It had been united to the Achæan league, but was betrayed to the Ætolians in the Social War. This was effected by some exiles, who, on their return to their native city, formed a plot for admitting the enemy within its walls. The Ætolians, accordingly, having crossed into Achaia with a considerable force, advanced to Cynæthæ, and easily scaled the walls; they then sacked the town and destroyed many of the inhabitants, not sparing even those to whose treachery they were indebted for their success. Polybius observes, that the calamity which thus overwhelmed the Cynæthians was considered by many as a just punishment for their depraved and immoral conduct, their city forming a striking exception to the estimable character of the Arcadians in general, who were esteemed a pious, humane, and social people. Polybius accounts for this moral phenomenon, from the neglect into which music had fallen among the Cynæthians. All the towns of Arcadia, save this single one, paid the greatest attention to the science, deeming it a necessary branch of education, on the principle that its influence was beneficial in humanizing the character and refining the manners of the people. The historian adds, that such was the abhorrence produced in Arcadia by the conduct of the Cynæthians, that, after a great massacre which took place among them, many of the towns refused to receive their deputies, and the Mantinæans, who allowed them a passage through their city, thought it necessary to perform lustral rites and expiatory sacrifices in every part of their territory. Cynæthæ was burned by the Ætolians on their retreat from Arcadia (Polyb. 4, 19, seqq.), but was probably restored, as it still existed in the time of Pausanias. (Cramer's Ancient Greece, vol. 3, p. 319.) Cynæthæ is supposed to have stood near the modern town of Calabryta, though there are no remains of antiquity discernible near that place. (Dodwell's Tour, vol. 2, p. 447.—Gell's Itin. of Moera, p. 131.)

CYNĒSĪ or CYNĒTES (Κυνῆσιοι or Κύνητες), according to Herodotus (2, 33), the most western inhabitants of Europe, living beyond the Celtæ. Mannert, following the authority of Avienus (Ora Marit., v. 200), makes them to have been situate in Spain, on both sides of the river Anas, and their western limit to have corresponded with the modern Faro in Algarve, while their eastern was the bay and islands formed by the small rivers Odiel and Tinto. (Compare Larcher, Hist. d'Herodote.—Tab. Geogr., vol. 7, p. 159.—Ukert, Geogr., vol. 2, p. 247, 251.—Mannert, Geogr., vol. 1, p. 235.) Niebuhr, however, is of a different opinion. "Still more absurd," observes he, "than this identification of the Celts of Herodotus with the Celtici, is the notion that the Cynetes, who, by his account, dwelt still farther west, being the most remote people in that part of Europe, were the inhabitants of Algarve, merely because this district, on account of Cape St. Vincent, which projects in the shape of a wedge, was called Cuneus by the Romans, and unfortunately may, from its true situation, be considered the westernmost country in this direction. As in historical geography we are not to look for the Celts to the west of the Iberi, so the Cynetes are not to be sought to the west of the Celts; yet assuredly they are not a fabulous people, but one which dwelt at a very great distance beyond the Celts, and, therefore, probably in the north; for, the more distant the object was, the farther it naturally diverged from the truth." (Niebuhr's Geography of Herodotus, p. 13.)

CYNIC, a sect of philosophers, so called either from Cynosarges, where Antisthenes, the founder of the sect, lectured, or from the Greek term κῠων, "a dog," in allusion to the snarling humour of their master. This sect is to be regarded not so much as a school of philosophers as an institution of manners. It was formed rather for the purpose of providing a remedy for the moral disorders of luxury, ambition, and avarice, than with a view to establish any new theory of speculative opinions. The sole end of the Cynic philosophy was to subdue the passions, and produce simplicity of manners. Hence the coarseness of their outward attire, their haughty contempt of external good, and patient endurance of external ill. The rigorous discipline of the first Cynics, however, degenerated afterward into the most absurd severity. The Cynic renounced every kind of scientific pursuit, in order to attend solely to the cultivation of virtuous habits. The sect fell gradually into disesteem and contempt, and many gross and disgraceful tales were propagated respecting them. (Vid. Antisthenes and Diogenes.—Enfield's History of Philosophy, vol. 1, p. 301, seqq.—Tenmann, Grundriss der Gesch. der Phil., p. 113.)

CYNISCA, a daughter of Archidamus, king of Sparta, who was the first female that ever turned her attention to the training of steeds, and the first that obtained a prize at the Olympic games. (Pausan., 3, 8.)

CYNO, the wife of a herdsman, and the one who nurtured and brought up Cyrus the Great, when exposed in infancy. (Herodot., 1, 110.) Her name, in the Median language, was Spaco, according to Herodotus, who makes Cyno the Greek translation of it, from κῠων, "a dog," and adds that it signified, in the Median tongue, a female dog. It is not known whether the dialect of the Medes and Persians was the same. In such remains as we have of the Persian language, Burton and Reland have not been able to discover any term like this. Nevertheless, Lefevre affirmed that the Hyrcanians, a people in subjection to the Persians, called, even in his time, a dog by the word spac. On what authority he makes this assertion is not known. Foster, in his letter to Michaëlis upon the origin of the Chaldees, thinks that he detects a resemblance between the Median Spaco and the Slavonic Sabaka, which has the same meaning. (Compare Michaëlis, Spicilegium, vol. 2, p. 99.) Some of the Greek grammarians cite the word σπάξ as signifying "a dog," among the Persians. (Struve, Specim. Quæst., p. 14, not.)

CYNOSCEPHALÆ, eminences in Thessaly, southeast of Pharsalus, where the Romans, under T. Quinctius Flamininus, gained a victory over Philip, king of Macedonia, and put an end to the first Macedonian war. (Strabo, 441.—Liv., 33, 6.—Polyb., Fragm., 18, 3, 10.) They are described by Plutarch as hills of small size, with sharp tops; and the name properly belongs to those tops, from their resemblance to the heads of dogs (κυνῶν κεφαλαί.—Plut., Vit. Flamin.) Sir W. Gell, in describing the route between Larissa and Velestino, the ancient Phæræ, observes, that Cynoscephalæ was in the range of hills which separate the plain of Larissa from that of Pharsalia. (Itin., p. 268.—Compare Pouqueville, vol. 3, p. 390.)

CYNOCEPHĀLI, a nation of India, who were said to have the heads of dogs, whence their name. (Ctesias, Ind., 23.—Aul. Gell., 9, 4.—Ælian, Nat. An., 4, 46.—Diod. Sic., 3, 34.) The writer last quoted speaks of them as resembling human beings of deformed visage, and as sending forth human mutterings. It has been generally supposed, that the Cynoccephali of antiquity were nothing more than a species of large ape or baboon. Heeren, however (Ideen, 1, 2, p. 689), thinks, that Ctesias refers, in fact, to the Paria, or lowest caste of Hindoos; and that the appellation of Cynoccephali is a figurative allusion to their degraded state. Malte-Brun also thinks that the narration of Ctesias refers to some actual race of human beings (Nouvelles Annales, p. 356, seqq.—Bähr, ad Ctes., p. 321), and supposes that a black race is meant, who at a very early period occupied not only the islands of the Southern Ocean, but the interior of the peninsula of India as far as the mountains, and also the country around the sources of the Indus. He calls them "Negres Oceaniques, Haraforas, ou Alphuriens de Borneo." Bähr seems inclined to admit this hypothesis, but maintains that more or less of fable must have been blended with it. He refers to the Hindu legends of the war waged by Rama with the nation of apes in Ceylon, and to the bridge built by apes, connecting that island with the peninsula of India. (Compare the plate given in Creuzer's Symbolik, n. 28, and the remarks of Creuzer himself, vol. 1, p. 606, 612.) Some inferior race, subdued by a superior one, is evidently meant.

CYNOS, a town of Locris, in the territory of the Opuntii, and their principal maritime place. According to some ancient traditions, it had long been the residence of Deucalion and Pyrrha; the latter was even said to have been interred here. (Strabo, 425.—Apollod., ap. Schol. in Pind., Ol., 9, 65.) The ruins of this city are probably those which have been observed near the small village of Lcanitis, by Sir W. Gell and other travellers.

CYNOSARGES, a place in the suburbs of Athens, where the school of the Cynics was held. It derived its name from a white dog (κῠων ἀγῆρος), which, when Diomedes was sacrificing to Hercules, snatched away part of the victim. It was adorned with several temples; that of Hercules was the most splendid. The most remarkable thing in it, however, was the Gymnasium, where all strangers, who had but one parent an Athenian, had to perform their exercises, because Hercules, to whom it was consecrated, had a mortal for his mother, and was not properly one of the immortals. Cynosarges is supposed to have been situated at the foot of Mount Anchesmus, now the hill of St. George. (Potter, Gr. Ant., 1, 8.—Cramer's Anc. Greece, vol. 2, p. 342.)

CYNOSĒMA (the dog's tomb), a promontory of the Thracian Chersonesus, where Hecuba was changed into a dog, and buried. (Ovid, Met., 13, 569.—Strabo, 595.—Schol. Lyc., 315, et 1176.) Here the Athenian fleet, under the command of Thrasybulus and Thrasyllus, gained an important victory over the allied squadron of the Peloponnesus, towards the close of the war with that country. (Thucyd., 8, 103, seqq.) The site is said to be now occupied by the Turkish fortress of the Dardanelles, called Kelidil-Bahar. (Chevalier, Voyage dans la Troade, pt. 1, p. 5.)

CYNOSŪRA, I. a nymph of Ida in Crete, one of the nurses of Jove. She was changed into a constellation. (Consult remarks under the article Arctos, near its close).—II. A promontory of Attica, formed by the range of Pentelicus. It is now Cape Carala. (Ptol., p. 86.—Suid., s. v.)—III. A promontory of Attica, facing the northeastern extremity of Salamis. It is mentioned in the oracle delivered to the Athenians, prior to the battle of Salamis. (Herod., 8, 76.—Gell's Itin., p. 103.)

CYNTHIA, I. a female name, occurring in some of the ancient poets. (Propert., 2, 33, 1.—Ovid, Rem. Am., 764, &c.)—II. A surname of Diana, from Mount Cynthus, in the island of Delos, where she was born.—III. A name given to the island of Delos itself. (Plin., 4, 12.)

CYNTHIUS, a surname of Apollo, from Mount Cynthus, in the island of Delos, where he was born. (Vid. Cynthus.)

CYNTHUS, a mountain of Delos, which raises its barren summit to a considerable height above the plain. At its base was the city of Delos. The modern name is Monte Cinto. On this mountain, according to the poets, Apollo and Diana were born, and hence the epithets of Cynthus and Cynthia, respectively applied to them. (Strab., 435.—Plin., 4, 12.—Virg., Geogr., 3, 36.—Ovid, Met., 6, 304.—Id., Fast., 3, 346, &c.)

CYNURI, a small tribe of the Peloponnesus, on the shore of the Sinus Argolicus, and bordering on Laconia, Arcadia, and Argolis properly so called. They were an ancient race, accounted indigenous by Herodotus (8, 73), who also styles them Ionians. The possession of the tract of country which they occupied led to frequent disputes and hostilities between the Spartans and Argives. (Pausan., 3, 2, 7.—Steph. Byz., s. v. Κύνουρα.) As early as the time of Egestratus the son of Agis, the first king of Sparta, the Cynurians were expelled from their homes by the Lacedæmonians, under pretence that they committed depredations on the Spartan territory. (Pausan., loc. cit.)

CYPARISSÆ or CYPARISSIA, I. a town of Messenia, near the mouth of the river Cyparissus, and on the Sinus Cyparissus. The river and gulf are now called Arcadia and Gulf of Arcadia respectively, from the modern town which occupies the site of Cyparissia. (Strabo, 348.—Polyb., 5, 92.)—II. A town of Laconia, in the vicinity of the Aseopus. The site is now occupied by the modern fortress of Rupino or Rampano, sometimes also called Castel Kyprissi. (Cramer's Anc. Greece, vol. 3, p. 194.)

CYPARISSUS, a youth, son of Telephus of Cea, beloved by Apollo. He slew, by mistake, a favourite stag, and, amid the deep sorrow which he felt for the loss of the animal, was changed into a cypress-tree. (Ovid, Met., 10, 121, seqq.)

CYPRIANUS (or Thascius Cæcilius Cyprianus), one of the Latin Fathers of the church, born at the beginning of the third century of our era, in Africa, either at Carthage, or some place in its vicinity. According to Gregory Nazianzen, he belonged to a senatorial family of that place. His name previous to his conversion was Thascius Cyprianus, but he now assumed the additional appellation of Cæcilius, the name of the priest by whom he was converted. Cyprian conducted himself so well after his change of faith, that, upon the death of Donatus, bishop of Carthage, he was unanimously chosen to succeed him. For nearly two years he managed the affairs of his bishopric in tranquillity; but in 251, on the commencement of the Decian persecution, the pagans of Carthage, enraged at his desertion of them, demanded that Cyprian should be thrown to the lions. During the storm he thought it prudent to withdraw, on which he was proscribed by government and his goods were confiscated. In his retirement, which lasted fourteen months, he employed himself in writing letters to his people and clergy, and to the Christians at Rome, exhorting them to remain steadfast in their faith. On the death of the Emperor Decius, Cyprian returned to Carthage, and held different councils for regulating the affairs of the church and a number of points relating to ecclesiastical discipline. One subject of much contention was the validity of the baptism of heretics. Cyprian maintained, that all baptism out of the Catholic Church was null and void, and that all who came over from heresies to the church ought to be baptized again. He was supported by the African bishops, but opposed by Stephen, bishop of Rome. In 257 the persecution was renewed by order of the Emperors Valerian and Gallienus, and Cyprian was summoned before Aspasius Paternus, proconsul of Africa, and, remaining firm in his faith, was banished to Curubis, a town twelve leagues from Carthage, where he employed himself in writing letters to the persecuted Christians, exhorting them to cheer their spirits and persevere in their religion. At the end of eleven months he was recalled to Carthage by Galerius Maximus, a new proconsul. On his return, finding that orders were issued to carry him before the proconsul, who was then at Utica, and wishing to suffer martyrdom before the eyes of his own church, he retired to a place of temporary concealment, from which he emerged to give his last testimony to the truth of his religion on the return of Galerius to Carthage. Being apprehended, he was desired by the magistrate to obey the imperial edict, and to sacrifice to the gods; and, on his peremptory refusal, he was sentenced to be beheaded. This sentence was executed at a place called Sexti, near the city of Carthage, in the year 258, where Cyprian submitted to his fate with firmness and cheerfulness. As a bishop, he discharged the duties of his office with prudence, fidelity, and affection, and with a degree of modesty and humility which much endeared him to his flock. As a writer, he is correct, pure, and eloquent, with much force and argumentative skill. According to Erasmus, he is the only African writer who attained to the native purity of the Latin tongue. His works consist of treatises on various subjects; some being defences of Christianity against the Jews and Gentiles, and others on Christian morality and the discipline of the church. The best editions are, that of Erasmus in 1520; of Rigaltius, Paris, 1648; of Bishop Fell, at Oxford, 1662, with the Annales Cyprianici of Bishop Pearson prefixed; and that of Father Maran, a Benedictine monk of the congregation of St. Maur at Paris, 1727. They were translated into English, with notes, by Marshall, in 1717. (Dupin, vol. 1, p. 149, seqq.—Fabric. Bibl. Lat., vol. 3, p. 377, seqq.—Biogr. Univ., vol.

CYPRUS, a large island of the Mediterranean, south of Cilicia and west of Syria. Like every other isle in the Grecian seas, it appears to have borne several appellations in remote ages, but many of these are only poetical, and rest on dubious and obscure authority. Those which occur most commonly are Sphecia, Cerastis, and Cryptus, for which fanciful etymologies are adduced by Stephanus of Byzantium, Eustathius, and other authorities compiled by Meursius: that of Cyprus, which finally prevailed over every other, is also uncertain; but the notion which derives it from the shrub cypress is probably the most correct; and Bochart, whose Phœnician analogies rest here on safer ground, insists strongly on its validity. (Geogr. Sacr., p. 373.) Cyprus is reckoned by Strabo (654), or, rather, Timæus, whom he quotes, as the third in extent of the seven Mediterranean isles, which he classes in the following order: Sardinia, Sicily, Cyprus, Crete, Eubœa, Corsica, and Lesbos. According to ancient measurements, its circuit amounted to 3420 stadia, including the sinuosities of the coast. Its greatest length from west to east, between Cape Acamas and the little islands called Clides, was reckoned at 1400 stadia. The interior of Cyprus is mountainous; a ridge being drawn across the entire length of the island, from Cape Acamas on the west, to that of Dinaretum in the opposite direction; it attains the highest elevation near the central region, and was anciently called Olympus. This physical conformation precludes the existence of any considerable rivers. There are no lakes, but some salt marshes on the coast. Cyprus yielded to no other island in fertility, since it produced excellent wine and oil, and abundance of wheat and various fruits. There was also a great supply of timber for building ships. (Strabo, 684.) Its mineral productions were likewise very rich, especially copper, found at Tamassus, and supposed to be alluded to in the Odyssey. The first inhabitants of this island are generally supposed to have come from Phœnicia; and yet, that the Cyprians spoke a language different from the Phœnicians and peculiar to themselves, is evident from the scattered glosses preserved by the lexicographers and grammarians. One thing is certain, however, that the whole of the ceremonies and religious rites observed by the Cyprians, with respect to Venus and Adonis, were without doubt borrowed from Phœnicia. Venus, in fact, was the principal deity of the island, and, as might be expected, the Cyprians were, in consequence, a sensual and licentious people. Prostitution was sanctioned by the laws (Herod., 1, 199.—Athenæus, 12, p. 516), and hired flatterers and professed sycophants attended on the luxurious princes of the land. (Clearch., ap. Athen., 6, p. 255.) Nevertheless, literature and the arts flourished here to a considerable extent, even at an early period, as the name of the Cypria Carmina, ascribed by some to Homer, sufficiently attests. (Herod., 2, 118.—Athenæus, 15, p. 682.) The island of Cyprus is still famed for its fertility. The most valuable production at present is cotton. The French also send thither for turpentine, building timber, oranges, and particularly Cyprian wine. Hyacinths, anemones, ranunculuses, and the single and double narcissus, grow here without cultivation. They deck the mountains, and give the country the appearance of an immense flower-garden. But agriculture is neglected, and an unwholesome atmosphere infects some districts where the method of draining the stagnant water is unknown. (Malte-Brun, Geogr., vol. 2, p. 88, Am. ed.—Cramer's Asia Minor, vol. 2, p. 366, seqq.)

CYPSÆLUS, I. son of Ection, and a native of Corinth, who attained to the sovereign power in that city about 660 B.C. The Heraclide clan of the Bacchiadæ had previously changed the original constitution of Corinth into an oligarchy, by keeping themselves distinct, in the manner of a caste, from all other families, and alone furnished the city with the annual prytanes or chief magistrates. Cypselus, although connected on the mother's side with the Bacchiadæ, overcame, with the assistance of the lower orders, the oligarchs, now become odious through their luxury and insolence (Ælian, V. H., 1, 19), and, from the inability of the people to govern themselves, made himself tyrant of Corinth. However violently the Corinthian orator in Herodotus (5, 92) accuses this sovereign, the judgment of antiquity in general was widely different. Cypselus was of a peaceful disposition, reigned without a body-guard, and never forgot that he rose from being a demagogue to the throne. Herodotus informs us (l. c.) that an oracle had been given to the parents of Cypselus, before the birth of the latter, intimating that the offspring of their union would overthrow the existing authority at Corinth; and that the Bacchiadæ, happening to hear of this, and comparing it with another response which had been given unto their own family, sent certain of their number to destroy Cypselus shortly after he was born. His mother, however, saved his life by hiding him in a coffer or chest (κύψελον), from which circumstance he obtained his name (Κύψελος). His descendants, the Cypselidæ, consecrated at Olympia, in the temple of Juno, a richly adorned coffer, in commemoration of the escape of their progenitor, an elaborate account of which offering is given by Pausanias (5, 17, seqq.). This was not, however, the coffer in which Cypselus himself had been preserved. (Compare Valckenær, ad Herod., l. c. and consult, on the subject of the coffer of Cypselus, Müller, Archaeol. der Kunst, p. 37.—Heyne, über den Kasten des Kypselus; eine Vorlesung, 1770, 4to.—Descrizione della Cassa di Cipselo, da Seb. Ciampi, Pisa, 1814.—Quatremère-de Quincy, Jup. Olymp., p. 124.—Siebelis, Amalthæa, vol. 2, p. 257.—Thiersch, Epochen, p. 169.) Creuzer and Bähr think, that the history of Cypselus, if such a person ever reigned at Corinth, has received a colouring from the fables relative to Hercules, Bacchus, and Osiris. (Creuzer, Comment. Herod., p. 62, seqq.—Bähr, ad Herod., l. c.—Compare Müller, Dorians, vol. 1, p. 187, seq.) Cypselus was succeeded by his son Periander.—II. The elder son of Periander, incapacitated from succeeding him by mental alienation.—III. A king of Arcadia, who gave his daughter in marriage to Cresphontes, the Heraclide, and thus saved his dominions from the sway of the Dorians when they invaded the Peloponnesus. (Pausan., 8, 5.)

CYRENAÏCA, a country of Africa, east of the Syrtis Minor, and west of Marmarica. It corresponds with the modern Barca. Cyrenaica was considered by the Greeks as a sort of terrestrial paradise. This was partly owing to the force of contrast, as all the rest of the African coast along the Mediterranean, from Carthage to the Nile, was a barren, sandy waste, and partly to the actual fertility of Cyrenaica itself. It was extremely well watered, and the inhabitants, according to Herodotus (4, 199), employed eight months in collecting the productions of the land: the maritime places first yielded their fruits, then the second region, which they called the hills, and lastly those of the highest part inland. One of the chief natural productions of Cyrenaica was an herb called silphium, a kind of laserpitium or assaefetida. It was fattening for cattle, rendering their flesh also tender, and was a useful aperient for man. From its juice, too, when kneaded with clay, a powerful antiseptic was obtained. The silphium formed a great article of trade, and at Rome the composition above mentioned sold for its weight in silver. It is for this reason that the silphium appeared always on the medals of Cyrene. Its culture was neglected however, when the Romans became masters of the country, and pasturage was more attended to. Captain Beechy, in the course of his travels through this region, noticed a plant about three feet in height, very much resembling the hemlock or wild carrot. He was told, that it was usually fatal to the camels who ate of it, and that its juice was so acrid as to fester the flesh, if at all excoriated. He supposes it to be the silphium. Della Cella describes, apparently, the same production as an umbelliferous plant, with compound, indented leaves, fleshy, delicate, and shining, without any involucre; the fruit being somewhat flattened, surmounted by three ribs, and furnished all round with a membrane as glossy as silk (p. 128). Captain Smith succeeded in bringing over a specimen of the plant, which is said to be now thriving in Devonshire. (Beechy, p. 410, seqq.) M. Pacho says, that the Arabs call it derias; and he proposes to class the plant as a species of laserwort, under the name of laserpitium derias. It seems to resemble the laserpitium ferulaceum of Linnaeus.—Cyrenaica was called Pentapolis, from its having five cities of note in it, Cyrene, Barce, Ptolemais, Berenice, and Tauchira. All of these exist at the present day under the form of towns or villages, and, what is remarkable, their names are scarcely changed from what we may suppose the pronunciation to have been among the Greeks. They are now called Kur-in, Barca, Tollamata, Berne, and Taukera.—Some farther remarks upon the district of Cyrenaica will be found under the head of Cyrene, being blended with the history of that city as its capital. For a full account of the silphium, see the 36th volume of the Mémoires de l'Académie des Belles Lettres, p. 18, and for some valuable observations respecting Cyrenaica, consult the work of M. Pacho, Relation d'un Voyage dans la Marmarique, la Cyrenaïque, &c., Paris, 1828, 4to.

CYRENAÏCI, a sect of philosophers who followed the doctrines of Aristippus, and whose name was derived from their founder's having been a native of Cyrene, and from their school's having been established in this place. Aristippus made the summum bonum and the τέλος of man to consist in enjoyment, accompanied by good taste and freedom of mind, τὸ κρατεῖν καὶ μὴ ἠττάσθαι ἡδόνων ἀριστον, οὐδὲ τὸ μὴ χρῆσθαι. (Diog. Laert., 2, 75.) Happiness, said the Cyrenaïcs, consists, not in tranquillity or indolence, but in a pleasing agitation of the mind or in active enjoyment. Pleasure is the ultimate object of human pursuit; it is only in subserviency to this that fame, friendship, and even virtue are to be desired. All crimes are venial, because never committed but through the immediate impulse of passion. Nothing is just or unjust by nature, but by custom and law. The business of philosophy is to regulate the senses in that manner which will render them most productive of pleasure. Since, then, pleasure is to be derived, not from the past or the future, but the present, a wise man will take care to enjoy the present hour, and will be indifferent to life or death. Such were the tenets of the Cyrenæic school. The short duration of this sect was owing, in part, to the remote distance of Cyrene from Greece, the chief seat of learning and philosophy; in part to the unbounded latitude which these philosophers allowed themselves in practice as well as opinion; and in part to the rise of the Epicurean sect, which taught the doctrine of pleasure in a more philosophical form. (Enfield's History of Philosophy, vol. 1, p. 197.—Tennemann's Manual, p. 101, Johnson's transl.)

CYRÈNE, I. the daughter of the river Peneus, beloved by Apollo. The god carried her in his golden chariot over the sea, to that part of Africa called afterward Cyrenaica, where she bore him a son named Aristæus. (Pind., Pyth., 9, 90, seqq.—Heyne, ad Virg., Georg., 4, 321.)—II. A celebrated city of Africa, on the Mediterranean coast, the capital of Cyrenaica, and to the west of Egypt. The foundation of this place dates as far back as the 37th Olympiad (about B.C. 628), when, according to Herodotus, a colony of Greeks from Thera, under Battus, were conducted by the Libyan Nomades to this delightful spot, then called Irasa. In the neighbourhood was a copious spring of excellent water, which the Dorian colonists are said to have called the fountain of Apollo, and to have named Cyra (Κύρα), having in this, most probably, given a Greek form to some appellation in use among the natives. From Κύρα arose the name of the place, Κυράνα, which, substituting the Ionic for the Doric form, became Κυρήνη, or Cyrene. (Callim. H. in Apoll., 88.—Eustath., ad Dionys. Perieg., 213.—Spanheim, ad Callim., l. c.) The poetic account, which makes Aristæus to have been the founder of the city, and to have named it after his mother, the nymph Cyrene, is, of course, purely fabulous.—After the arrival of Battus in this quarter, other migrations from Greece also took place; and the colonists had become strong enough, under their third sovereign, to make war upon their Libyan neighbours, and even to defeat an army of Egyptian auxiliaries, which Apries (Pharaoh Hophra) had sent to their assistance. (Herodot., 4, 160.) The state of Barca was founded by a division of the colonists, headed by the brother of the king (Arcesilaus III.), who, having abjured his authority, left Cyrene with his followers. A civil war ensued, followed by the usual consequences, an application to the neighbouring states for foreign aid, the eventual ruin of one party, and the loss of independence by the other. At first the Barceans appear to have had the advantage; but, in the reign of a fourth Arcesilaus, who had married the daughter of the sovereign of Barca, a popular insurrection took place, in which both monarchs were assassinated. The mother of the Cyrenean king, Queen Phertime, fled to Egypt, and invoked the aid of Aryander, the Persian viceroy under Darius Hystaspes, who readily espoused her cause. Barca, after a long siege, fell through treachery, and was plundered by the Persians; while the vengeance of the queen was glutted in the massacre of all who had been concerned in the insurrection. After this we hear no more of Barca as a separate state. In the time of Aristotle Cyrene was a republic; and this appears to have been the form of government at the era of the memorable dispute recorded by Sallust, between the Cyreneans and the Carthaginians, relative to their respective limits. (Ibid. Philani.) Cyrene subsequently fell under the power of the Carthaginians, and was comprised, with Egypt and Libya, in the viceroyalty of Ptolemy Lagos, whose brother Magas ruled Cyrene for fifty years. It continued to form part of the empire of the Ptolemies till it was made over by Ptolemy Physcon to his illegitimate son Apion. During a reign of twenty-one years, during which Egypt was a prey to intestine disturbances, Apion maintained peace and tranquillity in his dominions, and on his death bequeathed Cyrenaica to the Romans. The senate accepted the bequest, but allowed the cities to be governed by their own laws, which opened the way for fresh discord; and the anarchy was terminated, twenty years after the death of Apion (B.C. 76), by the reduction of the whole of Cyrenaica to the condition of a Roman province. In the time of Strabo it was united with Crete in one government. The most flourishing period of Cyrene was probably that of the Ptolemæic dynasty, and of the preceding two or three centuries, when Grecian art was in the highest perfection; to which period we may assign the Doric temples and other monuments, which are decidedly of an early style. The philosophy and literature of Greece were diligently cultivated at Cyrene, and this city gave birth to Aristippus, the founder of the licentious sect distinguished by the name of Cyrenaic. It was the birthplace also of the poet Callimachus, of Eratosthenes the historian, and Carneades

the sophist. Numbers of Jews appear to have settled in Cyrenaica, even prior to the Christian era. It was a Jew of Cyrene whom the Roman soldiers compelled to bear one end of our Saviour's cross. (Matt., 27, 32.—Mark, 15, 21.) Cyrenean Jews were present at Jerusalem on the day of the Pentecost; some of them took part with their Alexandrian brethren in disputing against the proto-martyr Stephen; and Christian Jews of Cyprus and Cyrene, fleeing from the persecution of their intolerant brethren, were the first preachers of Christianity to the Greeks of Antioch. (Acts, 2, 10; 6, 9; 11, 20.) That Cyrene continued to flourish under the Romans, may be inferred as well from some Latin inscriptions as from the style of many of the architectural remains. To what circumstance its desertion is attributable, does not appear; but in the fifth century it had become a mass of ruin. It is so described by Synesius, who lived in the time of Theodosius the younger. The wealth and honours of Cyrene were transferred to the episcopal city of Ptolemais. The final extirpation of the Greek colonies of Cyrenaica dates, however, from the destructive invasion of the Persian Chosroes, who, about 616, overran Syria and Egypt, and he advanced as far westward as the neighbourhood of Tripoli. The Saracens completed the work of destruction, and for seven centuries this once fertile and populous region has been lost to civilization, to commerce, and almost to geographical knowledge. For three parts of the year Cyrene is untenanted, except by jackals and hyenas, and during the fourth, wandering Bedouins, too indolent to ascend the higher range of hills, pitch their tents chiefly on the low grounds to the southward of the summit on which the city is built. The situation of Cyrene is described by modern travellers as singularly beautiful. It is built on the edge of a range of hills, rising about 800 feet above a fine sweep of high table-land, forming the summit of a lower chain, to which it descends by a series of terraces. The elevation of the lower chain may be estimated at 1000 feet; so that Cyrene stands about 1800 feet above the level of the sea, of which it commands an extensive view over the table-land, which, extending east and west as far as the eye can reach, stretches about five miles to the northward, and then descends abruptly to the coast. The view from the brow of the height, extending over the rocks, and woods, and distant ocean, is described by Capt. Beechy as almost unrivalled in magnificence. Advantage has been taken of the natural terraces of the declivity, to shape the ledges into practicable roads, leading along the face of the mountain, and communicating, in some instances, by narrow flights of steps cut in the rock. These roads, which may be supposed to have been the favourite drives of the citizens of Cyrene, are very plainly indented with the marks of chariot-wheels, deeply furrowing the smooth, stony surface. The rock, in most instances rising perpendicularly from these galleries, has been excavated into innumerable tombs, formed with great labour and taste, and generally adorned with architectural façades. In several of the excavated tombs were discovered remains of paintings, representing historical, allegorical, and pastoral subjects, executed in the manner of those of Herculaneum and Pompeii: some of them by no means inferior to the best that have been found in those cities. (For some remarks on these paintings, consult Beechy, p. 451, seqq.)

CYRESCHATA. Vid Cyropolis.

CYRILLUS, I. bishop of Jerusalem, born in that city A.D. 315. He succeeded Maximus in the episcopate, about the close of the year 350; and the author of the Chronicle of Alexandria, as well as Socrates and other writers, inform us, that on the 7th of May, 351, about nine in the morning, a luminous cross was seen in the heavens, extending from Calvary to the Mount of Olives, a distance of nearly three fourths of a league. The Greek church has a festival on the 7th of May, in commemoration of this phenomenon, which marked the promotion of Cyrill to the mitre. Cyrill himself has left a description of this celestial appearance in a letter to the Emperor Constantius, and the subject has afforded much controversy to writers of a later age.—Cyrill became involved in a controversy with Acacius, archbishop of Cæsarea, an Arian or Semiarian in his tenets; and refused to obey the citation of his opponent to appear at Cæsarea: the charge alleged against him was, his having wasted the property of the church, when the truth was, that, during a great famine in Judea, Cyrill had sold some of the sacred ornaments in order to procure sustenance for the suffering poor. The council assembled at Cæsarea, and composed of Arian bishops, condemned him, and, on Cyrill's appealing from them to a higher tribunal, Acacius, construing this appeal into a high offence, drove him from Jerusalem. He was restored to his see in 359 by the council of Seleucia, which also pronounced the deposition of Acacius and many other Arians; but in the following year Acacius and his partisans succeeded in again deposing Cyrill. In the year 361 he was again restored to his pontificate. It was about this time that Julian made his memorable attempt to rebuild the Jewish temple: Cyrill was then at Jerusalem, and before the flames issued from the side of the former structure, he confidently predicted the failure of the emperor's scheme. He became odious to Julian, who resolved, according to Orosius, to sacrifice this pontiff to his hatred on his return from the Persian war. Julian, however, perished in the expedition. Cyrill was again exiled, in 367, by the Emperor Valens, who had embraced Arianism: his exile lasted for ten years, and he only returned to Jerusalem in 378, when Gratian re-established in their sees those bishops who were in communion with Pope Damasus. Cyrill governed his church without any farther troubles for the space of eight years, under the reign of Theodosius, and assisted in 381 at the general council of Constantinople. He subscribed the condemnation of the Arians and Macedonians, and died in 386, in the 71st year of his age and the 36th of his episcopate. The works of Cyrill consist of twenty-three Instructions, known by the name of Catecheses, which were composed by him at Jerusalem when he filled the station of catechist, previous to his being made a bishop. These productions, the style of which is in general simple and familiar, are regarded as the most ancient and complete abridgment that we possess of the doctrines of the primitive church. The Calvinists have attempted to prove them supposititious, but the Protestants of England have fully succeeded in establishing their authenticity. We have also a homily of Cyrill's on the paralytic man mentioned in Scripture, and his letter to Constantius on the luminous cross which appeared at Jerusalem. The best editions of his works are, that of Mills, Oxon., 1703, fol., and that of Touttée, Paris, 1720, fol. This last is decidedly the better one, and was published by Maran on the death of Touttée. (Bibl. Univ., vol. 10, p. 404, seqq.)—II. Bishop of Alexandria, in the fifth century, succeeded his uncle Theophilus in that dignity in the year 412. The bishops of Alexandria had long acquired great authority and power, and Cyrill took every opportunity to confirm and increase it. Soon after his elevation, he expelled the Novatians from Alexandria, and stripped their bishop, Theopompus, of all his property. In 415 the Jews committed some insult on the Christians of Alexandria, which so enraged Cyrill, that, instead of advising them to apply for redress to the civil magistrate, he put himself at the head of his people, and led them to the assault and plunder of the synagogues and houses of that people, and drove them out of the city. This conduct, however, displeased Orestes, the governor of Alexandria, who feared that the bishop's authority, if not checked, might infringe upon that of the magistrate. Parties were formed to support the rival claims, and battles were fought in the streets of Alexandria; and Orestes himself was one day suddenly surrounded by 500 monks, by whom he would have been murdered had not the people interfered. One of these assailants, being seized, was put to the torture so severely that he died under the operation, on which Cyrill had him immediately canonized, and on every occasion commended his constancy and zeal. There also lived in Alexandria a learned pagan lady, named Hypatia, with whom Orestes was intimate, and who was supposed to have encouraged his resistance to the claims of the bishop. This accomplished female was one day seized by a band of zealots, who dragged her through the streets, and concluded by tearing her limb from limb, a piece of atrocity attributed to the instigation of Cyrill, and from which his memory has never been absolved. He next engaged in a furious controversy with Nestorius, bishop of Constantinople, who maintained that the Virgin Mary ought not to be called the Mother of God, but the mother of our Lord or of Christ, since the Deity can neither be born nor die. These homilies, falling into the hands of the Egyptian monks, caused a great commotion among them, and Cyrill wrote a pastoral letter to them, in which he maintained that the Virgin Mary ought to be called the Mother of God, and denounced bitter censures against all who supported an opposite opinion. A controversial correspondence between the two bishops ensued, which ended in an open war of excommunications and anathemas. To put an end to this controversy, in 431 a council was held at Ephesus by the Emperor Theodosius; and Cyrill, by his precipitation and violence, and not waiting for a number of Eastern bishops, obtained the condemnation of Nestorius without his being heard in his own defence, and that prelate was deprived of his bishopric and banished to the Egyptian deserts. When John, bishop of Antioch, and the other Eastern bishops, however, appeared, they avenged Nestorius, and, deposing Cyrill, put him in prison. In a subsequent meeting of the council, he was liberated and absolved from the sentence of deposition, but had the mortification of seeing the doctrine which he had condemned spreading rapidly through the Roman empire, Assyria, and Persia. He died at Alexandria in the year 444. Cyrill was undoubtedly a man of learning, but overbearing, ambitious, cruel, and intolerant in the highest degree. He is much extolled by Catholic writers for his great zeal and piety, of which the particulars thus specified are proofs. He was the author of a number of works, treatises, &c., the best edition of which was published at Paris in 1638, in 7 vols. fol., under the care of Jean Aubert, canon of Laon. (Biogr. Univ., vol. 10, p. 406.)

CYRΝΟΣ (Kýpρος), the Greek name of Corsica. (Vid. Corsica.)

CYRŌPŌLIS, a large city of Asia, on the banks of the Taurates, founded by Cyrus. (Cellarius, Geogr. Ant., vol. 2, p. 715 — Salmas., in Solin., p. 480.) It was also called Cyreschata. Both of these names, however, are Greek translations of the true Persian terms. The termination of the last is the Greek ἐσχάτη, expressing, as did the Persian one, the remote situation of the place. Alexander destroyed it, and built in its stead a city, called by the Roman geographers Alexandrea Ultima, by the Greeks, however, Ἀλεξανδρόεια Ἐσχάτη, of which the Latin is a translation. The modern Cogend is supposed by D'Anville to answer to the site of this city. Some writers make another city of the name of Cyropolis to have been founded by Cyrus in Media. (Compare Cellarius, Geogr. Ant., vol. 2, p. 666.)

CYRRHĒSTICA, a country of Syria, northeast of the city of Antiochia, and north of the district of Chaly-bonitis. It was so called from its capital Cyrrhus. (Plin., 5, 23. — Cic., Ep. ad Att., 5, 18.)

CYRRHUS, I. A city of Macedonia, in the vicinity of Pella. (Compare Thucydides, 2, 100.) There is a Palæo Castro about sixteen miles northwest of Pella, which is very likely to be Cyrrhus. Wesseling thinks that Diodorus alludes to the Macedonian Cyrrhus (18, 4), when he speaks of a temple of Minerva built there by order of Alexander (ad Ilin. Hieros., p. 606). Hence the title of Κυρρῆστις, noticed by both Strabo and Stephanus. But these writers allude to the Syrian Cyrrhus. (Cramer's Anc. Greece, vol. 1, p. 229.) — II. A city of Syria, the capital of a district named after it Cyrrhæstia. It derived its name from the Macedonian Cyrrhus. Stephanus Byzantinus, however, writes Κύρρος. Later writers, and especially Christian ones, give the name of this place as Κύρος, Cyrus, being misled, probably, by the fable which is found in Procopius (Edif., 2, 12), that the Jews were the founders of the city, and called it after Cyrus their liberator. The ruins are still called Corus. (Cellarius, Geogr. Ant., vol. 2, p. 359.)

CYRUS, I. A celebrated conqueror, and the founder of the Persian empire. His early history has been given, on the authority of Herodotus, under the article Astysages.—He had not been long seated on the throne, when his dominions were invaded by Cressus, king of Lydia, the issue of which contest was so fatal to the latter. (Vid. Cressus.) The conquest of Lydia established the Persian monarchy on a firm foundation, and Cyrus was now called away to the East by vast designs, and by the threats of a distant and formidable enemy. Babylon still remained an independent city in the heart of his empire, and to reduce it was his first and most pressing care. On another side he was tempted by the wealth and the weakness of Egypt; while his northern frontier was disturbed and endangered by the fierce barbarians, who ranged over the plains that stretch from the skirts of the Indian Caucasus to the Caspian. Until these last should be subdued or humbled, his Eastern provinces could never enjoy peace or safety. These objects demanded his own presence; the subjugation of the Asiatic Greeks, as a less urgent and less difficult enterprise, he committed to his lieutenants. While the latter, therefore, were executing his commands in the West, he was himself enlarging and strengthening his power in the East. After completing the subjugation of the nations west of the Euphrates, he laid siege to Babylon. The account of its capture is given elsewhere (vid. Babylon), though it seems doubtful whether he took the city in the way there related, or in any other manner, and did not rather owe his success to some internal revolution, which put an end to the dynasty of the Babylonian kings. In Xenophon's romance, Cyrus is made to fix his residence at Babylon during seven months in the year; perhaps we cannot safely conclude that this was ever the practice of any of his successors; but it is highly probable, that the reduction of this luxurious city contributed, more than any other of the Persian conquests, to change the manners of the court and of the nation. Cyrus himself scarcely enjoyed so long an interval of repose. The protection which he afforded to the Jews was probably connected with his designs upon Egypt; but he never found leisure to carry them into effect. Soon after the fall of Babylon he undertook an expedition against one of the nations on the eastern side of the Caspian. According to Herodotus, it was the Massageta, a nomadic horde, which had driven the Scythians before them towards the West; and, after gaining a victory over them by stratagem, he was defeated in a great battle and slain. The event is the same in the narrative of Ctesias; but the people against whom Cyrus marched are called the Derbices, and their army is strengthened by troops and elephants furnished by Indian allies; while the death of Cyrus is speedily avenged by one of his vassals, Amorges, king of the Sacæ, who gains a decisive victory over the Derbices, and annexes their land to the Persian empire. This account is so far confirmed by Herodotus, that we do not hear from him of any consequences that followed the success of the Massagetae, or that the attention of Cambyses, the son and heir of Cyrus, was called away towards the North. The first recorded measure of his reign, on the contrary, was the invasion of Egypt. (Thirlwall's Greece, vol. 2, p. 172, seq.)—Thus much for the history of Cyrus, according to the generally received account. It is more than probable, however, that many and conflicting statements respecting his birth, parentage, early life, attainment to sovereign power, and subsequent career, were circulated throughout the East, since we find discrepancies between the narratives of Herodotus, Ctesias, and Xenophon in these several particulars, that can in no other way be accounted for. It has been customary with most scholars to decry the testimony of Ctesias, and to regard him as a writer of but slender pretensions to the character of veracity. As far, however, as the history of Cyrus was concerned, to say nothing of other parts of his narrative, this opinion is evidently unjust, and its injustice will be placed in the clearest light if we compare together the two rival statements of Ctesias and Herodotus. The account of the latter teems with fables, from which that of the former appears to be entirely free. It is far more consistent with reason, to believe with Ctesias that there was no affinity whatever between Cyrus and Astyages, than with Herodotus, that the latter was his maternal grandfather. Neither does Ctesias make any mention of that most palpable fable, the exposure of the infant; nor of the equally fabulous story respecting the cruel punishment of Harpagus. (Compare Bähr, ad Ctes., Pers., c. 2, and the words of Reineccius, Famil. Reg. Med. et Bactr., Lips., 1572, p. 35, “ab Astyage usurpata in Cyrum et Harpagi filium crudelitatis decantatam ab Herodoto fabulam plane rejicimus.”) Nor need this dissimilarity between the statements of Ctesias and Herodotus occasion any surprise. The latter historian confesses, very ingeniously, that there were three different traditions in his time relative to the origin of Cyrus, and that he selected the one which appeared to him most probable (1, 96). How unfortunate this selection was we need hardly say. Ctesias, then, chose another tradition for his guide, and Xenophon, perhaps, may have partially mingled a third with his narrative. Æschylus (Persæ, v. 767) appears to have followed a fourth. (Compare Stanley, ad Æschyl., l. c., and Larcher, ad Ctes., Pers., c. 2.) With these several accounts, again, what the Armenian writers tell us respecting Cyrus is directly at variance. (Compare Recherches Curieuses sur l'Histoire Ancienne de l'Asie, par Cyrbiel et Martin, p. 64, seqq.) Among the modern scholars who have espoused the cause of Ctesias, his recent editor, Bähr, stands most conspicuous. This writer regards the narrative of Herodotus as savouring of the Greek love for the marvellous, and thinks it to have been in some degree adumbrated from the story of the Theban Œdipus and his exposure on Cithæron; while, on the other hand, Xenophon presents Cyrus to our view as a young man, imbued with the precepts of the Socratic school, and exhibiting in his life and conduct a model for the imitation of others. The same scholar gives the following as what appears to him a near approximation to the true history of Cyrus. He supposes Cyrus not to have been of royal lineage, but to have been by birth in the rank of a subject, and gifted with rare endowments of mind. He makes him to have first seen the light at the time when the Medes possessed the empire of Asia. The provinces or divisions of this empire he supposes to have been held by satraps or viceroys, whose power, though derived from the monarch, was hereditary among themselves.

He makes Cambyses, the father, to have been one of these satraps; and Cyrus, the son, to have succeeded him. Their sway was over the Persians, whom they ruled with almost regal power. Cyrus at length revolted from the king of the Medes, and, by the aid of his immediate followers, obtained possession of the empire. In order, however, the better to keep in subjection the other nations composing the empire of Astyages, he wished to pass himself off as the son and lawful successor of the dethroned monarch. Hence arose the nuptials of Cyrus and Amytis the wife of Astyages. (Compare, as regards the Persian custom of intermarriage, Creuzer, Fragm. Hist., p. 223.—Freinsheim., ad Curt., 3, 11, 24, and 8, 2, 19.—Theodoret, Serm., 9, p. 614.—Bähr, ad Ctes., p. 91.) Hence, too, we may account for the circumstance of Astyages' not having been put to death, but being treated with great honour, and made the companion of Cyrus in his marches against those nations who would not acknowledge his sway. (Consult Bähr, ad Ctes., p. 86, seqq.)—Ctesias makes Cyrus to have reigned thirty years, and Herodotus twenty-nine. According to some authorities he died at a very advanced age. (Compare Xenophon, Cyrop., 8, 7, 1.) Scaliger, guided by Dinon and Ctesias, makes Cyrus to have reached the 218th year of the era of Nabonassar, i. e., B.C. 528. (De Emend. Temp., p. 402.)—The name Cyrus (Κύρος) is generally thought to have been deduced from a Persian word, meaning the Sun. (Plut., Vit. Artax., l.) Coray (ad Plut., l. c.) informs us, that the Sun is still called Kour by the Persians. (Compare Hesychius, s. v. Κύρος . . . ἀπὸ τοῦ ἡλίου τὸν γὰρ ἡλιον οἱ Πέρσαι Κύρον λέγουσιν; and Pletho., Schol. in Orac. Mag. Zoroastr., p. 68, lin. 3, a fine.) Ritter also adduces various authorities to show, that, among the ancient Persians, as well as other early Oriental nations, Kor and Koros denoted the Sun. (Vorhalle, p. 86, seqq.) Wahl had proved the same before him. (Vorder und Mittel-asien, vol. 1, p. 599.) The Hebrew Khoresh (Cyrus) is traced by Gesenius also to the Persian. (Heb. Lex., s. v.) The previous name of Cyrus appears to have been Agradates (Strabo, 729), which Rosenmüller explains by the Persian Agah-dar-dad, i. e., “juris cognitionem habens,” “jus tenens ac servans.” (Roseum., Handbuch, vol. 1, p. 367.—Bähr, ad Ctes., p. 458.)—II. Commonly called “the Younger,” to distinguish him from the preceding, was the second of the four sons of Darius Nothus and Parysatis. According to the customs of the monarchy, his elder brother Artaxerxes was the legitimate heir apparent; but Cyrus was the first son born to Darius after his accession to the throne; and he was also his mother's favourite. She had encouraged him to hope, that, as Xerxes, through the influence of Atossa, had been preferred to his elder brother, who was born while their father was yet in a private station, so she should be able to persuade Darius to set aside Artaxerxes, and declare Cyrus his successor. In the mean while he was invested with the government of the western provinces. This appointment he seems from the first to have considered as a step to the throne. He had, however, sagacity and courage enough to perceive, that, should he be disappointed in his first expectations, the co-operation of the Greeks might still enable him to force his way to the throne. It was with this view that he zealously embraced the side of Sparta in her struggle with Athens, both as the power which he found in the most prosperous condition, and as that which was most capable of furthering his designs. According to Plutarch (Vit. Artax., 2), Cyrus went to attend his father's sickbed with sanguine hopes that his mother had accomplished her purpose, and that he was sent for to receive the crown. On his arrival at court, however, he saw himself disappointed in his expectations, and found that he had only come to witness his father's death, and his brother's accession to the throne. He accompanied Artaxerxes, whom the Greeks distinguished by the epithet of Mnemon, to Pasargadæ, where the Persian kings went through certain mystic ceremonies of inauguration, and Tissaphernes took this opportunity of charging him with a design against his brother's life. It would seem, from Plutarch's account, that one of the officiating priests was suborned to support the charge; though it is by no means certain that it was unfounded. Artaxerxes was convinced of its truth, and determined on putting his brother to death; and Cyrus was only saved by the passionate entreaties of Parysatis, in whose arms he had sought refuge from the executioner. The character of Artaxerxes, though weak and timid, seems not to have been naturally unamiable. The ascendancy which his mother, notwithstanding her undissembled predilection for her younger son, exercised over him, was the source of the greater part of his crimes and misfortunes. On this occasion he suffered it to overpower both the suspicions suggested by Tissaphernes, and the jealousy which the temper and situation of Cyrus might reasonably have excited. He not only pardoned his brother, but permitted him to return to his government. Cyrus felt himself not obliged, but humbled, by his rival's clemency; and the danger he had escaped only strengthened his resolution to make himself, as soon as possible, independent of the power to which he owed his life. Immediately after his return to Sardis, he began to make preparations for the execution of his design. The chief difficulty was to keep them concealed from Artaxerxes until they were fully matured; for, though his mother, who was probably from the beginning acquainted with his purpose, was at court, always ready to put the most favourable construction on his conduct, yet Tissaphernes was at hand to watch it with malignant attention, and to send the earliest information of any suspicious movement to the king. Cyrus, however, devised a variety of pretexts to blind Tissaphernes and the court, while he collected an army for the expedition which he was meditating. His main object was to raise as strong a body of Greek troops as he could, for it was only with such aid that he could hope to overpower an adversary, who had the whole force of the empire at his command: and he knew enough of the Greeks to believe, that their superiority over his countrymen, in skill and courage, was sufficient to compensate for almost any inequality of numbers. In the spring of 401 B.C., Cyrus began his march from Sardis. His whole Grecian force, a part of which joined him on the route, amounted to 11,000 heavy infantry, and about 2000 targeteers. His barbarian troops were 100,000 strong. After directing his line of march through the whole extent of Asia Minor, he entered the Babylonian territory; and it was not until he reached the plain of Cunaxa, between sixty and seventy miles from Babylon, that he became certain of his brother's intention to hazard an engagement. Artaxerxes met him in this spot at the head of an army of 900,000 men. If we may believe Plutarch, the Persian monarch had continued to waver almost to the last, between the alternatives of fighting and retreating, and was only diverted from adopting the latter course by the energetic remonstrances of Tiribazus. In the battle which ensued, the Greeks soon routed the barbarians opposed to them, but committed an error in pursuing them too far, and Cyrus was compelled, in order to avoid being surrounded by the rest of the king's army, to make an attack upon the centre, where his brother was in person. He routed the royal body-guard, and, being hurried away by the violence of his feelings the moment he espied the king, he engaged with him, but was himself wounded and slain by a common soldier. Had Clearchus acted in conformity with the directions of Cyrus, and led his division against the king's centre, instead of being drawn off into pursuit of the flying enemy, the victory must have belonged to Cyrus. According to the Persian custom of treating slain rebels, the head and right hand of Cyrus were cut off and brought to the king, who is said himself to have seized the head by the hair, and to have held it up as a proof of his victory to the view of the surrounding crowd. Thus ended the expedition of Cyrus. Xenophon, who gives an account of the whole enterprise, pauses to describe the qualities and conduct by which this prince commanded love and respect, in a manner which shows how important the results of his success might have been for the welfare of Persia. The Greeks, after the battle, began to negotiate with the king through Tissaphernes, who offered to lead them home. He treacherously violated his word, however; and having, by an act of perfidy, obtained possession of the persons of the Greek commanders, he sent them up to the king at Babylon, where they were all put to death. The Greeks were not, however, discouraged, though at a great distance from their country, and surrounded on every side by a powerful enemy. They immediately chose new commanders, in the number of whom was Xenophon, who has given so beautiful and interesting an account of their celebrated retreat. (Vid. Xenophon.) According to Diodorus and Diogenes Laertius, the expedition was undertaken by Cyrus in the 4th year of the 94th Olympiad. Larcher, on the contrary, in a dissertation inserted in the 17th vol. of the Memoirs of the Academy of Inscriptions and Belles Lettres, makes it to have been in the third year of that Olympiad, in the end of March or beginning of April. He makes the battle of Cunaxa to have been fought at the end of October, in the 4th year of the same Olympiad, and the time which the whole expedition occupied, including the retreat, down to the period when the Greeks entered the army of Thymbron, to have been two years. (Plut., Vit. Artax.—Xen., Anab.—Thirlwall's Greece, vol. 4, p. 281, seqq.)—III. A large river of Asia, rising in Iberia and falling into the Caspian; now the Kur. This river waters the great valley of Georgia, and is increased by the Aragui, the Iora, probably the Iberus of the ancients, and the Atasan, which is their Alazo. When it reaches the plains of Shirvan, its waters are mixed with those of the Aras or Araxes. These two rivers form several branches, sometimes united and sometimes separated, so that it appears uncertain, as it was in the time of Strabo and Ptolemy, whether their mouths were to be considered as separate, or whether the Cyrus received the Araxes. (Plin., 4, 10.—Id., 6, 9.—Id., 10, 13.—Mela, 3, 5.—Strabo, 345.)

ЦЫТА, a city of Colchis, in the interior of the country, near the river Phasis, and northeast of Tyndaris. It was the birthplace of Medea, and its site corresponds at the present day to Kutais, the capital of the Russian province of Imnerethi. The inhabitants, like the Colchians generally, were famed for their acquaintance with poisonous herbs and magic rites. Scylax calls the place Malê (Μάλη), which Vossius changes to Cyta (Κύτα). Medea was called Cytaïs from this her native city. (Steph. Byz., s. v.—Cellar., Geog. Antiq., vol. 1, p. 308.)

ЦΥΤΕΙΣ, a surname given to Medea by the poets, from her having been born at Cyta. (Propert., 2, 1, 73.)

ЦΥΤΗΡΑ, now Cerigo, an island on the coast of Laconia in Peloponnesus. It was particularly sacred to the goddess Venus, who was hence surnamed Cytheræa, and who rose, as fables tell us, from the sea, near its coasts. Stephanus of Byzantium says, that the island derived its name Cythera from a Phœnician named Cytherus, who settled in it. Before his arrival it was called Porphyris or Porphyryssa, according to Eustathius (ad Dion. Perieg., 500), from the quantity of purple fish found on its shores; but the name of Cythera is as ancient as the time of Homer. (Od., 1, 80.) The fable respecting Venus' having arisen from the sea in its vicinity, means nothing more than that her worship was introduced into the island by some maritime people, probably the Phœnicians. Cythera was a place of great importance to the Spartans, since an enemy, if in possession of it, would be thereby enabled to ravage the southern coast of Laconia. Its harbours also sheltered the Spartan fleets, and afforded protection to all merchant vessels against the attacks of pirates, whose depredations, on the other hand, would have been greatly facilitated by its acquisition. (Thucyd., 4, 53.) Hence the Argives, who originally held it, were driven out eventually by the Spartans. A magistrate was sent yearly from Sparta, styled Cytherodices, to administer justice, and to examine into the state of the island; and so important a position was it, that Demaratus expressly advised Xerxes to seize it with a part of his fleet, since by that means he would compel the Spartans to withdraw from the confederacy, and defend their own territories. Demaratus quoted, on this occasion, the opinion of Chilo, the Lacedæmonian sage, who had declared it would be a great benefit to Sparta if that island were sunk into the sea. Cythera (Cerigo) is now one of the Ionian islands. (Virg., Æn., 1, 262; 10, 5.—Pausan., 3, 33.—Ovid., Mét., 4, 288; 15, 386.—Fast., 4, 15.—Herodot., 1, 29.)

CYTHÆA, a surname of Venus, from her rising out of the ocean near the island of Cythera.

CYTHNOS, an island between Ceos and Seriphus, in the Mare Myrtoium, colonized by the Dryopes. (Artem., ap. Strab., 485.—Dicaarch., Ins., 27.) It was the birthplace of Cyadai, an eminent painter. The cheese of Cythnos, according to Stephanus and Julius Pollux, was held in high estimation among the ancients. The island is now called Thermia. It was also named Ophiussa and Dryopis. (Cramer's Anc. Greece, vol. 3, p. 403.)

CYTHNËUM, the most considerable of the four cities of Doris in Greece. According to Thucydides (3, 95), it was situate to the west of Parnassus, and on the borders of the Locri Ozole. Æschines observes, that it sent one deputy to the Amphictyonic council. (De Fals. Leg., p. 43.)

CYTÖRUM, a city of Paphlagonia, on the coast between the promontory Carambis and Amastris. It was a Greek town of great antiquity, since Homer alludes to it (Il., 2, 853), and is thought to have been founded by a colony of Milesians. According to Strabo (545), it had been a port of the inhabitants of Sinope. In its vicinity was a mountain, named Cytorus, which produced a beautifully-veined species of box-tree. (Catullus, 4, 13.—Virg., Georg., 2, 437.) The ruins of the ancient city are found near a harbour called Quitros or Kitros. (Tavernier, Voyage, lib. 3, c. 6.) In the vicinity is a high mountain called Kutros or Kotru. (Abulfeda, tab. 18, p. 309.—Mannert, Geogr., vol. 6, pt. 3, p. 23.)

CYZICUS, I. an island off the northern coast of Mysia, nearly triangular in shape, and about five hundred stadia in circuit. Its base was turned towards the Propontis, while the vertex advanced so closely to the continent that it was easy to connect it by a double bridge. This, as Pliny reports, was done by Alexander. Scylax, however, says that it was always a peninsula, and his authority is followed by Mannert, who is of opinion that the inhabitants may, after the time of Scylax, have separated it from the mainland by a canal or ditch, for purposes of security. (Plin., 5, 32.—Mannert, Geogr., vol. 6, pt. 3, p. 527.) It is certainly a peninsula at the present day, and there are no indications whatever of the bridges mentioned by Pliny and others. (Scutini, Viaggio, p. 502.—Cramer's Asia Minor, vol. 1, p. 47.)—II. A celebrated city of Mysia, on the island of the same name, situate partly in the plain which extended to the bridges connecting the island with the continent, and partly on the slope of Mount Arceton-oros. Its first foundation is ascribed by Conon to a colony of Pelasgi from Thessaly, under the conduct of Cyzicus, son of Apollo, and Aristides speaks of the god himself as the founder of the city. (Orat. Cycic., 1, p. 114.) In process of time the Pelasgi were expelled by the Tyrrheni, and these again made way for the Milesians, who are generally looked upon by the Greeks as the real settlers, to whom the foundation of Cyzicus is to be attributed. (Conon, Narrat., 41.—Strab., 635.) Cyzicus became, in process of time, a flourishing commercial city, and was at the height of its prosperity, when, through the means of the kings of Pergamus, it secured the favour and protection of Rome. Florus speaks in the highest terms of its beauty and opulence; and Strabo assures us that it equalled in these respects, as well as in the wisdom of its political institutions and the firmness of its government, the most renowned cities of Asia. The Cyzicene commonwealth resembled those of Rhodes, Marseilles, and Carthage. They elected three magistrates, who were curators of the public buildings and stores. They possessed extensive arsenals and granaries, and care was taken to preserve the wheat by mixing it with Chalcidic earth. Owing to these wise and salutary precautions, they were enabled to sustain an arduous and memorable siege against Mithradates, king of Pontus, by both sea and land, until relieved by Lucullus. (Appian, Bell. Mithr., c. 73, seqq.—Plut., Vit. Lucull., c. 9, seqq.—Strab., 575.) The Romans, in acknowledgment of the bravery and fidelity displayed by the Cyziceni on this occasion, granted to them their independence, and greatly enlarged their territory. Under the emperors, Cyzicus continued to prosper greatly, and in the time of the Byzantine sway it was the metropolis of the Hellespontine province. (Hierocl., p. 661.) It was nearly destroyed by an earthquake, A.D. 943. Cyzicus gave birth to several historians, philosophers, and other writers. The coins of this place, called Κυζικηνὸι στατήρες, were so beautiful as to be deemed a miracle of art. Proserpina was worshipped as the chief deity of the place, and the inhabitants had a legend among them, that their city was given by Jupiter to this goddess, as a portion of her dowry. The ruins of Cyzicus now pass by the name of Atraki. (Cramer's Asia Minor, vol. 1, p. 40, seqq.)—III. A king of the Dolionians, a people who are said to have been the first inhabitants of the district of Cyzicus in Mysia. He was killed in a night encounter by the Argonauts, whom he had mistaken for enemies. (Vid. Argonautæ.)

D.

DÆE or DAHÆ (called by Herodotus Δαί), a people who dwelt on the southeastern borders of the Caspian Sea, in the province of Hyrcania. They seem to have been a roving nomadic tribe. Virgil (Æn., 728) styles them indomiti; and Servius, in commenting on the passage of the poet where the term occurs, states that they extended to the northern part of Persia. He must allude evidently to the incursions they were accustomed to make into the countries south of Hyrcania. (Compare Plin., 6, 17.—Mela, 1, 2, and 3, 5.) Their country is supposed by some to answer to the modern Dahistan. (Plin., 6, 17.—Curt., 7, 4.—Herod., 1, 125.)

DACIA, a large country of Europe, bounded on the south by the Danube, which separated it from Mesia, on the north by Sarmatia, on the east by the Tyras and Pontus Euxinus, and on the west by the Iazyges Metanastæ. It corresponded nearly to Valachia, Transylvania, Moldavia, and that part of Hungary which lies to the east of the Tibiscus or Teiss, one of the northern branches of the Danube. In A.D. 105, Trajan added this country to the Roman empire. He erected a stately bridge over the Danube, 3325 English feet in length. This Aurelian destroyed: his motive in so doing is said to have been the fear lest the barbarians would find it an easy passage to the countries south of the Danube, for he had by a treaty abandoned to the Goths the Dacia of Trajan. (Vopisc., 33, 39.) On this occasion he named the province south of the Danube, to which his forces were withdrawn, Dacia Aureliani. (Vid. Mœsia.) There were afterward distinguished in Dacia, the part bordering on the Danube and called Ripensis, and that which was sequestered in the interior country under the name of Mediterranea. This last was probably the same with what was more anciently termed Dardania. The Daci of the Romans are the same with the Gætæ of the Greeks. (Mannert, Geogr., vol. 4, p. 188, seqq.) From Dacus comes Dacus, the common name of slaves in Greek and Roman plays. Gætæ was used in the same sense. The Daci were, in process of time, successively subdued by the Sarmatæ, the Goths, and the Huns; and lastly, the Saxons, driven by the conquests of Charlemagne, established themselves in Dacia. The Saxons principally concentrated themselves in what is now Transylvania, corresponding to the ancient Dacia Mediterranea, a fertile region, surrounded with forests and metalliferous mountains. (Sambuzo, Append. Rer. Hung. Bonfin., p. 760.) To their coming must be entirely attributed the origin of its cultivation. All its principal towns were built by them: traces of their language still remain; and it is from them that Transylvania received the name of Siebenburgen, or the Region of Seven Cities. (Chron. Hung., c. 2, ap. Rer. Hung. Script., p. 31.—Clarke's Travels—Greece, Egypt, Holy Land, &c., vol. 8, p. 295, seqq.)

DACIUS, I. a surname of the Emperor Trajan, from his conquest of Dacia. (Rasche, Lex. Rei Num., vol. 3, col. 27.)—II. A surname, supposed, but erroneously, to have been assumed by Domitian, on account of a pretended victory over the Dacians. The coins on which it occurs are Trajan's. (Achaintre, ad Juv., Sat., 6, 204.)

DACTYLI. Vid. Idæi Dactyli.

DÆDALA, I. a town of Caria, near the confines of Lycia, and on the northern shore of the Glaucus Sinus. It was said to have derived its name from Dædalus, who, being stung by a snake on crossing the small river Nims, died and was buried here. (Steph. Byz., s. v. Δαίδαλα.)—II. A mountain, in the vicinity of the city of the same name, and on the confines of Lycia. (Strabo, 664)—III. Two festivals in Bœotia. One of these was observed at Alalcomenæ by the Plataeans, in a large grove, where they exposed, in the open air, pieces of boiled flesh, and carefully observed whither the crows that had come to prey upon them directed their flight. All the trees upon which any of these birds alighted were immediately cut down, and with them statues were made, called Dædala, in honour of Dædalus—The other festival was of a more solemn kind. It was celebrated every sixty years by all the cities of Bœotia, as a compensation for the intermission of the smaller festival for that number of years, during the exile of the Plataeans. Fourteen of the statues called Dædala were distributed by lot among the Plataeans, Lebadæans, Coroneans, Orchomenians, Thespians, Thebans, Tanagraeans, and Chæroneans, because they had effected a reconciliation among the Plataeans, and caused them to be recalled from exile about the time that Thebes was restored by Cassander, the son of Antipater. During this festival, a woman in the habit of a bride-maid accompanied a statue, which was dressed in female garments, along the banks of the Eurotas. This procession was attended to the top of Mount Cithæron by many of the Bœotians, who had places assigned them by lot. Here an altar of square pieces of wood, cemented together like stones, was erected, and upon it were thrown large quantities of combustible materials. Afterward a bull was sacrificed to Jupiter, and an ox heifer to Juno, by every one of the cities of Bœotia, and by the most opulent that attended. The poorest citizens offered small cattle; and all these oblations, together with the Dædala, were thrown in the common heap and set on fire, and totally reduced to ashes. The festival originated in this: when Juno, after a quarrel with Jupiter, had retired to Eubœa, and refused to return, the god went to consult Cithæron, king of Plataea, to find some effectual measure to subdue her obstinacy. Cithæron advised him to dress a statue in woman's apparel, and carry it in a chariot, and publicly to report it was Plataea, the daughter of Asopus, whom he was going to marry. The advice was followed, and Juno, informed of her husband's future marriage, repaired in haste to meet the chariot, and was easily united to him, when she discovered the artful measures he made use of to effect a reconciliation. (Pausan., 9, 3.) Plutarch composed an entire treatise on this festival, some fragments of which have been preserved by Eusebius (Præp. Evang., 3, 1, p. 83.—Plut., Op. ed. Hutten., vol. 14, p. 287), and agree with the account given in Pausanias, except that, in the narrative of Eusebius, Cithæron is called Alalcomene, and Plataea, Dædala. (Stebelis, ad Pausan., l. c.)

DÆDALUS, I. the name of a celebrated artist of antiquity, said to have been a native of Athens. In treating of him, it is requisite first to mention, that the statements of ancient writers respecting him cannot be understood as exhibiting the true history of an individual, but rather as obscurely intimating the origin and progress of the arts in Greece; and, in particular, the information which is afforded respecting the place of his birth, and the countries in which he lived, seems to reflect light on the districts in which the arts were first cultivated. In noticing the accounts which have reached us, of the personal history of the artist Dædalus, the name itself first claims our attention. We learn from Pausanias (9, 3, 2), that all statues and images were anciently styled δαίδαλα, and as this designation was common long before the birth of the Athenian artist Dædalus, it is inferred that the name Dædalus was given to him on account of his productions. We have many similar instances of names given to individuals, to show either the origin of particular acts, or the talents, ingenuity, and other excellences of artists. Diodorus Siculus (4, 76, seqq.) and Pausanias (7, 4, 5.—Id., 9, 3, 2), together with other writers, say that he was born in Attica; but Ausonius (Mos., 301) designates him as a Cretan, probably because a large portion of his time was spent in the island of Crete. The name of his father is variously stated by different authors. Plato (Ion, p. 363) and Diodorus Siculus (4, 76, seqq.) give the name as Metoneus. On the other hand, Hyginus (fab., 274), Suidas, Servius (ad Virg., Æn., 6, 14), and some other authorities, mention Eupalamus as his parent. Pausanias (9, 3, 4) calls the latter Palamius; and thus we have three names contended for by different authors, all of which imply descent from some skillful and ingenious person. Dædalus was celebrated for his skill in architecture and statuary. His nephew, named Talus or Perdix, showed a great genius for mechanics; having, from the contemplation of a serpent's teeth, invented the saw, and applied it to the cutting up of timber. Dædalus, jealous of his skill, and apprehensive of the rivalry of the young man, cast him down from the Acropolis and killed him. For this murder he was banished by the court of Areopagus, and he betook himself to Minos, king of Crete, for whom he built the Labyrinth. He also devised an ingenious species of dance for Ariadne, the daughter of that monarch (Il., 18, 590); but, having formed the wooden cow for Pasiphaë, he incurred the displeasure of the king, and was thrown into prison. Having, by means of Pasiphaë, escaped from confinement, he determined to flee from Crete; but, being unable to get away by sea, he resolved to attempt flight through the air. He made, accordingly, wings of feathers united by wax, for himself and his son Icarus. They mounted into the air; but Icarus ascending too high, and approaching too near the sun, its heat melted the wax, and the youth fell into the sea and was drowned. Dædalus arrived in safety in Sicily, where he was kindly received by Cocalus, king of that island, who took up arms in his defence against Minos, when the latter pursued him thither. (Apollod., 3, 15, 9.—Ovid, Met., 8, 103, seqq.—Phalisci Fragm., 1, p. 145, ed. Göller.) Here, too, he was employed in erecting several great architectural works, some of which were extant even in the time of Diodorus. This author states that he died in Sicily, but others mention that he went to Egypt, where he left monuments of his ability (Scylax Peripl.); and others, again, assert, that he was a member of the colony which Aristæus is said by some to have established in Sardinia.—Thus much for the pretended history of Dædalus. It must be evident, that under the name of this artist are concealed facts respecting the origin of Grecian art, which took its rise in Attica, and then spread, under different circumstances, into Crete and Sicily. Dædalus, therefore (δαίδαλος, “ingenious,” “inventive”), is merely a personification of manual art. He was the Eponymus of the class of Dædalids, or statues, at Athens, and there were various wooden statues, preserved till late times, and said to be the work of his hands. Icarus (from εἰκω, “to be like,” εἰκῶν, ἑκῆλος) was a suitable name for his son, and the resemblance between it and the name of the Icarian Sea probably gave occasion to the legend of the flight through the air. (Sillig, Dict. Art., s. v.—Keightley's Mythology, p. 398.) Dædalus is said to have introduced several improvements into the forms of ancient statues, by separating the legs, which before were closed together, and representing his statues in the attitude of moving forward; and also by opening the eyes, which were previously shut. Hence arose the fabulous statement, invented at a subsequent period, that Dædalus communicated motion to statues by an infusion of quicksilver. (Plat., Men., p. 97, ed. Stalb.—Aristot., Polit., 1, 4.—Suid., s. v. δαίδαλον ποιῆματα.—Böttiger, Andeutungen, p. 49.) Dædalus is mentioned as the inventor of the axe, plumbline, auger, and also of glue; and likewise as the person who first introduced masts and sails into ships. (Plin., 7, 56.—Varr., Fragm., p. 325, ed. Bip.)—II. A statuery of Sicily, who flourished in the 95th Olympiad, or 400–397 B.C. (Plin., 34, 8.—Sillig, Dict. Art., s. v.)—III. A statuery of Bithynia, author of an admirable figure of Ζεὺς Στράτιος, which was preserved at Nicomedia. (Arrian, ap. Eustath., ad Dionys. Perieg., 796.) Thiersch thinks that he lived after the founding of Nicomedia. He certainly flourished when the arts had been brought to a high state of perfection in Greece. (Sillig, Dict. Art., s. v.)

DAIÆ. Vid. Dæ.

DALMATIA, a part of Illyricum, between the rivers Titus and Drinus, and the ranges of the Bebian mountains and Scardus. It derived its name from the Dalmates, a barbarous but valiant race, supposed to be of Thracian origin, and who were very skilful in navigating the sea along their coast, and extremely bold in their piracies. The modern name of the country is the same with the ancient. The capital, Dalminium or Delminium, was taken and destroyed by the Romans, B.C. 157; the country, however, was not completely subdued until the time of Augustus, who is said by Appian (Bell. Ill. c. 25) to have concluded the war in person before he became emperor. According to Strabo, the Dalmatians had a peculiar custom of dividing their lands every eight years, and had no coined money. The geographer also informs us, that they possessed fifty towns, all of considerable size, several of which were burned by Augustus. Their capital he calls Dalmium, and derives from it the name of the nation. (Strab., 315.) The Romans, after their conquest of this country, divided it into Dalmatia Maritima and Mediterranea, and made it part of the province of Illyricum, forming the lower portion of Illyria Barbara. Dalmatia, however, is sometimes made to comprehend a much wider tract of country, namely, all Illyria Barbara, or the region between Istria and Dyrrhachium, the Adriatic Sea and the Danube. Dalmatia was the native land of several of the Roman emperors, who exerted themselves, accordingly, to improve its condition. Many cities, therefore, and splendid structures arose in various parts of it; and, after the new division of the Roman provinces under Constantine and Theodosius, Dalmatia became one of the most important parts of the empire. (Flor., 4, 12.—Sueton., Vit. Tib., c. 9.—Id., Vit. Aug., c. 21.—Jordan., de Regn. Succ., p. 39, 58.—Id., de Reb. Get., p. 109, 128, 136.)

DALMATIUS, a nephew of Constantine the Great. He was invested by this emperor with the title of Cæsar, and commanded against the Goths in Thrace, Macedonia, and Greece. Dalmatius fell in a tumult of his own soldiers, A.D. 338, brought about by the intrigues of Constantius, after the death of Constantine. (Zosim., 2, 39, seq.—Compare Crozier, Hist. des Emp., vol. 6, p. 395.)

DALMINIUM, the capital of Dalmatia, and from which the Dalmatæ are said to have derived their name. It was situate to the east of the river Naro, and north-east of Narona. This place, like many other of the Dalmatian towns, was situate on an eminence. Hence, when it was attacked by the Romans, the usual machines could not be brought up against it, and the consul Figulus was compelled to dart burning brands from his catapultas. As the fortifications of the place were of wood, these were soon reduced to ashes, and with them a large part of the city itself. Strabo (315) and Stephanus of Byzantium write the name Dalmion (Δάλμιον). The reduction of this city by Figulus took place B.C. 119. (Appian, Bell. Ill., 11.—Mannert, Geogr., vol. 7, p. 372.)

DAMASCENE, or DAMASCENË (ἡ Δαμασκηνή χώρα), a name given to the region around Damascus, in Syria. (Plin., 5, 12.—Strab., 756.)

DAMASCUS, a philosopher, a native of Damascus. He commenced his studies under Ammonius at Alexandria, and completed them at Athens under Marinus, Isidorus, and Zenodotus. According to some, he was the successor of Isidorus. It is certain, however, that he was the last professor of New-Platonism at Athens. He appears to have been a man of excellent judgment, and to have had a strong attachment for the sciences, particularly mathematics. He wrote a work entitled Ἀπορία καὶ λύσεις περὶ τῶν πρώτων ἀρχῶν, “Doubts and solutions concerning the origin of things.” Of this only two fragments remain, one preserved by Photius, which forms a biographical sketch of Isidorus of Gaza; the other treating περὶ γεννητοῦ, “of what has been procreated.” A Munich MS. is said to contain an unedited work of his, entitled Ἀπορία καὶ λύσεις εἰς τὸν Πλάτωνος Παμενίδην, “Doubts and solutions relative to the Parmenides of Plato.” (Arctin, Beiträge zur Gesch. und Lit., vol. 1, p. 21.—Schöll, Hist. Lit. Gr., vol. 7, p. 117, seq.)

DAMASCUS (in Hebrew Dammesek), one of the principal cities of Syria, in what was called Cæle-Syria, a few miles to the east of Antilibanus, where the chain begins to turn off to the southeast, under the name of Carmel. It was beautifully situated in an extensive and pleasant plain, still called Goutch Demesk, or the orchard of Damascus, and watered by a river called by the Greeks Bardine or Chrysorrhoeas, the golden stream, now Baradi. The Syriac name of this stream was Pharphar. Damascus is supposed to have been founded by Uz, the eldest son of Aram. (Gen., 10, 23.) However this may be, it subsisted in the time of Abraham, and may be reckoned one of the most ancient cities of Syria. It was conquered by David (2 Sam., 8, 6), but freed itself from the Jewish yoke in the time of Solomon (1 Kings, 11, 23, seqq.), and became the seat of a new principality, which often harassed the kingdoms of both Judah and Israel. It afterward fell, in succession, under the power of the Assyrians and Persians, and came from the latter into the hands of the Seleucidæ. Damascus, however, did not flourish as much under the Greek dynasty as it had while held by the Persians. The Seleucidæ neglected the place, and bestowed all their favour on the new cities erected by them in the northern parts of Syria; and here, no doubt, lies the reason why the later Greek and Roman writers say so little of the city itself, though they are all loud in their praises of the adjacent country. Damascus was seized by the Romans in the war of Pompey with Tigranes, B.C. 65, but still continued, as under the Greek dynasty, a comparatively unimportant place, until the time of Dioclesian. This emperor, feeling the necessity of a strongly fortified city in this quarter, as a depôt for munitions of war, and a military post against the frequent inroads of the Saracens, selected Damascus for the purpose. Everything was done, accordingly, to strengthen the place; extensive magazines were also established, and likewise numerous workshops for the preparation of weapons of war. (Malala, Chron., 11, p. 132.—Notitia Imperii.) It is not unlikely that the high reputation to which Damascus afterward attained, for its manufacture of sword-blades and other works in steel, may have had its first foundations laid by this arrangement on the part of Dioclesian. The city continued from this time a flourishing place. In the 7th century it fell into the hands of the Saracens, and was for some time after this the seat of the califs. Its prosperity, too, remained unimpaired, since the route of the principal caravans to Mecca lay through it. It is now the capital of a pachaic. The Arabs call it El-Sham, and the Oriental name Demesk is known only to geographers. It is one of the most beautiful and pleasant cities of Asia, and is by the Arabs considered the first of the four terrestrial paradises. Its population is variously estimated from 80,000 to 200,000. Volney gives the former number, and Ali Bey the latter. The Christian population is estimated by Connor at about 20,000, including Greeks, Catholics, Latins, Maronites, Armenians, and Nestorians, but he says "this is a rough calculation. It is impossible to know the exact number." (Mannert, Geogr., vol. 6, pt. 1, p. 409, seqq.)

DAMASIPPUS, I. a prætor during the consulship of Papirius Carbo and the younger Marius, A.U.C. 671. As a follower of the Marian party, he indulged in many cruel excesses against the opposite faction, and also against such as were suspected of favouring it. He was put to death by Sylla. (Sallust, Cat., 51.—Vell. Patere., 2, 26.)—II. A character in Horace, who is there represented as having been at first a virtuoso, or dealer in antiques, but who, proving unfortunate in this branch of business, assumed the name and appearance of a Stoic philosopher. (Horat., Sat., 2, 3, 17, seqq.)

DAMNII, one of the ancient nations of Scotland, whose country answered to the modern Clydesdale, Renfrew, Lennox, and Stirling. (Ptol.—Mannert, Geogr. vol. 2, p. 207.)

DAMNONII or DUMNONII, a people of Britain, whose country answered to the modern Devonshire and Corn- wall. As the several tribes of the Damnonii submitted without much resistance to the Romans, and never joined in any revolt against them, their conquerors were under no necessity of building many forts or keeping many garrisons in their country. Hence it happens, that few Roman antiquities have been found here, and that the name of its people is seldom mentioned by the Roman writers. Mannert considers the name Dumnonii the more correct of the two. (Geogr., vol. 2, p. 195.)

DAMOCLES, one of the flatterers of Dionysius the Elder, of Sicily. Having in the course of conversation extolled the power and wealth of the tyrant, and the abundant means of felicity by which the latter appeared to be surrounded, Dionysius asked him whether he would like to make trial of this same state, which seemed to him so happy a one. Damocles eagerly assented, and the tyrant caused him to be placed on a purple couch, most beautifully adorned with various embroidery. Vessels of gold and silver, richly wrought, met his view on every side, and an exquisite banquet was served up by slaves of the most attractive mien, who were attentive to his every command. Damocles thought himself at the summit of human felicity; when, happening to cast his eyes upward towards the richly carved ceiling, he perceived a sword, suspended from it by a single horsehair, directly over his neck as he lay reclined at the banquet. All feeling of delight instantly left him; and he begged the tyrant to allow him to depart, since he no longer wished to enjoy this kind of felicity. And thus was Damocles taught the salutary lesson, that little, if any, enjoyment is found in the possession of usurped power, when every moment is imbibed by the dread of impending conspiracy and danger. (Cic. Tusc., 5, 22.—Compare Philo, ap. Euseb., Præp. Evang., 8, 14, p. 391.—Macrob., ad Somn. Scip., 1, 10.—Sidon. Apoll., 2, 13.—Horat., Od., 3, 1, 17.)

DAMON, a Pythagorean philosopher of Syracuse, united by ties of the firmest friendship to Phintias (not Pythias, as the name is commonly given), another Pythagorean, of the same city. Dionysius the tyrant having condemned Phintias to death for conspiring against him, the latter begged that leave might be allowed him to go for a short period to a neighbouring place, in order to arrange some family affairs, and offered to leave one of his friends in the hands of Dionysius as a pledge for his return by an appointed time, and who would be willing, in case Phintias broke his word, to die in his stead. Dionysius, quite sceptical as to the existence of such friendship, and prompted by strong curiosity, assented to the arrangement, and Damon took the place of Phintias. The day appointed for the return of the latter arrived, and public expectation was highly excited as to the probable issue of this singular affair. The day drew to a close, no Phintias came, and Damon was in the act of being led to execution, when, on a sudden, the absent friend, who had been detained by unforeseen and unavoidable obstacles, presented himself to the eyes of the admiring crowd, and saved the life of Damon. Dionysius was so much struck by this instance of true attachment, that he pardoned Phintias, and entreated the two to allow him to share their friendship. (Diod. Sic., fragm., lib. 10, vol. 4, p. 52, seqq., ed. Bip.—Val. Max., 4, 7, 1, ext. ed. Hase.—Phint., de amic. mult., p. 93.)

DAMOPHILA, a poetess of Lesbos, intimate with Sappho. She composed a hymn on the worship of the Pergæan Diana. (Philostrat., Vit. Apollon., 1, 20.)

DAMOXENUS, a boxer of Syracuse, excluded from the Nemean games for killing his opponent in a pugilistic encounter. The name of the latter was Creugas, and the two competitors, after having consumed the entire day in boxing, agreed each to receive from the other a blow without flinching. Creugas first struck Damoxenus on the head, and then Damoxenus, with his fingers unfairly stretched out, struck Creugas on the side : and such, observes Pausanias, was the hardness of his nails and the violence of the blow, that his hand pierced his side, seized on his bowels, and, drawing them outward, gave instant death to Creugas.—A fine piece of sculpture has come down to us, with this for its subject. (Pausan., 8, 40.)

DANA, a large town of Cappadocia. D'Anville makes it to have been the same with Tyana, an opinion which is ably refuted by Mannert, who maintains that it lay more to the southeast, and coincided with the Tanadaris of Ptolemy. It is mentioned in Xenophon's Anabasis as being in the vicinity of the Cilician Gates (1, 2). The position of Tyana on Mannert's chart is north of the Cilician pass ; in D'Anville's it is to the northeast. (Mannert, Geogr., vol. 6, pt. 2, p. 239, 263.)

DANÆ, I. the daughter of Acrisius, king of Argos, by Eurydice, daughter of Lacedæmon. Acrisius inquired of the oracle about a son ; and the god replied that he would himself have no male issue, but that his daughter would bear a son, whose hand would deprive him of life. Fearing the accomplishment of this prediction, he framed a brazen subterranean chamber (θάλαμον χάλκεον ὑπὸ γῆρ), in which he shut up his daughter and her nurse, in order that she might never become a mother. (The Latin poets call the place of confinement a brazen tower.) But Jupiter had seen and loved the maiden ; and, under the form of a golden shower, he poured through the roof into her bosom. Danaë became, in consequence, the mother of a son, whom she and her nurse reared in secrecy until he had attained his fourth year. Acrisius then chanced to hear the voice of the child at play. He brought out his daughter and her nurse, and, putting the latter instantly to death, drew Danaë privately, with her child, to the altar of Hercean Jove, where he made her answer on oath whose was her son. She replied that he was the offspring of Jove. Her father gave no credit to her protestations. Enclosing her and the boy in a coffer, he cast them into the sea, to the mercy of the winds and waves, a circumstance which has afforded a subject for a beautiful piece by the poet Simonides. The coffer was carried to the little island of Seriphus, where a person named Dictys drew it out in his nets (δίκτυα) ; and, freeing Danaë and Perseus from their confinement, treated them with the greatest attention. Polydectes, the brother of Dictys, reigned over the island. He fell in love with Danaë ; but her son Perseus, who was now grown up, was an invincible obstacle in his way. He had, therefore, recourse to artifice to deliver himself of his presence ; and, feigning that he was about to become a suitor to Hippodamia, the daughter of Enomaus, he managed to send Perseus, who had bound himself by a rash promise, in quest of the head of the Gorgon Medusa, which he pretended that he wished for a bridal gift. When Perseus had succeeded, by the aid of Hermes, in destroying the Gorgon, he proceeded to Seriphus, where he found that his mother and Dictys had been obliged to fly to the protection of the altar from the violence of Polydectes. He immediately went to the royal residence ; and when, at his desire, Polydectes had summoned thither all the people, to see the formidable head of the Gorgon, it was displayed, and each became a stone of the form and position which he exhibited at the moment of the transformation. Having established Dictys as king of Seriphus, Perseus returned with his mother to Argos, and, not finding Acrisius there, proceeded to Larissa in Thessaly, whither the latter had retired through fear of the fulfilment of the oracle. Here he inadvertently killed Acrisius. (Vid. Acrisius, Perseus.)—There was a legend in Italy, that Ardea, the capital of the Rutulians, had been founded by Danaë. (Virg., Æn., 7, 372, 410.) It was probably caused by the similarity of sound in Danaë and Daunia. Daunus is the father of Turnus.—An explanation of the legend of Danaë will be found under the article Perseus. (Apollod., 2, 4, seqq.—Keightley's Mythology, p. 414, seqq.)

DANAI, a name originally belonging to the Argives, as being, according to the common opinion, the subjects of Danaüs. In consequence, however, of the warlike character of the race, and the high renown acquired by them, Homer uses the name Danaoi (Δαναοί) as a general appellation for the Greeks, when that of Hellenes was still confined to a narrower range. (Vid. Danaüs.)

DANAÏDES, the fifty daughters of Danaüs, king of Argos. An account of the legend connected with their names will be found, together with an explanation of the same, under the article Danaüs.

DANAPĒRIS, another name for the Borysthenes, first mentioned in an anonymous Periplus of the Euxine Sea. It is now the Dnieper. The Dnieper rises in the Valdai hills, near the sources of the Duna, and, after a winding course of about 800 miles, falls into the Black Sea, a little to the east of the Dniester. In the lower part of its course the navigation is impeded by islands, and at one place, about two hundred miles from its mouth, by falls, which continue for nearly forty miles. A little above its mouth, the river widens into a kind of lake or marsh, called Liman, into which the Bog, the ancient Hypanis or Bogus, one of the principal tributaries of the Dnieper, discharges itself. As regards the root of the name Danaperis (Dan, Don), consult remarks under the article Tanaïs. (Phin., 4, 12.—Mela, 2, 1.—Ammian. Marcell., 22, 18.—Jornand., de Reb. Get., p. 5.)

DANASTUS, another name of the Tyras or Dniester. It is called Danastus by Ammianus Marcellinus (31, 3), Danastris by Constantine Porphyrogenitus (de administr. Imperio, c. 8), and Danaster by Jornandes (de Reb. Get., p. 84). The Dniester rises from a lake amid the Carpathian Mountains in Austrian Galicia, and empties into the Black Sea after a course of about six hundred miles. The name Tyras (Τύρας) occurs in Ptolemy, Strabo, Stephanus of Byzantium, and Seymnus of Chios. Herodotus gives the Ionic form Τύρης. (Herod., 4, 51.) As regards the root of the name (Dan, Don), consult remarks under the article Tanaïs.

DANÆUS, a son of Belus and Anchinœ, and brother of Ægyptus. Belus assigned the country of Libya to Danaus, while to Ægyptus he gave Arabia. Ægyptus conquered the country of the Melampodes, and named it from himself. By many wives he became the father of fifty sons. Danaüs had by several wives an equal number of daughters. Dissension arising between him and the sons of Ægyptus, they aimed at depriving him of his kingdom ; and, fearing their violence, he built, with the aid of Minerva, a fifty-oared vessel, the first that ever was made, in which he embarked with his daughters, and fled over the sea. He first landed on the Isle of Rhodes, where he set up a statue of the Indian Minerva ; but, not willing to abide in that island, he proceeded to Argos, where Gel-anor, who at that time ruled over the country, cheerfully resigned the government to the stranger who brought thither civilization and the arts. The people took the name of their new monarch, and were called Danaoi (Δαναοί). The country of Argos being at this time extremely deficient in pure and wholesome water (Vid. Inachus), Danaüs sent forth his daughters in quest of some. As Amymone, one of them, was engaged in the search, she was rescued by Neptune from the intended violence of a satyr, and the god revealed to her a fountain called after her name, and the most famous among the streams that contributed to form the Lernæan lake or marsh. The sons of Ægyptus came now to Argolis, and entreated their uncle to bury past enmity in oblivion, and to give them their cousins in marriage. Danaüs, retaining a perfect recollection of the injuries they had done him, and distrustful of their promises, consented to bestow upon them his daughters, whom he divided among them by lot; but, on the wedding-day, he armed the hands of the brides with daggers, and enjoined upon them to slay in the night their unsuspecting bridegrooms. All but Hypermnestra obeyed the cruel orders of their father; and, cutting off the heads of their husbands, they flung them into Lerna, and buried their bodies with all due rites outside of the town. At the command of Jupiter, Mercury and Minerva purified them from the guilt of their deed. Hypermnestra had spared Lynceus, for the delicate regard which he had shown to her modesty. Her father, at first, in his anger at her disobedience, put her into close confinement. Relenting, however, after some time, he gave his consent to her union with Lynceus, and proclaimed gymnastic games, in which the victors were to receive his other daughters as the prizes. It was said, however, that the crime of the Danaïdes did not pass without due punishment in the lower world, where they were condemned to draw water, for ever, with perforated vessels. (Apollod., 2, 1, 4.—Hygin., fab., 168, 169, 170.—Schol. ad Il., 1, 42, et ad 4, 171.—Schol. ad Eurip., Hec., 872.)—Thus much for the story of Danaüs. The intimate connexion between this popular legend and the peculiar character of the Argive soil, which exhibited a striking contrast between the upper part of the plain and the low grounds of Lerna, has given rise to a bold and ingenious theory. Argos was greatly deficient in water (whence Homer calls it "thirsty," πολυδιψιον), and the word δαίος signifies "dry." We have here, then, a simple derivation for the name Danai, namely, the people of the thirsty land of Argos; and, in the usual manner, the personification of their name is a hero, Danaüs. Again, springs are daughters of the earth, as they are called by the Arabs; the nymphs of the springs are therefore daughters of Danaüs, that is, of the thirsty land; and as a confirmation, in some degree, of this view of the subject, we may state, that four of the daughters of Danaüs, namely, Amynone, Peirone, Physadca, and Asteria, were names of springs. Still farther, a head (κεφαλή) is a usual name for a spring in many languages; and a legendary mode of accounting for the origin of founts is to ascribe them to the *well*ing forth of the blood of some person who was slain on the spot where the spring emitted its waters. Thus the blood of Pentheus and Actæon gave origin to springs on Cithæron. (Philostrat., Icon., 1, 14.—Compare Welcker, Tril., p. 400.) The number fifty, in the case of the Danaïdes, is probably an arbitrary one, for we cannot discern in it any relation to the weeks of the year, as some endeavour to do. (Völcker, Myth. der Iap., p. 192, seqq.) It is to be observed, that the founts of the Inachus were in Mount Lyceon or Lynceon (Schol. ad Apoll. Rh., 1, 125), and here, perhaps, lies the origin of Lynceus, who, in one form of the legend, fights with and vanquishes Danaus (Schol. ad Eurip., l. c.); that is, the stream from Mount Lynceon overcomes the dry nature of the soil. We see, therefore, that the physical legend may have existed long before there was any intercourse with Egypt; and, like that of Io, may have been subsequently modified so as to suit the new theory of an Egyptian colony at Argos. (Herod., 2, 91; 171, 182.—Müller, Orchom., p. 109, seqq.—Id., Proleg., p. 184, seqq.—Keightley's Mythology, p. 409, seqq.)

DANUVIUS, the largest river of Europe except the Rha or Volga, and called in German the Donau, by us the Danube. Strabo and Pliny make it rise in the chain of Mons Abnoba, or the mountains of the Black Forest. According to modern accounts, it has its origin on the heights of the Black Forest, from three sources, the Brig-Ach and the Brige, which are both more considerable than the third or the Donau, a feeble stream that is enclosed in a stone basin, and formed into a fountain in the court of the castle of Donau-Eschingen. It is, therefore, the first two that may be considered the source of the Danube. (Malte-Brun, vol. 7, p. 41, Am. ed.—Id., vol. 6, p. 288.) It is one of the few rivers which run from west to east, traversing Austria, Hungary, and part of Turkey in Europe, and, after a course of about 1620 miles, falls into the Black Sea. It is of irregular width, being sometimes confined between rocks and mountains, at other times so wide that it almost resembles a sea, and again broken and divided into small streams by numerous islands. It receives sixty navigable rivers, the largest of which is the Cenus or Inn, and 120 smaller streams. It is always yellow with mud, and its sands are everywhere auriferous. At its entrance into the Black Sea it is shallow; its waters are spread over an immense surface, and lie stagnating among an infinity of reeds and other aquatic plants. The current of the river communicates a whitish colour to the sea, and gives a freshness to it for nearly nine leagues, and within one league renders it fit for use. Pomponius Mela says it had as many mouths as the Nile, of which three were small and four navigable. Only two now remain, which can scarcely be entered by ships of considerable size or burden, the rest being choked up. The ancients gave the name of Ister to the eastern part of this river after its junction with the Savus or Saave. The Greeks and Romans were very imperfectly acquainted with the whole course of the stream, which was for a long period the northern boundary of the Roman empire in this quarter. This river was an object of worship to the Scythians. The river-god is represented on a medal of Trajan; but the finest figure of him is on the column of that emperor at Rome. (Mela, 2, 7.—Amm. Marcell., 22, 19.—Ptol., 3, 10.—Plin., 4, 12.—Dionys. Perieg., 301.) As regards the root of the name (Dan), consult remarks under the article Tanais.

DAPHNÆ, a city of Egypt, about sixteen miles from Pelusium, on the route to Memphis. (Anton., Itin., p. 162.) There was always a strong garrison in this place, to keep in check the Arabians and Syrians. It is now Safnas. (Herodot., 2, 30.)

DAPHNE, 1. a daughter of the Peneus, and the first love of Phœbus. This god, according to the poetic legend, proud of his victory over the serpent Python, beholding Cupid bending his bow, mocked at the efforts of the puny archer. Cupid, incensed, flew to Parnassus, and, taking his station there, shot his golden arrow of love into the heart of the son of Latona, and discharged his leaden one of aversion into the bosom of the nymph of the Peneus. Daphne loved the chase, and it alone, indifferent to all other love. Phœbus beheld her, and pursued. Exhausted and nearly overtaken, Daphne, on the banks of her father's stream, stretched forth her hands, calling on Peneus for protection and change of form. The river-god heard; bark and leaves covered his daughter, and Daphne became a bay-tree (δάφνη, laurus). The god embraced its trunk, and declared that it should be afterward his favourite tree. (Ovid, Met., 1, 452, seqq.—Hygin., fab., 203.)—The meaning of this legend is evident enough. It is only one of the many tales devised to give marvel to the origin of natural productions; and its object is to account for the bay-tree being sacred to Apollo. The great majority of the authorities place the legend in Arcadia, making Daphne the daughter of the Ladon by Earth (the natural parent of a plant), and add that it was her mother who changed her on her prayer. (Pausan., 8, 20.—Nonnus, 42, 387.—Schol. ad Il., 1, 14.—Stat., Theb., 4, 289, &c.—Keightley's Mythology, p. 118.)—II. A beautiful spot about forty stadia to the south of Antioch, near the Orontes, adorned with fair edifices, and containing a temple sacred to Apollo and Diana. The whole was surrounded with a thick grove of cypresses and bay-trees (δάφναι), from the latter of which the place derived its name. Numerous fountains, too, imparted continual freshness to the grove and coolness to the surrounding atmosphere. The luxurious citizens of Antioch made this a favourite place of retreat, and even the Roman governors often forgot amid the enjoyments of Daphne the cares of office. Pompey is said to have been so charmed by the place, and by the united beauties of nature and art with which it was adorned, that he considerably enlarged the limits of the grove, by the addition of many of the surrounding fields. The modern name of the place is Beit-el-Mar, "the house of water." (Ammian. Marcell., 19, 2.—Id., 22, 31.—Sozomen, 5, 19.—Eutrop., 6, 11.)

DAPHNEPHORIA, a festival in honour of Apollo, celebrated every ninth year by the Bœotians. It was then usual to adorn an olive bough with garlands of bay and flowers, and place on the top a brazen globe, from which were suspended smaller ones. In the middle were a number of crowns, and a globe of inferior size; and the bottom was adorned with a saffron-coloured garment. The globe on the top represented the Sun or Apollo; that in the middle was an emblem of the moon, and the others of the stars. The crowns, which were 365 in number, represented the sun's annual revolution. This bough was carried in solemn procession by a beautiful youth of an illustrious family, and whose parents were both living. (Pausan., 9, 10, 4.)

DAPHNIS, a celebrated herdsman of Sicily, the son of Mercury by a Sicilian nymph. He was found by the shepherds, when an infant, lying among the bay-trees (δάφναι), and from this circumstance obtained his name. Pan taught him to sing, and play upon the pipe, the nymphs were his foster-parents, and the Muses inspired him with the love of song. According to Diodorus, he was the inventor of pastoral poetry. He also accompanied Diana in the chase, and, when the labours of the day were ended, was wont to delight the goddess with the sweet notes of his syrinx. Daphnis became eventually attached to a Naiad, who forbade him holding communion with any other female, under pain of loss of sight; and she bound him by an oath to that effect. A princess, however, contrived to intoxicate him: he broke his vow, and the threatened penalty was inflicted. According to Diodorus, however, the Naiad merely predicted that loss of sight would be the consequence of his proving unfaithful to her. Theocritus, in his first Idyl, represents him as pining away in death, and refusing to be comforted. (Serv. ad Virg., Eclog., 5, 20.—Diod. Sic., 4, 84.—Schol. ad Theoc., Idyll., 1, 66.—Parthen., Erot., 29.—Ælian, V. H., 10, 18.) Ovid says, that the Naiad turned him into a rock. (Mét., 4, 276, seqq.—Keightley's Mythology, p. 240.)

DAPHNIS (gen. -antis: in Greek, Δαφνοῖς, -οῦντος), a town of the Locri Opuntii, situate on the seacoast, at the mouth of a river of the same name, near the frontiers of the Epichnemidian Locri. Strabo (424) places it twenty stadia from Cnemides. Into the river Daphnis the body of Hesiod was thrown after his murder. (Vid. Hesiodus.)

DARABUS (called also Daras, gen. -atis), a river of Africa, rising to the northwest of the Palus Nigrites, on Mount Mandras, and falling into the Atlantic to the north of the promontory Arsinarium. It is supposed to be the same with the Senegal. (Bischoff und Möller, Wörtb. der Geogr., p. 405.) Gosselin, however, makes it correspond to the modern Darabin. (Recherches, vol. 3, p. 112.)

DARDANIA, I. a district of Troas, in the north, called so from its inhabitants the Dardani. These derived their name from Dardanus, who built here the city of the same name. (Vid. Dardanus, I., II.) According to the Homeric topography, the Dardani, who were subject to Anchises, and commanded by his son Æneas during the siege, occupied the small district which lay between the territory of Abydus and the Promontory of Rhæteum, beyond which point the Trojan land, properly so called, and the hereditary dominions of Priam commenced. Towards the mainland, Dardania extended to the summit of Ida, and beyond that chain to the territory of Zeleca, and the plains watered by the Æsepus on the north, and as far as the territories of Assus and Antandrus to the south. (Strab., 592, 606.) It was more particularly in this inland district that the descendants of Æneas are said to have maintained themselves as independent sovereigns after the siege of Troy. (Cramer's Asia Minor, vol. 1, p. 80, seq.)—II. A region of Illyria, lying south of the territory of the Scordisci. It comprehended the upper valleys of the Drilo, and extended to the borders of Pæonia and Macedonia. The Dardani, its inhabitants, were often at war with the latter power, more particularly under the reign of its last two monarchs. Their country answers to the modern districts of Ipeck, Pristina, and Jacova, which are situate to the south of Servia, and form part of the pachalic of Scutari. Strabo describes these Dardani as a savage race, living mostly in caves formed out of mud and dirt, and yet possessing great taste for music, having from the earliest period been acquainted with both wind and stringed instruments. (Strab., 316.—Cramer's Anc. Greece, vol. 1, p. 47.)

DARDANIS or DARDANIUM, a promontory of Troas, south of Abydus, near which was situate the city of Dardanus. It is now called Cape Berbieri, or Kepos Burun. The Hellespont here begins to contract itself. (Strab., 587, 595.)

DARDANUS, I. a celebrated hero, son of Jupiter and Electra, who came to Troas, according to some accounts, from Arcadia; according to others, from Italy. All, however, agree in fixing upon Samothrace as the spot in which he had formed his first principality, before he migrated to the foot of Mount Ida. (Apollod., 3, 12.—Strab., 331.—Virg., Æn., 7, 207.) We may reconcile this variety of opinions respecting the native country of Dardanus, by supposing that he was a chief of that early race, who, under the name of Pelasgi, were so widely diffused, and more especially in those countries, each of which claimed to be the birthplace of the hero. The epoch of the arrival of Dardanus on the coast of Asia is too remote to be ascertained at present with accuracy. Homer reckons five generations between Dardanus and Priam. (Il., 20, 230.) Plato, as we learn from Strabo (592), placed his arrival in the second epoch after the universal deluge, when mankind began to leave the summits of the mountains to which fear had driven them, and where they had led a barbarous and savage life, in caves and grots, like the Cyclopes of Homer. The Athenian philosopher deduced his reasoning from the passage in Homer, where the town founded by Dardanus is stated to have been built at the foot of Ida. (Il., 20, 215, seqq.)—The legend respecting Dardanus is as follows: Afflicted by the death of his brother Iasion, whom Jove had struck with lightning, Dardanus left Samothrace, and passed over to the mainland, where Teucer, the son of the river Scamandrus and the nymph Idaea then reigned over a people called Teucrians. He was well received by this prince, who gave him his daughter Batieia (Il., 2, 813) in marriage, and a part of his territory, on which he built a town called Dardanus. He had two sons, Ilus and Erichthonius, the former of whom died childless: the latter succeeded to the kingdom, and was remarkable for his wealth. By Astyoche, daughter of the Simois, Erichthonius had a son named Tros, who succeeded him on the throne. From Tros came Ilus, Assaracus, and Ganymedes. The house of Priam were descended from Ilus; that of Æneas from Assaracus. (Cramer's Asia Minor, vol. 1, p. 76, seqq.—Keighley's Mythology, p. 483.)—II. An ancient city of Troas, founded by Dardanus. According to Homer, who calls it Dardania, it was situated at the foot of Mount Ida. (Il. 20, 215.—Strab., 592.)—III. Another city of Troas, not to be confounded with the preceding. By whom it was built is uncertain. We know, however, that it existed in the time of Herodotus (5, 117), who mentions its capture by the Persians, in the reign of Darius. In the narrative of Xerxes's march, he describes it as close to the sea, and contiguous with Abydos (7, 43). Strabo reports, that the inhabitants were often compelled to change their abode by the successors of Alexander: he reports also, that peace was concluded here between Sylla and Mithradates. (Strab., 595.—Plut., Vit. Syll., c. 21.) The ruins of Dardanus are to be found between Kepos Burun and Dervend Tchemek Burun. The name Dardanelles, which was in the first instance applied to the Turkish castles erected to defend the passage of the straits, and next to the straits themselves, is confessedly derived from this ancient city. (Cramer's Asia Minor, vol. 1, p. 82.)

DARES, I. a Trojan priest, mentioned by Homer (Il. 5, 9). It is absurdly pretended, by some of the ancient writers, that he wrote an Iliad, or history of the Trojan war, in prose; and Ælian (Var. Hist., 11, 2) assures us that it still existed in his day, without telling us, however, whether he himself had read it or not. There can be no doubt that Ælian was deceived, and that the work which he took for the production of Dares was the composition of some sophist of a much later age. However this may be, the Iliad of which Ælian speaks no longer exists; but we have a Latin work remaining, written in prose, which was for some time regarded as a translation from the Greek original, and was ascribed to Cornelius Nepos, though abounding with solecisms. The truth is, that this work is the production of an English poet, who flourished at the close of the 12th century. His name was Joseph, to which was sometimes added Davonius, from his having been born at Exeter in Devonshire, and at other times Iscanus, from the ancient name of Exeter, Isca. This Iliad, thus falsely ascribed to Dares, is not even translated from any Greek writer; it is merely the plan or prose outline of a Latin poem in six cantos, which Joseph Iscanus composed under the title De Bello Trojano—The work just mentioned, as well as that of Dictys Cretensis, forms the original source of a famous romance of chivalry, which met with extraordinary success during the middle ages, and in the centuries immediately subsequent to the invention of printing. These works of Dares and Dictys having fallen into the hands of a Sicilian named Guido dalle Colonne, a native of Messina, and a celebrated lawyer and poet of the 13th century, he conceived the idea of giving them that romantic air which would harmonize with the spirit of the age, when chivalry had now acquired its greatest lustre. He consequently intercalated the narratives of the pretended poets of Phrygia and Crete with various adventures, suited to the taste of the age, such as tournaments, challenges, single combats, &c. His work having met with considerable success, he composed, in Latin prose, a romance of the war of Troy, in which he also introduced the war of the Seven against Thebes, and the expedition of the Argonauts. He confounds together history and mythology, Greek and Arabian manners; his heroes are acquainted with alchemy and astronomy, and come in contact with dragons, griffons, and other fabulous monsters. His romance was translated into almost every European language, and excited a general enthusiasm. Hence the desire which at that time seized the great families of Europe of claiming descent from one of the heroes of Trojan story; and hence the eagerness, on the part of the monks, to compose genealogies consisting of Greek and Roman names which had some analogy with the names of the sovereign princes of the middle ages. (Schöll, Hist. Lit. Gr., vol. 7, p. 3, seqq.) This same work of Dares Phrygius was the source whence Conrad of Würzburg, in the latter half of the 13th century, derived the materials of the poem which he composed in like manner on the war of Troy. (Koberstein, Grundriss der Deutsch Nationalit., § 46, not. 3.)—II. One of the companions of Æneas, celebrated as a pugilist, though conquered in the funeral games of Anchises by the aged Entellus. (Virg., Æn., 5, 369, seqq.) This Dares, or a Trojan of the same name, was slain by Turnus in Italy. (Æn., 12, 363.)

DARICUS, a Persian coin of the purest gold. According to Harpocration and Suidas, it weighed two drachmas, and hence it was equivalent in value to 20 Attic drachmas of silver. Five Darics were consequently equal to an Attic mina of silver. (Wurm, de pond., &c., p. 58.) Reckoning the Attic drachma at 17 cents, 5.93 mills, Federal currency, the value of the Daric will be 3 dolls., 51 cts., 8 64 mills. The Daric was the gold coin best known at Athens; and when we consider the great number that are recorded to have been employed in presents and bribes alone, exclusive of the purposes of traffic, it would seem extraordinary that so few should have reached modern times, if we did not know that, upon the conquest of Persia, they were melted down, and recoined with the type of Alexander. Very few Persian Darics are now to be seen in cabinets. There is one in Lord Pembroke's, which weighs 129 grains; and there are three in the cabinets at the British Museum, weighing about 128½ grains each. The purity of the gold in the Persian Daric was remarkable. Balthemy found it to be in one, = $\frac{24}{100}$, or 0.9583 (Mem. de l'Acad. des Inscr., vol. 21); and yet, if we credit Patin (Hist. Num., c. 7), this was exceeded by the purity of the gold coins of Philip and his son Alexander, which he makes = 23 carats, 10 grains, or 0.979. (Wurm, l. c.) The Daric had on one side the figure of an archer crowned, and kneeling upon one knee; upon the other a sort of quadrata incusa, or deep cleft. Knight sees in the figure upon the Persian Daric, not an archer, but a type of Hercules-Mithras, or the sun. (Inquiry, § 131.—Class. Journ., vol. 25, p. 49.) Common parlance, however, made the figure to be an archer; and hence arose the witticism of Agesilaus, who said that he had been driven out of Asia by thirty thousand archers, meaning so many Darics distributed among the Greek cities by the Persian king. Who the Darius was from whom the coin received its name has never been clearly ascertained. According to the scholiast on Aristophanes (Eccles., 589), and also Harpocration and Suidas, the Daric did not obtain this appellation from the son of Hystaspes, but from a more ancient king of the name of Darius. Hence some writers are led to infer that Darius the Mede, who is mentioned by Daniel (5, 31), was the same with the Cyaxares of whom Xenophon speaks. (Compare Prideaux, Hist. Connect., 2, 538.—Hutchinson, ad Xen., Cyrop., 5, 2, 3.—Perizon., ad Ælian, V. H., 1, 22.) Wesseling, however, maintains the contrary, and ascribes the origin of the coin in question to the son of Hystaspes; 1st, because we find no mention made by the Greeks of any more ancient Darius than the one just alluded to; and 2d, because, as the lineage of the monarch is given by Herodotus, Darius, the son of Hystaspes, appears to have been the first who bore the name. Zeune conjectures (what, in fact, seems more than probable), that Darius, the son of Hystaspes, only corrected, and gave his name to an ancient coinage already existing. Müller also speaks of the Daric as having been coined by Darius Hystaspis. (Public Econ. of Athens, vol. 1, p. 32.)—The silver coins which go by the name of Darics are in truth miscalled. The earliest of them, if we may credit Herodotus (4, 166), were struck by Aryandes, the Persian governor of Egypt, under Cambyes, in imitation of the Darics. He was put to death by Darius for his presumption. The coining of these Darics or Aryandies in silver, however, must have been continued after the time of the Persian governor. No fewer than eight specimens of this description are in the cabinets of the British Museum. One, formerly Mr. R. P. Knight's, bears the name of Pythagoras, a king or governor of Cyprus, as Mr. Knight conjectured. Others, which have the figure of the archer crowned on one side, have a mounted horseman on the other. They are generally considered as ancient Persian coins, and are commonly, though without any assignable reason, except as bearing the impress of an archer, called Darics. In the silver Daric, a drawing of which is given by Landon (Numismatique du Voyage d'Anacharsis, p. 48), a kneeling archer appears on both sides of the coin.—Prideaux observes, that in those parts of Scripture which were written after the Babylonian captivity (he refers to Chron., 29, 7, and Ezra, 8, 27), the gold Darics are mentioned by the name of Adarkonim; and in the Talmudists by the name of Darkonoth (Buxtorf, Lex. Rabbin., p. 577), both from the Greek Δαρεικός. (Prideaux's Connexions, vol. 1, p. 183, ed. 1725.)

Darius, I. surnamed Hystaspis (or son of Hystaspes), a satrap of Persia, belonging to the royal line of the Achæmenides, and whose father Hystaspes had been governor of the province of Persia. Seven noblemen of the highest rank, in the number of whom was Darius, conspired to dethrone the Magian Smerdis, who had usurped the crown after the death of Cambyes, and, having accomplished their object, resolved that one of their number should reign in his stead. According to Herodotus (3, 84), they agreed to meet at early dawn in the suburbs of the capital, and that he of their number whose horse should first neigh at the rising of the sun, should possess the kingdom. If we believe the historian, who gives two accounts of the matter, Darius obtained the crown through an artful contrivance on the part of his groom. It is more probable, however, that, in consequence of his relationship to the royal line, his election to the throne was the unanimous act of the other conspirators. It is certain, indeed, that they reserved for themselves privileges which tended at least to make them independent of the monarch, and even to keep him dependant upon them. One of their number is even said to have formally stipulated for absolute exemption from the royal authority, as the condition on which he withdrew his claim to the crown: and the rest acquired the right of access to the king's person at all seasons, without asking his leave, and bound him to select his wives exclusively from their families. How far the power of Darius, though nominally despotic, was really limited by these privileges of his grandees, may be seen from an occurrence which took place in the early part of his reign, in the case of Intaphernes, who had been one of the partners in the conspiracy. He revenged himself, it is true, for an outrage committed by this individual, by putting him to death. But, before he ventured to take this step, he thought it necessary to sound the rest of the six, and to ascertain whether they would make common cause with the offender. He was probably glad to remove men so formidable to distant governments; and it may easily be conceived, that, if their power was so great at court, it was still less restrained in the provinces that were subjected to their authority. Nevertheless, Darius was the greatest and most powerful king that ever filled the throne of Persia, and even the disasters he experienced but slightly clouded the remembrance of his wisdom and his prosperity. Cyrus and Cambyes had conquered nations: Darius was the true founder of the Persian state. The dominions of his predecessors were a mass of countries only united by their subjection to the will of a common ruler, which expressed itself by arbitrary and irregular exactions: Darius first organized them into an empire, where every member felt its place and knew its functions. His realm stretched from the Ægean to the Indus, from the steppes of Scythia to the Cataracts of the Nile. He divided this vast tract into twenty satrapies or provinces, and appointed the tribute which each was to pay to the royal treasury, and the proportion in which they were to supply provisions for the army and for the king's household. A high road on which distances were regularly marked, and spacious buildings placed to receive all who travelled in the king's name, connected the western coast with the seat of government; and along this road, couriers trained to extraordinary speed transmitted the king's messages.—Compared with the rude government of his predecessors, the institutions of Darius were wise and vigorous; in themselves, however, unless they are considered as foundations laid for a structure that was never raised, they were weak and barbarous. The defects of the Persian system, however, belong to another head. (Vid. Persia.)—Darius, in the very beginning of his reign, meditated an expedition against the Scythians, in retaliation, most probably, for the desolating inroads of that barbarous but warlike race, and to check their incursions for the time to come by a salutary display of the power and resources of the Persian empire. His march, however, was delayed by a rebellion which broke out at Babylon. The ancient capital of Assyria had been secretly preparing for revolt during the troubles that followed the fall of the Magian, and for nearly two years it defied the power of Darius. At length the treachery of Zopyrus, a noble Persian, who sacrificed his person and his power to the interest of his master, is said to have opened its gates to him. When he was freed from this care he set out for the Scythian war. The whole military force of the empire was put in motion, and the numbers of the army are rated at seven or eight hundred thousand men. This expedition of Darius into Scythia has given rise to considerable discussion. The first point involved is to ascertain how far the Persian monarch penetrated into the country. According to Herodotus (4, 83), he crossed the Thracian Bosphorus, marched through Thrace, passed the Danube on a bridge of boats, and then pursued a Scythian division as far as the Tanais. Having crossed this river, he traversed the territories of the Sauromatæ as far as the Budini, whose city he burned. Beyond the Budini he entered upon a vast desert, and reached the river Oarus, where he remained some considerable time, erecting forts upon its banks. Finding that the Scythians had disappeared, he left these works only half finished, turned his course to the westward, and, advancing by rapid marches, entered Scythia, where he fell in with two of the divisions of the enemy. Pursuing these, he traversed the territories of the Melanchlænî, Androphagi, and Neuri, without being able to bring them to an engagement. Provisions failing, he was eventually compelled to recross the Danube (vid. Histians), glad to have saved a small portion of his once numerous army. According to Rennel (Geography of Herodotus, vol. 1, p. 136), the Persian monarch, in marching against the Scythians, crossed the Danube between Ismail and the junction of that river with the Pruth, and penetrated as far as Saratow on the Wolga. (Compare Mannert, Geogr., vol. 3, p. 13, seqq.) It is very doubtful, however, whether Darius proceeded as far as this, especially when we take into consideration the time consumed by a Persian army in making an expedition, the labour of crossing large and rapid rivers, and the difficulty of supplying so numerous a force with food and forage, especially when wandering in the track of the Scythians at a distance from the coast. According to other accounts (Strabo, 305), Darius only came as far as the sandy tract between the Danube and the Tyras, in the present Bessarabia, where, in after days, Antigonus was taken prisoner by the Scythians, with his whole army. (Ukert, Geogr., vol. 1, p. 59.)

—To wipe away the disgrace of this unfortunate enterprise, we find the Persian monarch shortly after undertaking an expedition against India. In this he was more successful, and conquered a part of the Pendjab; not, however, the whole country, as some modern writers erroneously represent. Some time after this, Miletus having revolted, and Aristagoras, its ruler, having solicited aid from the Athenians for the purpose of enabling it to maintain its independence, they sent twenty ships, to which the Eretrians added five more, in order to requite a kindness previously received from the Milesians. Aristagoras, upon this succour's arriving, resolved to make an expedition against Sardis, the residence of the Persian satrap. Accordingly, landing at Ephesus, the confederates marched inland, took Sardis, and drove the governor into the citadel. Most of the houses in Sardis were made of reeds, and even those which were built of brick were roofed with reeds. One of these was set on fire by a soldier, and immediately the flames spread from house to house, and consumed the whole city. The light of the conflagration showing to the Greeks the great numbers of their opponents, who were beginning to rally, being constrained by necessity to defend themselves, as their retreat was cut off by the river Pactolus, the former retired through fear, and regained their ships. Upon the receipt of this intelligence, Darius, having called for a bow, put an arrow into it, and shot it into the air, with these words: "Grant, oh Jupiter, that I may be able to revenge myself upon the Athenians." After he had thus spoken, he commanded one of his attendants thrice every time dinner was set before him, to exclaim, "Master! remember the Athenians." Marodonius, the king's son-in-law, was intrusted with the care of the war. After crossing the Hellespont, he marched down through Thrace, but, in endeavouring to double Mount Athos, he lost 300 vessels, and, it is said, more than 20,000 men. After this he was attacked in the night by the Brygi, who killed many of his men, and wounded Marodonius himself. He succeeded, however, in defeating and reducing them under his power, but his army was so weakened by these circumstances that he was compelled to return ingloriously to Asia. Darius, only animated by this loss, sent a more considerable force, under the command of Datis and Artaphernes, with orders to sack the cities of Athens and Eretria, and to send to him all the surviving inhabitants in fetters. The Persians took the isle of Naxos and the city of Eretria in Eubœa, but were defeated with great slaughter by the Athenians and Plataeans under the celebrated Miltiades at Marathon. Their fleet was also completely unsuccessful in an attempt to surprise Athens after the battle. (Vid. Miltiades and Marathon.) The anger of Darius was doubly inflamed against Athens by the event of Marathon; and he resolved that the insolent people, who had invaded his territories, violated the persons of his messengers, and driven his generals to a shameful flight, should feel the whole weight of his arm. The preparations he now set on foot were on a vast scale, and demanded a longer time. For three years all Asia was kept in a continual stir: in the fourth, however, Darius was distracted by other causes; by a quarrel between his two sons respecting the succession to the throne, and by an insurrection in Egypt. In the following year, before he had ended his preparations against Egypt and Attica, he died, and Xerxes mounted the throne, B.C. 485. Darius reigned thirty-six years. His memory was always held in veneration by the Persians and the other nations comprehended under his sway, whom he governed with much wisdom and moderation.—As regards the import of the name Darius in Persian, Herodotus (6, 98) informs us that it was equivalent to ἐπιζῆς, "one who restrains," but he is at variance with Hesychius, who makes it the same as φρονιμος, "prudent." Grotefend makes Darius to be a compound word, the first part being an abbreviation of Dara ("lord"), and the latter portion coming from ksah ("king"), and thinks that the name may have been pronounced in Persian Daryeush, or Dary-coesh, whence, by an easy change, we have Daryavesh, which reminds us of the Δαρείος of Ctesias (Pers., § 48). Herodotus appears to have merely translated the latter part of the name Darius, by ἐπιζῆς, imitating, after the Greek fashion, the sound of the Persian word. (Grotefend, in Heron, Ideen, vol. 1, pt. 2, p. 347.) St. Martin reads the name as Darciousch Vysehtasponea on the Persepolitan inscriptions, i. e., Darius (roï) Visthaspo (sc. filius). (Journal Asiatique, Febr., 1823, p. 83.) Lassen, however, more correctly, we think, gives Darhauus Vistaspatha, the latter word being equivalent to the Gustasp of the modern Persian, and meaning "one whose employment is about horses." (Die Altpersisch. Keil-Inschriften, p. 37, seqq.)—II. The second of the name was surnamed Ochus. (Vid. Ochus.)—III. The third of the name, and the last king of Persia, was son of Arsames, who had for his father Osthames, one of the sons of Darius Ochus. His true name was Codomannus, and he had, before coming to the throne, acquired some reputation for personal courage, chiefly through an exploit which he had performed in one of the expeditions against the Cadusians, when he accepted a challenge from one of their stoutest warriors, and slew him in single combat. The eunuch Bagoas raised him to the throne, not so much, however, on this account, as because they had previously been friends, and because, perhaps, there was no other prince of the blood on whose gratitude he could safely rely. (Vid. Bagoas.) Codomannus, upon his accession, which took place about the time when Philip of Macedon died, assumed the name of Darius. He soon discovered that Bagoas, who may have intended at length to mount the throne himself, designed that he should share the fate of his last two predecessors. A cup of poison had been prepared for him. But, having detected the plot, he called Bagoas into his presence, and compelled him to drink the deadly draught.—The reign of Darius Codomannus was early disturbed by the invasion of Alexander. The Persian monarch, however, did not take the command of his forces until after the battle of the Granicus had been fought, and Alexander had advanced as far as Cilicia. He then proceeded to meet the invader, in all the pomp of royalty, but with an army ill fitted to contend against such an antagonist. Resolving to hazard an encounter, contrary to the advice of his Greek allies, Darius engaged in the battle of Issus, but was compelled to flee from the field with so much precipitation as to leave behind him his bow, shield, and royal mantle. His camp was plundered, and his mother, wife, and children fell into the hands of the conqueror. In vain, after this, did Darius supplicate for an accommodation. Alexander went on in the career of victory; and in a second pitched battle at Gaugamela, commonly called the battle of Arbela (vid. Arbela), Darius again fought, and again was compelled to flee. His plan was now to advance into Media, lay waste the country through which he passed, and seek refuge finally on the other side of the Oxus, where he hoped that the conqueror would be content to leave him unmolested. Alexander suffered four months to elapse before he again set out in pursuit of Darius. He then advanced by forced marches in pursuit of him, and learned eventually that the monarch was a prisoner in the hands of Bessus, one of his own satraps. (Vid. Bessus.) A still more active pursuit now commenced, and the unhappy king refusing to proceed any farther, was left mortally wounded in a chariot, while Bessus and his accomplices took to flight, accompanied by

600 horse. Darius expired before Alexander saw him. The conqueror threw his cloak over the corpse.—Alexander ordered his body to be buried in the sepulchre of his ancestors with royal magnificence, took charge of the education of his children, and married his daughter. (Plut., Vit. Alex.—Arrian, Exp. Al.—Thirlwall's History of Greece, vol. 6, p. 237, seqq.)—IV. Eldest son of Artaxerxes Mnemon, put to death for conspiring against his father. (Plut., Vit. Artax.)

DASYLIUM, a city of Bithynia, in the district Olympea, placed by D'Anville on a lake at the mouth of the small river Horisius; which runs, according to him, into the Propontis. Mannert, however, makes it to have been situated to the west of the mouth of the river Gebes or Gelbes, and gives the Horisius as flowing to the west towards the Rhyndacus. (Geogr., vol. 6, pt. 3, p. 559.) This city is named by Strabo and Ptolemy Dasylium, as it is here given, but by Mela and Pliny, Dascylos. (Strabo, 575.—Plin., 5, 32.—Mela, 1, 19.) During the continuance of the Persian empire, it was the residence of the satrap of Mysia and Phrygia Minor; hence, immediately after the battle of the Granicus, Alexander despatched Parmenio to take possession of it. (Arrian, Exp. Alex., 1, 18.) The modern name, according to D'Anville, is Diaskillo.

DATAMES, a satrap of Cappadocia, in the reign of Artaxerxes Mnemon. He was a man of extraordinary abilities, had served the king with the utmost loyalty, and might have proved the firmest bulwark of his throne. But the calumnies of some envious courtiers had excited the suspicions of Artaxerxes against him, and Datames saw himself obliged to revolt, to escape disgrace and ruin. He long maintained his independence, but was at length entrapped and slain by Mithradates, a son of Ariobarzanes, satrap of Phrygia. This event took place after the death of Artaxerxes, and when Ochus had succeeded to the throne. Nepos has written the life of Datames. (Nep., Vit. Dat.—Compare Polyæn., 7, 29, 1.)

DATIS, a general of Darius Hystaspis, sent in conjunction with Artaphernes, to punish Eretria and Athens. Datis was a Mede, and Artaphernes son of the satrap of Lydia, and nephew of Darius. He was hence superior in rank, but inferior probably to Datis both in age and military experience. The latter, therefore, would seem to be the real leader of the expedition. The whole armament consisted of 600 ships, according to Herodotus; this, on the footing which he fixes elsewhere, of 200 men to each trireme, would give 120,000 men as the strength of the Persian land force transported in the fleet. After accomplishing one object of the expedition in the capture of Eretria, Datis and Artaphernes then invaded Attica, but were defeated in the memorable battle of Marathon. According to Ctesias (Pers., c. 18), Datis fell on the field of battle; but Herodotus (6, 119) makes him to have returned to Asia. Larcher sides with the latter (Hist. d'Herod., vol. 9, p. 272), and Bähr with the former (ad Ctes., p. 148). This commander, in the exultation which he felt on occasion of his first success in reducing Naxos (id. Darius), exclaimed, ὡς ἔδομαι καὶ τέττομαι καὶ χαίρομαι! The word χαίρομαι is a barbarism, for the Greeks always said χαίρω. These kinds of barbarisms were afterward called Datisms. (Compare Aristoph., Pac., v. 290, and the remarks of the scholiast on v. 288.)

DATOS, a town of Europe, which, after having belonged to Thrace, was transferred to Macedonia when the empire was extended on that side. It was situate not far from the coast, to the northeast of Amphipolis, and near the southern extremity of the range of Mount Pangæus. It stood on a craggy hill, having a forest to the north, and to the south a lake or marsh at a small distance from the sea. Proserpina is said to have been gathering flowers here when she was carried away by

Pluto, whereas the common account places the scene of the fable at Enna in Sicily. This place was proverbially rich, on account of the mines of gold in its territory. Its territory also was highly fertile, and it possessed excellent docks for the construction of ships; hence arose the proverb, Δάτος ἀγαθόν, i. e., an abundance of good things. (Strabo, p. 331.—Compare Harpocrat., s. v. Δάτος.—Zenob., Prov. Græc. Cent., 3, 71.)

DAULIS, I. a city of Phocis, south of the Cephalissus, and about seven stadia from Panopesus. (Pausan., 10, 4.) It was a city of great antiquity, and celebrated in mythology as the scene of the tragic story of Philomela and Progne. Thucydides (2, 29) affirms, that Teres, who had married Progne, the daughter of Pandion, sovereign of Athens, was chief of Daulis, then occupied, as well as the rest of Phocis, by a body of Thracians; in support of his statement, he observes, that the poets frequently alluded to Philomela under the name of the "Daulian bird." Strabo (423) asserts, that the word "Daulos," which signifies a thick forest, had been applied to this district from its woody character. Daulis, having been destroyed by the Persians, was no doubt afterward restored, as we find it besieged and taken, during the Macedonian war, by T. Flamininus, the consul. Livy represents it as situate on a lofty hill difficult to be scaled (32, 18). Daulis was the more ancient name; it was afterward changed to Daulia (Strab., l. c.) and Daulium. (Polyb., 4, 25.) Pausanias reports, that the Daulians surpassed in strength and stature all the other Phocians (10, 4). The site of this ancient city retains the name of Daulia. (Compare Dodwell, Tour, vol. 1, p. 204.—Gell's Itinerary, p. 172 and 203.—Cramer's Anc. Greece, vol. 2, p. 183.)

DAUNIA, a country of Italy, forming part of Apulia, and situate on the coast to the northwest of Peucezia. The Daunii appear to have been one of the earliest Italian tribes with which the Greeks became acquainted, from the circumstance of their having formed colonies, which they established at a remote period on the western shores of the Adriatic. This people, according to the most received tradition, obtained their appellation from Daunus, the father-in-law of Diomedes, which latter is stated, on his return from Troy, to have been compelled, from domestic calamities, to abandon his native country, and to have founded another kingdom in the plains watered by the Aufidus. This tradition, as far as it relates to Diomedes, may afford matter for discussion, but it proves, at least, the great antiquity of the Daunians as an indigenous people of Italy. Other accounts, perhaps still more ancient, asserted that Daunus was an Illyrian chief, who, driven from his country by an adverse faction, formed a settlement in this part of Italy. (Festus, s. v. Daunia.—Cramer's Ancient Italy, vol. 2, p. 266.)

DAUNUS, according to one account, an Illyrian chieftain, who, on being driven from his native country by an adverse faction, formed a settlement in that part of Italy which was called Daunia after his name. (Festus, s. v. Daunia) Poetic legends, however, make him to have been of Italian origin, and a son of Pileumnus, king of Apulia, by Danae, who had fled hither, as was fabled, from Greece. Virgil makes Turnus the son of Daunus, and grandson of Pileumnus. (Æn., 10, 76.)

DECAROLIS, a country of Palestine, lying to the east and southeast of the sea of Tiberias. It seems to have belonged originally to the possessions of the kingdom of Israel, but was afterward reckoned as a part of Syria. Pliny (15, 2) and Ptolemy both speak of it as forming a part of the latter country. The name is derived from the circumstance of ten cities (δέκα πόλεις) contained in it having formed a confederation, in order to oppose the Asmonæan princes, by whom the Jewish nation was governed until the time of Herod. After his death they passed into the hands of the Romans.

(Josephus, Ant., 17, 12.—Id., Bell. Jud., 2, 4.) The inhabitants were for the most part of Grecian origin. These ten cities, according to Ptolemy, were Scythopolis, Hippo, Gadara, Dion, Pella, Gerasa, Philadelphia, Canatha, Capitolias, and Gadara. Pliny, instead of the last two, gives Damascus and Raphana; in the rest his account agrees with that of Ptolemy, who seems more worthy of reliance in this instance than the Roman writer. (Plin., 6, 18.)

DECEBALUS, a warlike and enterprising monarch of the Dacians, who prosecuted a successful war against Domitian, and drove him to a disgraceful peace. He was unable, however, to cope with Trajan, and destroyed himself when all was lost. His head was sent by the emperor to Rome, and his treasures were found by the Romans, on the information of one of his confidants, in the bed of the river Sargetia (now the Istrig), and in various secret caverns. (Dio Cass., 67, 6.—Id., 68, 6, seqq.) Lazius, cited by Fabretti, says, that some Wallachian fishermen, in the middle of the sixteenth century, found a part of these treasures, which had escaped the search of Trajan. (Fabr., de Col. Traj., c. 8.)

DECELEA, a borough and fortress of Attica, about 125 stadia from Athens, and the same distance from the Boeotian frontier. This town was always considered of great importance, from its situation on the road to Eubœa, whence the Athenians derived most of their supplies; when, therefore, by the advice of Alcibiades, it was seized and garrisoned by a Lacedæmonian force, they became exposed to great loss and inconvenience. (Thucyd., 6, 91.—Id., 7, 19.—Strabo, 396.) Thucydides reports, that Decælea was visible from Athens; and Xenophon observes that the sea and Piræus could be seen from it. (Hist. Gr., 1, 1, 25.) Herodotus states, that the lands of the Decæleans were always spared by the Peloponnesian army in their invasions of Attica, because they had pointed out to the Tyndaridæ the place where Helen was secreted by Theseus, when they came to Attica in search of her. (Herodot., 9, 73.—Alex., ap. Athen., 2, 76.) Sir W. Gell describes Decælea as situate on a round detached hill, connected by a sort of isthmus with Mount Parnes. From the top is an extensive view of the plains of both Athens and Eleusis. The fortress is at the mouth of a pass through Parnes to Oropus. The nearest place is Varibobi. (Itin., p. 106.) Mr. Hawkins gives the modern name of the spot on which the ruins of Decælea stand as Χοροκλειδιά. (Walpole's Collection, vol. 1, p. 338, in notis.—Cramer's Ancient Greece, vol. 2, p. 403.)

DECEMVIRI, I. ten commissioners appointed to frame a code of laws for the Roman state.—The history of this affair is as follows: The intestine feuds between the patricians and plebeians were continuing with unabated animosity. Occasionally one of the consuls favoured the plebeians, and proposed some mitigation of the hardships under which they were labouring, or some increase of their privileges, but generally with little success. The Agrarian law, brought forward by Spurius Cassius, continued to be the main demand of the commons and their supporters, but its passage was, on every occasion, either directly or indirectly prevented. At last the commons became convinced, that they need hope for no complete redress of grievances, until they should have previously secured the establishment of some constitutional principle, from which equal justice would, of necessity and from its very nature, emanate. Accordingly, Caius Terentillus Harsa, one of the tribunes, proposed a law for a complete reform of the existing state of things. Its purport was, that ten commissioners should be chosen, five by the patricians and five by the commons, to draw up a constitution, which should define all points of constitutional, civil, and criminal law; and should thus determine, on just and fixed principles, all the political, social, and civil relations of all orders of the Roman people. After much opposition on the part of the patricians, the law was passed, and three commissioners were at length sent to Greece, to collect from the Grecian states such notices of their laws and constitutions as might be serviceable to the Romans. After the absence of a year, they returned; and the commons, finding it in vain to insist upon five of their own body forming part of the reviewers of the laws, yielded the point, and ten of the most distinguished of the patrician and senatorial body were chosen to form an entirely new and complete code of laws, by which the state should be governed. They were named Decemviri ("the ten men"), and during their office they were to supersede every other magistrate. Each in his turn was to administer the government for a day, or, according to others, for several days, till they should complete their legislative labours. After the careful deliberation of a few months, the result was laid before the people in the form of ten tables, fully written out, and exhibited in a conspicuous place where all might read them. Various amendments were proposed, and the ten tables again laid before the senate, the curiæ, and the centuries, and, having received the sanction of both orders of the state, were recognised as the very fountain of the laws, public and private. The decemvirs had conducted matters so much to the satisfaction of the community, that when, at the expiration of their year, they requested a renewal of their office, on the ground that they had still two more tables to form in order to complete their task, an election of new decemvirs was ordered. The patrician Appius Claudius, who took the leading part in the whole affair, was nominated to preside over this election. He acted in concert with the plebeians, by receiving votes for plebeian candidates, and for himself likewise, though it had been declared contrary to law that any functionary should be re-elected immediately after holding office. By dint of intrigue, however, Appius was re-elected, and along with him nine others, half of whom were patricians, half plebeians. The new commission soon showed itself very different from the first. Each of the decemvirs had twelve lictors, whereas the previous commission had the lictors only by turns, and a single acensus or officer preceded each of the rest. The lictors, too, now bore amid the fasces the formidable axe, the emblem of judgment on life and death, which the consuls, since the time of Valerius Publicola, had been obliged to lay aside during their continuance in the city. The Decemviri seemed resolved to change the government of Rome into a complete oligarchy, consisting of ten, whose power should be absolute in everything. They arrogated the right of superseding all other magistracies; and, at the conclusion of their second year, they showed no intention of resigning their offices or of appointing their successors. Matters had nearly arrived at a crisis, when a war arose, the Sabines and the Æqui having united their forces, and being desirous of availing themselves of the distracted state of Rome. The decemvirs assembled the senate, obtained their authority to raise an army, at the head of which they placed three of their number, and sent it against the Sabines. Another was raised and sent against the Æqui, while Appius Claudius remained at Rome to provide for the safety of the city and for the maintenance of the power of the decemvirs. Both armies suffered themselves to be defeated, and retired nearer to the city, dissatisfied rather than discomfited. Then occurred the affair of Virginia, and the decemviral power was at an end. (Vid. Virginia, Appius.—Liv., 3, 32, seqq.—Hetherington's Hist. of Rome, p. 50, seqq.)—The account of the Decemviri is involved in considerable obscurity. A careful examination of the whole subject gives rise to the suspicion, that it was an artful and well-concerted scheme on the part of the nobility to regain the power of which they had been dispossessed by the gradual encroachments of the commons, and was only frustrated by the selfish and inordinate ambition of the leading agents. The people had been clamorous for a code of laws, a demand which the patricians, in whom the whole judiciary power was vested, and to whom the knowledge of the few laws which then existed was confined, had always very strenuously opposed. After violent altercations between the two orders, the patricians on a sudden yielded to the popular wish, and became apparently as desirous of a code of laws as the people themselves were: when, however, it came to the choice of commissioners, who should be sent abroad for the purpose of inspecting foreign codes, the nobility insisted that all three deputies should be of patrician rank. They gained their point, and three of their own order were sent. That these deputies actually went to Greece is a point far from being well established; indeed, the contrary would seem much nearer the truth. We have, it is true, the authority of Florus, Orosius, and Aurelius Victor, in favour of the Roman laws having been compiled from the code of Solon; but, on the other hand, Diodorus Siculus (12, 23), who makes mention of the Decemviri, and of the laws compiled by them, says nothing of the Romans having sent to Athens for that purpose; and in none of the works of Cicero is any account given of this deputation. It must not be denied, however, that Dio Cassius (44, 26) makes Cicero remark, a little after the death of Cæsar, that their forefathers had not disdained to borrow some laws from Athens; and Cicero himself, in his treatise De Legibus (2, 23), speaking of a funeral law of the twelve tables, states that it was nearly all borrowed from one of the laws of Solon. In opposition to this, however, it may be urged, that a comparison of the fragments we possess of the decemviral laws with the code of Solon, shows so striking a discrepance in general, as to lead at once to the belief that the coincidences mentioned by Cicero are to be explained on other and different grounds. Why, it may be asked, if the Roman code were borrowed from the Greek, did it breathe so little of the spirit of Grecian legislation, and contain so many things peculiar to the Romans and foreign to the Greeks? How came it that Hermodorus of Ephesus, who is reported to have interpreted and explained the Attic laws to the Roman commissioners, used many Latin terms, such as auctoritas, libripens, assiduus, proletarius, and many others, for which there were no equivalent expressions among the Greeks?—But the authority of Cicero himself is conclusive on this point. He hesitates not to rank the laws of the twelve tables far above those of Greece. “It is easy,” he observes, “to perceive how much the wisdom and prudence of our forefathers surpassed that of other nations, if you compare our laws with those of Lycurgus, Draco, and Solon. It is incredible how ill digested and almost ridiculous every system of civil law is excepting our own. This I repeat every day, when in my discourses I prefer the wisdom of our Romans to that of other men, and in particular of the Greeks.” (Cic. de Orat., 1, 44.) Is this the language of a man who believed that the Decemviri had been indebted to the legislators of Greece for the code which they promulgated?—The truth appears to be, that whatever admixture of Grecian laws there was in the Roman code, was derived from Grecian customs and usages prevalent at the time both in the vicinity of Rome and in the city itself. To these Grecian customs were added others peculiar to the Romans. These last were, in fact, the old Leges Regiæ, which, as the ancient writers inform us, were observed, after the expulsion of the kings, not as written law, but as customs. The patricians might well be anxious to give them the sanction of written laws, as it is highly probable that, being of regal institution, they breathed more or less of an aristocratical spirit.

Now the concurrence of the nobility in the views of the people, as regarded a code of laws, appears to have been all a preconcerted plan. They wished to destroy the tribunician power, and bring in laws which would tend to strengthen their own hands. The short time in which the Decemviri were occupied with digesting the code in question, shows that the laws had already been compiled and arranged by the patricians, and that their object was merely to present them under the sanction of some esteemed and respected name, as, for example, that of Solon, to the attention of the Roman people. The very continuance of the decemviral office shows this; and Dionysius of Halicarnassus expressly states (Ant. Rom., 10, 58), that the want of two additional tables was a mere pretext to continue the office and crush the tribunician power. It was no difficult thing for the patricians to impose on the lower orders, and give them old Roman laws for Athenian ones, especially as the patricians were the sole depositaries of the ancient laws. The whole history of the Decemviri would show that, until a short time previous to their abdication, they acted with a full understanding on the part of the patricians; and that even towards the close of their administration, when they wanted levies of troops, the opposition of the senate was little better than a mere farce. Had Appius not been tempted to play the tyrant, and to endeavour to monopolize too large a portion of the decemviral power, the plans of the nobility might have had a successful result.—II. There were also military decemviri; and, on various emergencies, decemviri were created to manage and regulate certain affairs, after the same manner as boards of commissioners are now appointed. Thus there were decemviri for conducting colonies; decemviri who officiated as judges in litigated matters under the prætor; decemviri for dividing the lands among the veteran soldiers; decemviri to prepare and preside at feasts in honour of the gods; decemviri to take care of the sacrifices; and decemviri to guard the Sibylline books. With regard to the last of these, however, it must be observed, that the number, after having been originally two, and then increased to 10, was subsequently still further increased to 15 and 16. (Vid. Sibyllæ.)

Decius I. (Publius Decius Mus), a celebrated Roman consul, who, after many glorious exploits, devoted himself to the gods Manes for the safety of his country, in a battle against the Latins, B.C. 337. His son Decius imitated his example, and devoted himself in like manner in his fourth consulship, when fighting against the Gauls and Samnites, B.C. 296. His grandson also did the same in the war against Pyrrhus and the Tarentines, B.C. 280. (Liv., 7, 21, seqq.—Id., 8, 10.—Val. Max., 5, 6.—Virg. Æn., 6, 824.)—II. (Messius Quintus Trajanus), a native of Pannonia, sent by the Emperor Philip to appease a sedition in Mæsia. Instead of obeying his master's command, he assumed the imperial purple. His disaffected troops, it is said, forced him to this step. The emperor immediately marched against him, and a battle was fought near Verona, which terminated successfully for Decius, and Philip was either slain in the conflict or put to death after he fell into the conqueror's power. This took place A.D. 249, and from this period is dated the commencement of the reign of Decius. It was one of short duration, about two years. During this, however, he proved a very cruel persecutor of the Christians. He greatly signalized himself against the Persians, but was slain in an action with the Goths, who had invaded his dominions. In advancing upon them, he was, with the greatest part of his troops, entangled in a morass, where, being surrounded by the enemy, he perished under a shower of darts, A.D. 251, aged 50 years. (Casaub., in Hist. Aug. Script., vol. 2, p. 168.)

DECEMĀTES AGRI, lands in Germany, lying along the Danube, in the vicinity of Mons Abnoba, which paid the tenth part of their value to the Romans. (Tacit., G., 29.) Much interesting information relative to these lands will be found in the work of Leichtlen, entitled "Schwaben unter den Römern." Fribourg, 8vo, 1825.

DEIANIRA, a daughter of CENEUS, king of Ætolia. Her beauty procured many admirers, and her father promised to give her in marriage to him only who proved superior in prowess to all his competitors. Hercules obtained her hand, after a contest with the god of the Achelous. (Vid. Achelous.) On his way to Trachis, after his union with the daughter of CENEUS, Hercules came in company with Deianira to the river Evenus, where Nessus, the Centaur, had taken his abode, and carried over travellers, saying that he had received this office from the gods as a reward for his uprightness. Hercules went across through the water himself, having agreed on the price for the conveyance of Deianira. Nessus attempted the honour of his fair freight. She resisted, and Hercules, hearing her cries, shot Nessus to the heart as he came on shore. The dying Centaur thought on revenge: he called Deianira to him, and told her, if she wished to possess a philtre, or means of securing the love of Hercules, to keep carefully the blood which flowed from his wound; an advice with which she incautiously complied. When Hercules, subsequently, had erected an altar to Jupiter at the promontory of Cenæum in Eubœa, and, wishing to offer a sacrifice, had sent for a splendid robe to wear, Deianira, having heard from the messenger of a female captive named Iola, whom Hercules had taken, and fearing the effect of her charms on the heart of her husband, resolved to try the efficacy of the philtre of Nessus, and tinged with it the tunic which was sent. Hercules, suspecting nothing, put on the fatal garment, and prepared to sacrifice. At first he felt no effect from it; but, when it became warm, the venom of the hydra, which had been communicated by his arrow to the blood of the Centaur, began to consume his flesh, and eventually compelled him, in order to put an end to his sufferings, to ascend the funeral pile at Ceta. (Vid. Hercules.)—Another legend made Deianira to have been the offspring of Bacchus and Althæa, queen of CENEUS. Apollodorus speaks also of her skill in driving the chariot, and her acquaintance generally with martial exercises, a statement which he appears to have borrowed from some old poet. (Apollod., 1, 8, 1.—Heyne, ad loc.—Apollod., 2, 7, 5.—Id., 2, 7, 7.—Ovid, Met., 9, 9.—Id. ib., 9, 137.)—Müller, in his explanation of the myth of Hercules, makes the marriage of that hero with Deianira a figurative allusion to the league between the Dorians and Ætolians for the invasion of the Peloponnesus. (Dorians, vol. 1, p. 70, Eng. trans.) Creuzer, on the other hand, gives a mystic interpretation to the legend. According to him, Hercules represents the power of the sun in drying up and fertilizing the wet places. Hence CENEUS (Οἰνύς, οἰνός), the wine-man (or cultivator of the vine), gives his offspring in marriage to Hercules (or, in other words, gives the vine to the protecting care of that power which imparts the principle of production), and Hercules rescues her from the Centaur, the type, according to Creuzer and others, of the water or morasses. (Symbolik, vol. 2, p. 251.)

DEIDAMIA, a daughter of LYCOMEDES, king of Seyros. She bore a son called PYRRIUS, or NEOPTOLEMUS, to Achilles, who was disguised at her father's court in women's clothes, under the name of PYRRA. (Apollod., 3, 13, 7.—Propert., 2, 9, 16.—Ovid, A. A., 1, 682, seqq.)

DEIOCES, a Median, who, when his countrymen had shaken off the Assyrian yoke, succeeded in attaining to the sovereign power. His mode of accomplishing that object was as follows: Having, by his probity and strict exercise of justice, obtained the office of judge in his own district, he made himself so celebrated by the discharge of his official duties that the inhabitants of other districts also came to him for redress. Pretending at last that his private affairs were suffering, in consequence of the time which he devoted to the business of others, he absented himself from the place where he used to sit to determine differences. Lawlessness and iniquity thereupon increased, until an assembly of the Medes being summoned, the partisans of Deioces recommended him for king, and he was accordingly elected. He is said to have founded the city of Ecbatana, and to have reigned 43 years, being succeeded on his death by his son Phraortes. (Herod., 1, 96, seqq.)

DEIOTARUS was first distinguished as tetrarch of Galatia, and, on account of the eminent services which he performed in that station, and of the figure which he made in the Mithradatic war, was afterward appointed to the throne of Armenia Minor by Pompey, which appointment was confirmed by the senate. In the civil wars he sided with Pompey, and on that account was deprived of his Armenian possessions by Cæsar, but allowed to retain the title of king and the other favours conferred upon him by the Romans. Shortly after this he was accused by his grandson, with whom he was at open variance, of having made an attempt on the life of Cæsar when the latter was in Asia. Cicero ably and successfully defended him before Cæsar, in whose presence the cause was tried. After Cæsar's death, he recovered by bribery his forfeited territories. He intended also to join Brutus, but the general to whom he committed his troops went over to Antony, which saved him his kingdom. (Cic., pro Rege Deiot.—Id., Phil., 11, 12.—Id., ep. ad Att., 5, 17.—Id., de Har. Resp., 13.—Id., de Dic., 2, 37, &c.)

DEIPHOBÆ, a sibyl of Cumæ, daughter of Glaucus. Virgil makes her the guide of Æneas to the lower world. (Æn., 6, 236, seqq.) Various names are given to her by the ancient writers, in relation to which, consult Gallæus (Dissertationes de Sibyllis, p. 145).

DEIPHOBUS, a son of Priam and Hecuba, who married Helen after the death of Paris, and was betrayed by her to Menelaus, and ignominiously murdered. (Virg., Æn., 6, 495.) According to Virgil's account, she introduced Menelaus secretly into the bedchamber of Deiphobus, who was asleep at the time, and, on awaking, was unable to defend himself, his faithless consort having removed his trusty sword from beneath his head, and all arms from his palace. He was cruelly mutilated before being put to death. (Virg., l. c.) Homer makes Deiphobus to have particularly distinguished himself during the Trojan war, in two encounters with Meriones and Ascalaphus. (Il., 13, 156, et 517, seqq.)

DELIA, I. a festival celebrated every fifth year in the island of Delos, in honour of Apollo. It was instituted by the Athenians, after the solemn lustration of Delos, in the sixth year of the Peloponnesian war. (Vid. Delos.)—II. Another festival, celebrated annually by a sacred voyage from Athens to Delos. It was said to have been instituted by Theseus, who when going to Crete, made a vow to Apollo, that, if he and the rest of the youths and maidens should be saved, he would send every year a sacred delegation to the natal island of the god. The vow was fulfilled, and the custom was ever after observed by the Athenians. The persons sent on this annual voyage were called Delias and Theori, and the ship which conveyed them was said to have been the same with the one which had carried Theseus to Crete. The beginning of the voyage was computed from the time that the priest of Apollo first adorned the stern of the ship with garlands, according to Plato, and from that time they began to purify the city. During this period, up to the time of the vessel's return, it was held unlawful to put any condemned person to death, which was the reason that Socrates was reprieved for thirty days after his condemnation, as we learn from Plato and Xenophon. With regard to the sacred vessel itself, which was called Θεωπις, it was preserved by the Athenians to the time of Demetrius Phalereus, they restoring always what was decayed, and changing the old rotten planks for others that were new and entire; so that it furnished philosophers with matter of dispute, whether, after so many repairs and alterations, it still remained the same identical ship; and it served as an instance to illustrate the opinion of those, who held that the body still remained the same numerical substance, notwithstanding the continual decay of old parts and the acquisition of new ones, through the several stages of life. (Plat., Phædon., § 2, seqq.—Schol., ad loc.—Plut., Vit. Thes., c. 23.—Xen., Mem., 4, 8, 2.—Calim., II. in Del., 278, &c.)—III. A surname of Diana, from her having been born in the island of Delos.

DELŪM, a city of Bœotia, on the seacoast, north of the mouth of the Asopus. It was celebrated for its temple of Apollo, and also for the battle which took place in its vicinity between the Athenians and Bœotians, when the former were totally routed. It was in this engagement that Socrates, according to some accounts, saved the life of Xenophon, or, according to others, of Alcibiades. (Strabo, 403.—Diog. Laert., 2, 22.—Thucyd., 4, 96.) Some vestiges of this ancient town have been observed by modern travellers near the village of Dramisi, on the Euripus. (Gell's Lin., p. 134.—Dodwell's Tour, vol. 2, p. 155.)

DELŪS, a surname of Apollo, because born in Delos.

DELMINIUM, the ancient capital of Dalmatia. (Vid. Dalmatinum.)

DELOS, an island of the Ægean, situate nearly in the centre of the Cyclades. This island was called also Asteria, Pelasgia, Chlamydia, Lagia, Pyrpilis, Scythias, Mydia, and Ortygia. (Plin., 4, 12.—Steph. Byz., s. v. Δῖλος.) It was named Ortygia from ὄρνις, a quail, and Lagia from λαγός, a hare, the island formerly abounding with both these creatures. On this account, according to Strabo, it was not allowed to have dogs at Delos, because they destroyed the quails and hares. (Strabo, 485.) The name Delos is commonly derived from δῖλος, manifest, in allusion to the island having floated under the surface of the sea until made to appear and stand firm by order of Neptune. This was done for the purpose of receiving Iatona, who was on the eve of delivery, and could find no asylum on the earth, Juno having bound it by an oath not to receive her; as Delos at the time was floating beneath the waters, it was freed from the obligation. Once fixed in its place, it continued, according to popular belief, to remain so firm as even to be unmoved by the shocks of an earthquake. This, however, is contradicted by Thucydides and Herodotus, who report that a shock was felt there before the Peloponnesian war. (Thucyd., 2, 8.—Herodot., 6, 98.—Compare Orac., ap. Eustath. ad Dion. Perieg., 525, and Pindar, ap. Phil. Jud., 2, p. 511.) Pliny quotes, among others, Aristotle, who pretends that its name was given to Delos, because the island rose unexpectedly out of the sea, and appeared to view. Many other opinions have been advanced respecting its origin. According, however, to Olivier, it is at the present day everywhere schistose or granitical, exhibiting no traces of a volcano, and nothing that can explain, by the laws of physics, the wonders which the Greeks have transmitted to us respecting it.—It appears from Thucydides, that as early as the days of Homer, whose hymn to Delos he quotes, this island was the great rendezvous of the Ionians, who met there to celebrate a national festival and public games.—Delos was celebrated as the natal island of Apollo and Diana, and the solemnities with which the festivals of these deities were observed there never failed to attract large crowds from the neighbouring islands and the continent. Among the seven wonders of the world was an altar at Delos, which was made of the horns of animals. Tradition reported that it was constructed by Apollo, with the horns of deer killed in hunting by his sister Diana. Plutarch says he saw it, and he speaks of the wonderful interlacing of the horns of which it was made; no cement nor bond of any kind being employed to hold it together. (Plut., de Solert. An., p. 983.) The Athenians were commanded by an oracle, in the time of Pisistratus, to purify Delos, which they did by causing the dead bodies to be taken up which had been buried there, and removed from all places within view of the temple. In the sixth year of the Peloponnesian war, they, by the advice of an oracle, purified it anew, by carrying all the dead bodies to the neighbouring island of Rhenæa, where they were interred. After having done this, in order to prevent its being polluted for the time to come, they published an edict, that for the future no person should be suffered to die, nor any woman to be brought to bed, in the island, but that, when death or parturition approached, they should be carried over into Rhenæa. In memory of this purification, it is said, the Athenians instituted a solemn quinquennial festival. (Vid. Delia.—Thucyd., 3, 104.) A ship called Theoris (Θεωπις) likewise sailed annually from the Athenian shores on a sacred voyage to this same island. (Vid. Delia II.)—When the Persian armament, under Datis and Artaphernes, was making its way through the Grecian islands, the inhabitants of Delos left their rich temple, with its treasures, to the protection of its tutelary deities, and fled to Tenos. The fame of the sanctuary, however, saved it from spoliation. The Persians had heard that Delos was the birthplace of two deities, who corresponded to those which held the foremost rank in their own religious system, the sun and moon. This comparison was probably suggested to them by some Greek who wished to save the temple. Hence, though separately neither of the divine twins inspired the barbarians with reverence, their common shrine was not only spared, but, if we may credit the tradition which was current in the days of Herodotus, received the highest honours from Datis: he would not suffer his ships to touch the sacred shore, but kept them at the island of Rhenæa. He also sent a herald to recall the Delians who had fled to Tenos; and offered sacrifice to the god, in which 300 talents of frankincense are said to have been consumed. (Herodot., 6, 97.) After the Persian war, the Athenians established at Delos the treasury of the Greeks, and ordered that all meetings relative to the confederacy should be held there. (Thucyd., 1, 96.) In the tenth year of the Peloponnesian war, not being satisfied with the purifications which the island had hitherto undergone, they removed its entire population to Adramyttium, where they obtained a settlement from the Persian satrap Pharnaces. (Thucyd., 5, 1.) Here many of these unfortunate Delians were afterward treacherously murdered by order of Arsaces, an officer of Tissaphernes. (Thucyd., 8, 108.) Finally, however, the Athenians restored those that survived to their country after the battle of Anaphipolis, as they considered that their ill success in the war proceeded from the anger of the god on account of their conduct towards this unfortunate people. (Thucyd., 5, 22.) Strabo says that Delos became a place of great commercial importance after the destruction of Corinth, as the merchants who had frequented that city then withdrew to this island, which afforded great facilities for carrying on trade on account of the convenience of its port, its advantageous situation with respect to the coasts of Greece and Asia Minor, as well as from the great concourse of people who resorted thither at stated times. (Plin., 4, 12.—Liv., 36, 43.) The Romans especially favoured the interests of the Delians, though they had conceded to the Athenians the sovereignty of the island and the administration of the temple. (Polyb., 30, 18.) But, on the occupation of Athens by the generals of Mithradates, they landed troops in Delos, and committed the greatest devastations there in consequence of the inhabitants refusing to espouse their cause. After this calamity it remained in an impoverished and deserted state. (Strabo, 436.—Appian, Bell. Mithrad., c. 28.—Pausan., 3, 23.—Antip., Thess. Anal., vol. 2, p. 118.) The town of Delos was situate in a plain watered by the little river Inopus (Strabo, l. c.—Callim., Hymn. in Del., 206), and by a lake, called Trochoeides by Herodotus (2, 170), and Theognis (v. 7). Callimachus and Euripides also allude to it. (Hymn. in Del., 261.—Iph. Taur., 1097.) The island is now called Delo or Sidile, and is so covered with ruins and rubbish as to admit of little or no culture. (Wheeler, vol. 1, p. 88.—Spon., vol. 1, p. 176.—Tournefort, vol. 1, p. 307.—Choiseul Gouffier, Voyage Pittoresque, vol. 1, p. 396, seqq.)

DELPHI, a small but important city of Phocis in Greece, situate on the southern side of Mount Parnassus, and built in the form of an amphitheatre. Justin (24, 6) says it had no walls, but was defended by its precipices. Strabo (418) gives it a circuit of sixteen stadia; and Pausanias (10, 5) calls it πόλις, which seems to imply that it was walled like other cities. In earlier times it was, perhaps, like Olympia, defended by the sanctity of its oracle and the presence of its god. These being found not to afford sufficient protection against the enterprises of the profane, it was probably fortified, and became a regular city after the predatory incursions of the Phocians. The walls may, however, be coeval with the foundation of the city itself; their high antiquity is not disproved by the use of mortar in the construction. Some of the Egyptian pyramids are built in a similar manner. (Consult Hamilton's Ægyptiaca.—Dodwell's Tour, vol. 1, p. 164.)—The more ancient name of Delphi was Pytho, from the serpent Python, as is commonly supposed, which was said to have been slain by Apollo. (Apollod., Biblioth., 1, 4, 3.) Whence the name Delphi itself was derived we are not informed. Some make the city to have received this name from Delphus, a son of Apollo. Others deduce the appellation from the Greek ἀδελφοί, "brethren," because Apollo and his brother Bacchus were both worshipped there, each having one of the summits of Parnassus sacred to him. The author of the Hymn to Apollo seems to pun on the word Delphi, in making Apollo transform himself into a dolphin (δελφίς.—v. 491). Some supposed, that the name was intended to designate Delphi as the centre or navel of the earth. Faber makes it Tel Phi, "the oracle of the Sun" (Cabiri, vol. 1, p. 66), and Bryant would tempt us to resolve the Nymph who originally presided over the sacred precincts of Delphi, into Ain omphie, i. e., "font oraculi." (Mythology, vol. 1, p. 110 and 345.) Jones derives the name of Delphi from the Arabic Telb, "to inquire." (Greek Lex., s. v.) If, amid these various etymological theories, we might venture to adduce one of our own, it would be, that Βελφοί, the Æolic form for Δελφοί (Maittaire, Dial., p. 139, c.), contains the true germ of the name, viz., Βελ, or the old term ελ (i. e., "the sun"), with the digamma prefixed in place of the aspirate. (Compare the Greek forms ἥλιος, i. e., ἑλ-ιος, σέλας, i. e., σελ-ας, and the Latin Sol.) Delphi will then be the city of the Sun. (Compare with the term Βελ the Oriental Baal.)—In speaking of this city, the poets commonly use the appellation of Pytho, but Herodotus and historians in general prefer that of Delphi, and are silent as to the other. A short sketch of the history of this most celebrated oracle and temple will not, perhaps, be unacceptable to the reader. Though not so ancient as Dodona, it is evident that the fame of the Delphic shrine had been established at a very early period, from the mention made of it by Homer, and the accounts supplied by Pausanias and Strabo. The Homeric hymn to Apollo informs us (v. 391, seqq.), that, when the Pythian god was establishing his oracle at Delphi, he beheld on the sea a merchant-ship from Crete; this he directs to Crissa, and appoints the foreigners the servants of his newly-established sanctuary, near which they settled. When this story, which we would not affirm to be historically true, is stripped of the language of poetry, it can only mean, that a Cretan colony founded the temple and oracle of Delphi. (Heeren, Ideen, vol. 3, p. 94.) Strabo reports, that it was at first consulted only by the neighbouring states; but that, after its fame became more widely spread, foreign princes and nations eagerly sought responses from the sacred tripod, and loaded the altar of the god with rich presents and costly offerings (420). Pausanias states that the most ancient temple of Apollo at Delphi was formed, according to some, out of branches of bay, and that these branches were cut from the tree that was at Tempe. The form of this temple resembled that of a cottage. After mentioning a second and a third temple, the one raised, as the Delphians said, by bees from wax and wings, and sent by Apollo to the Hyperboreans, and the other built of brass, he adds, that to this succeeded a fourth and more stately edifice of stone, erected by two architects named Trophonius and Agamedes. (Pausan., 10, 5.) Here were deposited the sumptuous presents of Gyges and Midas, Alyattes and Cræsus (Herodot., 1, 14; 50, 51), as well as those of the Sybarites, Spineta, and Siceliots, each prince and nation having their separate chapel or treasury for the reception of these offerings, with an inscription attesting the name of the donor and the cause of the gift. (Strabo, 420.) This temple having been accidentally destroyed by fire in the first year of the fifty-eighth Olympiad, or 548 B.C. (Pausan., l. c.), the Amphictyons undertook to build another for the sum of three hundred talents, of which the Delphians were to pay one fourth. The remainder of the amount is said to have been obtained by contributions from the different cities and nations. Amasis, king of Egypt, furnished a thousand talents of alumina. The Alcæonidæ, a wealthy Athenian family, undertook the contract, and agreed to construct the edifice of Porphyry stone, but afterward liberally substituted Parian marble for the front, a circumstance which is said to have added considerably to their influence at Delphi. (Herodot., 2, 180.—Id., 5, 62.) According to Strabo and Pausanias, the architect was Spintharus, a Corinthian. The vast riches accumulated in this temple, led Xerxes, after having forced the pass of Thermopylæ, to detach a portion of his army into Phocis, with a view of securing Delphi and its treasures, which, as Herodotus affirms, were better known to him than the contents of his own palace. The enterprise, however, failed, owing, as it was reported by the Delphians, to the manifest interposition of the deity, who terrified the barbarians and hurled destruction on their scattered bands (Herodot., 8, 37.) Many years subsequent to this event, the temple fell into the hands of the Phocians, headed by Philomelus, who scrupled not to appropriate its riches to the payment of his troops in the war he was then waging against Thebes. The Phocians are said to have plundered the temple, during this contest, of gold and silver, to the enormous amount of 10,000 talents, or nearly 10,600,000 dollars. (Compare Pausanias, 10, 2.—Strabo, 421.) At a still later period, Delphi became exposed to a formidable attack from a large body of Gauls, headed by their king Brennus. These barbarians, having forced the defiles of Mount Cita, possessed themselves of the temple and ransacked its treasures. The booty which they obtained on this occasion is stated to have been immense; and this they must have succeeded in removing to their own country, since we are told, that, on the capture of Tolosa, a city of Gaul, by the Roman general Cæpio, a great part of the Delphic spoils was found there. (Strabo, 188.—Dio Cassius, Excerpt., p. 630.) Pausanias, however, relates, that the Gauls met with great disasters in their attempt on Delphi, and were totally discomfited through the miraculous intervention of the god (10, 23.—Compare Polybius, 1, 6, 5.—Id., 2, 20, 6.—Justin, 24, 6.) Sylla is also said to have robbed this temple, as well as those of Olympia and Epidaurus. (Dio Cass., Excerpt., p. 646.—Diod. Sic., Excerpt., 406.) Strabo assures us, that in his time the temple was greatly impoverished, all the offerings of any value having been successively removed. The Emperor Nero carried off, according to Pausanias (10, 7), five hundred statues of bronze at one time. Constantine the Great, however, proved a more fatal enemy to Delphi than either Sylla or Nero. He removed the sacred tripods to adorn the hippodrome of his new city, where, together with the Apollo, the statues of the Heliconian muses, and a celebrated statue of Pan, they were extant when Sozomen wrote his history. (Gibbon, Decline and Fall, c. 17.) Among these tripods was the famous one, which the Greeks, after the battle of Plataea, found in the camp of Mardonius. The Brazen Column which supported this tripod is still to be seen at Constantinople. (Clarke's Travels—Greece, Egypt, &c., vol. 3, p. 75, seqq.)—The spot whence issued the prophetic vapour, which inspired the priestess, was said to be the central point of the earth, this having been proved by Jupiter himself, who despatched two eagles from opposite quarters of the heavens, which there encountered each other. (Strabo, 419.—Pausan., 10, 16.—Plut., de Orac. Def., p. 409.) Strabo reports, that the sacred tripod was placed over the mouth of the cave, whence proceeded the exhalation, and which was of great depth. On this sat the Pythia, who, having caught the inspiration, pronounced her oracles in extempore prose or verse; if the former, it was immediately versified by the poet always employed for that purpose. The oracle itself is said to have been discovered by accident. Some goats having strayed to the mouth of the cavern, were suddenly seized with convulsions: those likewise by whom they were found in this situation having been affected in a similar manner, the circumstance was deemed supernatural, and the cave pronounced the seat of prophecy. (Pausan., 10, 5.—Plut., de Orac. Def., p. 433.—Plin., 2, 93.) The priestess could only be consulted on certain days. The season of inquiry was the spring, during the month Busius. (Plut., Quæst. Græc., p. 292.) Sacrifices and other ceremonies were to be performed by those who sought an answer from the oracle, before they could be admitted into the sanctuary. (Herodot., 7, 140.—Plut., de Orac. Def., p. 435, 437.—Id., de Pyth. Orac., p. 397.) The most remarkable of the Pythian responses are those which Herodotus records as having been delivered to the Athenians, before the invasion of Xerxes (7, 140), to Cræsus (1, 46), to Lycurgus (1, 65), to Glaucus the Spartan (6, 86), and one relative to Agesilaus, cited by Pausanias (3, 8). There was, however, it appears, no difficulty in bribing and otherwise influencing the Pythia herself, as history presents us with several instances of this imposture. Thus we are told, that the Alcæonidae suggested on one occasion such answers as accorded with their political designs. (Herodot., 5, 62, 90.) Cleomenes, king of Sparta, also prevailed on the priestess to aver that his colleague Demaratus was illegitimate. On the discovery, however, of this machination, the Pythia was removed from her office. (Herodotus, 6, 66.) The same charge was brought against Plistonax, another sovereign of Sparta. (Thucyd., 5, 16.—Compare Plut., Vit. Demosth., p. 854.—Id., Vit.

Nic., p. 532.) Delphi derived farther celebrity from its being the place where the Amphictyonic council held one of their assemblies (Strabo, 420.—Sainte Croix, des Gouvern. Feder. Art., 2, p. 19), and also from the institution of the games which that ancient and illustrious body had established after the successful termination of the Crissæan war. (Vid. Pythia, II., and compare Clinton's Fasti Hellenici, Appendix, 1, p. 195.) For an account of the ruins of Delphi, on part of the site of which stands the present village of Castri, consult Clarke's Travels—Greece, Egypt, &c., vol. 7, p. 225, seqq.—Dodwell's Tour, vol. 1, p. 174, seqq.—And for some remarks on the fable of Apollo and Python, consult the latter article.—No traces of the sacred aperture remain at the present day. Dr. Clarke, however, inclines to the opinion that it ought to be searched for in the very middle of the ancient city. He bases his remark on a passage of Steph. Byz. (p. 229, ed. Gronov., Amst., 1678), and on the statement of Strabo, that the navel of the earth was in the midst of the temple of Apollo. (Clarke's Travels, l. c.)

DELPHUS, a son of Apollo and Celæno, who, according to one account, was the founder of Delphi. (Pausan., 10, 6.)

DELTA, a part of Egypt, which received that name from its resemblance to the form of the fourth letter of the Greek alphabet. It lay between the Canopic and Pelusiac mouths of the Nile, where the river begins to branch off, and is generally supposed to have been formed, in part at least, if not altogether, by the deposits of the Nile. (Consult remarks under the article Nilus, and also Lyell's Geology, vol. 1, p. 355.)

DEMĀDES, an Athenian, of obscure origin, the son of a mariner, and at first a mariner himself. He afterward, although without any liberal education, came forward as a public speaker, and obtained great influence among his countrymen. Demades is described as a witty, acute, and fluent speaker, but an unprincipled and immoral man. Having been taken prisoner at Chæronæa, he is said, by a free and well-timed rebuke, to have checked the insolent joy displayed by Philip, but afterward to have allowed himself to be corrupted, and employed as a venal agent by the conqueror. The first part of this story is hardly credible, the latter is fully substantiated. Demades from this time was the tool of Macedon. He advocated the interests of Philip, flattered his successor Alexander, sided with Antipater, and, in a word, is described by Plutarch as the man who, of all the demagogues of the day, contributed most to the ruin of his country. (Vit. Phoc. init.) He was at last put to death by Cassander, having been proved, by means of an intercepted letter, to be in secret league with the enemies of the former, B.C. 318. Cicero and Quintilian state, that no orations of Demades were extant in their time. (Cic., Brut., 9.—Quint., 2, 17, et 12.) The old rhetorician, however, from whom Tzetzes drew his information on the subject, had read speeches of his. (Tzet., Chil., 6, 36, seq.) We have, moreover, remaining at the present day a fragment of an oration by Demades, entitled ἐπὶ τῆς δωδεκαετίας, "An apology for his conduct during the twelve years he had been a public orator." It is to be found in the collections of Aldus, Stephens, and Reiske. (Ruhnken, Hist. Crit. Orat. Græc., in Opusc., vol. 1, p. 319, seqq.—Hauptmann, de Demade Dissert.—Schöll, Hist. Lit. Gr., vol. 2, p. 265, seq.)

DEMĀRĀTUS, I, the son and successor of Ariston on the throne of Sparta, B.C. 526. He was deposed, through the intrigues of Cleomenes, his colleague, on the ground of his being illegitimate. After his deposition, he was chosen and held the office of magistrate; but, being insultingly derided on one occasion by Leorychides, who had been appointed king in his stead, he retired, first to the island of Zacynthus, whither he was pursued by the Lacedæmonians, and afterward crossed over into Asia to Darius, who received him honourably, and presented him with lands and cities. (Herod., 6, 65, 70.) He enabled Xerxes subsequently to obtain the nomination to the empire, in preference to his elder brother Artabazarnes, by suggesting to him an argument, the justice of which was acknowledged by Darius. (Herod., 7, 3.) We find him after this, though an exile from his country, yet sending the first intelligence to Sparta of the designs of Xerxes against Greece. (Herod., 7, 239.) He accompanied the monarch on his expedition, frankly praised to him the discipline of the Greeks, and especially that of the Spartans; and, before the battle of Thermopylæ, explained to him some of the warlike customs of the last-mentioned people. (Herod., 7, 209.) We learn also, that he advised Xerxes to seize, with his fleet, on the island of Cythera, off the coast of Laconia, from which he might continually infest the shores of that country. The monarch did not adopt his suggestion, but still always regarded the exile Spartan as a friend, and treated him accordingly. The nature of the advice relative to Cythera makes it more than probable that Demaratus, in sending home information of the threatened expedition of Xerxes, meant in reality to taunt and alarm his countrymen. (Herod., 7, 234, seqq.)—II. A rich citizen of Corinth, of the family of the Bacchiadæ. When Cypselus had usurped the sovereign power of Corinth, Demaratus, with all his family, migrated to Italy, and settled at Tarquinii, 658 years before Christ. Commerce had not been deemed disreputable among the Corinthian nobility; and as a merchant, therefore, Demaratus had formed ties of friendship at this place. He brought great wealth with him. The sculptors Eucheir and Engrammus, and Cleophrantus the painter, were said to have accompanied him; and along with the fine arts of Greece, he taught (so the popular account said) alphabetic writing to the Etruscians. His son Lucumo migrated afterward to Rome, and became monarch there under the name of Tarquinius Priscus. (Plin., 35, 5.—Liv., 1, 34, seqq.)—III. A Corinthian, in the time of Philip and his son Alexander. He had connexions of hospitality with the royal family of Macedon, and, having paid a visit to Philip, succeeded in reconciling that monarch to his son. After Alexander had overthrown the Persian empire, Demaratus, though advanced in years, made a voyage to the east in order to see the conqueror, and, when he beheld him, exclaimed, "What a pleasure have those Greeks missed, who died without seeing Alexander seated on the throne of Darius!" He died soon after, and was honoured with a magnificent funeral. (Plut., Vit. Alex., c. 37.—Id. ibid., c. 56.—Id., Vit. Ages., c. 15.)—IV. A Corinthian exile at the court of Philip, king of Macedonia. (Plut., Alex.)

DEMETRIA, a festival in honour of Ceres, called by the Greeks Demêter (Δημήτηρ). It was then customary for the votaries of the goddess to lash themselves with whips made with the bark of trees. The Athenians instituted for a short time a solemnity of the same name, in honour of Demetrius Poliœcetes.

DEMETRIAS, a city of Thessaly, on the Sinus Pelagicus or Pagasæus, at the mouth of the river Onchestus. It owed its name and origin to Demetrius Poliœcetes, about 290 B.C., and derived, as Strabo reports, its population, in the first instance, from the neighbouring towns of Nelia, Pagasæ, Ormenium, Rhizus, Sepias, Olizon, Bæbe, and Iolcos, all of which were finally included within its territory. (Strabo, 436.—Plut., Vit. Demetr.) It soon became one of the most flourishing towns in Thessaly, and, in a military point of view, was allowed to rank among the principal fortresses of Greece. It was, in fact, most advantageously placed for defending the approaches to the defile of Tempe, as well on the side of the plains as on that of the mountains. Its maritime situation also, both from its proximity to the island of Eubœa, to Attica, the Peloponnesus, the Cyclades, and the opposite shores of Asia, rendered it a most important acquisition to the sovereigns of Macedonia. Hence Philip, the son of Demetrius, is said to have termed it one of the chains of Greece. (Polyb., 17, 11.—Liv., 32, 37.—Id., 28, 5.) After the battle of Cynoscephalæ, it became the principal town of the Magnesian republic, and the seat of government. It fell under the Roman power after the battle of Pydna. Demetrias is generally thought to coincide with the modern Volo; but this last occupies the site of the ancient Pagasæ. (Cramer's Anc. Greece, vol. 1, p. 434.)

DEMETRIUS, I. a son of Antigonus and Stratonice, surnamed Poliœcetes (Πολιορκητής), "besieger of cities," from his talents as an engineer, and his peculiar skill in conducting sieges, especially by the aid of machines and engines either invented or improved by himself. At the age of twenty-two he was sent by his father against Ptolemy, who had invaded Syria. He was defeated near Gaza; but he soon repaired his loss by a victory over one of the generals of the enemy. He afterward sailed with a fleet of 250 ships to Athens, and restored the Athenians to liberty, by freeing them from the power of Cassander and Ptolemy, and expelling the garrison which was stationed there under Demetrius Phalereus. The gratitude of the Athenians to their deliverer passed all bounds, or was only equalled by their fulsome and impious adulation, the details of which are to be found in the pages of Plutarch. (Vit. Demetr., c. 10.) But Demetrius was soon summoned by his father to leave the flattery of orators and demagogues, in order to resume the combined duties of an admiral and an engineer in the reduction of Cyprus. After a slight engagement with Menelaüs, the brother of Ptolemy, he laid siege to Salamis, the ancient capital of that island. The occurrences of this siege occupy a prominent place in history, not so much on account of the determined resistance opposed to the assailants, and the great importance attached to its issue by the heads of the belligerent parties, as for a new species of warlike engine invented by Demetrius, and first employed by him against the city of Salamis. The instrument in question was called an Helepolis, or "Town-taker," and was an immense tower, consisting of nine stories, gradually diminishing as they rose in altitude, and affording accommodation for a large number of armed men, who discharged all sorts of missiles against the ramparts of the enemy. Ptolemy, dreading the fall of Salamis, which would pave the way, as he easily foresaw, for the entire conquest of Cyprus, had already made formidable preparations for compelling Demetrius to raise the siege. A memorable scaffold ensued, in which the ruler of Egypt was completely defeated, with the loss of nearly all his fleet, and thirty thousand prisoners. An invasion of Egypt, by Antigonus, then took place, but ended disgracefully; and Demetrius was sent to reduce the Rhodians, who persisted in remaining allies to Ptolemy. The operations of the son of Antigonus before Rhodes, and the resolute defence of the place by the inhabitants, present perhaps the most remarkable example of skill and heroism that is to be found in the annals of ancient warfare. The Helepolis employed on this occasion greatly exceeded the one that was used in the siege of Salamis. Its towers were 150 feet high; it was supported on eight enormous wheels, and propelled by the labour of 3400 men. After a siege of a whole year, however, the enterprise was abandoned, a treaty was concluded with the Rhodians, and Demetrius, at the request of the Athenians, who were now again subjected to the Macedonian yoke, proceeded to rescue Greece from the power of Cassander. In this he was so successful that he ultimately spread the terror of his arms over the whole of that country. The object of Antigonus and his son was now to effect the final subjugation of Macedonia, Egypt, and the East. The confederacy of Seleucus, Ptolemy, Lysimachus, and Cassander was therefore renewed, with the view of crushing these ambitious schemes, and in the battle of Ipsus they succeeded in effecting their object. Antigonus fell in the conflict, and Demetrius, after a precipitate flight of 200 miles, regained his fleet with only a small remnant of his once powerful host. Sailing soon after to Athens, he received information from the fickle and ungrateful inhabitants that they had resolved to admit no king within their city; upon which, finding that all Greece had now submitted to the influence of Cassander, he made a descent on the coast at Corinth for the mere purposes of plunder and revenge, and afterward committed similar ravages along the whole coast of Thrace. Fortune, however, soon smiled again. Seleucus, jealous of the power of Lysimachus, whose territories now extended to the Syrian borders, resolved to strengthen his own dominions by forming an alliance with the family of Demetrius, which was still possessed of considerable claims and interests. He therefore made proposals for, and obtained in marriage, the accomplished Stratonice, the daughter of his former rival. The power of Demetrius again became formidable, an alliance with Ptolemy, who gave him his daughter Ptolemais in marriage, having also added to its increase. Having compelled the Athenians to open their gates and receive a garrison, and having generously forgiven their previous fickleness, he turned his attention to Macedonia, and having embraced an opportunity of interfering in the affairs of that country, which was afforded by dissensions between the two sons of Cassander, he cut off Alexander, one of the two princes, and made himself master of the throne. His restless ambition now projected new conquests in Europe and Asia. Turning his arms against Pyrrhus, he drove him from Thessaly, and then marched to Thebes, which he took by assault. About the same time also he built the city of Demetrias on the Pelasgic gulf; and, in order to increase his naval power, formed a matrimonial union with the daughter of Agathocles, tyrant of Sicily. His fleet at length amounted to 500 galleys, many of them having fifteen or sixteen banks of oars; while his land forces exceeded considerably 100,000 men, of which more than 12,000 were cavalry. This formidable power excited the alarm of Lysimachus and Ptolemy; the latter advanced against Greece with his fleet, while the former, with Pyrrhus his ally, made a land attack on Macedon in two different points at once. Demetrius took the field with his usual alacrity, but when he approached the position of Pyrrhus, the greater part of his troops deserted him, and he was compelled to flee. Leaving Macedon a prey to Lysimachus and Pyrrhus, the active Demetrius passed over into Asia Minor with a body of his best troops, resolved to assail his adversary in the most vulnerable quarter. The enterprise was at first attended with the most brilliant success. In a short time, however, a check was imposed on his career by Agathocles, the son of Lysimachus, and Demetrius was compelled to apply for protection to his aged son-in-law Seleucus. The latter yielded to his solicitations only so far as to grant him permission to spend two months within his territory; and was subsequently induced by his courtiers to rid himself of so dangerous a guest, by sending him a prisoner to a strong fortress on the Syrian coast, about sixty miles south of Antioch. A sufficient revenue was allowed him for his support, and he was permitted to indulge in the chase and other manly exercises, always, however, under the eye of his keepers. At last, however, giving up all active pursuits, he closed his checkered life, at the end of three years, a victim to chagrin, sloth, and intemperance. His remains were delivered up to his son Antigonus, who interred them with great splendour in the city of Demetrias. The age of Demetrius at the time of his death was fifty-four. His posterity enjoyed the throne of Macedon in continued succession down to Perses, when the Roman conquest took place.—Demetrius was remarkable for the possession of two qualities, which seem to be altogether inconsistent with each other, an excessive love of pleasure and an ardent passion for glory. His courage in conflicts, his profound acquaintance with the military art, and his skill, particularly in the construction of warlike engines, constitute strong claims on the remembrance of posterity. His dissolute morals have been justly censured, but there were many excellent traits of character which went far towards counterbalancing his vices. He always showed himself a dutiful and affectionate son, a mild and generous conqueror, and a liberal patron of the arts. (Plut., Vit. Demetr.)—II. Son of Antigonus Gonatas, and grandson of Demetrius Poliorcetes, succeeded his father, B.C. 243. He made war on the Ætolians and Achæans, and was successful against both, especially the latter, whom he defeated, although under the command of Aratus. He had distinguished himself, before coming to the throne, by driving Alexander of Epirus out of Macedonia, and also stripping him of his own dominions. He reigned ten years, and was succeeded by his son, Philip III. (Justin. 26, 2.—Id. ib. 28, 3.)—III. Son of Philip III., of Macedonia. He was an excellent prince, greatly beloved by his countrymen, and was sent by his father as a hostage to Rome, where he also made many friends. He was subsequently liberated, and not long after paid a second visit to the capital of Italy, as an ambassador from Philip, on which occasion he obtained, by his modest and candid deportment, favourable terms for his parent, when the latter was complained of to the Roman senate by the cities of Greece. Returning home loaded with marks of distinction from the Romans, and honoured by the Macedonians themselves, who regarded him as the liberator of their country, he excited the jealousy of his own father, and the envy and hatred of his brother Perses. The latter eventually accused him of aspiring to the crown, and of carrying on, for this purpose, a secret correspondence with the Romans. Philip, lending too credulous an ear to the charge, put his son Demetrius to death, and only discovered, when too late, the utter falsity of the accusation. (Liv. 33, 30.—Id. 39, 35, seqq.—Id. 40, 5.—Id. 40, 24.—Id. 40, 54, seqq.)—IV. Surnamed Soter (Σωτήρ), or “the Preserver,” was the son of Seleucus Philopator; and was sent by his father, at the age of twenty-three, as a hostage to Rome. He was living there in this condition when his father died of poison, B.C. 176. His uncle Antiochus Epiphanes thereupon usurped the throne, and was succeeded by Antiochus Eupator. Demetrius, meanwhile, having in vain endeavoured to interest the senate in his behalf, secretly escaped from Rome, through the advice of Polybius the historian, and, finding a party in Syria ready to support his claims, defeated and put to death Eupator, and ascended the throne. He was subsequently acknowledged as king by the Romans. After this he freed the Babylonians from the tyranny of Timarchus and Heracles, and was honoured for this service with the title of Soter. At a subsequent period he sent his generals Nicanor and Bacchides into Judæa, at the solicitation of Alcimus, the high-priest, who had usurped that office with the aid of Eupator. These two commanders ravaged the country, and Bacchides defeated and slew the celebrated Judas Maccabæus. Demetrius, at last, became so hated by his own subjects, and an object of so much dislike, if not of fear, to the neighbouring princes, that they advocated the claims of Alexander Bala, and he fell in battle against this competitor for the crown, after having reigned twelve years (from B.C. 162 to B.C. 150). His death was avenged, however, by his son and successor Demetrius Nicator. (Polyb., 31, 12.—Id., 31, 19.—Id., 32, 4, seqq.—Id., 33, 14, seqq.—Justin, 34, 3.—Id., 35, 1.)—V. Son of the preceding, was surnamed Nicator, or “the Conqueror.” He drove out Alexander Bala, with the aid of Ptolemy Philometor, who had given him his daughter Cleopatra in marriage, though she was already the wife of Bala. He ascended the throne B.C. 146, but soon abandoned himself to a life of indolence and debauchery, leaving the reins of government in the hands of Lathenes, his favourite, an unprincipled and violent man. The disgust to which his conduct gave rise induced Tryphon, who had been governor of Antioch under Bala, to revolt, and place upon the throne Antiochus Dionysius, son of Bala and Cleopatra, a child only four years of age. A battle ensued, in which Demetrius was defeated, and Antiochus, now receiving the surname of Theos, was conducted by the victors to Antioch, and proclaimed king of Syria. He reigned, however, only in name. The actual monarch was Tryphon, who put him to death at the end of about two years, and caused himself to be proclaimed in his stead. Demetrius, meanwhile, held his court at Seleucia. Thinking that the crimes of Tryphon would soon make him universally detested, he turned his arms in a different direction, and marched against the Parthians, in the hope that, if he returned victorious, he would be enabled the more easily to rid himself of his Syrian antagonist. After some successes, however, he was entrapped and made prisoner by the Parthian monarch Mithradates, and his army was attacked and cut to pieces. His captivity among the Parthians was an honourable one, and Mithradates made him espouse his daughter Rhodoguna. The intelligence of this marriage so exasperated Cleopatra, that she gave her hand to Antiochus Sidetes, her brother-in-law, who thereupon ascended the throne. Sidetes having been slain in a battle with the Parthians after a reign of several years, Demetrius escaped from the hands of Mithradates and remounted the throne. His subjects, however, unable any longer to endure his pride and cruelty, requested from Ptolemy Physcon, a king of the race of the Seleucidae to govern them. Ptolemy sent Alexander Zebina. Demetrius, driven out by the Syrians, came to Ptolemais, where Cleopatra, his first wife, then held sway, but the gates were shut against him. He then took refuge in Tyre, but was put to death by the governor of the city. Zebina recompensed the Tyrians for this act, by permitting them to live according to their own laws, and from this period commences what is called by chronologists the era of the independence of Tyre, which was still subsisting at the time of the council of Chalcedon, 574 years after this event. (Joseph., Ant. Jud., 13, 9.—Id. ib., 13, 12.—Id. ib., 13, 17.—Justin, 36, 1.—Id., 39, 1.—L'Art de vérifier les Dates, vol. 2, p. 331.)—VI. Surnamed Eucarus (Εὐκαρπός, “the Seasonable” or “Fortunate,” was the fourth son of Antiochus Grypus. He was proclaimed king at Damascus, and, in conjunction with his brother Philip, to whom a part of Syria remained faithful, drove out Antiochus Eusebes from that country, compelling him to take refuge among the Parthians. The two brothers then divided Syria between them, Antioch being the capital of Philip, and Damascus that of Demetrius. The latter afterwards marched to the aid of the Jews, who had revolted from their king Alexander Janneus. He was recalled, however, to his own dominions by the news of an invasion on the part of his own brother Philip. He took Antioch, and besieged Philip in Beroë; but the latter being succoured by the Parthians and Arabians, Demetrius was besieged in his own camp, and at length taken prisoner. He was brought to the King of Parthia, who treated him with great distinction, and sent him into Upper Asia. He reigned a little over six years. The Abbé Belley has written a learned dissertation on the reign of this monarch, illustrated by medals. (Mém. de l'Acad. des. Inscr., vol. 29.)—VII. Pepagomenus, a medical writer, who flourished during the reign of Michael VIII. (Palæologus). By the order of this monarch, he wrote a work on the Gout (περὶ Πονάγρας). We have two treatises under his name; but it is extremely doubtful whether he was indeed their author. The first is on the art of training falcons; the second, on the mode of breaking and training dogs. (Schöll, Hist. Lit. Gr., vol. 7, p. 265.) The best edition of the treatise on the gout is that of Bernhard, Amst., 1753, 8vo.—VIII. Phalæreus (three syllables—Φαλῆρεϋς), a native of Phalærum in Attica, and the last of the more distinguished orators of Greece. He was the son of a person who had been slave to Timotheus and Conon. (Compare Ælian, Var. Hist., 12, 43, and the remarks of Perizonius, ad loc.) But, though born in this low condition, he soon made himself distinguished by his talents, and was already a conspicuous individual in the public assemblies when Antipater became master of Athens; for he was obliged to save himself by flight from the vengeance of the Macedonian party. He was compelled to quit the city a second time, when Polysperchon took possession of it through his son. Subsequently named by Cassander as governor of Athens (B.C. 312), he so gained the affections of his countrymen, that, during the ten years in which he filled this office, they are said to have raised to him three hundred and sixty statues. Athenæus, however, on the authority of Düris, a Samian writer, reproaches him with luxurious and expensive habits, while he prescribed, at the same time, frugality to his fellow-citizens, and fixed limits for their expenditures. It is thought, however, that Düris, or else Athenæus in copying him, erred with respect to the name; since what the latter relates of Demetrius Phalæreus, Ælian mentions of Demetrius Polioretetes. (Var. Hist., 9, 19.) After the death of his protector, Demetrius was driven from Athens by Antigonus and Demetrius Polioretetes (B.C. 306). The people of that city, always fickle, always ungrateful, always the sport of the demagogues who ruled them, overthrew the numerous statues they had erected to him, although he had been their benefactor and idol, and even condemned him to death. Demetrius, upon this, retired to the court of Alexandria, where he lived upward of twenty years. It is generally supposed that he was the individual who gave Ptolemy the advice to found the Museum and famous library. This prince consulted him also as to the choice of a successor. Demetrius was in favour of the monarch's eldest son, but the king eventually decided for the son whom he had by his second wife Berenice. When Ptolemy II., therefore, came to the throne, he revenged himself on the unlucky counsellor by exiling him to a distant province in Upper Egypt, where Demetrius put an end to his own life by the bite of an asp (B.C. 284.—Compare the dissertation of Bonamy, on the life of Demetrius Phalæreus, Mém. de l'Acad. des. Inscr. et Belles Lettres, vol. 7, p. 157, seqq.). Cicero describes Demetrius as a polished, sweet, and graceful speaker, but deficient in energy and power. (De Orat., 2, 23.—Brut., 9.) Quintilian assigns to him much of talent and fluency. (Inst. Or., 10, 1, 80.) Both writers, however, agree that he was the first who deviated in a marked degree from the character that previously belonged to Attic eloquence. We cannot form any opinion of our own respecting the merits of this writer, because his historical, political, and philosophical writings are all lost. In the number of these was a treatise “On the Ionians,” and another “On the Laws of Athens,” two pieces, the acquisition of which would prove of great value to us. Plutarch cites his treatise “On Socrates,” which appears to have contained also "a Life of Aristides." We have said that the works of Demetrius are lost: there exists, it is true, under his name "A Treatise on Elocution" (περί Εφαγγελίας), a work full of ingenious observations; but critics agree in making it of later origin. It appears that the copyists have confounded Demetrius Phalereus with Demetrius of Alexandria, who flourished under Marcus Aurelius, and was, perhaps, the author of the work in question. Besides the treatise on Elocution, there exists a small work On the Apophthegms of the Seven Sages, which Stobæus has inserted in his third discourse, as being the production of Demetrius Phalereus.—The best editions of the treatise on Elocution are, that of Gale, Oxon., 1676, 8vo, re-edited by Fischer, Lips., 1773, 8vo, and that of J. G. Schneider, Allen., 1779, 8vo. This last is printed with but little care; yet it is critical, and supplied with an excellent commentary. (Schöll, Hist. Lit. Gr., vol. 3, p. 241, seqq.)—IX. A Cynic philosopher, who flourished at Corinth in the first century. During the reign of Caligula, he taught philosophy at Rome, where he obtained the highest reputation for wisdom and virtue. He was banished from Rome in the time of Nero, for his free censure of public manners. After the death of this emperor he returned to Rome; but the boldness of his language soon offended Vespasian, and again subjected him to the punishment of exile. Apollonius, with whom he had contracted a friendship, prevailed on Titus to recall him; but under Domitian he shared the common fate of philosophers, and withdrew to Puteoli. Seneca, who was intimately acquainted with him, speaks in the highest terms of his masculine eloquence, sound judgment, intrepid fortitude, and inflexible integrity. (Seneca, de Vit. Beat., 25.)

DEMOCEDES, a celebrated physician of Crotona, son of Calliphon, and intimate with Polycrates. He was carried as a prisoner from Samos to Darius, king of Persia, where he acquired great riches and much reputation by two cures which he performed, one on the king, and the other on Atossa. Always desirous of returning to his native country, he pretended to enter into the views and interests of the Persians, and procured himself to be sent with some nobles to explore the coast of Greece, and to ascertain in what parts it might be attacked with the greatest probability of success. Stopping at Tarentum, the Persians were seized as spies, and Democedes escaped to Crotona, whither the Persians followed him, and demanded, but in vain, that he should be restored. He settled there, and married the daughter of Milo. (Ælian, V. H., 8, 18.—Herodot., 3, 124, &c.)

DEMOCRITUS, a celebrated philosopher, born at Abdera, about 490 or 494 B.C., but according to some, 460 or 470 B.C. His father was a man of noble family and of great wealth, and contributed largely towards the entertainment of the army of Xerxes, on his return to Asia. As a reward for this service, the Persian monarch made him and the other Abderites rich presents, and left among them several Chaldaean Magi. Democritus, according to Diogenes Laertius, was instructed by these Eastern sages in astronomy and theology. After the death of his father, he determined to travel in search of wisdom; and devoted to this purpose the portion which fell to him, amounting to one hundred talents. He is said to have visited Egypt and Ethiopia, the Persian Magi, and, according to some, even the Gymnosophists of India. Whether, in the course of his travels, he visited Athens or attended upon Anaxagoras, is uncertain. There can be little doubt, however, that, during some part of his life, he was instructed in the Pythagorean school, and particularly that he was a disciple of Leucippus. After a long course of years thus spent in travelling, Democritus returned to Abdera, richly stored with the treasures of philosophy, but destitute even of the necessary means of subsistence. His brother Damosis, however, received him kindly, and liberally supplied all his wants. It was a law in Abdera, that whoever should waste his patrimony, should be deprived of the rites of sepulture. Democritus, desiring to avoid this disgrace, gave public lectures to the people, chiefly from his larger Diacosmos, the most valuable of his writings; in return, he received from his hearers many valuable presents, and other testimonies of respect, which relieved him from all apprehension of suffering public censure as a spendthrift. Democritus, by his learning and wisdom, and especially by his acquaintance with natural phenomena, acquired great fame, and excited much admiration among the ignorant Abderites. By giving previous notices of unexpected changes in the weather, and by other artifices, he had the address to make them believe that he possessed a power of predicting future events, and they not only looked upon him as something more than mortal, but even proposed to invest him with the direction of their public affairs. From inclination and habit, however, he preferred a contemplative to an active life, and therefore declined these public honours, and passed the remainder of his days in solitude. It is said that from this time he spent his days and nights in caverns and sepulchres; and some even relate, that, in order to be more perfectly master of his intellectual faculties, he deprived himself, by means of a burning-glass, of the organs of sight. The story, however, is utterly incredible, since the writers who mention it affirm that Democritus employed his leisure in writing books, and in dissecting the bodies of animals, neither of which could well have been effected without eyes. Nor is greater credit due to the tale that Democritus spent his leisure hours in chemical researches after the philosopher's stone, the dream of a later age; or to the story of his conversation with Hippocrates, grounded upon letters which are said to have passed between the father of medicine and the people of Abdera, on the supposed madness of Democritus, but which are so evidently spurious that it would require the credulity of the Abderites themselves to suppose them genuine. The only reasonable conclusion that can be drawn from these and other marvellous tales, is, that Democritus was, what he is commonly represented to have been, a man of lofty genius and penetrating judgment, who, by a long course of study and observation, became an eminent master of speculative and physical science; the natural consequence of which was, that, like Roger Bacon in a later period, he astonished and imposed upon his ignorant and credulous countrymen. Petronius relates, that he was perfectly acquainted with the virtues of herbs, plants, and stones; and that he spent his life in making experiments upon natural bodies.—Democritus has been commonly known under the appellation of "The Laughing Philosopher;" and it is gravely related by Seneca (De Ira, 2, 10.—De Tranq., 15), that he never appeared in public without expressing his contempt of the follies of mankind by laughter. But this account is wholly inconsistent with what has been related concerning his fondness for a life of gloomy solitude and profound contemplation, and with the strength and elevation of mind which his philosophical researches must have required, and which are ascribed to him by the general voice of antiquity. Thus much, however, may be easily admitted on the credit of Ælian (V. H., 4, 20) and Lucian (Vit. Aet., vol. 3, p. 112, ed. Bip.), that a man so superior to the generality of his contemporaries, and whose lot it was to live among a race of men who were stupid to a proverb, might frequently treat their follies with ridicule and contempt. Accordingly, we find that, among his fellow-citizens, he obtained the appellation of γελᾶστος, or the "Derider." Democritus appears to have been in his morals chaste and temperate; and his sobriety was repaid by a healthy old age. He lived and enjoyed the use of his faculties to the term of a hundred years (some say several years longer), and at last died through mere decay.—Democritus expanded the atomic theory of his master Leucippus, to support the truth of which he maintained the impossibility of division ad infinitum; and from the difficulty of assigning a commencement of time, he argued the eternity of existing nature, of void space, and of motion. He supposed the atoms, originally similar, to be endowed with certain properties, such as impenetrability, and a density proportionate to their volume. He referred every active and passive affection to motion, caused by impact, limited by the principle he assumed, that like can only act on like. He drew a distinction between primary motion and secondary; impulse and reaction; from a combination of which he produced rotatory motion. Herein consists the law of necessity, by which all things in nature are ruled. From the endless multiplicity of atoms have resulted the worlds which we behold, with all the properties of immensity, resemblance, and dissimilitude which belong to them. The soul consists (such is his doctrine) of globular atoms of fire, which impart movement to the body. Maintaining his atomic theory throughout, Democritus introduced the hypothesis of images (εἰδῶλα), a species of emanation from external objects, which make an impression on our senses, and from the influence of which he deduced sensation (αἴσθησις) and thought (νόησις). He distinguished between a rude, imperfect, and therefore false perception, and a true one. In the same manner, consistently with his theory, he accounted for the popular notions of the Deity; partly through our incapacity to understand fully the phenomena of which we are witnesses, and partly from the impressions communicated by certain beings (εἰδῶλα) of enormous stature, and resembling the human figure, which inhabit the air. To these he ascribed dreams, and the causes of divination. He carried his theory into practical philosophy also, laying down that happiness consisted in an equilibrium of temperament (εὐθυμία), whence he deduced his moral principles and prudential maxims. It was from Democritus that Epicurus borrowed the principal features of his metaphysics. (Enfield's History of Philosophy, vol. 1, p. 423, seqq.—Ritter, Hist. Phil., vol. 1, p. 544, seqq.—Tennemann's Manual, p. 79.)

ΔΕΜΟΟΪΟΥΣ, I. a musician at the court of Alcæonius, who sang in the presence of Ulysses. (Hom., Od., 8, 44.—Plut., de Mus.)—II. A Trojan chief, who came with Æneas into Italy, where he was killed. (Virg., Æn., 10, 413.)

ΔΕΜΟΛΕΩΝ, I. a centaur, killed by Theseus at the nuptials of Pirithoüs. (Ovid, Met., 12, 356.)—II. A son of Antenor, killed by Achilles. (Hom., Il., 20, 395.)

ΔΕΜΟΝΑΧ, a Cynic philosopher, of excellent character, contemporary with Lucian, who relates his history. He was a native of Cyprus, of wealthy parents, and is described by Lucian as having been the best philosopher he ever knew. Demonax resided at Athens, attained to the age of nearly 90 years, and was honoured at his death with a public funeral. (Lucian, Vit. Demonact., vol. 5, p. 231, seqq., ed. Bip.)

ΔΕΜΟΝΗΘΝ or ΔΕΜΟΝΗΘΝ. Vid. Phyllis.

ΔΕΜΟΣΘΗΝΕΣ, I. a celebrated Athenian orator, a native of the borough of Peania, in the tribe Pandionis. His father, Demosthenes, was a citizen of rank and opulence, and the proprietor of a manufactory of arms; not a common blacksmith, as the language of Juvenal (10, 130) would lead us to believe. The son was born in the fourth year of the 98th Olympiad, B.C. 385, and lost his father at the early age of seven years, when he was left to the care of his mother, Cleobule. The guardians to whom his father had intrusted the administration of a large property proving faithless to their charge, and wasting a large portion of his patrimony, the orator's early studies were seriously impeded by the want of sufficient means, to say nothing of the over-anxious fears of maternal tenderness, and the delicate state of his own health. When Demosthenes was about sixteen years of age, his curiosity was attracted by a trial in which Callistratus pleaded, and won a cause of considerable importance. The eloquence which procured, and the acclamations which followed, his success, so inflamed the ambition of the young Athenian, that he determined to devote himself thenceforward to the assiduous study of oratory. He chose Isæus as his master rather than Isocrates (either because this plan was less expensive, or because the style of the latter was not sufficiently nervous and energetic): from Plato, also, he imbibed much of the richness and the grandeur which characterized the writings of that mighty master. At the age of seventeen he appeared before the public tribunals, and pronounced against his faithless guardians, and against a debtor to his father's estate, five orations, which were crowned with complete success. These discourses, in all probability, had received the finishing hand from Isæus, under whom Demosthenes continued to study for the space of four years after he had reached his majority. An opening so brilliantly successful imbodied the young orator, as may well be supposed, to speak before the people; but, when he made the attempt, his feeble and stammering voice, his interrupted respiration, his ungraceful gestures, and his ill-arranged periods, brought upon him general ridicule. Returning home in the utmost distress, he was reanimated by the kind aid of the actor Satyrus, who, having requested Demosthenes to repeat some passage from a dramatic poet, pronounced the same extract after him with so much correctness of enunciation, and in a manner so true to nature, that it appeared to the young orator to be quite a different passage. Convinced, thereupon, how much grace and persuasive power a proper enunciation and manner add to the best oration, he resolved to correct the deficiencies of his youth, and accomplished this with a zeal and perseverance which have passed into a proverb. How deeply he commands our respect and admiration by his struggles to overcome his natural infirmities, and remove the impressions produced by his first appearance before his assembled countrymen! He was not indebted for the glory he acquired either to the bounty of nature or to the favour of circumstances, but to the inherent strength of his own unconquerable will. To free himself from stammering, he spoke with pebbles in his mouth, a story resting on the authority of Demetrius Phalereus, his contemporary. It also appears that he was unable to articulate clearly the letter R; but he vanquished that difficulty most perfectly; for Cicero says, "exercitatione fecisse ut plenissime diceret." He removed the distortion of features, which accompanied his utterance, by watching the movements of his countenance in a mirror; and a naked sword was suspended over his left shoulder while he was declaiming in private, to prevent its rising above the level of the right. That his enunciation might be loud and full of emphasis, he frequently ran up the steepest and most uneven walks, an exercise by which his voice acquired both force and energy; and on the seashore, when the waves were violently agitated, he declaimed aloud, to accustom himself to the noise and tumult of a public assembly. He constructed a subterranean study, where he would often stay for two or three months together, shaving one side of his head, that, in case he should wish to go abroad, the shame of appearing in that condition might keep him within. In this solitary retreat, by the light of his lamp, he copied and recopied, ten times at least, the orations scattered throughout the history of Thucydides, for the purpose of moulding his own style after so pure a model.—Whatever may be the truth of these several stories, Demosthenes got credit for the most indefatigable labour in the acquisition of his art. His enemies, at a subsequent period of his career, attempted to ridicule this extraordinary industry, by remarking that all his arguments "smelt of the lamp," and they eagerly embraced the opportunity of denying him the possession of natural talents. A malicious opinion like this would easily find credit; and, in fact, a similar mistake is very frequently made; for, since it is acknowledged on all hands, that all successful men who are naturally dull must be industrious, the converse of the proposition grows into repute, and it is inferred that all men who are industrious must necessarily be dull. The accusation against Demosthenes seems to have rested chiefly on his known reluctance to speak without preparation. The fact is, that, though he could exert the talent of extemporaneous speaking, he avoided rather than sought such occasions, partly from deference to his audience, and partly from apprehending the possibility of a failure. Plutarch, who mentions this reluctance of the orator, speaks at the same time of the great merit of his extemporaneous effusions.—Demosthenes reappeared in public, after the rigorous discipline of private study, at the age of 25 years, and pronounced two orations against Leptines, the author of a law which imposed on every citizen of Athens, except the descendants of Harmodius and Aristogiton, the exercise of certain burdensome functions. The second of these discourses, entitled "Of Immunities," is regarded as one of his happiest efforts. After this he became much engaged with the business of the bar, and these professional labours, added to the scanty portion of his patrimony which he had recovered from his guardians, appear to have formed his only means of support. But, whatever may have been the distinction and the advantages which Demosthenes acquired by his practice at the bar, his principal glory is derived from his political discourses. At the period when he engaged in public affairs, the state was a mere wreck. Public spirit was at the lowest ebb; the laws had lost their authority, the austerity of early manners had yielded to the inroads of luxury, activity to indolence, probity to venality, and the people were far advanced upon the route which conducts a nation to irremediable servitude. Of the virtues of their forefathers there remained to the Athenians naught save an attachment, carried almost to enthusiasm, for their native soil, for that country the possession of which had been contested even by the gods. On the slightest occasion this feeling of patriotism was sure to display itself; thanks to this sentiment, the people of Athens were still capable of making the most strenuous efforts for the preservation of their freedom. No one knew better than Demosthenes the art of exciting and keeping alive this enthusiasm. His penetration enabled him easily to divine the ambitious plans of Philip of Macedonia, from the very outset of that monarch's operations, and he resolved to counteract them. His whole public career, indeed, had but one object in view, and that was, war with Philip. For the space of fourteen years did this monarch find the Athenian orator continually in his path, and every attempt proved unavailing to corrupt so formidable an adversary. These fourteen years, which immediately preceded the fall of Grecian freedom, constitute the brightest period in the history of Demosthenes. And yet his courage was political rather than military. At Chæronea he fled from the field of battle, though in the Athenian assembly no private apprehensions could check his eloquence or influence his conduct. But, though overpowered in the contest with the enemy of Athenian independence, he received after his defeat the most glorious recompense, which, in accordance with Grecian customs, a grateful country could bestow upon a virtuous son. Athens decreed him a crown of gold. The reward was opposed by Eschines. The combat of eloquence which arose between the two orators, attracted to Athens an immense concourse of spectators. Demosthenes triumphed, and his antagonist, not having received the fifth part of the votes, was, in conformity with the existing law, compelled to retire into exile. A short time after this splendid victory, Demosthenes was condemned for having suffered himself to be bribed by Harpalus, a Macedonian governor, who, dreading the anger of Alexander, had come to Athens to hide there the fruit of his extortion and rapine, and had bargained with the popular leaders of the day for the protection of the republic. Demosthenes, having escaped from imprisonment, fled to Ægina, whence he could behold the shores of his beloved country, and earnestly and constantly protested his innocence. After the death of Alexander he was restored, and his entry into Athens was marked by every demonstration of joy. A new league was formed among the Grecian cities against the Macedonians, and Demosthenes was the soul of it. But the confederacy was broken up by Antipater, and the death of the orator was decreed. He retired thereupon from Athens to the island of Calauria, off the coast of Argolis, and, being still pursued by the satellites of Antipater, terminated his life there by poison, in the temple of Neptune, at the age of above sixty years.—Before the time of Demosthenes there existed three distinct styles of eloquence: that of Lysias, mild and persuasive, quietly engaged the attention, and won the assent of an audience; that of Thucydides, bold and animated, awakened the feelings and powerfully forced conviction on the mind; while that of Isocrates was, as it were, a combination of the two former. Demosthenes can scarcely be said to have proposed any individual as a model, although he bestowed so much untiring labour on the historian of the Peloponnesian war. He rather culled all that was valuable from the various styles of his great predecessors, working them up, and blending them into one harmonious whole: not, however, that there is such a uniformity or mannerism in his works as prevents him from applying himself with versatility to a variety of subjects; on the contrary, he seems to have had the power of carrying each individual style to perfection, and of adapting himself with equal excellence to each successive topic. In the general structure of many of his sentences, he resembles Thucydides; but he is more simple and perspicuous, and better calculated to be quickly comprehended by an audience. On the other hand, his clearness in narration, his elegance and purity of diction, and (to borrow a metaphor from a sister art) his correct keeping, remind the reader of Lysias. But the argumentative parts of the speeches of Lysias are often deficient in vigour; whereas earnestness, power, zeal, rapidity, and passion, all exemplified in plain, unornamented language, and a strain of close, business-like reasoning, are the distinctive characteristics of Demosthenes. The general tone of his oratory, indeed, was admirably adapted to an Athenian audience, constituted as it was of those whose habits of life were mechanical, and of those whom ambition or taste had led to the cultivation of literature. The former were captivated by sheer sense, urged with masculine force and inextinguishable spirit, and by the forcible application of plain truths; and yet there was enough of grace and variety to please more learned and fastidious auditors. "His style," as Hume well observes, "is rapid harmony, exactly adjusted to the sense: it is vehement reasoning, without any appearance of art: it is disdain, anger, boldness, freedom, involved in a continued stream of argument; and, of all human productions, the orations of Demosthenes present to us the models which approach the nearest to perfection." Another very remarkable excellence of Demosthenes is the collocation of his words. The arrangement of sentences in such a manner that their cadences should be harmonious, and, to a certain degree, rhythmical, was a study much in use among the great masters of Grecian composition. Plato passed the latter years of his life in correcting his dialogues; and that very simplicity remarkable in the structure of the periods of Demosthenes is itself the result of art.—The question has often been raised as to the secret of the success of Demosthenes. How is it that he attained to his astonishing pre-eminence? How is it that, in a faculty which is common to the whole species, that of communicating our thoughts and feelings in language, the palm is conceded to him alone by the unanimous and willing consent of all nations and ages? And this universal approbation will appear the more extraordinary to a reader who for the first time peruses his unrivalled orations. They do not exhibit any of that ostentatious declamation, on which loosely hangs the fame of so many pretenders to eloquence. There appears no deep reflection to indicate a more than ordinary penetration, or any philosophical remarks to prove the extent of his acquaintance with the great moral writers of his country. He affects no learning, and he displays none. He aims at no elegance; he seeks no glaring ornaments; he rarely touches the heart with a soft or melting appeal, and when he does, it is only with an effect in which a third-rate artist would have surpassed him. He had no wit, no humour, no vivacity, in our acceptance of these terms, qualities which contribute so much to the formation of a modern orator. He wanted all these undeniable attributes of eloquence, and yet who rivals him?—The secret of his power is simple; it lies essentially in this, that his political principles were interwoven with his very spirit; they were not assumed to serve an interested purpose, to be laid aside when he descended from the Bema, and resumed when he sought to accomplish an object. No; they were deeply seated in his heart, and emanated from its profoundest depth. The more his country was environed by dangers, the more steady was his resolution. Nothing ever impaired the truth and integrity of his feelings, or weakened his generous conviction. It was his undeviating firmness, his disdain of all compromise, that made him the first of statesmen and orators; in this lay the substance of his power, the primary foundation of his superiority; the rest was merely secondary. The mystery of his mighty influence, then, lay in his honesty; and it is this that gave warmth and tone to his feelings, an energy to his language, and an impression to his manner, before which every imputation of insincerity must have immediately vanished.—We may hence perceive the meaning of Demosthenes himself, when, to one who asked him what was the first requisite in an orator, he merely replied, “Delivery” (ὑπόκρισις); and when asked what were the second and third requisites, gave the same answer as at first. (Plut., Vit. X. Orat., p. 845.) His idea was this: a lifeless manner on the part of a public speaker, shows that his own feelings are not enlisted in the cause which he is advocating, and it is idle for him, therefore, to seek to make converts of others, when he has failed in making one of himself. On the other hand, when the tone of voice, the gesture, the look, the whole manner of the orator, display the powerful feelings that agitate him, his emotion is communicated to his hearers, and success is inevitable. It was not, therefore, mere “action” that Demosthenes required in an orator, an error into which some have fallen from a mistranslation of the Latin rhetorical term “actio,” as employed by Cicero (Brut., 37) in mentioning this incident; but it was an attention to the whole manner of delivery, the look, the tone, the every movement, as so many unerring indications of internal emotion, and of the honesty and sincerity of the speaker. (Compare Quintilian, Inst. Or., 11, 3, int.)—A comparison has often been drawn between Demosthenes and Cicero; but by no writer has it been done more successfully than by the celebrated Longinus. “The sublimity of the one,” he remarks, “consists in his abruptness, that of the other in his diffuseness. Our countryman (Demosthenes), from the force, the fire, the mighty vehemence with which he bears down all before him, may be compared to a tempest or thunderbolt; while Cicero, like a wide-spreading conflagration, devours and rolls onward in every direction, ever maintaining its destructive energy, and nourished and supported from time to time by the fuel of various kinds with which it is continually supplied in its progress.” (Longinus, § 12.) Cicero’s eloquence is like a consular triumph; he is himself the most conspicuous figure in the procession, which is swollen with the grandeur and riches of conquered provinces. Demosthenes is the terrible sweep of a vast body of cavalry. Cicero’s oratory was local, fitted only to the audience; in Athens it would not have been tolerated. Demosthenes was for the whole earth, and at all times. In Rome he would have been as resistless as in Athens; and his eloquence would be as convincing now as it was in the popular assemblies of old.—Of the orations of Demosthenes we have sixty-one remaining, and sixty-five Introductions, or προοίμια δημογορικά. In confining ourselves to the classification adopted by the ancient rhetoricians, we may arrange all these discourses under one of three heads. 1. Deliberative discourses (λόγοι συμβουλευτικοί), treating of political topics, and delivered either before the senate or the assembly of the people. 2. Judicial speeches (λόγοι δικάντικοί), having for their object accusation or defence. 3. Studied or set speeches (λόγοι ἐπιδεικτικοί), intended to censure or praise.—Seventeen of the orations of Demosthenes belong to the first of these classes, forty-two to the second, and two to the third. (Compare Becker, Demosthenes als Staatsmann und Redner, Halle, 1815, 2 vols. 8vo.)—Of the seventeen discourses which compose the first class, five treat of various subjects connected with the republic, and twelve of the quarrels between the state and King Philip. Our limits, of course, allow an examination of only a few of these, that are most important in their character. Of the twelve harangues that turn upon the quarrels of the republic with King Philip, the first was pronounced in the first year of the 107th Olympiad, B.C. 352; the second, third, and fourth, in the fourth year of the same Olympiad, B.C. 349; the fifth in the second year of the 108th Olympiad, B.C. 347; the sixth in the third of the same Olympiad, B.C. 346; the seventh in the first year of the 109th Olympiad, B.C. 344; the eighth in the second year of the same Olympiad, B.C. 343; the ninth in the third year of the same Olympiad, B.C. 342; the tenth and eleventh in the fourth year of the same Olympiad, B.C. 341; and the twelfth in the first year of the 110th Olympiad, B.C. 340.—The order here given is taken from Dionysius of Halicarnassus; but no manuscript and no editions observe it. The manuscripts give the 1st, 2d, 10th, and 11th Philippics of Dionysius by name, and regard his fifth as forming the conclusion of the first. They give the title of 2d, 3d, and 1st Olynthiacs to his 2d, 3d, and 4th. The remaining four (6th, 8th, 9th, 12th) have the following titles: “Of Peace,” “Of Halonesus,” “Of the Chersonese,” and “On the letter of Philip.” We will now speak of them in chronological order. 1st and 2d, Ἡρώς Φιλίππου λόγος πρῶτος, “First Philippic.” Demosthenes here exhorts his fellow-citizens to prosecute the war with the greatest vigour against Philip. This monarch had, after the defeat of the Phocians, assumed a threatening attitude, as if wishing to establish himself in their country. The discourse we are now considering has been divided into two parts, which, according to Dionysius of Halicarnassus, were pronounced at different times; but this opinion is contradicted by most critics.—3d, 4th, 5th, Ὀλυνθιακός A. B. T. The three Olynthiacs. Their object is to stimulate the Athenians to succour Olynthus, and prevent its falling into the hands of Philip.—6th. Περὶ τῆς εἰρήνης, “Of the Peace.” Philip having obtained a seat in the council of the Amphictyons, Demosthenes advises his countrymen to preserve the peace with this prince. Libanius thinks that this discourse, though written by Demosthenes, was never delivered. Leland, Auger, Jacobs, and Bekker are, however, of a different opinion.—7th. Κατὰ Φιλίππου λόγος Β, the Second Philippic, pronounced after the return of Demosthenes from the Peloponnesus, where he had negotiated a peace between Sparta and Messenia.—8th. Περὶ τῆς Ἀλονήσου, “Of Halonesus,” or, rather, of a letter of King Philip’s, by which he makes a present to the Athenians of the isle of Halonesus, which he had taken from the pirates, and demands of the Athenians to share with them the office of protecting the seas. Demosthenes strenuously opposes so insulting an offer: it is, however, far from certain whether he ever pronounced such a discourse as this. Libanius says, that the ancient critics ascribed it to Hegesippus, the friend of Demosthenes. Suidas and the author of the Etymologicum Magnum agree with him. Valckenæer (Diatr. de fragm. Eurip., p. 253), Larcher (Mém. de l’Acad. des Inscri., &c., vol. 2, p. 243), and Bekker, also adopt this opinion: Jacobs (Demosthenes Staatreden, p. 378), after having stated the arguments on either side, pronounces no decision: Jacques de Tourreil (Préface historique des Philippes de Demosthène, p. 124) and Weiske (Oratio de Haloneso, &c. Lubben., 1808, 4to) consider that the speech is genuine.—9. Περὶ τῶν ἐν Χερσωνήσῳ πραγμάτων, ἡ οὐ περὶ Διοπείθεως, “Of the events in the Chersonese, or of Diopieithes.” This general, sent at the head of a colony into the Chersonesus, had committed hostilities against the city of Cardia; the only one which Philip had reserved for himself in the conditions of peace. Diopieithes had even made an inroad into Macedonia. Philip insisted on his being punished: Demosthenes undertakes in this oration to justify the conduct of the Athenian commander.—10th. Κατὰ Φιλίππου λόγος Γ, the Third Philippic. The progress which Philip had made in Thrace, where he was preparing to lay siege to the cities of Perinthus and Byzantium, form the subject of this harangue. 11. Κατὰ Φιλίππου λόγος Δ, Fourth Philippic, pronounced at the time when Philip had raised the siege of Perinthus, in order to fall upon Byzantium. Valckenæer (Or. de Phil., p. 250), Wolf (ad Lept. Proleg., p. lx), and Bekker do not acknowledge this as a production of Demosthenes.—12. Ὁ πρὸς τὴν ἐπιστολὴν Φιλίππου λόγος, “On the letter of Philip.” The letter of the king, to which this harangue refers, still exists. It contains many complaints, but no declaration of war. Taylor, Reiske, Valckenæer, and Bekker, consider this letter to be spurious.—We now come to the second class of the orations of Demosthenes, namely, those of a judicial nature; and here a distinction must be made between those which refer to affairs connected with the state, and those which relate to individual interests: in the former case, the procedure was called κατηγορία: in the second, δίκη; words which may be translated by “accusation” and “pleadings.” Of the first species, we have twelve harangues remaining, the most important one of which is that entitled Περὶ στεφάνου, “Concerning the Crown.” Demosthenes had been twice crowned in the theatre during the Dionysiac festival; the first time, after the expulsion of the Macedonian garrisons from the island of Eubœa, and again after the alliance with the Thebans. In the 2d year of the 110th Olympiad, Ctesiphon, who was then president of the senate, had a decree passed by this body, that, if the people approved, Demosthenes should be crowned at the approaching Dionysiac festival, in the public theatre, as a recompense for the disinterested manner in which he had filled various offices, and for the services which he had never for a moment ceased to render the state. This matter had to be confirmed by a psephisma, or decree of the people; but, before it was brought before them, Æschines presented himself as the accuser of Ctesiphon. He charged him with having violated the laws in proposing to crown a public functionary before the latter had given an account of the manner in which he had discharged his office, and to crown him, too, in the theatre, instead of the senate-house or the Pnyx, where this could alone be done; finally, in having alleged what was false, for the purpose of favouring Demosthenes. He concluded by demanding that a fine of fifty talents be imposed upon Ctesiphon. The matter remained for some time pending, in consequence of the interruption which public business of all kinds met with during the embarrassments and troubles that succeeded the battle of Chæronea. When, however, the influence of the Macedonian party had, through the exertions of Antipater, gained the ascendancy in Athens, Æschines believed it to be the favourable moment for the revival of his accusation. It was brought forward, therefore, again, in the 3d year of the 112th Olympiad, which was eight years since the proposition of Ctesiphon had been made. Æschines thereupon pronounced his famous harangue, to which Demosthenes replied. This speech of Demosthenes is regarded, and justly so, not only as his chef-d’œuvre, but as the most perfect specimen that eloquence has ever produced. Such is the opinion of Dionysius of Halicarnassus (De Comp. Verb.—Ed. Reiske, Op., vol. 5, p. 204), of Cicero (Orat., § 133), and of Quintilian (Inst. Or., 11, 1). Modern critics come to the same conclusion. It is said that after this discourse, Demosthenes no longer appeared as a public speaker. Ulpian, in his commentary on the oration respecting the crown, relates an anecdote, which has often been cited by those scholars who maintain that the Greek accents are anterior to the grammarians of Alexandria. Demosthenes is endeavouring to fix the charge of bribery on Æschines, whom he represents as corrupted by Philip and by Alexander, and consequently their hireling, and not their friend or guest. Of this assertion he declares his willingness to submit the truth to the judgment of the assembly. “I call thee,” says the orator, “the hireling, first of Philip, and now of Alexander; and all these who are here present agree in opinion with me. If thou disbelievest it, ask them the question: but no, I will ask them myself.—Athenians, does Æschines appear to you in the light of a hireling or a friend of Alexander’s?”—In putting this question, Demosthenes purposely commits a fault of accentuation: he places the accent improperly on the antepenultima, instead of the last syllable, of μισθωτός—in the words of Ulpian, ἐκὼν ἑνθαβάρισεν—in order to draw the attention of the people from the question to the pronunciation. This had the desired effect; the accurate ears of the Athenians were struck with the mistake; to correct it, they called out μισθωτός, μισθωτός (“a hireling! a hireling!”) from every part of the assembly. Affecting to receive the word as the expression of their sentiments on the guilt of Æschines, he cries out, “Dost thou hear what they say?”—The simple pleadings (δίκαι) relative to matters of private interest, constitute the second class of judicial actions. Of these we have thirty remaining, which are as follows: 1. Discourses having relation to the proceedings instituted by Demosthenes against his guardians. They are five in number: of these, two are against Aphobus, and two against Onitor, his brother.—2. Λόγοι παραγράφοι, or, as Cicero (de Incent., 1, 8), calls them, constitutiones translativæ. The Roman orator remarks: “Cum causa ex eo pendet quod non aut is agere videtur quem oportet, aut non apud quos, quo tempore, qua lege, quo crimine, qua rena oportet

tet, translativa dicitur constitutio, quia actio translationis et commutationis indigere videtur. Atque harum aliquam in omne causæ genus incidere necesse est. Nam in quam rem non incidit, in ea nihil esse potest controversiæ; quare eam ne causam quidem convenit putari." We have seven discourses of this class from the pen of Demosthenes, viz., against Zenothemis, against Apaturius, against Lacritus, against Phormion, against Pantænetus, against Nausimachus, and Xenopithæa.—3. Discourses relative to the rights of succession and to questions of dower. These are four in number: against Macartatus, against Leocrates, against Spudias, against Bætus for his mother's dowry.—4. Discourses in matters of commerce and of debt. These are three in number: against Calippus, against Nicostratus, against Timotheus.—5. Actions for indemnity and for damages (βλάβη, αἰκία). The discourses under this head are five in number: against Boeotus, against Olympiodorus, against Conon, against Dionysiodorus, against Calicles.—6. Actions for perjury: two discourses against Stephanus, and one against Euergus and Mnesibulus.—7. Three discourses on the subject of the ἀντίδοσις, or exchange of estates. According to the laws of Athens, if any person appointed to undergo any public charge, or λειτούργια, could find another who was richer than himself, and who was free from all duties, the informer was excused. But if the person thus substituted denied that he was the richer of the two, they then exchanged estates. The discourses under this head are the following: against Phœnippos, against Polycles, and respecting the crown of the trierarchia.—It would be useless to speak of each of these thirty pleadings: a few remarks on some of them must suffice. The five discourses which Demosthenes pronounced against his guardians contain valuable details respecting his youth, his fortune, the Athenian laws, &c. Aphobus, one of the guardians, was condemned to pay Demosthenes the sum of ten talents. It does not appear whether he brought the two other guardians to trial or not: it is probable that he settled the matter with them. These discourses have some resemblance to those of Isæus, his master.—The paragraph for Phormio against Apollodorus has furnished occasion for a reproach to the memory of Demosthenes. We are told by Plutarch (Vit. Dem.—vol. 4, p. 717, ed. Reiske), that Demosthenes "wrote an oration for Apollodorus, by which he carried his cause against the general Timotheus, in an action for debt to the public treasury; as also those others against Phormio and Stephanus, which formed a just exception against his character. For he composed likewise the oration which Phormio had pronounced against Apollodorus. This, therefore, was like furnishing the enemies with weapons out of the same shop."—The discourse against Macartatus respecting the succession of Hagnias is interesting from the circumstance of our having the defence of Macartatus by Isæus, and from our being thus able to compare the pupil with his former master.—It remains to speak of the third class of Demosthenes' orations, the λόγοι ἐπιδεδίктиοι, "studied or set speeches." We have only two remaining, and these, very probably, are spurious. The one, ἐπιτάσιος λόγος, is an eulogy on the Athenians who had perished at Chæronea: the other, ἱρώτικος λόγος, is written in praise of the beauty of the young Epicrates.—There are also six letters of Demosthenes, written by him during his exile: five of them are addressed to the people of Athens.—The best editions of the entire works of Demosthenes are, that of Reiske, in the Corpus Oratorum Græcorum, and that of Bekker, in the Oratores Attici, 10 vols., 8vo, Oxon., 1828. (Schöll. Hist. Lit. Gr., vol. 2, p. 224.—Encyclop. Metrop., div. 2, vol. 1, p. 699, seqq.—Recollections of an Irish Barrister, s. v. Demosth.)—II. An Athenian general, son of Alcisthenes, who obtained considerable reputation during a part of the Peloponnesian war. When the Spartan monarch Agis made an inroad into Attica, Demosthenes, on his part, infested the coasts of the Peloponnesus, and seized upon and fortified the Messenian Pylos. This led to the affair of Sphacteria, in which he had a conspicuous, or, rather, the principal share. He was afterward sent with an armament to the relief of Nicias before Syracuse; but, by his precipitate measures there, brought defeat upon himself, and the consequent ruin of the whole expedition. Demosthenes and Nicias were both put to death while in prison, notwithstanding the endeavours of the Spartan commander Gylippus to save their lives. Another account, alluded to by Plutarch, makes them to have been stoned to death. (Thucyd., 4, 3, seqq.—Plut., Vit. Nic.)—III. The father of the orator Demosthenes, a rich manufacturer of arms. (Plut., Vit. Demosth.)—IV. A Greek physician, a disciple of Alexander Philaletes, who obtained the same surname as his master, namely, Philaletes, or "Loer of Truth." He flourished about the commencement of our era, and turned his attention particularly to diseases of the eye. We have some fragments remaining of his writings on this subject, which appear to have formed part of a work often cited by Galen, Orisibus, and Aëtius. (Sprengel, Hist. de la Med., vol. 1, p. 458.—Renaudin, in Biogr. Univ., vol. 11, p. 64.)

Deo (Δῆω), a name given to Ceres. According to the common account, it means "the finder" or "inventress," and alludes to the search for, and discovery of, her daughter, on the part of the goddess. (Compare Eustath., ad Hom., Od., 11, 115.—Apollon. Lex. Hom., p. 221, ed. Toll.) Knight, however, gives a different and much superior explanation. "Ceres," he observes, "was not a personification of the brute matter which composed the earth, but of the passive productive principle supposed to pervade it; which joined to the active, was held to be the cause of the organization and animation of its substance; whence arose her other Greek name, Δῆω, the inventress." (Enquiry, &c., § 36.)—Some etymologists are in favour of an Oriental derivation for the name. Thus, Sickler (Hymn. ad Cer., p. 112) deduces it from the Hebrew davah, "to be feeble" or "afflicted," in allusion to the sorrow of Ceres for the loss of her daughter; or, as he explains it, the condition of the vegetable kingdom, when the quickening principle does not act. Schelling also makes Deo signify "the one that has become feeble and dejected with sorrow and fruitless search." (Goth. der Samothrak., p. 13.—Id. ib., p. 57.—Creuzer, Symbolik. vol. 4, p. 275, not.) The term Δῆω occurs in the Homeric hymn to Ceres (v. 47, 211, 497), but is suspected by Hermann of being an interpolation. (Hymn., ed. Herm.—Epist. ed., p. ci., seq.)

DEOÏNE (Δηοίνη), a name given by the Greek poets to Proserpine, as the daughter of Deo or Ceres. Vid. Deo. (Callim. fragm., 48.—Valck., ad loc.)

DERBE, a city of Asia Minor, in Lycæonia, near Isauria. D'Anville places it in a district of Isauria called Antiochiana, agreeing with Ptolemy (p. 124) and Stephanus of Byzantium; but St. Luke (Acts, 14, 6) and Hierocles (p. 675) assign it to Lycæonia. Derbe and the adjacent town of Lystra derive considerable interest from what befell St. Paul and Barnabas there on leaving Iconium. Stephanus reports, that this place was called by some Delbia, which, in the Lycæonian language, signified "the juniper." The same lexicographer describes it as a fortress and port of Isauria; but we ought, in his account, to substitute λίμνη for λίμνη, which would imply, that the town was situated near some one of the numerous lakes that are to be found in this part of Asia Minor. Derbe, as we learn from Strabo (569), was at one time the residence and capital of Antipater, the robber chieftain of Lycæ-onta. Its name is supposed to have been derived from the word Darb, a gate; and here, perhaps, was one of the passes of Mount Taurus, as the name of Alah dag is yet given to the spot, signifying the pass of the high mountains. Colonel Leake thinks, that the ruins now called Bibir-Klissa, or the Thousand and One Churches, will perhaps be found to be those of Derbe: they have never yet, he adds, been visited, or at least described, by any modern traveller. (Walpole's Memoirs, vol. 2, p. 233.—Leake's Asia Minor, p. 101.—Cramer's Asia Minor, vol. 2, p. 68.)

DERBICES, a nation of Upper Asia, whom Ptolemy (6, 10) places in Margiana, where the Oxus, according to him, empties into the Caspian; but Strabo (782) in Hyrcania. Larcher seeks to reconcile this discrepancy by supposing, that, in Strabo's time, Margiana did not yet extend as far as the Caspian. Others place them on the southern and western shores of the Caspian. (Mannert, Geogr., vol. 5, pt. 2, p. 135.) Wahl, however, thinks that they occupied a part of what is now Chorasan. (Vorder und Mittel-As., vol. 1, p. 562.) The most probable opinion is, that the Derbices dwelt not only around the Oxus and the shores of the Caspian, but that their territories extended also to the east as far as Bactriana. (Bähr, ad Ctes., Pers., c. 6.—Von Hammer, Wien. Jahrb., vol. 7, p. 253.)

DERCETO and DERCETIS, a goddess worshipped by the Syrians, and the same, in all probability, with Atargatis, the name Derceto or Dercetis itself being, apparently, a mere corruption from Atargatis. (Vid. Atargatis.)—According to Diodorus Siculus (2, 4) and Lucian (de Syria Dea, 14), her statues represented her as half woman, half fish, the female part being from the head to the loins. The Syrians of Ascalon, where Derceto had one of her temples, accounted for this peculiarity of form by the following legend. Derceto, it seems, having offended Venus, was inspired by the latter with a passion for a young priest, and, having become a mother, and being filled with shame at her own conduct, she put the young man to death, exposed the child in a lonely spot, and, throwing herself into the sea, became partially transformed into a fish. Hence the Syrians abstained from eating fish, and regarded them as something divine. The child was the famous Semiramis. (Diod., l. c.) Guignaut makes the true form of the name Atargatis to have been Aldirdaga, i. e., "the excellent" or "divine fish." The root is dag, "a fish," which we find inverted in Atargatis and Derceto, but plainly appearing in the Syrian name Dagon. Dupuis and others make the Syrian fish-worship to have had an astronomical basis, in which they are very probably correct. (Origine des Cultes, vol. 2, ch. 17.—Guignaut, vol. 2, pt. 1, p. 35, seqq.)

DERTŌNA, a city of Liguria, about twenty miles to the west of Asta. According to Strabo (217), it was a considerable place. It was a Roman colony (Plin., 3, 5), surnamed Julia, as we learn from ancient inscriptions. The modern name is Tortona. (Vell. Patere., 1, 15.—Cic., Ep. ad Fam., 11, 13.)

DERTŌSE, now Tortosa, a city of the Ilercaones in Spain, situate on the Iberus, a short distance above its mouth. Here was a bridge over the river, and along this route led the main military road to the southern parts of Spain, and the colonies established there. (Ukert, Geogr., vol. 2, p. 418.—Mannert, Geogr., vol. 1, p. 429.)

DEVA, I. a city of the Cornavii in Britain. It lay on the river Seteia, or Dec, and was the station of the 20th legion. Devana is merely an error of the editions: the Greek form of the name in Ptolemy is Δεῖνα. (Mannert, Geogr., vol. 2, p. 131.) It is now Chester.—II. A river of Britain, in the north, now the Dec, from which the cities of Old and New Aberdeen, the latter of which lies at its mouth, derive their name. (Mannert, Geogr., vol. 2, p. 201.)—III.

There was another river named Deva in Britain, on the northwestern coast, which is also called Dec, and flows into Wigtown Bay, the ancient Jena Estuarium.

DEUCALION, a prominent personage in the mythical traditions from which Greek history sprang. He is represented as the son of Prometheus and Clymene (Schol. ad Pind., Ol., 9, 72), or of Prometheus and Pandora, and is sometimes called the father (Thucyd., 1, 3), sometimes the brother of Hellen (Schol. ad Apollon. Rh., 3, 1086), the reputed founder of the Greek nation. The seat of his authority was Thessaly, from which, according to general tradition, he was driven to Parnassus by a great deluge (Apollod., 1, 7, 2), which, however, according to Aristotle (Meteorol., 1, 14), occurred between Dodona and the Acheloiūs. The Greek legend respecting this memorable event is as follows: Deucalion was married to Pyrrha, the daughter of Epimetheus and Pandora. When Jupiter designed to destroy the brazen race of men on account of their impiety, Deucalion, by the advice of his father, made himself an ark (ἀρκα), and, putting provisions into it, entered it with his wife Pyrrha. Jupiter then poured rain from heaven, and inundated the greater part of Greece, so that all the people, except a few who escaped to the lofty mountains, perished in the waves. At the same time, the mountains of Thessaly were hurst through by the flood, and all Greece without the isthmus, as well as all the Peloponnesus, were overflowed. Deucalion was carried along the sea in his ark for nine days and nights, until he reached Mount Parnassus. By this time the rain had ceased, and, leaving his ark, he sacrificed to Jupiter "Flight-giving" (Φύσιος), who sent Hermes, desiring him to ask what he would. His request was to have the earth replenished with men. By the direction of Jupiter, thereupon, he and his wife flung stones behind them, and those which Deucalion cast became men, those thrown by Pyrrha women; and from this circumstance, say the Greeks, came the name for people (ἄνθρωποι from ἄνθρωπος, "a stone."—Apollod., 1, 7, 2).—This narrative, it may easily be seen, is of a very narrow and even unpoetic character. It restricts the general deluge to Greece Proper, perhaps originally to Thessaly (Aristot., l. c.); and it most incongruously represents others as having escaped as well as Deucalion; yet, at the same time, it intimates, that he and his wife alone had been preserved in the catastrophe. What is said of the brazen age is quite at variance with the narrative of Hesiod, and is a very clumsy attempt at connecting two perfectly independent and irreconcilable myths. The circumstance of the ark is thought by some to be borrowed from the Mosaic account, and to have been learned at Alexandria, for we elsewhere find the dove noticed. "The mythologists," says Plutarch, "inform us, that a dove left fly out of the ark, was to Deucalion a sign of bad weather if it came in again, of good weather if it flew away." (Plut., de solert. an.—Op., ed. Reiske, vol. 10, p. 37.) The sacrifice and the appearance of Hermes also strongly remind us of Noah.—The Latin writers take a much nobler view of the deluge. According to them, it overspread the whole earth, and all animal life perished except Deucalion and Pyrrha, whom Ovid, who gives a very poetical account of this great catastrophe, conveys in a small boat to the summit of Parnassus; while others make Ætna or Athos the mountain which yielded them a refuge (Ovid, Met., 1, 253, seqq.—Hygin, fab., 153.—Sere. ad Virg., Eclog., 6, 41.) According to Ovid, they consulted the ancient oracle of Themis respecting the restoration of mankind, and received the following response: "Depart from the face, veil your heads, loosen your girded vestments, and cast behind you the great bones of your parent." (Mt., 1, 381, seqq.) They were at first horror-struck at such an act of impiety being enjoined upon them; but at length Deacalion penetrated the sense of the oracle, the stones being, by a very natural figure, the bones of the earth.—Deucalion and Pyrrha are evidently pure beings of fiction, personifications of water and fire. The name Deucalion comes very probably from δεῦκα (whence δεύκατος), to wet; while Pyrrha is evidently derived from πῦρ, fire. The meaning of the legend will then be, that when the passage through which the Peneus carries off the waters that run into the vale of Thesaly, which is on all sides shut in by lofty mountains, had been closed by some accident, they overflowed the whole of its surface, till the action of subterranean fire opened a way for them. According to this view of the subject, then, the deluge of Deucalion was merely a local one; and it was not until the time of Ptolemy Philadelphus, when the Hebrew Scriptures became known to the Greeks, that some features borrowed from the universal deluge of Noah were incorporated into the story of the Thessalian flood. (Welcker, Tril., p. 549, not.—Keightley's Mythology.—Clinton's Fasti Hellenici, vol. 1, p. 43, not.) It is but fair to remark, however, that many modern writers regard the deluge of Deucalion as nothing else than a tradition of the great cataclysm of Noah, altered in some of its features, and placed by the Hellenes in the period which they also assigned to Deucalion, because he was regarded as the founder of their nation, and because his history is confounded with that of all the chiefs of the renewed nations. Such, in particular, is the opinion of the celebrated Cuvier. (Theory of the Earth, p. 145, seqq., Jameson's transl.—Ovid, ed. Lemaire, vol. 3, p. xiii., seqq.)

DIA, I. another name for the island of Naxos. (Plin., 4, 12.)—II. An island not far from the northern shore of Crete. It is now Standia.

DIAGORAS, I. a native of the island of Melos, and follower of Democritus. Having been sold as a captive in his youth, he was redeemed by Democritus, and trained up in the study of philosophy. He attached himself also to lyric poetry, and was much distinguished for his success in this branch of the art. His name, however, has been transmitted with infamy to posterity, as that of an avowed advocate for the rejection of all religious belief. It is expressly asserted by ancient writers, that when, in a particular instance, he saw a perjured person escape punishment, he publicly declared his disbelief of Divine Providence, and from that time spoke of the gods and all religious ceremonies with ridicule and contempt. He even attempted to lay open the sacred mysteries, and to dissuade the people from submitting to the rites of initiation. A price at last was set upon his head, and he fled to Corinth, where he died. He lived about 416 years before Christ. (Cic., N. D., 1, 23.—Id. ib., 3, 37.—Val. Max., 1, 1, ext. 7.)—II. An athlete of Rhodes, who gained the prize in pugilism at the Olympic games, B.C. 462, Ol. 79. His victory was celebrated by Pindar, in an ode which is still extant (Olympiad 7), and which is said to have been inscribed in golden letters in the temple of the Lindian Minerva, at Rhodes. According to Pindar, he twice obtained the victory in the games of Rhodes, four times at the Isthmian, and was successful also at the Nemean and other contests. Aulus Gellius (3, 15) informs us, that he saw his three sons crowned on the same day at the Olympic games, and expired through joy. Bayle (Dict., s. v.) censures Pindar for prolix digression in the ode above referred to, and is censured in turn by Böckh: “Baylius, Pindari quidem pessimus iudex: nam hoc carmen, quod ob digressiones reprehendit, ita pulchre adornatum est, ut nihil vituperari queat.” (Böckh, ad Pind., Ol., 7, vol. 3, p. 167.)

DIAMASTIGÖSIS, a festival at Sparta in honour of Diana Orthia. (Vid. Bomonica.)

DIANA (called by the Greeks Ἀρτεμις, Artemis), was the daughter of Jupiter and Latona, and sister of Apollo. She was the goddess of the chase; she also presided over the delivery of females. The sudden deaths of women were ascribed to her darts, as those of men were to the arrows of her brother, of whom she forms the exact counterpart. Diana was a spotless virgin: her chief joy was to speed like a Dorian maid over the hills, followed by a train of nymphs, in pursuit of the flying game. Callimachus thus relates the early history of the goddess. (Hymn. ad Dian.) Diana, while yet a child, as she sat on her father's knee, besought him to grant her permission to lead a life of perpetual virginity, to get a bow and arrows formed by the Cyclopes, and to devote herself to the chase. She farther asked for sixty Ocean-nymphs as her companions, and twenty nymphs from Amnisus in Crete as her attendants. Of towns and cities she required not more than one, satisfied with the mountains, which she never would leave, but to aid women in the pains of childbirth. Her indulgent sire assented with a smile, and gave her not one, but thirty towns. She speeds to Crete, and thence to Ocean, and selects all her nymphs. On her return, she calls at Lipara on Vulcan and the Cyclopes, who immediately lay aside all their work to execute her orders. She now proceeds to Arcadia, where Pan, the chief god of that country, supplies her with dogs of an excellent breed. Mount Parhassius then witnessed the first exploit of the huntress-goddess. Five deer, larger than bulls, with horns of gold, fed on the banks of the dark-pebbled Anaurns, at the foot of that hill; of these the goddess, unaided by her dogs, caught four, which she reserved to draw her chariot; the fifth, destined by Juno for the last labour of Hercules, bounded across the Keladon and escaped.—The adventures of Diana were not numerous. She turned Actæon into a stag for having unconsciously beheld her when bathing. Callisto was changed by her into a bear for a breach of maiden purity. Orion perished by her arrows. Along with her brother she destroyed the children of Niobe; and, in a fable later than Homer, she is said to have detained the Grecian fleet at Aulis, in consequence of Agamemnon's having killed a hind which was sacred to her, and to have required the sacrifice of his daughter Iphigenia. The Alodæ, Otus and Ephialtes, sought in marriage Juno and Diana; the latter goddess, changing her form into a hind, sprang out between the two brothers, who, aiming their darts at the supposed beast, by her art pierced each other, and died.—If Diana or Artemis were merely one of the names under which the moon was worshipped, it need not surprise us to find her identified with Selene, with Hecate, and even with Proserpina, the goddess of the under world, and to be thence called the three-formed goddess, ruling as Selene in the sky, as Artemis or Diana on earth, as Hecate or Proserpina in Erebus. This will also give a very simple reason for her being the aider of women in labour. The moon was believed by the ancients to have great influence over growth in general (Plin., 18, 30.—Id., 2, 99.—Id., 10, 54.—Plut., de Is. et Os., 41.—Eudocia, 11); and as, moreover, a woman's time was reckoned by moons, it was natural to conceive that the moon-goddess presided over the birth of children. (Vid. Lucina.)—On the other hand, sudden deaths were ascribed to the influence of Apollo and Diana. In the former case, this will be an allusion to the coups de soleil; in the latter, to the well-known unhealthy influence of the moon, in producing fevers, &c. Diana was also confounded with the goddess worshipped on the Tauric Chersonese, whose altars were stained with the blood of such unhappy strangers as were cast on that inhospitable shore. (Herod., 4, 103.—Eurip., Iph. in Taur.) She was identified, too, with the goddess of nature adored at Ephesus, whose symbolical figure, by its multitude of breasts and heads of animals hung around it, denoted the fecundity of nature.—Diana is generally represented as a healthy, strong, active maiden; handsome, but with no gentleness of expression. She wears the Cretan hunting-shoes (ἐνδοπούδες), and has her garment tucked up for speed. On her back she bears a quiver, and in her hand a bow or a hunting-spear. She is usually attended by a hound. Walker considers the mode in which this goddess is represented as an illustration of what he terms the locomotive system. (Analysis of Beauty, p. 220.)—The name Artemis seems identical with ἀρετή, whole, uninjured, and, therefore, sound and pure, probably with reference to the virginity of the goddess. Welcker, however, regards it as an epithet of the same nature with Opis and Nemesis, and says that it is ἀρι-Θέμις. (Schwenk, p. 263.) The name Diana comes from Dia or Deira Jana, which became Diajana or Devajana, and ultimately Diana. She was invoked as Deiva Iana in the Salian hymns. Varro makes Iana the same as Lacua. (R. R., 1, 37, 3.) Nigidius, however (ap. Macrobi., Sat., 1, 9), makes Diana come from Iana with D prefixed; while Lanzi deduces the name from the early Greek form TH ANA (i. e., ἡ ἀνάσσα, "the queen"), just as Apollo is called ἀναΐς. (Saggio di Lingua Etrusca, vol. 1, p. 48, not.)—Mythologists are divided respecting the original nature of Apollo and Diana. The question is, whether they are to be regarded as physical or moral beings. Both classes of disputants agree that the latter is their character in the Homeric and Hesiodic poetry, where Apollo appears only as the god of prophecy, music, and archery, and Diana as his counterpart in this last office. Voss, therefore (with whom agree Wolf, Lobeck, Hermann, Vöcker, Nitzsch, and Müller), maintains such to have been the original conception of these deities; while Heyne, Buttmann, Welcker, Creuzer, Guignaut, and others, think that Apollo and Diana were, in their primitive character, the same with the sun and moon. This latter hypothesis is undoubtedly the more correct one of the two. (Keightley's Mythology, p. 128, seqq.) The references, in the discussion just alluded to, are as follows: Voss, *Mythol. DIANUM PROMONTORIUM, a promontory and town of Hispania Tarraconensis, on the Mediterranean coast, opposite the Pityusæ Insulæ. The modern name of the town is Denia, and of the promontory, cape St. Martin. It was one of the three towns on this coast whose foundation was ascribed to the Massilians. It was called by them Artemisium, from the Greek name of Diana, who had a temple here which was much venerated. Sertorius made this the chief station for his fleet, in consequence of its favourable position for intercepting the vessels of the foe. Mela names the promontory Ferraria, without doubt from iron-works in its vicinity (Strab., 159.—Mannert, Geogr., vol. 1, p. 423.—Mela, 2, 6.)

DIASIA, a festival in honour of Jupiter at Athens. In ancient Attica, the four tribes under the government of Erichthonius derived their names from four divinities, Jupiter, Minerva, Neptune, and Vulcan. They were termed, accordingly, Διῆς, Ἀθηναίης, Ποσειδωνίης, and Ἡφαίστιος. The deities in question were the four great possessors of the Attic soil, and Jove was the first among them. At the outgoing of the month Anthesterion, all the citizens celebrated his festival under the name of Diasia; many, after the old fashion, offered him the fruits of their fields, while others sacrificed cattle. It was a state family-feast; the old idea of house and court not being forgotten in it. (Creuzer, Symbolik, vol. 2, p. 510.—Wachsmuth, Alterthumsk., vol. 4, p. 25, et 139.—Mitchell, ad Aristoph., Nub., 397.)

DIBIO, a city of Gaul, in the territory of the Lingones, and now Dijon. It was founded, according to some authorities, by the Emperor Aurelian, while others make him merely to have fortified it anew. (Greg. Turon., 3, 19.)

DICÆA, a town of Thrace in the territory of the Bistones, and to the southeast of the Bistonian marsh. (Herod., 7, 109.—Seyler, p. 27.—Strabo, Epit., 7, p. 331.) Dr. Clarke, in his travels, mentions the Bistonis Palus, and some ruins near it, which probably are to be identified with those of Dicæa. (Clarke's Travels, vol. 8, p. 65.)

DICÆARCHIA. Vid. Puteoli.

DICÆARCHUS, I, a native of Messana in Sicily. He was a scholar of Aristotle's, and is called a peripatetic philosopher by Cicero (Off., 2, 5); but, though he wrote some works on philosophical subjects, he seems to have devoted his attention principally to geography and statistics. His chief philosophical work was two dialogues "on the Soul," each divided into three books, the one dialogue being supposed to have been held at Corinth, the other at Mytilene. In these he argued against the Platonic doctrines of the soul, and, indeed, altogether denied its existence. The greatest performance, however, of Dicæarchus was a treatise on the geography, politics, and manners of Greece, which he called Βίος Ἑλλάδος, "The Life of Greece" (a title imitated by Varro in his Vita Populi Romani).—All the philosophical writings of Dicæarchus are lost. His geographical works have shared the same fate, except a few fragments. We have remaining one hundred and fifty verses of his Ἀναγραφὴ τῆς Ἑλλάδος, or "Description of Greece," written in iambic trimeters; and also two fragments of the Βίος Ἑλλάδος, one containing a description of Boeotia and Attica, and another an account of Mount Pelion. It has been conjectured, with great appearance of truth, that the citations from Dicæarchus, in which his treatises on "Musical Contests," "on the Dionysian Contests," &c., are referred to, are drawn from his "Life of Greece," and that the grammarians have named them by the title of the subdivision to which these subjects belonged, instead of the leading title of the book. (Näke, Rhein. Mus. for 1833, p. 47.) Dicæarchus's maps were extant in the time of Cicero (Ep. ad Att., 6, 2), but his geography was not much to be depended upon. (Strab., 104.) Cicero was very fond of the writings of Dicæarchus, and speaks of him in terms of warm admiration. (Ep. ad Att., 2, 2.) In one of the extant fragments Dicæarchus quotes Posidippus, and must therefore have been alive in 289 B.C.—The remains of this writer are given in the Geographi Græci Minores of Hudson, Gail, and Bernhardt. They were printed also (with the exception of the one respecting Pelion) in the collection of Stephens, Paris, 1590, and in the second volume of Gronovius's Thesaurus Antiq. Græc. Marx has given a new edition of them in Creuzer's Meletemata, vol. 3, p. 174, seqq.—II. A grammarian, a pupil of Aristarchus. (Suid.)

DICTÆUS MONS. Vid. Dictæ.

DICTANNUM PROMONTORIUM. Vid. Dictynnæum Promontorium.

DICTATOR, the highest extraordinary magistrate in the Roman republic. Though the name obviously contains the element dic (from dico), it was doubted by the Roman writers, whether the title had reference to the mode of his nomination or his power. He was also called Prætor Maximus, and Magister Populi, and in Greek διῶπατος, or "double consul." After the expulsion of the kings, the consulship was established. The two consuls possessed the same power as the kings in the administration of the state and the command of the army, yet their authority was subject to some restrictions, and principally to the appeal that could be made from their decisions. The two consuls, possessing equal authority, often differed in their views and opinions; a circumstance which necessarily caused jealousy and disunion, particularly in the command of the army when on active service. In extraordinary emergencies, therefore, the republic required a single magistrate, invested with ample authority. Such circumstances led to the establishment of the dictatorship. The first dictator was created about 253 A.U.C., or 501 B.C. (Liv., 2, 18.) The dictator united in himself the power of the two consuls; and the authority of all the other magistrates, except that of the tribunes, ceased as soon as he was appointed. He possessed the whole administrative power of the state, and the command of the army without any restrictions. (Dio Cass., according to Zonaras, 7, 13, where a reference to a lost book of Dio is given.—Dion. Hal., 5, 10, seqq.) He had the power of life and death, and there was no appeal from his decision. This power, however, continued only for the space of six months, even although the business for which he had been created was not finished, and was never prolonged beyond that time except in extreme necessity, as in the case of Camillus, for Sylla and Cæsar usurped their perpetual dictatorship in contempt of the laws of their country. But the dictator usually resigned his command whenever he had effected the business for which he had been created: thus, Q. Cincinnatus and Mameus Æmilius abdicated the dictatorship on the 16th day; Q. Servilius on the 8th day. Another check on the dictator's power was, that he could lay out none of the public money without the authority of the senate or the order of the people. He could not, moreover, leave Italy; a law which was only once violated, and that on account of the most urgent necessity, as, for example, in the first Punic war, when a dictator commanded in Sicily. (Liv., Epit., 19.) Neither was he allowed to ride on horseback without the permission of the people. The principal check, however, against a dictator's abuse of power was, that he might be called to an account for his conduct when he resigned his office. The dictatorship was not created by the suffrages of the people, as the other magistrates, but one of the consuls, by order of the senate, named as dictator whatever person of consular dignity he thought proper; and thus he did, after having taken the auspices, usually in the dead of night. Sometimes the senate itself appointed the dictator, and in some instances he was elected by the comitia. The dictator was preceded by twenty-four lictors, with the fascies and securis, or, in other words, by as many as the two consuls together. The writers on Roman antiquities, and especially Dr. Adam, assert, that the dictator was attended by twenty-four lictors with the fascies and securis even in the city. In this they appear to have erred. Plutarch, indeed, tells us, in his life of Fabius, that the dictator was attended by twenty-four lictors; but, as Justus Lipsius observes, this statement is contradicted by higher authority; for we are told in the epitome of the 89th book of Livy, that Sylla, in assuming to himself twenty-four lictors, had done a thing entirely unprecedented: "Sylla, dictator factus, quod nemo quidem unquam fecerat, cum fascibus viginti quatuor processit."—At first the dictator was taken only from the patrician order, but afterward (B.C. 356) from the plebeians also. After his appointment he nominated the master of the horse (Magister Equitum), who commanded under him. Sometimes, however, a master of the horse was pitched upon for the dictator by the senate, or by the order of the people. It was only when the state was menaced by a sudden danger from within or without that a dictator was nominated; but, in the course of time, a dictator was elected to preside at the elections in the comitia, when the consuls were abroad; and also on some other public solemnities. (Liv., 7, 3.—Id., 8, 18, at 23.) For one hundred and twenty years before Sylla, the creation of a dictator was disused, but in dangerous emergencies the consuls were armed with dictatorial power. This office, so respectable and illustrious in the first ages of the republic, became odious by the usurpations of Sylla and Cæsar; and, after the death of the latter, the Roman senate, on the motion of the consul Antony, passed a decree, which forbade a dictator's being ever after appointed at Rome. Augustus declined the office, though offered to him by the people (Suet., Aug., 52), and the title of dictator was never assumed by the emperors of Rome.—These are the received opinions as to the Roman dictators; but in Niebuhr's Roman History we find other views of the subject, to which we shall briefly advert. According to him, the dictatorship was of Latin origin, and was introduced from the Latins among the Romans. The object of the Roman dictatorship was to evade the Valerian laws, and to establish the power of the patricians over the plebeians; for the appeal granted by those laws was from the sentence of the consuls, not from that of the dictator. The later Romans had but an indistinct knowledge of the dictatorship of the ancient constitution. Dio Cassius is in error when (without excepting the patricians) he asserts, that in no instance was there a right of appeal from the dictator, and that he could condemn knights and senators to death without trial. Dionysius is also in error when he says that the dictator decided on every measure according to his own pleasure. It is incorrect to suppose, that the appointment of the dictator in all cases rested with one of the consuls; for the conferring of kingly power (such as that of the dictator was) could never have been intrusted to a single person. The pontifical books have preserved so much as this, that the dictator was nominated by the senate, and that the nomination was approved by the people. As the plebeians increased in power, the dictatorship was seldom required, and then only for matters of less importance, and in such cases the nomination was left to the consuls. For a general sketch of the dictatorial power, consult Crenzer, Rom. Antiq., p. 231, seqq.—Niebuhr, Rom. Hist., vol. 1, p. 495, seqq., Cambr. transl.

DICTE, a mountain of the island of Crete, now called Sethia, and also Lasthi, next in height to Mount Ida, and covered throughout a great part of the year with snow; whence it is denominated by Strabo, Pliny, and Ptolemy, "the White Mountain." (Strabo, 328.—Compare Athenæus, 9, p. 376.) It is commonly supposed to have obtained its name from Dictynna, a nymph of Crete, who is supposed first to have invented hunting-nets (δίκτυα), and to have been called Dictynna on that account, having been before named Britomartis. (Callim., Hymn. in Dian., v. 197.) Strabo, however, censures Callimachus for his false derivation of the name. According to another account, she plunged into the sea in order to avoid Minos, who pursued her, and was caught in a fisherman's net. This mountain was consecrated to Jupiter, and hence he was called Dictæus, as well as from a cave which was there, in which he had been concealed from Saturn. (Virgil, Georg., 4, 149.) Crete was sometimes also styled by the poets Dictæa aræ. (Virg., Æn., 3, 171.)

DICTYNNA, a nymph of Crete. (Vid. Dictæ.)

DICTYNNÆUM, or DICTANNUM PROMONTORIUM, a promontory on the northern coast of the isle of Crete, towards the northwest. This promontory, answering to the Psacum Promontorium of Ptolemy, forms the termination of a chain called Tityrus by Strabo (499). On its summit was placed a celebrated temple of the nymph Britomartis or Dictynna. (Diad. Sic., 5, 76.—Mela, 2, 7.) The site of the temple now bears the name of Magny. (Cramer's Anc. Greece, vol. 3, p. 365.)

DICRYUS, I. a Cretan, said to have accompanied Idomeneus to the Trojan war, and to have written a history of that contest. This work, according to the account that has come down to us, was discovered in the reign of Nero, in a tomb near Cnossus, which was laid open by an earthquake. It was written in Phœnician, and translated into Greek by one Eupraxides or Praxis. The Greek translation has not reached our times, but we have remaining the Latin version of Q. Septimius, who lived in the time of the Emperor Dioclesian, and not in that of Constantine. Scioppius (Paradox. Lit. Ep., 5) makes him to have been a contemporary of Cornelius Nepos, an assumption which the style of Septimius most clearly disproves. The work of Septimius contains the first five books, with an abridgment of the remainder.—The Phœnician part of this story has been very ably refuted by Perizonius, in his "Dissertatio de Historia Belli Trojani, quæ Dictyos Cretensis nomen præfert, Græcæ." The real author was Eupraxides or Praxis, and the whole affair was got up to impose upon Nero, who was at that time on a visit to Achaia. What added to the deception was, that an earthquake did actually take place in Crete at this same period. (Perizon., Diss., § 5.) Although this work does not merit the confidence which its fabricator wished to produce, it is still not without interest for those who pursue the study of antiquity, since it contains many things derived from books which no longer exist. The best edition is that of Smids, Amst., 1702, in 4to and 8vo, with the preliminary dissertation of Perizonius. (Fabric., Bibl. Lat., 1, 6, p. 111.—Bähr, Gesch. Rom. Lit., vol. 1, p. 465, seq.)—II. A brother of Polydectes, king of Seriphus, made monarch of the island, in place of the latter, by Persæus. (Vid. Danaë.)

DIDA LEX, de Sumptibus, by Didius, A.U.C. 610. It limited the expense of entertainments, and the number of guests, and ordained that the sumptuary laws should be extended to all the Italians, and that not only the master of the feast, but also the guests, should incur a penalty for their offence. (Macrob., Sat., 2, 13.)

DIDIVS, Julianus, of a family originally from Mediolanum (Milan), and grandson of Salvus Julianus, a celebrated jurist, was born about A.D. 133. He was educated by Domitia Lucilla, the mother of Marcus Aurelius. Didius soon rose to important offices, was successively quæstor, prætor, and governor of Belgic Gaul, and, having defeated the Chauci, obtained the consulship. He was afterward sent as governor to Dalmatia, and next to Germania Inferior. Under Commodus he was governor of Bithynia: on his return to Rome he lived in luxury and debauchery, being enormously rich. After the murder of Pertinax, A.D. 193, the prætorians having put up the empire at auction, Didius proceeded to their camp, and bid against Sulpicianus, the father-in-law of Pertinax, who was to make his own bargain with the soldiers. Didius having bid highest, and having been proclaimed, was taken by the soldiers into Rome. The senate, with its usual servility, acknowledged him emperor, but the people openly showed their dissatisfaction, and loaded him with abuse and imprecations in the circus, when he assisted at the solemn games which were customary on the occasion of a new reign. He is said to have borne these insults with patience, and to have behaved altogether with great moderation during his short reign. Three generals, at the head of their respective legions, refused to acknowledge the nomination of the prætorians; Pescennius Niger, who commanded in the East; Septimius Severus, in Illyricum; and Claudius Albinus in Britain. Severus being proclaimed Augustus by his troops, marched upon Rome, and found no opposition upon the road, as the towns and garrisons all declared for him. The prætorians themselves forsook Didius, and the senate readily pronounced his abdication and proclaimed Severus emperor. A party of soldiers making their way into the palace, and disregarding the entreaties of Didius, who offered to renounce the empire, cut off his head. He had reigned only sixty-six days. (Spartianus, Vit. Did. Jul.—Dio Cass., Epit. Lib., 73.)

DIDO (called also Elissa), was daughter of Belus II., king of Tyre, and sister of Pygmalion. According to Justin (18, 5), the Tyrians, on the death of Belus, gave the kingdom to Pygmalion, though still quite young, and Dido married Acerbas, her maternal uncle, who was priest of Hercules, an office next to that of king. Acerbas was possessed of great treasures, which, dreading Pygmalion's covetous disposition when the latter had attained to manhood, he deemed it prudent to conceal. Pygmalion, in order to obtain this wealth, assassinated him while officiating at the altar, and Dido, unwilling to remain in a spot which served but to renew her grief, quitted her brother's kingdom. The tyrant, to prevent her final escape with the treasures of Acerbas, despatched messengers to solicit her to return to Tyre. Dido apparently assented, but took the precaution, when embarking, to place in the vessel, in the presence of those whom Pygmalion had sent to her, several bales filled with sand, which she told them contained the treasures. When they were out at sea, she compelled her attendants to throw these bales into the sea; and then representing to those who had come from the monarch, the instant death that awaited them if they presented themselves before him without the expected treasures, and that a regard for their own safety should induce them to become her companions in search of some settlement, in which they might find shelter from the persecution of Pygmalion, she prevailed upon them to follow her fortunes. Large numbers of the chief men (senatorum agmina), with whom the time had previously been agreed upon, thereupon joined her party. She sailed first to Cyprus, where the priest of Jupiter and his whole family, in obedience to the will of the gods, added themselves to the expedition. Taking these along with her, and also eighty Cyprian maidens, whom she carried off from the shore of the island, she sailed in quest of new settlements, and landed on the coast of Africa. Not being allowed by the inhabitants a more extensive grant of land than what could be covered with a bull's hide, Dido evaded this jealous concession, by cutting the hide into small slips, and enclosing with them a large portion of ground. The space thus enclosed was hence called Byrsa, from the Greek Βύρσα, "a hide." (Vid., however, Byrsa.) Here the first settlement was made, and as the city gradually increased around, and Carthage arose, Byrsa became the citadel of the place. When the Phœnician colony had established its cliff, Iarbas, king of Mauritania, sought the hand of Dido in marriage, and threatened war in case of refusal. Her subjects thereupon importuning her to save them from this formidable enemy, she demanded three months for consideration. During this interval she caused a large pile to be erected, as if for the purpose of offering a propitiatory sacrifice to the manes of Acerbas, and, having ascended it, there plunged a dagger into her heart. This action procured for her, it is said, the name of Dido, or "heroinë," her previous name having been Elissa. (But consult remarks at the close of this article.)—From this narrative of Justin's we find many deviations in Virgil. The poet assigns to Dido indiscriminately the name of Dido and Elissa. Acerbas is the Sichæus of Virgil; and the latter states that Pygmalion, after having slain Sichæus, long concealed the deed from Dido: that it was revealed to her by the shade of Sichæus, who at the same time discovered to her the spot where his treasures were concealed, and urged her to seek her own safety in flight. Virgil sanctions the story, that the Carthaginians, when making a foundation for their city, dug up the head of a horse, which was regarded as a presage of future greatness; a story which Bochart considers to have arisen from the word Cacabe (one of the names of Carthage), signifying also, in Punic, "the head of a horse." (Geog. Sacr., col. 471, 483, 743.) But the point on which the Mantuan poet and the historians most essentially differ, is the manner of Dido's death. Virgil attributes this to grief on her being abandoned by Æneas, whom she had hospitably received when wrecked on her coast. Opinions vary also relative to the time of Dido's death; but it is generally agreed, that she lived some centuries later than the Trojan hero. Her subjects, after her death, paid her divine honours.—The whole question relative to Dido is discussed by Heyne in the first Excursus to the fourth Æneid. He divides the earlier history of Carthage into three epochs: the first commences fifty years before the taking of Troy; the second, 173 years after the former; and the third, 190 years still later. At the commencement of this third epoch he makes Dido to have flourished, and to have improved, not, however, to have founded, the city, which, in fact, existed long before.—On the episode of Dido, as introduced by Virgil into his Æneid, Dunlop (History Rom. Lit., vol. 3, p. 167) has the following remarks: "Our poet has just so far availed himself of ancient traditions as to give probability to his narration, and to support it by the prisca fides facto. He wrote, however, at such a distance of time from the events which formed the groundwork of his poem, and the events themselves were so obscure, that he could depart from history without violating probability. Thus, it appears from chronology, that Dido lived many hundred years after the Trojan war; but the point was one of obscure antiquity, known perhaps to few readers, and not very precisely ascertained. Hence, so far was the violence offered to chronology from revolting his countrymen, that Ovid, who was so knowing in ancient histories and fables, wrote an heroic epistle as addressed by Dido to Æneas."—In giving the narrative of Dido, we have given also the etymology of the name, as assigned by some of the ancient writers. The derivation, however, appears to be an erroneous one. Dido neither denotes "the heroine," as Servius maintains (ad Æn., 4, 36), and as we have already given it; nor "the man-slayer" (ἀνδροτόνος), as Eustathius pretends (compare Bochart, col. 746); nor "the wanderer" (ἡ πλανήτις), as we find it stated in the Etymologicum Magnum. The name Dido means nothing more than "the beloved," whether the reference be to Baal or to her husband: "amor, delicia ejus, sive Baalis, sive mariti." (Gesenius, Phæn. Mon., p. 406.) The other appellation, Elissa (more correctly, perhaps, Elisa), means "the exulting" or "joyous one" (Gesen., l. c.), and not, as Bochart makes it, "the divine maiden." (Bochart, Geogr. Sacr., col. 472.)

ΔΙΔΥΜΑΧΟΣ, an artist, mentioned in Virgil. (Æn., 5, 359.) The name, of course, is imaginary.

ΔΙΔΥΜΟΣ, a famous grammarian, the son of a seller of fish at Alexandria, was born in the consulship of Antonius and Cicero, B.C. 63, and flourished in the reign of Augustus. Macrobius calls him the greatest grammarian of his own or any other time. (Sat., 5, 22.) According to Athenæus (4, p. 139, c.), he published 3500 volumes, and had written so much that he was called "the forgetter of books" (βιβλιολάθας), for he often forgot what he had written himself; and also "the man with brazen bowels" (χαλκώτερος), from his unwearied industry. To judge from the specimens of his writings given by Athenæus, we need not much regret the loss of them. His criticisms were, according to Suidas, of the Aristarchean school. He wrote, among other things, an explanation of the Agamemnon of Ion (Athen., 11, p. 418, d.); and also of the plays of Phrynichus (Id., 9, p. 371, f); several treatises against Iuba, king of Mauretania (Suid., s. v. Ἰούβας); a book on the corruption of diction (Athen., 9, p. 368, b.), &c. The Scholia Minora on Homer have been attributed to him, but incorrectly, for Didymus himself is quoted in these notes. The collection of proverbs extant under the name of Zenobius, was partly taken from a previous collection made by Didymus; and about sixty fragments of his fifteen books on agriculture are preserved in the collection of Cassianus Bassus.

ΔΙΕΣΠΙΤΕΡ, a name given to Jupiter as "the Father of Light." (Vid. Jupiter.)

ΔΙΓΕΝΤΙΑ, a small stream, watering the vale of Ustica, near the Tiburtine villa of Horace. It is celebrated by the poet for the refreshing coolness of its waters, and the beautiful scenery along its banks. The modern name is La Licenza. (Horat., Epit., 1, 18, 104.)

ΔΙΝΑΡΧΟΣ, one of the ten Greek orators, for the explanation of whose orations Harpocration compiled his lexicon. He was a Corinthian by birth, but settled at Athens, and became intimate with Theophrastus and Demetrius Phalereus. Dionsysius of Halicarnassus fixes his birth at B.C. 361. The time of his highest reputation was after the death of Alexander, when Demosthenes and other great orators were dead or banished. He seems to have got his living by writing speeches for those who were in want of them, and he carried on apparently a profitable business in this way. Having always been a friend to the aristocratical party, he was involved in a charge of conspiracy against the democracy, and withdrew to Chalcis in Eubœa. He was allowed to return to Athens by Demetrius Polioretetes, after an absence of fifteen years. On his return, Dinarchus, who had brought all his money back with him, lodged with one Proxenus, an Athenian, a friend of his, who, however, if the story be true, proved to be a knave, and robbed the old man of his money, or, at least, colluded with the thieves. Dinarchus brought an action against him, and, for the first time in his life, made his appearance in a court of justice. The charge against Proxenus, which is drawn up with a kind of legal formality, is preserved by Dionsysius of Halicarnassus. Of the numerous orations of Dinarchus, only three remain, and these are not entitled to any very high praise. One of them is against Demosthenes, touching the affair of Harpalus. Dionsysius passes rather a severe judgment on Dinarchus. He considers him merely an imitator of Lysias, Hyperides, and Demosthenes, and though succeeding, to a certain extent, in copying the several styles of these three great orators, yet failing, as all copiers from models must fail, in that natural expression and charm which are the characteristics of originality. The extant orations of Dinarchus are found in the usual collections of the Attic orators. (Dien. Hal., de Dinarch. Jud.—Op., ed. Reiske, vol. 5, p. 629, seqq.)

ΔΙΝΔΥΜΟΣ or Δ (orum), I. a mountain of Galatia in Asia Minor, placed by Ptolemy southeast of Pessinus, while Strabo says that the city lay upon it. The latter writer names it Dindymus, which is generally followed by subsequent geographers. Mannert, however, considers the true name to have been Didymus, from the Greek δίδυμος (twinn), and supposes this appellation to have been given to it from its double summit. One of these summits had the name of Agdistis; and on this, according to Pausanias, Atys was buried. Mannert makes Didymus to have been at the northern extremity of a chain of mountains known by the name of Olympus, not to be confounded, however, with the mountain named Olympus near Prusa in Bithynia, nor with another Olympus in Galatia, on which the Tolistoboi collected their forces to resist the proconsul Manlius. The whole march of the Roman army, as described by Livy, shows that the last-mentioned mountain lay about ten geographical miles northwest of Ancyra. The goddess Cybele was worshipped at Pessinus and on Mount Dindymus, and hence was called Dindymène. (Munnert, Anc. Geogr., vol. 6, 3, 63.)—II. A mountain in the island of Cyzicus, and overhanging the city. It had on its summit a temple, said to have been erected by the Argonauts in honour of Cybele. (Strabo, 575.)

DINIA, a town of Gallia Narbonensis, and the capital of the Bodiontici. Its name is said to be of Celtic origin, being derived from din, water, and ia, hot, so called from the thermal waters at the distance of a quarter of a league from it. It is now Digné. (Compare Munnert, Geogr., vol. 2, p. 106.)

DINOCRATES, a very celebrated Macedonian architect, who offered to cut Mount Athos into a statue of Alexander. (Vid. Athos, at the close of the article.) The monarch took him to Egypt, and employed him in several works of art. Ptolemy Philadelphus directed him to construct a temple for his queen Arsinoë, after her death; and the intention was to have the ceiling of loadstone, and the statue of iron, in order that the latter might appear to be suspended in the air. The death of the artist himself frustrated the undertaking. (Pliny, 34, 14.)

DINOSTRATES, a famous mathematician of the Platonic school, the brother of Menechares, and disciple of Plato. Pursuing the steps of his brother, who amplified the theory of the conic sections, Dinostrates is said to have made many mathematical discoveries; but he is particularly distinguished as the inventor of the quadratrix. Montucla, however, observes, that there is some reason for ascribing the original invention of this curve to Hippias of Elea, an ingenious philosopher and geometer contemporary with Socrates. (Proclus, Comment. in Eucl., 2, 4.—Pappus, Coll. Math., 4, prop. 25.)

DIOCLĒA, a town of Dalmatia, the birthplace, according to some, of the Emperor Dioclesian. Its ruins are near the modern Narenza.

DIOCLETIANOPŌLIS, a city of Macedonia, called so in honour of Dioclesian, and supposed by Mannert (Geogr., vol. 7, p. 479) to have been identical with Pella.

DIOCLETIANUS, CAIUS VALERIUS JOVIUS, a celebrated Roman emperor, born of an obscure family in Dalmatia, at the town of Dioclea or Doclea, from which town he derived his first name, which was probably Docles, afterward lengthened to the more harmonious Greek form of Diocles, and at length, after his accession to the empire, to the Roman form of Diocletianus. He likewise, on this occasion, assumed the patrician name of Valerius. Some, however, make him to have been born at Salona. His birth year also is differently given. The common account says 245 A.D., but other statements make him ten years older. He was first a common soldier, and by merit and success gradually rose to rank. At the commencement of his career, and while he occupied some inferior post, it is said that a Druidess, in whose house he lodged, upbraided him with covetousness, to whom he jocosely replied, "I shall be more generous when I am emperor." "You are joking," replied the Druidess; "but I tell you, in good earnest, that you will attain to the empire after you have killed a boar." This circumstance is said to have occurred in the city of Tongres, and present bishopric of Liège.—Dioclesian served in Gaul, in Mæsia, under Probus, and was present at the campaign against the Persians, when Carus perished in so mysterious a manner. He commanded the household or imperial body-guard when young Numerianus, the son of Carus, was secretly put to death by Aper, his father-in-law, while travelling in a close litter on account of illness, on the return of the army from Persia. The death of Numerianus being discovered, after several days, by the soldiers, near Chalcedon, they arrested Aper, and proclaimed Dioclesian emperor, who, addressing the army from his tribunal in the camp, protested his innocence of the death of Numerianus, and then, upbraiding Aper for the crime, plunged his sword into his body. The new emperor observed to a friend that he had now "killed the boar," punning on the word Aper, which means a boar, and alluding to the prediction of the Druidess. Dioclesian, in fact, self-composed and strong-minded in other respects, was all his life an anxious believer in divination, which superstition led him probably to inflict summary punishment upon Aper with his own hands. He made his solemn entry into Nicomedia in September, 284 A.D., and afterward chose this town for his favourite residence. Carinus, the other son of Carus, having collected a force to oppose Dioclesian, the two armies met at Margium in Mæsia, where the soldiers of Carinus had the advantage at first, but Carinus himself having been slain by one of his own officers, both armies joined in acknowledging Dioclesian emperor, A.D. 285. Dioclesian was generous after his victory, and, contrary to the common practice, there were no executions, proscriptions, or confiscations of property; he even retained most of the officers of Carinus in their places. Dioclesian, on assuming the imperial power, found the empire assailed in various quarters, but his talents and energy soon succeeded in counteracting these evils. In the year 286, he chose his old friend Maximian, a brave, but rude and uncultivated soldier, as his colleague in the empire, and it is to the credit of both that the latter continued ever after faithful to Dioclesian, and willing to follow his advice. Maximian was stationed in Gaul, and on the German frontier, to repel invasion; Dioclesian resided chiefly in the East, to watch the Persians, though he appears to have visited Rome in the early part of his reign. After the lapse of a few years, Dioclesian thought it necessary, in consequence of invasions and revolts in different parts of the empire, to increase the number of his colleagues. On the 1st March, 292, or, according to some, 291, he appointed Galerius a Cæsar, and Maximian, at the same time, adopted, on his part, Constantius Chlorus. The two Cæsars repudiated their respective wives; Galerius married Valeria, Dioclesian's daughter, and Constantius married Theodora, daughter of Maximian. The two Cæsars remained subordinate to the two Augusti, though each of the four was intrusted with the administration of a part of the empire. Dioclesian kept to himself Asia and Egypt; Maximian had Italy and Africa; Galerius, Thrace and Illyrium; and Constantius, Gaul and Spain. But it was rather an administrative than a political division. At the head of the edicts of each prince were put the names of all four, beginning with that of Dioclesian. Dioclesian resorted to this arrangement probably as much for reasons of internal as of external policy. By fixing upon four colleagues, one in each of the great divisions of the empire, each having his army, and all mutually checking one another, Dioclesian put a stop to military insolence and anarchy. The empire was no longer put up for sale; this immediate and intolerable evil was effectually cured, though another danger remained, that of disputes and wars between the various sharers of the imperial power; still it was a small danger, and one which did not manifest itself so long as Dioclesian remained at the helm. Writers have been very free of their censure upon this emperor, for parcelling, as they call it, the empire; but this was the only chance there was of preventing its crumbling to pieces. Italy and Rome, in particular, lost by the change; they no longer monopolized the wealth and power of the world; but the other provinces gained by this.—The new Cæsars justified Dioclesian's expectations. Successful wars were waged in different quarters of the empire; and though Galerius at first met with a defeat from Narses, king of Persia, yet, in the following year, he gave the Persians a terrible overthrow. Narses sued for peace, which was granted by Dioclesian, on condition of the Persians giving up all the territory on the right or western bank of the Tigris. This peace was concluded in 297, and lasted forty years. At the same time, Dioclesian marched into Egypt against Achilleus, whom he besieged in Alexandria, which he took after a siege of eight months, when the usurper and his chief adherents were put to death. Dioclesian is said to have behaved on this occasion with unusual sternness, several towns of Egypt, among others Busris and Coptos, being destroyed. For several years after this the empire enjoyed repose, and Dioclesian and his colleagues were chiefly employed in framing laws and administrative regulations, and in constructing forts on the frontiers. Dioclesian kept a splendid court at Nicomedia, which town he embellished with numerous structures. He, or rather Maximian by his order, caused the magnificent Therma at Rome to be built, the remains of which still bear Dioclesian's name, and which contained, besides the baths, a library, a museum, and other establishments.—In February, 303, Dioclesian issued an edict against the Christians, ordering their churches to be pulled down, their sacred books to be burned, and all Christians to be dismissed from offices civil or military; with other penalties, exclusive, however, of death. Various causes have been assigned for this measure. It is known that Galerius had always been hostile to the Christians, while Dioclesian had openly favoured them, and had employed them in his armies and about his person, and Eusebius speaks of the prosperity, security, and protection which they enjoyed under his reign. They had churches in most towns, and one at Nicomedia, in particular, under the eye of the emperor. Just before the edict was issued, Galerius had repaired to Nicomedia to induce Dioclesian to proscrib the Christians. He filled the emperor's mind with reports of conspiracies and seditions, and, aided by the artifices of the heathen priesthood, was at last but too successful. The barbarities that followed upon the issuing of the edict above referred to are utterly inconceivable. Malicious ingenuity was racked to the utmost to devise tortures for the persecuted followers of Jesus. For the space of ten years did this persecution rage with scarcely mitigated horrors; and such multitudes were massacred in all parts of the empire, that at last the imperial murderers ventured to erect a triumphal column, bearing the barbarously boastful, yet false inscription, that they had extinguished the Christian name and superstition, and restored the worship of the gods to its former purity and splendour. This was the last persecution under the Roman empire, and it has been called by the name of Dioclesian. But, as the persecution raged with most fury in the provinces subject to the rule of Galerius, and as he continued it for several years after Dioclesian's abdication, it might with more propriety be called the Galerian persecution.—In November, 303, Dioclesian repaired to Rome, where he and Maximian enjoyed the honour of a triumph, followed by festive games. This was the last triumph that Rome saw. The populace of that city complained of the economy of Dioclesian on that occasion, and so offended him by their jibes and sarcasms, that he left Rome abruptly, in the month of December, in very cold weather. A long illness ensued, which confined him at Nicomedia; and, soon after his recovery, he was visited by Galerius, who persuaded and almost forced him to abdicate. According to others, however, Dioclesian did it spontaneously. Setting off for Salona, in Dalmatia, he built himself, near this place, an extensive palace by the seashore, in which he lived for the rest of his life, respected by the other emperors, without cares and without regret. At the same time that Dioclesian abdicated at Nicomedia, Maximian, according to an agreement between them, performed a similar ceremony at Milan. Maximian retired to his seat in Laecania, but, not being endowed with the firmness of Dioclesian, he tried some time after to recover his former power, and wrote to his old colleague to induce him to do the same. "Were you but to come to Salona," answered Dioclesian, "and see the vegetables which I raise in my garden with my own hands, you would no longer talk to me of empire." Dioclesian died in 313, surviving his abdication about nine years.—He ranks among the most distinguished emperors of Rome; his reign of twenty-one years being, upon the whole, prosperous for the empire and creditable to the Roman name. He was severe, but not wantonly cruel, and we ought to remember that mercy was not a Roman virtue. His conduct after his abdication shows that his was no common mind. The chief charge against him is his haughtiness in introducing the Oriental ceremonial of prostration into the Roman court. The Christian writers, and especially Lactantius, have spoken unfavourably of him; but Lactantius cannot be implicitly trusted. (Eutrop., 9, 19, seqq.—Aurel. Vict., 39.—Vopisc. Carin., 15.—Paneg. Maxim.—Lactant., de mort. persec., 8, et 18.—Euseb., Vit. Const., c. 18, &c.)

DIODORUS, I. an historian, surnamed Siculus, because born at Agrigum in Sicily, and the contemporary of Julius Cæsar and Augustus. Our principal data for the events of his life are derived from his own work. In early life he travelled into Asia, Africa, and Europe, and on his return established himself at Rome, where he published a general history, in forty books, under the title of Βιβλιοθήκη ιστορική, or Historical Library. To this labour he consecrated thirty years of his life. The history comprehended a period of 1138 years, besides the time preceding the Trojan war, and was carried down to the end of Cæsar's Gallic war. His work was written after the death of Cæsar. The first six books were devoted to the fabulous history anterior to the war of Troy, and of these, the three former to the antiquities of barbarian states, the three latter to the archaeology of the Greeks. But the historian, though treating of the fabulous history of the barbarians in the first three books, enters into an account of their manners and usages, and carries down the history of these nations to a point of time posterior to the Trojan war; thus, in the first book, he gives a sketch of Egyptian history from the reign of Menes to Amasis. In the eleven following books he detailed the different events which happened between the Trojan war and the death of Alexander the Great; and the remaining twenty-three books contained the history of the world down to the Gallic war and the conquest of Britain. We have only a small part remaining of this vast compilation, namely, the first five books, then from the 11th to the 20th, both inclusive, and finally fragments of the other books from the 6th to the 10th inclusive, and also of the last twenty. These rescued portions we owe to Eusebius, to John Malala, Syncellus, and other writers of the lower empire, who have cited them in the course of their works; but, above all, to the authors of the "Extracts respecting Embassies," and of the "Extracts respecting Virtues and Vices." We are indebted also for a part of them to the patriarch Photius, who has inserted in his Myriobiblon extracts from several of the books, from the 31st to the 33d, and from the 36th to the 38th and 40th. Important additions have also recently been made from MSS. in the Vatican Library. (As regards the sources whence Diodorus drew the materials of his work, consult the dissertation of Heyne, "De fontibus hist. Diodori," prefixed to the Bipont edition).—A great advantage possessed by Diodorus over most of the ancient historians, is his indicating the order of time: though it must be acknowledged, at the same time, that his chronology offers occasional difficulties, and often needs reducing. Diodorus, who wrote at Rome, and at a period when the dominion of this city extended over the greatest part of the civilized world, arranges his narrative in accordance with the Roman calendar and consular fasti: he frequently adds the names of the Athenian archons that were contemporaneous. Now, at the time when he wrote, the consuls entered on their office on the first of January, whereas, after the adoption of the cycle of Meton, B.C. 402, the Athenian archons commenced their terms about the middle of the year. Diodorus, however, limits himself to the mention of those archons that entered upon their duties in the course of the consular year, which forms the basis of his chronology: thus, the events which took place during the first six months of a year, ought to be referred to the archon mentioned by him in the preceding year. Nor is this all; the duration of the consulship was that of the Roman year, which, from a very early period, was made to consist of 365 days; while the duration of the archonship remained for a long time subject to the irregularity of the Athenian calendar and years, the latter being sometimes 354 days, at other times 384. Thus, to cite only a single instance, Diodorus places the death of Alexander the Great in the 4th year of the 113th Olympiad, a period with which the names of the consuls also indicated by him fully agree; whereas, by the name of the archon, he makes it to be the following year, the 1st of the 114th Olympiad. (Compare Diod. Sic., 17, 113.—Annales des Lagides, par M. Champollion Figeac, vol. 1, p. 264.) We must carefully attend to this point in remodelling the chronology of Diodorus.—With regard to the historical value of the work itself, and the merits of the author, the most discrepant opinions have been entertained by modern writers. The Spanish scholar Vives called him a mere trifler; and Jean Bodin accused him, in no sparing terms, of ignorance and carelessness; while, on the other hand, he has been defended and extolled by many eminent critics as an accurate and able writer. The principal fault of Diodorus seems to have been the too great extent of his work. It was not possible for any man living in the time of Augustus to write an unexceptionable universal history. It is not, then, a matter of surprise, that Diodorus, who does not appear to have been a man of superior abilities, should have fallen into a number of particular errors, and should have placed too much reliance on authorities sometimes far from trustworthy. Wherever he speaks from his own observations, he may, perhaps, generally be relied upon; but when he is compiling from the writings of others, he has shown little judgment in the selection, and has, in many cases, proved himself incapable of discriminating between the fabulous and the true. We must not blame him for having given a Greek colouring to the manners of other nations which he describes, for it was the common practice of Greek writers to do so, and he has not erred so much in this respect as Dionysius of Halicarnassus. We are indebted to him, moreover, for many particulars which, but for him, we should never have known; and we must regret that we have lost the last, and probably the most valuable, portion of his works, as even by the fragments of them which remain we are enabled, in many places, to correct the errors of Livy. The style of Diodorus, though not very pure or elegant, is sufficiently perspicuous, and presents but few difficulties, except where the MSS. are defective, as is frequently the case. (Schöll, Hist. Lit. Gr., vol. 4, p. 77, seq.—Niebuhr, Rom. Gesch., vol. 3, p. 190, note 297.) The best edition of Diodorus is that of Wesseling, Amst., 2 vols. folio, 1746; reprinted at the Bipont press in 11 vols. 8vo, 1793, with dissertations by Heyne, and notes and disquisitions by Eyring.—II. A native of Caria, and disciple of the Megaric school. He was a great adept in that species of verbal combat which prevailed among the philosophers of his sect.

It is said that a question was proposed to him in the presence of Ptolemy Soter, by Sulpio, one of his fraternity, which he required time to answer, and on this account he was ridiculed by Ptolemy, and denominated Chronos (Χρόνος). Mortified at this defeat, he wrote a book on the question, but nevertheless died of vexation. He is the reputed author of the famous sophism against motion. "If any body be moved, it is moved either in the place where it is, or in a place where it is not, for nothing can act or suffer where it is not, and therefore there is no such thing as motion." Diodorus was suitably rewarded for this brilliant discovery; having dislocated his shoulder, the surgeon who was sent for kept him for some time in torture, while he proved from the philosopher's own mode of reasoning that the bone could not have moved out of its place. (Schöll, Hist. Lit. Gr., vol. 3, p. 253.)—III. A peripatetic philosopher, with whom the uninterrupted succession of the peripatetic school terminated. He was a native of Tyre, and a pupil of Critolaus. Mention is often made of him in the selections of Stobæus, and also in the works of Cicero. The sovereign good, according to Diodorus, was to live in a becoming manner, free from toil and care, τὸ ἀποχρητὸς καὶ καλῶς ἔχειν, or, vacare omni molestia cum honestate, as Cicero expresses it. (Acad., 2, 42.)—IV. An orator and epigrammatic poet, a native of Sardis. He was surnamed Zonas (Ζώνης). He fought in Asia, and was contemporaneous with Mithradates the Great, against whom he was charged with conspiring. He defended himself successfully. Nine of his epigrams remain. (Jacobs, Catal. Poet. Epigram. in Anthol., vol. 3, p. 883.—Strab., 627.)—V. Another native of Sardis, who wrote historical works, odes, and epigrams. Strabo speaks of him as subsequent to the former, and a contemporary and friend of his own. (Strab., 627.) We have one of his epigrams remaining. (Jacobs, l. c.)

DIOGENES, I. a celebrated Cynic philosopher of Sinope. His father, who was a banker, was convicted of debasing the public coin, and was obliged to leave the country, or, according to another account, his father and himself were charged with this offence, and the former was thrown into prison, while the son escaped from the city and came to Athens. Here he attached himself, as a disciple, to Antisthenes, who was at the head of the Cynics. Antisthenes at first refused to admit him into his house, and even struck him with a stick. Diogenes calmly bore the rebuke, and said, Strike me, Antisthenes, but never shall you find a stick sufficiently hard to remove me from your presence, while you speak anything worth hearing. The philosopher was so much pleased with this reply, that he at once admitted him among his scholars. Diogenes perfectly adopted the principles and character of his master. Renouncing every other object of ambition, he determined to distinguish himself by his contempt of riches and honours, and by his indignation against luxury. He wore a coarse cloak; carried a wallet and a staff; made the porticoes and other public places his habitation; and depended upon casual contributions for his daily bread. A friend, whom he had desired to procure him a cell, not executing his order so soon as was expected, he took up his abode in a tub or large vessel in the Metroum. It is probable, however, that this was only a temporary expression of indignation and contempt, and that he did not make a tub the settled place of his residence. This famous tub is indeed celebrated by Juvenal; it is also ridiculed by Lucian, and mentioned by Seneca. But no notice is taken of so singular a circumstance by other ancient writers who have mentioned this philosopher; not even by Epictetus, who discourses at large concerning Diogenes, and relates many particulars respecting his manner of life. It may therefore be questioned whether this whole story is not to be ranked among the na-merous tales which have been invented to expose the sect of the Cynics to ridicule. It cannot be doubted, however, that Diogenes practised the most hardy self-control and the most rigid abstinence; exposing himself to the utmost extremes of heat and cold, and living upon the simplest diet, casually supplied by the hand of charity. In his old age, sailing to Ægina, he was taken by pirates and carried to Crete, where he was exposed to sale in the public market. When the auctioneer asked him what he could do, he said, I can govern men; therefore sell me to one who wants a master. Xenias, a wealthy Corinthian, happening at that instant to pass by, was struck with the singularity of his reply, and purchased him. On their arrival at Corinth, Xenias gave him his freedom, and committed to him the education of his children and the direction of his domestic concerns. Diogenes executed this trust with so much judgment and fidelity, that Xenias used to say that the gods had sent a good genius to his house. During his residence at Corinth, the interview between him and Alexander is said to have taken place. Plutarch relates, that Alexander, when at Corinth, receiving the congratulations of all ranks on being appointed to command the army of the Greeks against the Persians, missed Diogenes among the number, with whose character he was not acquainted. Curious to see one who had given so signal an instance of his haughty independence of spirit, Alexander went in search of him, and found him sitting in his tub in the sun. "I am Alexander the Great," said the monarch; "and I am Diogenes the Cynic," replied the philosopher. Alexander then requested that he would inform him what service he could render him: "Stand from between me and the sun," said the Cynic. Alexander, struck with the reply, said to his friends who were ridiculing the whimsical singularity of the philosopher, "If I were not Alexander, I would wish to be Diogenes." This story is too good to be omitted, but there are several circumstances which in some degree diminish its credibility. It supposes Diogenes to have lived in his tub at Corinth, whereas it appears that he lived there in the house of Xenias, and that, if he ever dwelt in a tub, he left it behind him at Athens. Alexander, moreover, was at this time scarcely 20 years old, and could not call himself Alexander the Great, for he did not receive this title till his Persian and Indian expedition, after which he never returned to Greece; yet the whole transaction supposes him elated with the pride of conquest. Diogenes, probably, was visited by Alexander, when the latter held the general assembly of the Greeks at Corinth, and was received by him with rudeness and incivility, which may have given rise to the whole story. The philosopher at this time would be about 70 years of age.—Various accounts are given concerning the manner and time of his death. It seems most probable that he died at Corinth, of mere decay, in the 90th year of his age, and in the 114th Olympiad. His friends contended for the honour of defraying the expenses of his funeral; but the magistrates settled the dispute by ordering him an interment at the public expense. A column of Parian marble, terminated by the figure of a dog, was raised over his tomb. His fellow townsmen of Sinope also erected brazen statues in memory of the philosopher. Diogenes left behind him no system of philosophy. After the example of his master, he was more attentive to practical than theoretical wisdom. The following are a few of the particular opinions ascribed to him. He thought exercise was indispensable, and able to effect anything; that there were two kinds of exercise, one of the mind, the other of the body, and that one of these was of no value without the other. By the cultivation of the mind, he did not mean the prosecution of any science, or the acquirement of any mental accomplishment; all such things he considered useless; but he intended such a cultivation of the mind as might serve to bring it into a healthy and virtuous state, and produce upon it an effect analogous to that which exercise produces upon the body. He adopted Plato's doctrine, that there should be a community of wives and children; and he held, with the Dorian lawgivers, that order (kóσμος) was the basis of civil government.—The freedom of remark in which Diogenes indulged, and which spared neither the rich and powerful, nor even the religious superstitions of the age, gave great offence; and the consequence was, that in his private life he suffered much obloquy, and was made the subject of ludicrous and disgraceful calumny. It is wholly incredible, that a man who is universally celebrated for his sobriety and contempt of pleasure, and who, for his vehement indignation against vice, and his bold attempts to reform the age in which he lived, has been represented by some of the most eminent philosophers as one endued with divine wisdom, should have been capable of committing the grossest indecencies. The tale which is related of him and the courtesan Lais is wholly inconsistent with chronology, for Lais must have been fourscore years old, and Diogenes seventy, when the circumstance is related to have taken place. The truth is, we are chiefly indebted for these stories to Athenæus, a writer who seems to have ransacked every corner of antiquity, and of his own invention too, for tales to the discredit of philosophy. (Diog. Laertius, Vit. Diog.—Plutarch, Apoph.—Enfield, Hist. Philos., vol. 1, p. 305, seqq.)—II. A native of Apollonia in Crete, was a pupil of Anaximenes, and contemporary with Anaxagoras. Schleiermacher, however, who is followed by Schaubach, the editor of the fragments of Anaxagoras, affirms, from the internal evidence of the fragments of the two philosophers, that Diogenes preceded Anaxagoras. But Diogenes might have written before Anaxagoras, and yet have been his junior, as we know was the case with Empedocles. (Aristot., Met., 1, 3, p. 843, b.) Diogenes followed Anaximander in making air the primal element of all things; but he carried his views farther, and regarded the universe as issuing from an intelligent principle, by which it was at once vivified and ordered, a rational as well as sensitive soul, but still without recognising any distinction between matter and mind. Diogenes wrote several books on Cosmology (περὶ φύσεως). The fragments which remain have been recently collected and edited by Panzerbeiter. (Diog. Laert., 9, 9—Bayle, Hist. Dict., s. v.—Schleiermacher, Mem. Berlin. Acad. for 1815.—Philol. Museum, vol. 1, p. 92.)—III. Lærtius, so called from his native city, Lærtis in Cilicia. He wrote the lives of the philosophers, in ten books, which are still extant. The period when he lived is not exactly known, but it is supposed to have been during the reigns of Septimius Severus and Caracalla. (Compare Iousius, de Script. Hist. Phil., lib. 3, c. 12, § 5. seqq.) Diogenes is thought to have belonged to the Epicurean sect. He divides all the Greek philosophers into two classes; those of the Ionic and those of the Italic school. He derives the first from Anaximander, the second from Pythagoras. After Socrates, he divides the Ionian philosophers into three branches: 1st. Plato and the Academics, down to Chitomachus; 2d. the Cynics down to Chrysippus; 3d. Aristotle and Theophrastus. The series of Italic philosophers consists, after Pythagoras, of the following: Telanges, Xenophanes, Parmenides, Zeno of Elea, Leucippus, Democritus, and others down to Epicurus. The first seven books are devoted to the Ionic philosophers; the last three treat of the Italic school.—The work of Dionysius is a crude contribution towards the history of philosophy. It contains a brief account of the lives, doctrines, and sayings of most persons who have been called philosophers; and though the author is evidently a most unfit person for the task which he imposed upon himself, and has shown very little judgment and discrimination in the execution of it, yet the book is extremely useful as a collection of facts, which we could not have learned from any other quarter, and is entertaining as a sort of omniana on the subject. The article on Epicurus is valuable, as containing some original letters of that philosopher, which comprise a pretty satisfactory epitome of the Epicurean doctrines, and are very useful to the readers of Lucretius. The best editions of Diogenes are, that of Meibomius, Amst., 1692, 2 vols. 4to, and that of Hübner, Lips., 1828, 2 vols. 8vo.

DIOMEDEÆ INSULÆ. Vid. Diomedis Insulæ.

DIOMEDES, son of Tydeus and Deiphyle, was king of Ætolia, and one of the bravest of the Grecian chiefs in the Trojan war, ranking next to Achilles and Ajax. Homer represents him as one of the favourites of Minerva, and ascribes his many acts of valour to her protecting influence. Among his exploits, it is recorded of him that he engaged in single combat with Hector and Æneas; that he wounded Mars, Æneas, and Venus; and that, in concert with Ulysses, he carried off the horses of Rhesus, and the palladium; and procured the arrows of Philoctetes. (Sophocles, however, makes Ulysses to have been aided in this last-mentioned affair by Pyrrhus, son of Achilles.) Diomedes was deprived of the affection of his wife Ægiale, through the wrath and vengeance of Venus, by whose influence, during his absence at the war, she had become attached to Cyllabarus, the son of Sthenelus. (But consult Heyne, ad Apollod., 1, 8, 6, et ad Hom., II., 5, 412.) Diomedes was so afflicted at the enstrangement of Ægiale, that he abandoned Greece, and settled at the head of a colony, in Magna Græcia, where he founded a city, to which he gave the name of Argyripa; and married a daughter of Daunus, prince of the country. In the progress of his voyage to Italy, Diomedes was shipwrecked on that part of the Libyan coast which was under the sway of Lycus, who, as was his usage towards all strangers, seized and confined him. He was, however, liberated by Callirhoë, the tyrant's daughter, who became so enamoured of him, that, upon his quitting the African shores, she put herself to death. Diomedes, according to one account, died in Italy at a very advanced age; while another legend makes him to have been slain by his father-in-law Daunus. (Tzet., ad Lycophr., 603, seqq.) His companions were so much afflicted by his death that they were changed into birds. Virgil, however, makes this transformation earlier in date, and to have taken place during the lifetime of Diomedes. (Æn., 11, 272.) He seems to have followed the tradition recorded by Ovid (Met., 14, 457), that Agnon, one of Diomedes's companions in his voyage from Troy, insulted Venus with contemptuous language, and that the goddess, in revenge, transformed not only Agnon, but many others of Diomedes's followers into birds. These birds, according to Ovid, resembled swans; they chiefly frequented some neighboring islands in the Adriatic, and were noted for their fondness for Greeks, and their aversion towards the natives of any other country. (Vid. Diomedis Insulæ.—Consult Heyne, Excurs., 1, ad Æn., 11, and Lord Bacon's Fables of the Ancients, fab. xviii.)—II. A king of the Bistones, in Thrace, son of Mars and Cyrene. His mares fed on human flesh. Hercules sailed to this quarter, having been ordered, as his eighth labour, to bring these mares to Mycenæ. The hero overcame the grooms of Diomedes, and led the mares to the sea. The Bistones pursued with arms. Hercules, leaving the mares in charge of Abderus, one of his companions, went to engage the foe. Meantime the mares tore their keeper to pieces; and the hero, having defeated the Bistones and slain Diomedes, built a city by the tomb of Abderus, which he called Abdera after him. Hercules brought the mares to Eurystheus, who turned them loose; and they strayed on to Mount Olympus, where they were destroyed by the wild beasts. (Apollod., 2, 5, 8.—Heyne, ad loc.) Another account makes Hercules to have given Diomedes to be devoured by his own mares; and Eurystheus to have consecrated them to Juno. (Diod. Sic., 4, 15.)

DIOMEDES INSULÆ, certain small islands opposite the Sinus Urias, and at no great distance from the coast of Apulia. They are celebrated in mythology as connected with the legend of the transformation of Diomedes's companions into birds. (Vid. Diomedes I., towards the close of the article.) (Aristot., de Mirab.—Lycophr., Alex., v. 599.—Ovid, Met., 14, 457.) Ancient writers differ as to their number. Strabo (284) recognises two; whereof one was inhabited, the other deserted. This is also the account of Pliny (3, 26, and 10, 44), who states, that one was called Diomedea, and the other Teutria. Ptolemy, however, reckons five, which is said to be the correct number, if we include in the group three barren rocks, which scarce deserve the name of islands. The island to which Pliny gives the name of Diomedea appears to have also borne the appellation of Tremitus, as we learn from Tacitus (Ann., 4, 71), who informs us that it was the spot to which Augustus removed his abandoned daughter Julia, and where she terminated a life of infamy. Of these islands, the largest is now called Isola San Domino, the other S. Nicolò. (Romanelli, vol. 2, p. 296.—Cramer's Anc. Italy, vol. 2, p. 275.)

DION, I. an illustrious inhabitant of Syracuse, who, deriving an ample inheritance from his father Hipparchus, became a disciple of Plato, invited to the court of Syracuse by the elder Dionysius. In consequence of the instructions of his master, he escaped being infected with the licentiousness of the capital, and he shared with his preceptor, at a subsequent period, in the persecutions inflicted by the son and successor of the tyrant. He was nearly connected with Dionysius by having married his daughter, and by his sister being one of his wives; and he was also much esteemed by him, so as to be employed on several embassies. At the accession of the younger Dionysius, Plato was again, at Dion's request, invited to Syracuse. In order, however, to counteract his influence, the courtiers obtained the recall of Philistus, a man notorious for his adherence to arbitrary principles. This faction determined to supplant Dion, and availed themselves of a real or supposititious letter to fix on him the charge of treason. Dion, precluded from defence, was transported to Italy, and from thence proceeded to Greece, where he was received with great honour. Dionysius became jealous of his popularity in Greece, especially at Athens, stopped his remittances, confiscated his estates, and compelled his wife, who had been left at Syracuse as an hostage, to marry another person. Dion, incensed at this treatment, determined to expel the tyrant. Plato resisted his intentions; but, encouraged by other friends, he assembled a body of troops, and with a small force sailed to Sicily, took advantage of the absence of Dionysius in Italy, and freed the people from his control. Dionysius returned, but, after some conflicts, was compelled to escape to Italy. The austere and philosophic manners of Dion, however, soon lost him the favour of his fickle countrymen, and he was supplanted by Heraclides, a Syracusan exile, and obliged to make his retreat to Leontini. He afterward regained the ascendancy, and in a rash moment caused Heraclides to be assassinated. This robbed him everafter of his peace of mind. An Athenian, an intimate friend, formed a conspiracy against his life, and Dion was assassinated in the 55th year of his age, B.C. 351. His death was universally lamented by the Syracusans, and a monument was raised to his memory. (Diod. Sic., 16, 6 seqq.—Plut., Vit. Dion.—Corn. Nep., Vit. Dion.)—II. Cassius Cocceianus, son of Cassius Apronianus a Roman senator, was born A. D. 155, in Bithynia. His true name was Cassius, but he assumed the other two names, as being descended on the mother's side from Dion Chrysostomus. Thus, though he was on his mother's side of Greek descent, and though, in his writings, he adopted the then prevailing language of his native province, namely, the Greek, he must nevertheless be considered as a Roman. Dio Cassius passed the greater part of his life in public employments. He was a senator under Commodus; governor of Smyrna after the death of Septimius Severus; for he had displeased this monarch, and held no office, consequently, during the life of the latter; and afterward consul, as also proconsul in Africa and Pannonia. Alexander Severus entertained the highest esteem for him, and made him consul for the second time, with himself, though the praetorian guards, irritated against him on account of his severity, had demanded his life. When advanced in years, he returned to his native country. Dion published a Roman history, in eighty books, the fruit of his researches and labours for the space of twenty-two years. It embraced a period of 983 years, extending from the arrival of Aeneas in Italy, and the subsequent founding of Rome, to A. D. 229. Down to the time of Julius Cæsar, he only gives a summary of events; after this, he enters somewhat more into details; and from the time of Commodus he is very circumstantial in relating what passed under his own eyes. We have fragments remaining of the first 36 books: but there is a considerable portion of the 35th book, on the war of Lucullus against Mithradates, and of the 36th, on the war with the pirates, and the expedition of Pompey against the King of Pontus. The books that follow, to the 54th inclusive, are nearly all entire: they comprehend a period from B. C. 65 to B. C. 10, or from the eastern campaign of Pompey, and the death of Mithradates, to the death of Agrippa. The 55th book has a considerable gap in it. The 56th to the 60th, both included, which comprehend the period from A. D. 9 to A. D. 54, are complete, and contain the events from the defeat of Varus in Germany to the reign of Claudius. Of the following 20 books we have only fragments, and the meagre abridgment of Niphius. The 80th or last book comprehends the period from A. D. 222 to A. D. 229, in the reign of Alexander Severus. The abridgment of Niphius, as now extant, commences with the 35th, and continues to the end of the 80th book. It is a very indifferent performance, and was made by order of the Emperor Michael Duca: the abbreviator, Niphius, was a monk of the eleventh century.—The fragments of the first 36 books, as now collected, are of three kinds. 1. Fragmenta Valesiana: such as were dispersed throughout various writers, scholiasts, grammarians, lexicographers, &c., and were collected by Henri de Valois. 2. Fragmenta Peiresciana: comprising large extracts, found in the section entitled "Of Virtues and Vices," in the great collection or portative library compiled by order of Constantine VI., Porphyrogenitus. The manuscript of this belonged to Peiresc. 3. The fragments of the first 31 books, preserved in the second section of the same work of Constantine's, entitled "Of Embassies." These are known under the name of Fragmenta Ursiniana, because the manuscript containing them was found in Sicily by Fulvio Orsini. 4. Excerpta Vaticana, by Mai, which contain fragments of books 1–35, and 61–80, and which have been published in the second volume of the Scriptorum Nova Collectio, p. 135, seqq. To these are added the fragments of an unknown continuator of Dion (p. 231–246), which go down to the time of Constantine. Other fragments from Dion belong chiefly to the first 35 books, also published in the same collection (p. 527, seqq.), were found by Mai in two Vatican MSS., which contain a sylloge or collection made by Maximus Planudes. The annals of Zonaras also contain numerous extracts from Dion. Dion has taken Polybius for his model; but the imitator is comparable with his original neither as respects arrangement and the distribution of materials, nor in soundness of views, and just and accurate reasoning. His style is generally clear, though there are occasionally obscure passages, where there appears to be no corruption of the text. His diligence is unquestionable, and, from his opportunities, he was well acquainted with the circumstances of the empire during the period for which he is a contemporary authority; and, indeed, we may assign a high value to his history of the whole period from the time of Augustus to his own age. Nor is his work without value for the earlier periods of Roman history, in which, though he has fallen into errors, like all the Greek and Roman writers who have handled the same obscure subject, he still enables us to correct some erroneous statements of Livy and Dionysius.—The best edition is that of Fabricius, completed by Reimar, Hamb., 2 vols. folio, 1751. Notwithstanding, however, the labours of these editors, a new critical edition is much wanted, both from the scarcity of the edition just mentioned, and the fact that the manuscripts have not been collated with sufficient care. The small Tauchnitz edition, 4 vols 16mo, contains all the fragments. A very useful edition appeared in 1824–1825, by Sturz, from the Leipzig press, 8 vols. 8vo, which some even prefer to the edition of Fabricius and Reimar. (Schöll, Hist. Lit. Gr., vol. 4, p. 180, seqq.—Hoffmann, Lex. Bibliograph., vol. 1, p. 250.)—III. Surnamed Chrysostomus, or the Golden-mouthed, on account of the beauty of his style, was a native of Prusa, in Bithynia, and a sophist and stoic. He was in Egypt when Vespasian, who had been proclaimed emperor by his own army, came there, and he was consulted by that prince on the proper course to be adopted under the circumstances. Dion had the candour, or, as some may think, the want of judgment, to advise him to restore the republic. Afterward he resided for years at Rome, till one of his friends having engaged in a conspiracy against Domitian, Dion, fearing for himself, fled to the modern Moldavia, where he remained till the tyrant's death, labouring for his subsistence with his own hands, and possessing no books but the Phædon of Plato, and Demosthenes' περί Περικλέους βίης. Domitian having been assassinated, the legions quartered on the Danube were about to revolt, when Dion got upon an altar, and harangued them so effectually that they submitted to the decision of the senate. Dion was in high favour with Nerva and Trajan, and, when the latter triumphed after his Dacian victories, the orator sat in the emperor's car in the procession. He returned to Bithynia, where he spent the remainder of his life. Accusations of peculation and treason were brought against him, but rejected as frivolous. He died at an advanced age, but it is not known in what year. We have eighty orations attributed to him, which are very prettily written, but not of much intrinsic value. The best edition is that of Reiske, 2 vols. 8vo, Lips., 1784 (Schöll, Hist. Lit. Gr., vol. 4, p. 210, seqq.)

DIONÆA, a surname of Venus, as the daughter of Dione.

DIONE, a nymph daughter of Nereus and Doris. She was mother of Venus by Jupiter, according to Homer (Il., 5, 370). Dione, according to Knight, is the female ΔΙΣ, or ΖΕΥΣ, and therefore associated with him in the most ancient temple of Greece at Dodona. (Inquiry into the Symb. Lang., &c., § 43.—Class. Journ., vol. 23, p. 234.—Compare Buttmann, Mythologus, vol. 1, p. 7, and Constant, de la Religion, vol. 2, p. 335, in notis.)

DIONYSI, festivals held in honour of the god Dionysus or Bacchus. The most important of these were held at Athens and in Attica; and these derive their importance from their being the occasion on which the dramatic exhibitions of the Athenians took place. An account of these festivals, which were four in number, will be found under the article Theatrum, § 2.

DIONYSIUS, a town of Egypt, situate at the south-western extremity of the Lake Mœris. It is now called Bedel-Keran, or, according to some, Scobha. (Ptol.)

DIONYSOPOLIS, 1. a town of Lower Mesia, in the vicinity of the Euxine Sea. Pliny says that it was also called Crunos, but Pomponius Mela (2, 2) makes Crunos the port of Dionysopolis. The modern name is Dionysipoli.—II. A city of India, supposed by Mannert to be the same with the modern Nagar, or Naghar, on the western bank of the river Cote. Mannert does not consider it to have been the same with the ancient city of Nyssa, but makes the position of the latter more to the north. (Geogr., vol. 5, p. 142.)

DIONYSIUS I., or the Elder, a celebrated tyrant of Syracuse, raised to high rank from the station of a simple citizen, was born in this same city 430 B.C. He was son-in-law to Hierocæres, who, having been banished by an adverse party, attempted to return by force of arms, and was killed in the action. Dionysius was dangerously wounded, but he recovered, and was afterward recalled. In time he procured himself to be nominated one of the generals, and, under pretence of raising a force sufficient to resist the Carthaginians, he obtained a decree for recalling all the exiles, to whom he gave arms. Being sent to the relief of Gela, then besieged by the Carthaginians, he effected nothing against the enemy, pretending that he was not seconded by the other commanders; and his friends suggested, that, in order to save the state, the supreme power ought to be confided to one man, reminding the people of the times of Gelon, who had defeated the Carthaginian host, and given peace to Sicily. The general assembly therefore proclaimed Dionysius supreme chief of the republic about 405 B.C.; when he was twenty-five years of age. He increased the pay of the soldiers, enlisted new ones, and, under pretence of a conspiracy against his person, formed a guard of mercenaries. He then proceeded to the relief of Gela, but failed in the attack on the Carthaginian camp: he however penetrated into the town, the inhabitants of which he advised to leave it quietly in the night under the escort of his troops. On his retreat he persuaded those of Camarina to do the same. This raised suspicions among his troops, and a party of horsemen, riding on before the rest, raised, on their arrival at Syracuse, an insurrection against Dionysius, plundered his house, and treated his wife so cruelly that she died in consequence. Dionysius, with a chosen body, followed close after, set fire to the gate of Acradina, forced his way into the city, put to death the leaders of the revolt, and remained undisputed possessor of the supreme power. The Carthaginians, being afflicted by a pestilence, made proposals of peace, which were accepted by Dionysius, and he then applied himself to fortifying Syracuse, and especially the island of Ortygia, which he made his stronghold, and which he peopled entirely with his trusty partisans and mercenaries, by the aid of whom he put down several revolts. After reducing beneath his sway the towns of Leontini, Catana, and Naxos, he engaged in a new war with Carthage, in which he met with the most brilliant success, making himself master of numerous towns in Sicily, and becoming eventually feared both in Italy and Sicily, to the dominion of both of which countries he seems at one time to have aspired. In order to raise money, he allied himself with the Illyrians, and proposed to them the joint plunder of the temple of Delphi: the enterprise, however, failed. He then plundered several temples, such as that of Proserpina at Locri; and as he sailed back with the plunder, with a fair wind, he, who was a humourist in his way, observed to his friends, "You see how the immortal gods favour sacrilege." Having carried off a golden mantle from a statue of Jupiter, consecrated by Gelon out of the spoils of the Carthaginians, he replaced it by a woollen garment, saying that this was more suited to the vicissitudes of the seasons. He also took away a golden beard from Æsculapius, observing that it was not becoming for the son of a beardless father (Apollo) to make a display of his own beard. He likewise appropriated to himself the silver tables and golden vases and crowns in the temples, saying he would make use of the bounty of the gods. (Cic., N. D., 3, 31.—Ælian, F. H., 1, 20.) He also made a descent with a fleet on the coast of Etruria, and plundered the temple at Cære or Agylla of 1000 talents. With these resources he was preparing himself for a new expedition to Italy, when a fresh Carthaginian armament landed in Sicily, 383 B.C., and defeated Dionysius, whose brother Leptines fell in the battle. A peace followed, of which Carthage dictated the conditions. The boundary of the two states was fixed at the river Halycus, and Dionysius had to pay 1000 talents for the expenses of the war. This peace lasted fourteen years, during which Dionysius remained the undisturbed ruler of Syracuse, and one half of Sicily, with part of southern Italy. He sent colonies to the coasts of the Adriatic, and his fleets navigated both seas. Twice he sent assistance to his old ally, Sparta; once against the Athenians, 374 B.C., and again in 369, after the battle of Leuctra, when the Spartans were hard pressed by Epaminondas. Meantime the court of Dionysius was frequented by many distinguished men, philosophers, and poets. Plato is said to have been among the former, being invited by Dion, the brother-in-law of Dionysius; but the philosopher's declamations against tyranny led to his being sent away from Syracuse. The poets fared little better, as Dionysius himself aspired to poetical fame, for which, however, he was not so well qualified as for political success. Those who did not praise his verses were in danger of being led to prison. Dionysius twice sent some of his poems to be recited at the Olympic games, but they were hissed by the assembly. He was more successful at Athens. A tragedy of his obtained the prize, and the news of his success almost turned his brain. He had just concluded a fresh truce with the Carthaginians, after having made an unsuccessful attack on Lilybæum, at the expiration of the fourteen years' peace; and he now gave himself up to rejoicings and feasting for his poetical triumph. In a debauch with his friends, he ate and drank so intemperately that he fell senseless, and soon after died (some say he was poisoned by his physicians, at the instigation of his son), B.C. 367, in the 63d year of his age, having been tyrant of Syracuse thirty-eight years. After the death of his first wife, he married two wives at once, namely, Doris of Locri, and Aristaneta, daughter of Hipparimus, of Syracuse: by these women he had seven children, of whom Dionysius, his elder son by Doris, succeeded him in the sovereignty.—Dionysius was a clever statesman, and generally successful in his undertakings. He did much to strengthen and extend the power of Syracuse, and it was probably owing to him that all Sicily did not fall into the hands of the Carthaginians. He was unscrupulous, rapacious, and vindictive, but several of the stories stated of his cruelty and suspicious temper appear improbable, or at least exaggerated. The works of Philistus, who had written his life, and who is praised by Cicero, are lost. Diodorus, who is our principal remaining authority concerning Dionysius, lived nearly three centuries after, and was not a critical writer. The government of Dionysius, like that of many others who are styled tyrants in ancient history, was not a despotism; it resembled rather that of the first Medici, and other leaders of the Italian republics in the middle ages, or that of the stadtholders in Holland. The popular forms still remained, and we find Dionysius repeatedly convoking the assembly of the people on important occasions, when full freedom of speech seems to have been allowed. (Plut., Vit. Dion.—Diod. Sic., 13, 92, seqq.—Id., 14, 7, seqq., &c.) An account of the famous prison, or "Ear of Dionysius," will be found under the article Λαυτομαία.—II. The second of that name, surnamed the Younger, was son of Dionysius I. by Doris. His father, whom he succeeded, had left the state in a prosperous condition, but young Dionysius had neither his abilities, nor his prudence and experience. He followed at first the advice of Dion, who, although a republican in principle, had remained faithful to his father, and who now endeavoured to direct the inexperienced son for the good of his country. For this purpose Dion invited his friend Plato to Syracuse about 364 B.C. Dionysius received the philosopher with great respect, and, in deference to his advice, reformed for a while his loose habits and the manners of his court. But a faction, headed by Philistus, who had always been a supporter of the tyranny of the elder Dionysius, succeeded in prejudicing the son against both Dion and Plato. Dion was exiled, under pretence that he had written privately to the senate of Carthage for the purpose of concluding a peace. Plato urgently demanded of Dionysius the recall of Dion, and, not being able to obtain it, he left Syracuse, after which Dionysius gave himself up to debauchery without restraint. Dion, meanwhile, was travelling through Greece, where his character gained him numerous friends. Dionysius, moved by jealousy, confiscated his property, and obliged his wife to marry another. Upon this, Dion collected a small force at Zacynthus, with which he sailed for Sicily, and entered Syracuse without resistance. Dionysius retired to the citadel in Ortygia, and, after some resistance, in which Philistus, his best supporter, was taken prisoner and put to death, he quitted Syracuse by sea and retired to Locri, the country of his mother, where he had connexions and friends. Dion having been treacherously murdered, several tyrants succeeded each other in Syracuse, until Dionysius himself came and retook it about B.C. 346. Instead, however, of improving by his ten years' exile, he had grown worse. Having, during the interval of his absence from Syracuse, usurped the supreme power in Locri, he had committed many atrocities, had put to death several citizens, and abused their wives and daughters. Upon his return to Syracuse, his cruelty and profligacy drove away a great number of people, who emigrated to various parts of Italy and Greece, while others joined Iketas, tyrant of Leontini, and a former friend of Dion. The latter sent messengers to Corinth to request assistance against Dionysius. The Corinthians appointed Timoleon leader of the expedition. This commander landed in Sicily B.C. 344, notwithstanding the opposition of the Carthaginians, and of Iketas, who acted a perfidious part on the occasion; he entered Syracuse, and soon after obliged Dionysius to surrender. Dionysius was sent to Corinth, where he spent the remainder of his life in the company of actors and low women; some say, that at one time he kept a school. Justin (21, 5) states, that he purposely affected low habits in order to disarm revenge, in that, being despised, he might no longer be feared or hated for his former tyranny. Several repartees are related of him in answer to those who taunted him upon his altered fortunes, which are not destitute of wit or wisdom. (Plut., Vit. Dion.—Diod. Sic., 16, 5, seqq.)—III. Halicarnassensis or Halicarnassæus, an historian and critic, was born at Halicarnassus in the first century B.C. We know nothing of his history beyond what he has told us himself. He states, that he came to Italy at the termination of the civil war between Augustus and Antony (B.C. 29), and that he spent the following two-and-twenty years at Rome in learning the Latin language, and in collecting materials for his history. (Antiq. Rom., 1, 7, seqq.—Compare Phot., Biblioth., cod. 83.) The principal work of Dionysius is his Roman Antiquities (Ῥωμαϊκὴ Ἀρχαιολογία), which commenced with the early history of the people of Italy, and terminated with the beginning of the first Punic war, B.C. 265. It originally consisted of 20 books, of which the first ten remain entire. The eleventh breaks off in the year 312 B.C., but several fragments of the latter half of the history are preserved in the collection of Constantine Porphyrogenitus, and to these a valuable addition was made in 1816, by Mai, from an old MS. Besides, the first three books of Appian were founded entirely upon Dionysius; and Plutarch's biography of Camillus must also be considered as a compilation mostly taken from the Roman Antiquities, so that, perhaps, upon the whole, we have not lost much of his work. With regard to the trustworthiness and general value of Dionysius's history, considerable doubts may justly be entertained: for, though he has evidently written with much greater care than Livy, and has studied Cato and the old annalists more diligently than his Roman contemporary, yet he wrote with an object which at once invalidates his claim to be considered a veracious and impartial historian. Dionysius wrote for the Greeks, and his object was to relieve them from the mortification which they felt at being conquered by a race of barbarians, as they considered the Romans to be. And this he endeavoured to effect by twisting and forging testimonies, and botching up the old legends, so as to make out a prima facie proof of the Greek origin of the city of Rome; and he inserts arbitrarily a great number of set speeches, evidently composed for the same purpose. He indulges in a minuteness of detail, which, though it might be some proof of veracity in a contemporaneous history, is a palpable indication of want of faith in the case of an ancient history so obscure and uncertain as that of Rome. With all his study and research, Dionysius was so imperfectly acquainted with the Roman constitution, that he often misrepresents the plainest statements about it. (Niebuhr, Rom. Hist., vol. 2, p. 13, Camb. transl.) For instance, he thought the original constitution of Rome was a monarchical democracy, and he calls the curiæ the demus (δῆμος). He believed, when he wrote his second book, that the decrees of the people were enacted by the curiæ and confirmed by the senate (Antiq., 2, 14), and not, as he afterward discovered, the converse. (Antiq., 7, 38.) In a word, though the critical historian may be able to extract much that is of great importance for the early history of Rome from the garbled narrative and dull trifling of Dionysius, he cannot be regarded as a meritorious writer, or recommended to the student of ancient history as a faithful guide.—Dionysius also wrote a treatise on rhetoric; criticisms on the style of Thucydides, Lysias, Isocrates, Isæus, Dmarchus, Plato, and Demosthenes; a treatise on the arrangement of words, and some other short essays. His critical works are much more valuable than his history, and are, indeed, written with considerable power. The criticism on Dmarchus displays good sense and judgment, and shows the great pains which the author took to separate the genuine writings of the Attic orators from the fabrications which passed under their name. The best editions of Dionysius are, that of Hudson, Oxon., 1704, 2 vols. fol., and that of Reiske, Lips., 1774–1777, 6 vols. 8vo. Mai's fragments were first published at Milan in 1816, and reprinted the following year at Frankfurt. They also appear in the second volume of Mai's Nona Collectio, Rome, 1827.—IV. The author of a Greek poem in 1186 hexameters, entitled Τῆς Οἰκουμένης Περιήγησις, "A Description of the Habitable World." It is not clearly ascertained where he was born. The probability is, however, that he was a native of Charax, in Susiana. It is uncertain, also, when he flourished; he belonged, however, according to the general opinion, to the latter part of the third or the beginning to the fourth century A.D. He derived from his poem the surname of Periegetes. This production of his has little merit as a work of imagination, and but feeble interest for the geographer. The commentary, however, of Eustathius upon it possesses some value from the miscellaneous information which is scattered throughout. There are two Latin translations of the poem, one by Rufus Festus Avenius, and the other by Priscian. The last and best edition of the Periegesis is that of Bernhardt, Lips., 1828, 8vo, in the first volume of his Geographi Græci Minores. (Schöll, Hist. Lit. Gr., vol. 4, p. 59.)—V. A Christian writer, called Areopagita, from his having been a member of the court of Areopagus at Athens. He was converted to Christianity by St. Paul's preaching. (Acts, 17, 34.) He is reported to have been the first bishop of Athens, being appointed to that office by the apostle Paul, and to have suffered martyrdom under Domitian. During the night of learning, a great number of writings were circulated under his name, which were collected together and printed at Cologne in 1536, and subsequently at Antwerp in 1634, and at Paris in 1646, 2 vols. fol. They have now, for a long time, been deemed spurious, although the learned differ in respect to the times and authors of the fabrication. The most probable reasoning, however, fixes them at the end of the fifth century. (Suid.—Cave, Hist. Lit.—Lardner's Creed, pt. 2.)—VI. Surnamed Exiguus, or the Little, on account of the smallness of his stature, was a Scythian monk of the sixth century, who became an abbot at Rome. Cassiodorus, who was his intimate friend, speaks highly of his learning and character. At the request of Stephen, bishop of Salona, he drew up a body of canons, entitled "Collectio, sive Codex Canonum Ecclesiasticorum," &c., translated from the Greek, containing the first 50 apostolical canons, as they are called, with those of the councils of Nice, Constantinople, Chalcedon, Sardis, and including 138 canons of certain African councils. He afterward drew up a collection of the decretals, and both are to be found in the Bibliotheca Juris Canonici Veteris of Justell. To this Dionysius some writers ascribe the mode of computing the time of Easter, attributed to Victorinus, and of dating from the birth of Christ. (Cave's Hist. Lit.—Hutton's Math. Diet.)—VII. A Greek poet and musician, the author of the words and music of three hymns, addressed to Calliope, Apollo, and Nemesis. They were published by Vincent Galilei, at Florence, in 1581; and again by Dr. Fell, at Oxford, in 1672, from a manuscript found among the papers of Archbishop Usher. It appears by these notes, that the music of the hymns in question was in the Lydian mode and diatonic genus. Galilei asserts that he had them from a Florentine gentleman, who copied them from an ancient Greek manuscript in the library of Cardinal St. Angelo at Rome, which manuscript also contained the treatises on music by Aristides, Quintilianus, and Bryennius, since published by Meibomius and Dr. Wallis. The Florentine and Oxford editions of these hymns exactly agree; and they have since also been printed in the fifth volume of the French Memoirs of the Academy of Inscriptions, &c. (Burney's History of Music.)

DIOPHANTUS, a mathematician of Alexandria, who, according to the most received opinion, was contemporary with the Emperor Julian. This opinion is founded upon a passage of Abulpharadge, an Arabian author of the thirteenth century: he names, among the contemporaries of the Emperor Julian, Diophantes (for Diophantus), as the author of a celebrated work on algebra and arithmetic; and he is thought to have derived his information from an Arabic commentator on Diophantus, Muhammed al Buziani, who flourished about the end of the eleventh century. The passage of Abulpharadge, in the translation of Pococke, is as follows: "Ex istis etiam Diophantes, cujus liber A, B, quem Algebram vocant, celebris est." According to Ideler, however (in a communication to Schulz), the Arabic text, when rendered into Latin, runs as follows. "Cujus liber Ab-kismet de Algebra et Almokabala celebris est." The two words Al-dgebr and Almokabala, designate with the Arabians what we call algebra. The term Kismet means "division," but Ab-Kismet is unintelligible: it may, perhaps, be the Greek word for arithmetic (Ἀριθμητική), in a corrupt and mutilated state. Some critics, who attach no great weight to this testimony of the Arabian writer just referred to, declare that there is no reason whatever for fixing any precise period between B.C. 200 and A.D. 400. Diophantus is certainly later than the first of these dates, since he cites Hypatia; he is anterior to the year 400 of our era, since, according to Suidas, the celebrated Hypatia, who perished A.D. 415, commented upon his writings. The reputation of Diophantus was so great among the ancients that they ranked him with Pythagoras and Euclid. From his epitaph in the Anthologia, which furnishes a kind of arithmetical problem, the following particulars of his life have been collected: viz., that he was married when thirty-three years old, and had a son five years after; that his son died at the age of forty-two, and that his father did not survive him above four years; whence it appears that Diophantus was eighty-four years old when he died. The problem amounts to this, viz., to find a number such that its sixth, twelfth, and seventh parts, with five, its half, and four, amount to the whole number; which is evidently eighty-four. Diophantus wrote a work entitled Arithmetical Questions, in thirteen books, of which only six remain. It would seem that in the fifteenth, and even at the beginning of the seventeenth, century all the thirteen books still existed. John Müller, known by the name of Regio-montanus, assures us that he saw a complete manuscript of the work; and, according to Bachet de Meziriac, Cardinal Perren also once possessed a complete copy. The arithmetic of Diophantus is not merely important for the study of the history of mathematics, from its making known the state of the exact sciences in the fourth century before the Christian era, but is interesting also to the mathematician himself, from its furnishing him with luminous methods for the resolution of analytical problems. We find in it, moreover, the first traces of that branch of the exact sciences called algebra. It is scarcely to be conceived, however, that, while the cumbrous machinery of common language constituted the sole instrument of investigation, the very curious conclusions which we find in this work could have resulted from the researches of one single mind. To suppose that Diophantus was the author of the analysis which bears his name is so contrary to all analogy with experience and the history of mental phenomena, as to be utterly impossible to admit. Still, if we inquire into the history of this branch of analysis, and ask who were the predecessors to Diophantus, or whether they were Greeks or Hindus, no satisfactory answer can be given. We have also a second work of Diophantus on Polygon Numbers (Περὶ πολυγώνων ἀριθμῶν). He himself cites a third, under the title of Πορίγματα, or Corollaries. The best edition of Diophantus is that of Fermat, Tolos., 1670, fol. It is a republication of that of Meziriac (Paris, 1621, fol.), with additions. A valuable translation of the Arithmetical Questions into German was published by Otto Schulz, Berlin, 1822, 8vo, to which is added Poselger's translation of the work on Polygon numbers. (Schöll, Hist. Lit. Gr., vol. 7, p. 43, seqq.)

DIÖRES, a friend of Æneas, killed by Turnus. He had engaged in the games exhibited by Æneas on his father's tomb in Sicily. (Virg. Æn., 5, 297; 12, 509.)

DIOSCŒRIDES, 1. a disciple of Isocrates, who wrote. 1. A work on the government of Lacedæmon (Πολιτεία Λακεδæμονίων); 2. Commentaries, or Historic Memoirs

(Ἑπομήματα); and, 3. A treatise on the manners in Homer (Οἱ παρ' Ὀμήρῳ νόμοι). Athenæus, who cites the first two of these works, has preserved a long fragment of the last. It treats of the mode in which the Homeric heroes subsisted, and is extremely curious. (Athenæus, Ep. 1, p. 8.—Ed. Scherz, vol. 1, p. 31.)—II. A poet of Alexandria, some of whose epigrams are preserved in the Anthology (ed. Jacobs, vol. 1, p. 224, seqq.).—III. A native of Anazarbus in Cilicia, who lived, according to some, in the time of Antony and Cleopatra, while others place him in the reign of Nero. One circumstance in favour of the latter supposition is, that Pliny, who faithfully mentions the authors whence he borrows, does not once mention Dioscorides, although we find in the work of the former a great number of passages which appear to have been borrowed from the latter. This silence on the one hand, and conformity on the other, prove that Pliny and Dioscorides wrote nearly at the same period, and derived some of their materials from the same sources, particularly from the lost work of Sextus Niger. Dioscorides himself informs us, that, as a military man, he visited many countries. He received the surname of Phacas, from his having on his person a spot resembling a lentil (φακί). Dioscorides is the most celebrated herbalist of antiquity, and for sixteen or seventeen centuries there was nothing known that could be regarded as superior to his work Περὶ Ὑγιᾶς ἱατρικῆς, “On the Materia Medica,” in five books. This is the more surprising, considering the real nature of this famous work. The author introduces no order into the arrangement of his matter, unless by consulting a similarity of sound in the names he gives his plants. Thus, medium was placed with epimedium, althæa cannabina with cannabis, hippophæstum (cniscus stellatus) with hippophæ, and so on. The mere separation of aromatic and gum-bearing trees, esculents and corn-plants, hardly forms an exception to this statement. Of many of his plants no description is given, but they are merely designated by a name. In others the descriptions are comparative, contradictory, or unintelligible. He employs the same word in different senses, and evidently attached no exactness to the terms he made use of. He described the same plant twice under the same name or different names; he was often notoriously careless, and he appears to have been very ready to state too much upon the authority of others. Nevertheless, his writings are extremely interesting, as showing the amount of Materia Medica knowledge in the author's day, and his descriptions are in many cases far from bad: but we must be careful not to look upon them as evidence of the state of botany at the same period; for Dioscorides has no pretensions to be ranked among the botanists of antiquity, considering that the writings of Theophrastus, four centuries earlier, show that botany had even at that time begun to be cultivated as a science distinct from the art of the herbalist.—It was only at last, when the rapidly increasing number of new plants, and the general advance in all branches of physical knowledge, compelled the moderns to admit that the vegetable kingdom might contain more things than were dreamed of by the Anazarbian philosopher, that the authority of Dioscorides ceased to be acknowledged.—Dioscorides, in his preface, criticises the authors who had treated of this subject before him: Iolas of Bithynia, and Heraclides of Tarentum, had neglected plants and metals; Craterus, the botanist (βοτανικός), and Andreas the physician, who had been regarded as the best writers on this subject, had nevertheless omitted many plants or roots; the disciples of Asclepiades, namely, Julius Bassus, Niccratus, Petronius, Sextus Niger, and Diocotus, had described very exactly what all the world knew, but had passed over in silence the sanative virtues of medicaments. He also states, in his preface, that his work is divided into five books. Photius, however, cites as a sixth and seventh book, two small treatises which have come down to us, the one on Alexipharmacs, and the other on Theriacs. The authenticity of these is doubted by critics; and yet not only are these two books found in manuscript, but the whole work is often arranged in a very different manner; being distributed sometimes into five, and at other times into seven, eight, or nine books. The text also has experienced various interpolations, which have in some degree been removed by the diligence and learning of later editors. Among these may be mentioned the synonyms for the names of the plants in the several chapters, which are taken from the ancient Egyptian, Dacian, and Celtic languages. These have been now placed at the end of the work, as they are generally supposed not to have come from the pen of Dioscorides. Many passages, too, have been discovered, which have been added to the text, being taken from authors of a later period, such as Aetius, Oribasius, Constantinus Africanus, or else being translations from Pliny. Many transpositions, too, have been made in the text by copyists and possessors of manuscripts, with a view of introducing into the work an alphabetical arrangement. Besides the Alexipharmacs and Theriacs, there exists another work attributed to Dioscorides, and entitled Περὶ εὐπορίστων ἀπλῶν τε καὶ συνθέτων φαρμάκων, “Of Simple and Compound Medicines which are easy to be prepared.” It is divided into two books: the authenticity of the treatise, however, is extremely doubtful. Finally, we have a work entitled Περὶ φαρμάκων ἐμπειρίας, “Of the Knowledge of Medicines.” It is a species of alphabetical repertory of the works of Dioscorides and Stephen of Athens.—Dr. Alston affirms, that Dioscorides brought the Greek Materia Medica to perfection; or, at least, that it was never much improved afterward. “In him I have counted,” he says, “above 90 minerals, 700 plants, and 168 animal substances, that is, 958 in all.” “Even Galen,” remarks Dr. Adams, “who is so parsimonious of praise, seldom mentions Dioscorides but in terms of high eulogy; and neither Galen nor Aëtius, Oribasius nor Paulus Ægineta, have made any material addition to the list of medical articles described by Dioscorides. The only fault with which his work is at all chargeable, is his attributing, in some instances, too many virtues to one and the same substance; and probably some which one cannot always admit to have been founded upon actual experience. On this ground Dr. Cullen founds a severe charge against the accuracy of our author; but, as the mania for exalting modern literature at the expense of the ancient was then at its height in Edinburgh, the opinion of such a critic ought to be received with considerable allowance, more especially as Cullen is constantly betraying his ignorance of the works which he depreciates.”—The most celebrated MS. of Dioscorides is one at Vienna, illuminated with rude figures. It was sent by Busbecquius, the Austrian ambassador at Constantinople, to Mathioli, who quotes it under the name of the “Cantacuzene Codex,” and it is believed to have been written in the sixth century. Copies of some of the figures were inserted by Dodæus in his Historia Stirpium, and others were engraved in the reign of the Empress Maria Theresa, under the inspection of Jaquin. Two impressions only of these plates have ever been taken off, as the work was not continued. One of them is now in the library of the Linnean Society, the other with Sibthorp's collection at Oxford. They are of little importance, as the figures are of the rudest imaginable description. Another MS., of the ninth century, exists at Paris, and was used by Salmasius: this also is illustrated with figures, and has both Arabic and Coptic names introduced, on which account it is supposed to have been written in Egypt. Besides these, there is at Vienna a MS., believed to be still more ancient than that first mentioned; and three others are preserved at Leyden. The latest and best edition of Dioscorides is that of Sprengel, in the collection of Greek physicians by Kuhn, Lips., 1829, 8vo. The folio edition by Saracenus (Sarassin) Francof., 1598, is also a very good one. Sprengel's edition is improved by a collation of several MSS.—So far as European plants are in question, we may suppose that the means of illustrating Dioscorides are now nearly exhausted; but it is far otherwise with his Indian and Persian plants. Concerning the latter, it is probable that much may be learned from a study of the modern Materia Medica of India. When the Nestorians, in the fifth century, were driven into exile, they sought refuge among the Arabs, with whom they established their celebrated school of medicine, the ramifications of which extended into Persia and India, and laid the foundation of the present medical practice of the natives of those countries. In this way the Greek names of Dioscorides, altered, indeed, and adapted to the genius of the new countries, became introduced into the language of Persia, Arabia, and Hindustan, and have been handed down traditionally to the present day. Thus Dr. Royle has shown, by an examination of this sort of evidence, that the calamus aromaticus of Dioscorides is not a Gentian, as has been imagined; that Nardus Indike is unquestionably the Nardostachys Jatamansi of De Candolle, and that the Lukion Indicon was neither a Rhamnus nor a Lycium, but, as Prosper Alpinus long ago asserted, a Berberis. (Enqye. Us. Knowl., vol. 9, p. 5.—Schöll, Hist. Lit. Gr., vol. 5, p. 331, seqq.)

DIOSCORIDI INSULA (Διοσκορίδου νῆσος, Ptol.), or DIOSCORIDA (Διοσκορίδα, Peripl., p. 17), an island situate at the south of the entrance of the Arabic Gulf, and now called Socotra. The aloes here produced are held in more estimation than those of Hadramaut. The ancient name, observes Vincent (Periplus of the Erythrean Sea, p. 341.—Commerce of the Ancients, vol. 2), may have a Greek origin; but it has so near a name to Socotra or Zocotora, that it is much more likely to be a nautical corruption of an Arabic term, than the application of a Greek one. The island is near a hundred miles long, and thirty at its greatest breadth: it was inhabited only on the northern side in the age of Arrian, and the population there was very scanty, consisting of a mixture of Arabians, Indians, and Greeks, who had resorted hither for the purposes of commerce; while the remainder of the country was marshy and deserted. Marco Polo informs us, that in his time the inhabitants were Christians; and Al Edrissi confirms this, with the addition, that the Greeks were introduced there by Alexander at the request of Aristotle, in hopes of obtaining aloes. Cosmas Indicopleustes, on the other hand, says they were Greeks from Egypt (ed. Montfauc., p. 179).

DIOSCURI (Διοσκουροι), or sons of Jupiter, a name given to Castor and Pollux.

DIOSCURIAS, a maritime town of Colchis, at the mouth of the small river Charus. It was afterward called Sebastopolis, and was, in the earliest ages, the port most frequented in Colchis by distant as well as neighbouring nations, speaking different languages; a circumstance that still distinguishes Iskuriah, which name is only a corruption of the ancient one. (Mannert, Geogr., vol. 4, p. 370.) Arrian makes it to have been established by a colony of Milesians. Pomponius Mela, however, says that it was founded by Castor and Pollux, who made a voyage to Colchis, along with Jason, in the Argonautic expedition. (Mela, 1, 19.)

DIOSPÖLIS I. MAGNA, a famous city of Egypt. (Vid. Thebæ.)—II. Parva, a city of Egypt, west of Tenytira, and on the western side of the Nile. It was the capital of the nome Diospolites. Pococke thought that the site of this place was in the vicinity of the village Hou, a supposition adopted by D'Anville, and also by the scavans of the French expedition. (Mannert, Geogr., vol. 10, pt. 1, p. 376.)—III. A city of Palestine, called also Lydda. It was situate in an extensive plain, and is placed by the Itiner. Hierosol. (p. 60) thirty-two miles northwest of Jerusalem. It was destroyed by the Saracens, who at a later period built, about two geographical miles to the east of its site, the modern city of Ramlat. (Abulfeda, Tab. Syr., p. 79.)

DIREÆ, another name for the Furies. (Vid. Furie.)

DIREÆ, I. wife of Lycus, king of Thebes. She treated Antiope with great cruelty, and was put to death by Amphion and Zethus, Antiope's two sons. They tied her by the hair to a wild bull, and let the animal drag her until she was dead. After death she was changed into a fountain of the same name, near the city of Thebes. (Vid. Antiope.)—II. A fountain near Thebes, in Boeotia, the waters of which emptied into the Ismenus. Near it was the dwelling of Pindar. Sir W. Gell noticed a brook to the west of the Cadmea, by some Turkish tombs, which he considered to be the ancient Dirce. (Cramer's Anc. Greece, vol. 2, p. 230.)

DIS, a name given to Pluto. (Vid. Pluto.)

DIRE or DERE (Δειρή, called by Ptolemy Δερή), a promontory of Africa, over against the coast of Arabia, and at the narrowest part of the Sinus Arabicus, or Red Sea. From its appearance as it stretched along the coast, it received the appellation of Dire (Δειρή) or "the neck." The modern name is said to be Bab-el-Mandeb. According to Mannert, however, Dire is now Ras-bel, and the opposite promontory of Posidium is Bab-el-Mandeb. The city of Dire, or, as it was originally called, Berenice epi-Dires, stood upon a part of the promontory Dire. (Mannert, vol. 10, pt. 1, p. 59, seqq.)

DISCORDIA, a malevolent deity, daughter of Nox, and sister to Nemesis, the Parca, and Death. She was driven from heaven by Jupiter, because she sowed dissensions among the gods, and was the cause of continual quarrels. When the nuptials of Peleus and Thetis were celebrated, the goddess of discord was not invited, and this seeming neglect so irritated her, that she threw into the midst of the festal assembly an apple all of gold, and having on it the inscription, "Let the fairest take me." This apple was the cause of the ruin of Troy, and of infinite misfortunes to the Greeks. (Vid. Paris.) Discord is represented with a pale, ghastly look, her garment is torn, her eyes sparkle with fire, and in her bosom she has a concealed dagger. (Lucian, Dial. Marin., 5.—Virg., Æn., 8, 702.)

DITHYRAMBUS, I. a name of Bacchus. (Eurip., Bacchæ, 526.) According to the old explanation, now deservedly rejected, it stood for διθύραμος, "double-doored," "he who has passed through two doors," as an allusion to the double birth of Bacchus. The quantity of the first syllable is an insuperable objection to this interpretation, and Welcker's answer to it (Nachtrag., p. 192), that this deviation from the quantity of δις arose from the necessities of the trochaic verse, falls to the ground at once, unless it can be shown not only that the metre of the dithyramb itself was trochaic, but also that it was necessary to introduce the name of the poem into the poem itself. (Donaldson, Theatre of the Greeks, p. 17, not., 4th ed.)—II. The earliest species of choral poetry connected with the worship of Bacchus. The inventor of this species of hymn was as little known as the meaning of the name. It is attributed by Herodotus to Arion (1, 23); by others to Lasus (Schol. ad Aristoph., Vesp., 1450.—Suid., s. v. Λάσος); and Archilochus, who lived long before either of them, mentions it by name. (Archil., frag., 38, ed. Liebel.) It was danced by a chorus of fifty men or boys around a blazing altar (Schol. ad Pind., Olymp., 13, 26.—Simonid., Epigr., 76); and hence it was also called the Cyclic chorus. The subjects were generally the birth of Bacchus, and his misfortunes. Indeed, unless we misunderstand

Plato's words (Leg., 3, p. 700, b, Διόνυσον γένεσσις . . . διθύραμβος λεγόμενος), the name of the song expressed as much. It was originally distinguished by a disorderly and enthusiastic wildness of tone, which, in the end, degenerated into turgidity and bombast. The music was Phrygian (therefore stirring and rapid), and the pipe its original accompaniment. From the more solemn festivities and systematic wildness of the dithyramb sprang tragedy; just as comedy came from the Phallic song.—Blomfield supposes an etymological connexion between the words ἱαμβος, θρίαμβος, and διθύραμβος, and thinks they are corruptions of Egyptian terms. (Mus. Crit., vol. 2, p. 70.) It is more probable, however, that θρίαμβος and διθύραμβος came with the worship of Bacchus from India, and that Dithyrambus was not, as many think, the name of the god after it became the name of the song, but the reverse. Donaldson, however, opposes this last-mentioned supposition, and attempts also to give a new derivation to the term itself, but with little, if any success. (Theatre of the Greeks, p. 18, not., 4th ed.)

ΔΙΝΙΤΙΛΕΥΣ, a leading nobleman of the Ædoui, who possessed great influence with Cæsar in consequence of his fidelity and attachment to the Romans. (Cæs., B. G., 1, 3.—Id. ib., 1, 41, &c.)

Dium, one of the principal cities of Macedonia, and not unfrequently the residence of its monarchs. It was situate, according to Livy (44, 6 and 7), at the foot of Mount Olympus, which leaves but the space of one mile from the sea; and half of this is occupied by marshes formed by the mouth of the river Baphyrus. Thucydides (4, 78) says it was the first Macedonian town which Brasidas entered on his march from Thessaly. This place suffered considerably during the Social war from an incursion of the Ætolians under their prætor Scopas, who levelled to the ground the walls, houses, and gymnasium, destroying the porches around the temple of Jupiter, an edifice of great celebrity, with the offerings and everything used in the festivals. (Polyb., 4, 62.) It is evident, however, from Livy's account, that this damage had been repaired when the Romans occupied the town in the reign of Perseus. It was here that Philip assembled his army previous to the battle of Cynoscephale. (Liv., 33, 3.) Dium, at a later period, became a Roman colony. (Ptol., p. 82.) Pliny terms it Colonia Diensis (4, 10). Some similarity in the name of this once flourishing city is apparent in that of a spot called Staudia, which answers to Livy's description. Dr. Clarke, however, was not disposed to acquiesce in this opinion, and thought that it must have stood at Katerina. (Travels—Greece, Egypt, &c., vol. 7, p. 400, seqq.) He was most probably mistaken, as Katerina, or Hateri, which is the real name of the place, is doubtless the Hatera of the Tabula Theodosiana, one stage from Dium. (Cramer's Ancient Greece, vol. 1, p. 208.)

ΔΙΒΟΔΟΥΡΟΝ, the capital of the Mediomatici, a people of Belgic Gaul, who were located along the Mosella or Moselle. Its name was afterward changed to that of the people itself, and is now Metz. (Tacit., Hist., 1, 63.—Amm. Marcell., 15, 27.)

ΔΟΔΩΝΑ, I. a celebrated city and oracle of Epirus, situate most probably in the present valley of Joannina, but the exact position of which has never been ascertained. We are not assisted here by any accurate ancient traveller like Pausanias, nor have we any itineraries or faithful measurements of distances to guide us; all is vague and indefinite; and, even after a most careful comparison of all the various passages in which the name occurs, very different opinions may be entertained on the subject. Dionysius of Halicarnassus places it four days' journey from Butthrotum, and two from Ambracia. (Antiq. Rom., 1, 5.) Colonel Leake makes it to have been situate at the southeastern extremity of the Lake of Joannina, near Kastritza (Trav- els in Northern Greece, vol. 4, p. 168, seqq.), and there are many reasons for believing that the Dodonean territory corresponded to the valley at the south of that sheet of water. It is true there is no mention of a lake in the neighbourhood of the ancient Dodona, but the place is described as surrounded by marshes, and it is not unlikely that the Lake of Joannina may have been increased in later times from the Katavothras in the country. (Leake, vol. 4, p. 189.) It is universally allowed, that the temple of Dodona owed its origin to the Pelasgi at a period much anterior to the Trojan war; since many writers represent it as existing in the time of Deucalion, and even of Inachus. (Æsch., Prom. Vinct., v. 679.—Dion. Hal., Ant. Rom., 1, 14.) Herodotus distinctly states, that it was the most ancient oracle of Greece, and represents the Pelasgi as consulting it on various occasions (2, 52). Hence the title of Pelagic assigned to Jupiter, to whom the temple was dedicated. (Ζεύ ἄνα, Δωδωναιε, Πελασγικέ.—Iliad, 16, 233.—Compare Hesiod, ap. Strab., 7, 327.) Of the existence, however, of another oracle in Thessaly of the same name (vid. No. II.), no doubt can be entertained; and to this the prayer of Achilles, in Homer, probably had reference.—Setting aside the fables which Herodotus has transmitted to us respecting Dodona and its doves, to which he evidently attached no belief, his report of the affinity which existed between the service of this temple and that of Thebes in Egypt is deserving of our attention. It appears from this author, that in his time the service of the temple was performed by females; and he has recorded the names of the three priestesses who officiated when he visited Dodona (2, 55). Strabo, however, asserts, that these duties were originally allotted to men, from the circumstance of Homer's mention of the Selli as being attendant upon the gods. The term Selli was considered by many ancient writers to refer to a people of Pelagic origin, whom they identified with the Helli (Soph., Trach., v. 1160, seqq.—Strabo, 327.—Eustath., ad Il., 16, v. 233.—Schol. ad Hom., l. c.—Aristot., Meteorol., 1, 14.—Hesych., s. v. Ἑλλοι), and also with the Tomuri. (Eustath., ad Od., 16, 403.) The origin of the word Dodona seems not to have been ascertained, if we judge from the contradictory opinions transmitted to us by Steph. Byz. (s. v. Δωδώνη.—Compare remarks under No. II.) Nor are we better informed as to the nature and construction of the temple during the early age of Grecian history. The responses of the oracle were originally delivered from the sacred oak or beech. (Soph., Trach., v. 173.—Hesiod, ap. Schol. in Soph., Trachin.) Its reputation was at first confined to the inhabitants of Epirus, Acarnania, Ætolia, and the western parts of Greece (Pausan., 7, 21), but its fame was afterward extended over the whole of that country, and even to Asia, as we know that on one occasion the oracle was consulted by Cresus. (Herod., 1, 46.) The Ætoliens were the only people who received the prophetic answers from the mouth of men; to all other nations they were always communicated by the priestesses of the temple. The reason of this exception is stated at length by Strabo (401), on the authority of Ephorus. (Compare Procl., Chrestom., ap. Phot., Bibl., vol. 2, p. 321, ed. Bekker.) Dodona was the first station in Greece to which the offerings of the Hyperboreans were despatched, according to Herodotus; they arrived there from the Adriatic, and were thence passed on to the Malic Gulf (4, 33). Among the several offerings presented to the temple by various nations, one dedicated by the Coryceans is particularly noticed. It was a brazen figure placed over a caldron of the same metal; this statue held in its hand a whip, the lash of which consisted of three chains, each having an astragalus fastened to the end of it; these, when agitated by the wind, struck the caldron, and produced so continued a sound that 400 vibrations could be counted before it ceased. Hence arose the various proverbs of the Dodonian caldron and the Coreyean lash. (Strabo, Compend., 7, p. 329.) Menander, in one of his plays, compared an old nurse's chatter to the endless sound of this kettle. (Menand., Reliq., ed. Meinecke, p. 27.) It was said by others, that the walls of the temple were composed of many caldrons, contiguous to each other, so that, striking upon one, the sound was conveyed to all the rest. But this account is not so much to be depended on as the other, which, according to Steph. Byz., rests on the authority of Polemio Periegetes, who seems to have written a very accurate description of the curiosities of the place; as also another person named Aristides.—We hear of the oracle of Dodona at the time of the Persian invasion (Herodot., 9, 93), and again in the reign of Agesilaus, who consulted it previously to his expedition into Asia. (Plut., Apophthegm. Lacon., p. 125.) It is stated by Diodorus Siculus (14, 13), that Lysander was accused openly of having offered to bribe the priestess. The oracle which warned the Molossian Alexander of his fate is well known from Livy (8, 24). From Demosthenes we learn, that the answers delivered from time to time to the Athenians were laid up in the public archives; and he himself appeals to their testimony on more than one occasion. At length, during the Social war, Dodona was, according to Polybius (4, 67), almost entirely destroyed in an irruption of the Ætolians, under their prætor Dorimachus, then at war with Epirus. "They set fire," says the historian, "to the porches, destroyed many of the offerings, and pulled down the sacred edifice." It is probable that the temple of Dodona never recovered from this disaster, as in Strabo's time there was scarcely any trace left of the oracle; but the town must still have existed, as it is mentioned by Hierocles among the cities of Epirus in the seventh century; and we hear of a bishop of Dodona in the council of Ephesus. (Wesscl., ad Hierocl., Synecd., p. 651.)—All accounts seem to agree that Dodona stood either on the declivity or at the foot of an elevated mountain called Tomarus or Tamarus. (Strabo, 328.) Hence the term Tomuri, supposed to be a contraction for Tomaruri (Τομαρῦροι), or guardians of Tomarus, which was given to the priests of the temple. (Strabo, l. c.) In Callimachus (Hymn. in Cer., 52) we find the name of the mountain written Tmarus (Τμάρος). This lofty mountain was farther remarkable for the number of streams which burst from its sides. (Plin., 4, 1.) If, then, we had the means of distinguishing the modern chain which answers to the ancient Tomarus, we might easily discover the site of Dodona, but the whole of Epirus being covered with lofty mountains, it is not easy to ascertain even this point.—(For discussions on this interesting question, consult Cramer's Anc. Greece, vol. 1, p. 115, seqq.—Wordsworth's Greece, p. 247.—Walpole's Collection, vol. 2, p. 473.—Hughes's Travels, vol. 1, p. 511.)—II. A city and oracle of Thessaly. It has given rise to much controversy whether Homer (Il., 2, 749) refers to this or the city of Epirus, and the scholars and commentators are divided in their opinions. Stephanus Byzantinus (s. v. Δωδώνη) enters fully into the discussion, and quotes passages from several writers on the antiquities of Thessaly, who all acknowledged a city named Dodona or Bodona in that country; whence the opinion has been entertained that the oracle of Jupiter was afterward transferred to Epirus. Strabo (441) seems to adopt this notion, and affirms, in one place, that the Thessalian Dodona was situated near the Titaresius. Elsewhere, however, he leads us to suppose that it stood near Scotussa, at the foot of Mount Ossa (9, p. 441). Ritter has some curious and learned speculations on this subject. According to this writer, the primitive form of the name was Bodona (Βωδώνη), and he traces the founding of Dodona to a sacer-dotal colony from India, and establishes, when taken in connexion with various other parts of early Grecian history, the remarkable fact of the introduction of the Buddha-worship into Greece along with the germs of civilization. The analogy between the root of the name Βωδώνη (Bōd), and that of the Hindu Buddha (Bud), is sufficiently obvious. Ritter's work, however (Vorhalle Europäischer Völkergeschichten vor Herodotus, um den Kaukasus und an den Gestaden des Pontus, Berlin, 1820, 8vo), ought to be carefully perused in order to do justice to his learned and elaborate arguments. His object is to show, that the stream of civilization and religion flowed into the countries of Europe from the remote India, by pursuing a route through the vast regions of Scythia, and coming down into Europe by the shores of the Euxine.

DODONÆUS, a surname of Jupiter from Dodona. (Consult Homer, Il., 16, 233.—Ζεὺς ἄνα, Δωδωναίε, Πελασγικέ.—And compare remarks under the article Dodona.)

DODONIDES, the priestesses who gave oracles in the temple of Jupiter at Dodona. (Vid. Dodona.)

DOLABELLA, P. Cornelius, a Roman who married Tullia, the daughter of Cicero. His early profligacies and extravagances led him to join Cæsar at the beginning of his rebellion, as the natural patron of men of broken fortunes. He afterward fought under him at Pharsalia, distinguished himself by his revolutionary proceedings when tribune during Cæsar's absence in Egypt, and afterward went with him into Africa, and served under him through the whole of that campaign. On his return to Italy after Cæsar's final victory, he appears to have lived in a style of great magnificence and the excellence of his entertainments is recorded by Cicero, who, through him and one or two other friends maintained a friendly intercourse with the dominant party. He was nominated by Cæsar for the consulship a short time before the assassination of the latter, and, after Cæsar's death, assumed the office of consul himself, but went over to the side of the republic, and acted vigorously in its behalf. Subsequently, however, Antony drew him entirely away from the republican party by paying off for him a heavy load of debts. Leaving Rome in order to get possession of Syria against Cassius, he surprised Smyrnia and put Trebonius to death, on which the senate declared him a public enemy. Having been pursued and defeated by Cassius, he destroyed himself.—Dolabella was a man of no virtue or principle. Cicero was compelled to have his daughter Tullia divorced from him. Still, however, the orator always kept up a fair intercourse with him, and endeavoured to use him as a check upon the designs of Antony, his colleague in the consulship. (Cic., Phil., 2, 30.—Id., Ep. ad Fam., 9, 16.—Middleton, Life of Cicero, vol. 2, p. 206, 224, 290, 343, &c., 8vo ed.)

DOLICHA, I. a town of Thessaly, in the Perthæbian district, to the southeast of Azorus. Here the consul Q. Marcius Philippus received a deputation from the Achæan league, at the head of which was Polybius, who accompanied the Roman army in their singular and perilous march through the defiles of Olympus into Pieria. (Polyb., Excerpt., 28, 11.—Liv., 42, 53.—Id., 44, 2.)—II. A town of Syria, situate in the district Euphratensis, and northwest of Zeugma. The ancient name is preserved in that of Doluc, a castle on a chain of mountains, which, detached from Amanus, are prolonged towards the Euphrates. (Abulfeda, Tab. Syr., p. 122.—Mannert, Geogr., vol. 6, pt. 1, p. 496.)

DOLON, a Trojan, the only son of the herald Eumenes, famed for swiftness of foot. When Hector was anxious to explore by night the Grecian camp Dolon, induced by the promised reward of the chari and horses of Achilles, undertook the enterprise. On his approach to the Grecian tents, he was met by Diomedes and Ulysses, who, on the part of the Greeks, had been despatched on a similar expedition. Dolon, having betrayed to them the situation and plans of the Trojans, was put to death by Diomedes for his treachery. (Hom., Il., 10, 314.—Virg., Æn., 12, 349.)

DOLONCI, a people of Thrace. (Herodot., 6, 34.—Id. Miltiades.)

DOLŌPES, a people of Thessaly, who appear to have been early established in that southeastern angle of Thessaly formed by the chain of Pindus, or rather Tymphrestus, on one side, and Mount Othrys, branching out of it, on the other. By the latter mountain they were separated from the Ænantes, who were in possession of the upper valley of the Sperchius; while to the west they bordered upon Phthiotis, with the inhabitants of which country they were connected as early as the siege of Troy. This we learn from Homer, who represents Phoenix, the Dolopian leader, as accompanying Achilles thither in the double capacity of preceptor and ally. (Il., 9, 480.—Pind., ap. Strab., 431.) The Dolopians, according to Pausanias and Harpocration, sent deputies to the Amphictyonic council. From Herodotus we learn, that they presented earth and water to Xerxes, and furnished some troops for the expedition undertaken by that monarch into Greece (7, 132 and 185). Xenophon, at a later period, enumerates them as subjects of Jason, tyrant of Phœre. (Hist. Gr., 6, 1.) Diodorus Siculus informs us that they took part in the Lamiac war (18, 11). We afterward find Dolopia a frequent subject of contention between the Ætolians, who had extended their dominion to the borders of this district, and the kings of Macedonia. Hence the frequent incursions made by the former people into this part of Thessaly when at war with the latter power. (Liv., 31, 12.—Id., 33, 34.—Id., 36, 38.) Dolopia was finally conquered by Perseus, the last Macedonian monarch. The cantons of Thaumako, Gritunio, and part of Agrapha, may be supposed to occupy the situation ascribed by ancient writers to the country of the Dolopians. (Cramer's Anc. Greece, vol. 1, p. 416.)

DOMITIA LEX, de Sacerdotiis, brought forward by Cn. Domitius Ahenobarbus, tribune of the commons, A.U.C. 650. It enacted that the pontifices, augures, and decemviri sacris faciendis should not be chosen by the sacerdotal colleges, but by the people. The pontifex maximus and curio maximus were always, in the first ages of the republic, chosen by the people. (Cic., Kull., 2, 7.—Liv., 25, 5.—Id., 27, 8.)

DOMITIA GENs, a celebrated plebeian family, divided into two branches, that of the Calvini and that of the Ahenobarbi. The Calvini attained to the consular office A.U.C. 422, the Ahenobarbi in 562. The latter, at length, in the person of Nero, became invested with imperial power; but with this emperor perished the male line of the Domitii. Domitian only belonged to this family through his mother Domitia.

DOMITIA, I. Lepida, aunt of Nero, was accused of magic and put to death (A.D. 54) through the intrigues of Agrippina, who was jealous of her influence over Nero. (Tacit., Ann., 12, 64, seq.)—II., or Domitilla, wife of Vespasian, by whom he had Titus and Domitian, and a daughter named Domitilla. She had been the mistress of a Roman knight, and passed for a freed woman; but she was declared of free birth on having been acknowledged by her father Flavius Liberalis, who held the situation of scribe to one of the quæstors. She died before Vespasian came to the throne. (Sueton., Vit. Vespas., 3.)—III. Longina, daughter of the famous Corbulo, the general of Nero. She married Ælius Iamnia, but was seduced by Domitian, and, after the birth of a daughter, publicly raised to the throne. Hardly, however, had the emperor elevated her to the station of Augusta, when his jealousy was alarmed by certain familiarities to which she admitted the pantomime Paris, and he drove her from his bed and palace.

The ascendancy which she had acquired, however, over the vicious emperor, was too strong to be thus suddenly dissolved, and she was recalled to her former station. Domitia was concerned, it is thought, in the conspiracy by which the emperor lost his life. She died during the reign of Trajan. (Sueton., Vit. Domit., 3.)

DOMITIÂNUS, TITUS FLAVIUS, the second son of Vespasian, born at Rome A.D. 51. Vespasian, well aware of his natural disposition, reposed no confidence in him during his whole reign. Domitian, however, accompanied his father and brother Titus in their triumph at the close of the Jewish war. Upon the death of Vespasian, he endeavoured to foment troubles in the empire, and share the succession with Titus. The latter, however, generously forgave him, treated him with great kindness, and made him his colleague in the consulship, always declaring to him that he intended him for his successor. Domitian is accused of hastening the death of Titus by poison; a charge, however, not warranted by the circumstances of Titus's death. The beginning of his reign was marked by moderation and a display of justice bordering upon severity. He affected great zeal for the reformation of public morals, and punished with death several persons guilty of adultery, as well as some vestals who had broken their vows. He completed several splendid buildings begun by Titus; among others, an odeum, or theatre for musical performances. The most important event of his reign was the conquest of Britain by Agricola; but Domitian grew jealous of that great commander's reputation, and recalled him to Rome. His suspicious temper and his pusillanimity made him afraid of every man who was distinguished either by birth and connexions, or by merit and popularity, and he mercilessly sacrificed many to his fears, while his avarice led him to put to death a number of wealthy persons for the sake of their property. The usual pretext for these murders was the charge of conspiracy or treason; and thus a numerous race of informers was created and maintained by this system of spoliation. His cruelty was united to a deep dissimulation, and in this particular he resembled Tiberius rather than Caligula or Nero. He either put to death or drove away from Rome the philosophers and men of letters; Epictetus was one of the exiled. He found, however, some flatterers among the poets, such as Martial, Silius Italicus, and Statius. The latter dedicated to him his Thebais and Achilleis, and commemorated the events of his reign in his Sylvee. But, in reality, the reign of Domitian was any other than favourable to the Roman arms, except in Britain. In Mæsia and Dacia, in Germany and Pannonia, the armies were defeated, and whole provinces lost. (Tacitus, Vit. Agric., 41.) Domitian himself went twice into Mæsia to oppose the Dacians, but, after several defeats, he concluded a disgraceful peace with their king Decebalus, whom he acknowledged as sovereign, and to whom he agreed to pay tribute, which was afterward discontinued by Trajan. And yet Domitian made a pompous report of his victories to the senate, and assumed the honours of a triumph. In the same manner he triumphed over the Cotti and Sarmatians, which made Pliny the younger say, that the triumphs of Domitian were always evidence of some advantages gained by the enemies of Rome. In A.D. 95, Domitian assumed the consulship for the seventeenth time, together with Flavius Clemens, who had married Domitilla, a relative of the emperor. In that year a persecution of the Christians is recorded in the history of the Church; but it seems that it was not directed particularly against them, but against the Jews, with whom the Christians were then confounded by the Romans. Suetonius ascribes the proscriptions of the Jews, or those who lived after the manner of the Jews, and whom he styles "improfecti," to the rapacity of Domitian. Flavius Clemens and his wife were among the victims. In the following year, A.D. 96, a conspiracy was formed against Domitian among the officers of his guards and several of his intimate friends, and his wife, the infamous Domitilla, herself is said to have participated in it. The immediate cause of it was his increasing suspicions, which threatened the life of every one around him, and which are said to have been stimulated by the predictions of astrologers and soothsayers, whom he was very ready to consult. He was killed in his apartments by several of the conspirators, after struggling with them for some time, in his 45th year, and in the fifteenth of his reign. On the news of his death, the senate assembled and elected M. Cocceius Nerva emperor.—The character of Domitian is represented by all ancient historians in the darkest colours, as being a compound of timidity and cruelty, of dissimulation and arrogance, of self-indulgence and stern severity towards others. He gave himself up to every excess, and plunged into the most degrading vices. Conceiving at last the mad idea of arrogating divine honours to himself, he assumed the titles of Lord and God, and claimed to be a son of Minerva. Soon after he had succeeded to the government, he indulged in that love of solitude, which pride and fear combined to render in a very short time the most confirmed of all his habits. In the beginning of his reign, says his biographer, he accustomed himself to spend several hours every day in the strictest privacy, employed frequently in nothing else than in catching flies, and piercing them with a sharp instrument. Hence the well-known remark made by Vibius Crispus, who, when asked whether there was any one with the emperor, replied, "No, not even a fly." Domitian took a delight in inspiring others with terror; and Dio Cassius tells of a singular banquet, to which he invited the principal members of the senate and equestrian order, where everything wore the appearance of an intended execution. He once even convened the senate to determine in what way a large turbot should be cooked, whether whole or divided. And yet at one time, before his becoming emperor, Domitian had applied himself to literature, and he is said to have composed several poems and other works.—The senate, after his death, issued a decree that his name should be struck out of the Roman annals, and obliterated from every public monument. (Tacit., Hist., 3, 59, seqq.—Id. ib., 4, 2, seqq.—Sueton., Vit. Domit.—Dio Cass., 67.—Plin., Epist., 4, 11.—Id., Paneg., 52, 6, &c.—Juv., Sat., 4, 37, seqq.)

DOMITILLA. Vid. Domitia II.

DOMITIUS, I. Ahenobarbus, the first of the Domitian family that bore the surname of Ahenobarbus, lived about the beginning of the sixth century after the founding of the city.—II. Cneius Ahenobarbus, son of the preceding, was plebeian ædile A.U.C. 558, B.C. 196; prætor A.U.C. 560; and consul A.U.C. 562. (Liv., 33, 42.—Id., 49, 35, &c.)—III. Cneius Ahenobarbus, was consul B.C. 122. He conquered Bituntius, general of the Arverni, slaying 20,000 and making 3000 prisoners. On his return to Rome he obtained a triumph.—IV. Lucius Ahenobarbus, was quæstor B.C. 66, and prætor some years after. In the year 54 B.C. he attained to the consulship. He and Lentulus were the first to oppose Cæsar in his invasion of Italy. Betrayed by his own troops into the hands of the conqueror at the capture of Corfinium, he received his liberty, and again raising a little army at his own expense, sustained a siege at Massilia. Escaping thence, we find him with Pompey in Macedonia, still the determined enemy of Cæsar, and finally he fell in the fight after the battle of Pharsalia. (Cic., Ep. ad Fam., 8, 14.—Id. ib., 16, 12.—Id., Ep. ad Att., 1, &c.)—V. Cneius Ahenobarbus, son of the preceding, inherited all his father's hatred towards Cæsar. After the death of the latter, he joined the party of Brutus and Cassius. After the battle of Philippi he went over to the triumvirs, was pardoned, and, during the ensuing year, obtained the consulship, A.U.C. 722. Subsequently, however, he attached himself to Octavius against Antony, but died before he could render the former any service.—VI. Cneius Ahenobarbus, father of Nero, married Agrippina, the daughter of Germanicus, B.C. 28. He degraded his high birth by the ferocity of his character and the corruption of his morals. In early life he killed one of his freedmen, who would not drink as much as he wished him to do. He tore out also the eye of a Roman knight who displayed towards him a freedom of spirit that gave offence. Being accused before Claudius of treason, adultery, and other crimes, he only escaped by the death of that emperor. He used to say, that from himself and his wife there could only spring a monster deadly to the human race, a prediction fatally verified in Nero. (Tacit., Ann., 4, 75.—Id. ib., 6, 45, &c.)

DONATUS, ÆLIUS, I. a celebrated grammarian, born in the fourth century of our era, about A.D. 333. He was preceptor to St. Jerome, who speaks with great approbation of his talents, and of the manner in which he explained the comedies of Terence. Independent of his commentaries on Virgil and Terence, Donatus composed a treatise purely elementary, in which he treated of the eight parts of speech individually. This work was highly esteemed, and Diomedes the grammarian entertained so high an opinion of its merits, as subsequently to add it to his own work on Latin grammar. Some, though without the least authority, maintain that the commentaries of Donatus on Virgil and Terence are lost, and that those which at the present day bear his name are spurious. That on Virgil is very unimportant, it is true, and appears worthy neither of the author commented on, nor of the reputation of the grammarian to whom it is ascribed. But the commentary on Terence is extremely valuable. Some writers assign the commentary on Virgil not to Ælius Donatus, but to Claudius Tiberius Donatus. (Compare the remarks of Heyne on the life of Virgil by Donatus, vol. 1, p. 153, in notis.)—II. A bishop of Numidia, in the fourth century. According to some writers, he was the founder of the sect of Donatists, which grew out of a schism produced by the election of a bishop of Carthage. He was deposed and excommunicated in councils held at Rome and at Arles, in the years 313 and 314, but was for some time after supported by a party at home. What farther happened to him is not known.—III. A bishop of Carthage, chosen to that office in 316. He continued and supported the schism produced by his namesake, which led to a persecution under the Emperor Constans, in which the imperial arms finally prevailed, and Donatus died in exile about 355. According to St. Augustin, this prelate maintained an inequality of persons in the Trinity. (Gorton's Biogr. Dict., vol. 1, p. 653.)

DONŪSA, an island in the Icarian Sea, one of the Sporades. It lay southeast of Icaria, and east of Patmos. The marble obtained from this island was green. It is thought to correspond to the modern Rachia. (Compare, as regards this island, the following authorities: Tacit., Ann., 4, 30.—Mela, 2, 7.—Plin., 4, 12.—Steph. Byz., s. v. Δονουσία.)

DÖRES, the inhabitants of Doris. (Vid. Doris.)

DORIAS, a river of India extra Gangem. Marnett makes it correspond to the small river Pegu. (Geograph., vol. 5, pt. 1, p. 249 and 264.) Others, however, are in favour of the modern Zangan, the mouth of which is in the kingdom of Tonquin.

DORTON, a town of Messenia, where Thamyras the musician challenged the Muses to a trial of skill. Pausanias (4 33) notices this ancient town, of which he saw the ruins near a fountain named Achaia. Strabo, however, asserts that no such place was known to exist in his day, but that some identified it with an obscure town named Oluris, in the Messenian district of Aulon (350). This may have been the spot alluded to by Pausanias. Homer (Il., 2, 594) assigns Dorium to the dominions of Nestor. Hesiod seems to have adopted a different tradition from other poets, since he removes the scene of the story of Thamyras to Dotium in Thessaly (ap. Steph. Byz., s. v. Δωτιον.—Plin., 4, 5).

DORIS, a country of Greece, situate to the south of Thessaly, and separated from it by the range of Mount Ceta. On the south it had the Locri Ozolæ. On the east it was parted from the Locri Epineimidi by the Pindus, a branch of the Cephissus; and on the west from Ætolia by a part of the chain of Ceta. Its territory was of small size, extending only about 40 miles in length. The country, though mountainous, had still several beautiful plains, and was very fruitful.—The Dorians were the most powerful of the Hellenic tribes, and derived their origin, as they pretended, from a mythic personage named Dorus, who is generally made the son of Hellen, though he is described as the son of Xuthus by Euripides (Ion., 1590). Herodotus (1, 52) mentions five successive migrations of this race. Their first settlement was in Phthiotis, in the time of Deucalion; the next under Dorus, in Hestiatotis, at the foot of Ossa and Olympus; the third on Mount Pindus, after they had been expelled by the Cadmæans from Hestiatotis. In this settlement, says Herodotus, they were called the Macedonian people; and he elsewhere (8, 43) attributes to the Dorians a Macedonian origin; but there does not appear to be any real connexion between the Dorians and the Macedonians, who were of Illyrian origin (Müller, Dorians, vol. 1, p. 2), beyond this vicinity of abode. The fourth settlement of the Dorians, according to Herodotus, was in Dryopis (afterward called the Doric Tetrapolis); and their last migration was to the Peloponnesus. Another, and most remarkable expedition, not mentioned by Herodotus, was the voyage of a Dorian colony to Crete, which is stated to have taken place while they were in their second settlement, at the foot of Olympus (Androm., ap. Strab., 475); and Dorians are mentioned among the inhabitants of that island even by Homer (Od., 19, 174). The eastern coast was the first part which they occupied. (Staphylus, ap. Strab., 475). This early settlement in Crete must not be confounded with the two subsequent expeditions of the Dorians to that island, which took place after they were well settled in the Peloponnesus, the one from Laconia, under the guidance of Pollis and Delphus; the other from Argolis, under Althæmenes. The migration of the Dorians to the Peloponnesus, which is generally called "the return of the descendants of Hercules," is expressly stated to have occurred 80 years after the Trojan war, that is, in B.C. 1104. (Thucyd., 1, 12) The origin and nature of the connexion which subsisted between the Heraclidæ and the Dorians are involved in much obscurity. The Dorians were, from very early times, divided into three tribes, and the epithet "thrice divided" (τριφυλὲς) is applied to them by Homer in the passages referred to above. These three tribes were the Hyllæans, the Dymanes, and the Pamphylians. Now the two latter tribes are said to have been descended from Dymas and Pamphylus, the two sons of Ægimius, a mythical Doric king; and the first claimed a descent from Hyllus, the son of Hercules. An attempt has been made to show that the Hyllæans were of Doric origin, as well as the other two tribes. (Müller, Dorians, 1, chap. 3, sect. 2) It is more natural, however, to infer from the traditions, as well as from the duplicate divinities of the Dorians, that the genuine Dorians were included in the two other tribes, and that the Heraclidæ were a powerful Achæan family, united with them in a similar manner, but by a stronger tie than the Ætolians under Oxyclus, who are also said to have taken part in this expedition. The Heraclidæ, then, with their Ætolian and Dorian allies, crossed the Corinthian Gulf from Naupactus, invaded and subdued Elis, which was assigned to the Ætolian chieftain; and, bending their steps southward, conquered successively, and with greater or less difficulty, Messenia, Laconia, Argolis, Corinth, and Megaris. In Laconia they were joined by the Cadmæan clan of the Ægidæ, who assisted them in their tedious war with Amyclæ, and afterward took part in the colonies to Thera and Cyrene. This invasion, which so materially affected the destinies of Greece, was very similar in its character to the return of the Israelites to Palestine. The invaders, who, like the descendants of Abraham, brought their wives and children with them, though they, perhaps, did not completely abandon their last settlement, which was still called and considered Dorian (Thucyd., 1, 107), numbered about 20,000 fighting men, on the highest estimate. (Müller, Dorians, 1, ch. 4, sect. 8.) They were therefore very inferior in number to the inhabitants of the countries which they conquered; but the superiority of their peculiar tactics ensured them an easy victory in the field, and they appear to have taken all the strong places either by a long blockade, or by some lucky surprise; for they were altogether unskilled in the art of taking walled towns. The government which the Dorians established in all the countries which they thus invaded and conquered, was, as might have been expected, very analogous to that which the Norman invasion introduced into England, namely, an aristocracy of conquest; for while the successful invaders remained on a footing of equality among themselves, all the old inhabitants of the country were reduced to an inferior condition, like the Saxons in England. They were called περιόικοι, or "dwellers around," a name corresponding to the Pfahlbürger, or "citizens of the Palisade," at Augsburg, who dwelt in the city suburbs, without the wall of the city; to the "pale" in Ireland before the time of James I.; to the people of the contado in Italy; and to the Fauxbourgeois in France. (Niebuhr, Roman Hist., vol. 1, p. 398, Camb. trans.—Arnold's Thucydides, vol. 1, p. 626.) The usual name for a constitution in a Dorian state was "an order," or regulative principle (κόσμος), and this name appears to have arisen from the circumstance that the attention of the Dorian legislators was principally, if not solely, directed to the establishment of a system of military discipline, and to the encouragement of that strict subordination which is the result of it. The necessity of this was apparent, from the peculiar relation subsisting between the Dorians and their περιόικοι. It was by superior prowess and discipline that the former had acquired their rank, and it was only by a continuance of this superiority that they could hope to maintain themselves in the same position. The same occasion for strict discipline may also account for the extraordinary austerity which prevailed in most Dorian communities. The Dorian women enjoyed a degree of consideration unusual among the Greeks. The Syssitia or common tables, which were established in most Doric states, were designed to admonish those of the privileged class, that, living as they did in the midst of a conquered but numerous population, they must not consider themselves to have any individual existence, but must live only for the sake of their order. (Consult Müller's Dorians, Eng. trans., Oxford, 1830, 2 vols. 8vo.—Hermann, Lehrbuch der Griechischen Staatsalterthümer, Heideb., 1836, translated Oxford, 1836.—Lachmann, Spartanische Staatsverfassung, Breslau, 1836.—Encycl. Us. Knowl., vol. 9, p. 89.)—II. A colony of the Dorians in Asia Minor, on the coast of Caria. On the arrival of the Dorians in Asia, they formed themselves into six independent states or small republics, which were confined within the bounds of as many cities

These were Lindus, Ialysus, Camirus, Cos, Cnidus, and Halicarnassus. Other cities in the tract, called from them Doris, belonged to their confederacy; but the inhabitants of these six alone, as true and genuine Dorians, were admitted into the temple at Triope, where they exhibited solemn games in honour of Apollo Triopius. The prizes were tripods of brass, which the victors were obliged to consecrate to Apollo, and leave in the temple. When Agasicles of Halicarnassus won the prize, he transgressed this custom, and carried the tripod to his own house, on which account the city of Halicarnassus was ever afterward excluded from the Dorian confederacy. The Dorians were from that time known by the name of the five cities, or Pentapolis, and no longer by that of Hexapolis.—III. A goddess of the sea, daughter of Oceanus and Tethys. She married her brother Nereus, by whom she had 50 daughters called Nereides. Her name is often used to express the sea itself. (Propert., 1, 17, 25.—Virg., Ecl., 10.—Hesiod., Theog.)—IV. A female of Locri, in Italy, daughter of Xenetus, whom Dionysius the Elder, of Sicily, married the same day with Aristomache. (Vid. Dionysius.)

DORISCUS, a plain in Thrace, near the mouth of the Hebrus, where, according to Herodotus (7, 59), Xerxes numbered his land forces, as he was marching upon Greece. The mode in which his officers ascertained the amount of his troops was this: they drew up in one place a body of 10,000 men; and making these stand together as compactly as possible, they traced a circle around them. Dismissing these, they enclosed the circle with a wall breast high; into this they introduced the army by bodies of 10,000 men each time. (Vid. Xerxes.)

DORSENNUS, or more correctly Dossennus, a Roman comic poet, and writer of Atellane fables, who enjoyed no mean reputation as a popular dramatist. (Compare Vossius, de Poet. Lat. incert. et., c. 7, p. 84.) Horace makes mention of him (Ep., 1, 2, 173.) He particularly excelled in drawing the characters of parasites; but, in consequence of the applause which these elicited from the lower orders, he would seem, from the censure of Horace, to have been tempted to go still farther, and push matters to extremes. The same poet also pleasantly alludes to his carelessness and negligence as a writer, by saying that he traversed the stage with his sock, or comic slipper, loose and untied. Seneca makes mention of the inscription on his tomb; from which epitaph some have inferred that he was distinguished as a moral writer. It ran as follows: "Hospes resistit, et sophilam Dossenni lege." (Senec., Epist., 89, 6.—Fabric., Bibl. Lat., vol. 3, p. 238, seqq.)

DORSO, C. FABIUS, a Roman, who, according to the old legend, when Rome was in the possession of the Gauls, issued from the Capitol, which was then besieged, to go and offer on Mons Quirinalis a stated sacrifice enjoined on the Fabian house. In the Gabinian cincture, and bearing the sacred things in his hands, he descended from the Capitol and passed through the enemy without betraying the least signs of fear. When he had finished his sacrifice, he returned to the Capitol unmolested by the foe, who were astonished at his boldness, and did not obstruct his passage or molest his sacrifice. (Liv., 5, 46.)

DORUS, a son of Hellen. (Vid. Doris.)

DORYLÆUM and DORYLÆUS, a city of Phrygia, now Eski-shehr, at the junction of the Bathys and Thymbris, two branches of the Sangarius, and on the confines of Bithynia. The plain of Dorylæum is often mentioned by the Byzantine historians as the place of assemblage of the armies of the Eastern empire in their wars against the Turks; and it is described by Anna Comnena as being the first extensive plain of Phrygia after crossing the ridges of Mount Olympus, and after passing Leuca. For some remarks on the modern Eski-shehr, consult Walpole's Collection, vol. 2, p. 205.

DŌSŌN, a surname of Antigonus III., because he promised and never performed; δῶσων, in Greek, i. e., about to give; i. e., always promising. (Vid. Antigonus III.)

DRACO, I. a celebrated Athenian legislator, who flourished about the 39th Olympiad, B.C. 621. Suidas tells us that he brought forward his code of laws in this year, and that he was then an old man. Aristotle (Polit., 2, sub fin.) says, that Draco adapted his laws to the existing constitution, and that they contained nothing particular beyond the severity of their penalties. The slightest theft was punished capitally, as well as the most atrocious murder; and Demades remarked of his laws, that they were written with blood, and not with ink. (Plut., Vit. Sol., c. 17.) Draco, however, deserves credit as the first who introduced written laws at Athens, and it is probable that he improved the criminal courts, by his transfer of cases of bloodshed from the archon to the ephetæ (Jul. Polux, 8, 124, seq.), since before his time the archons had a right of settling all cases arbitrarily, and without appeal; a right which they enjoyed in other cases until Solon's time. (Bekker, Anecd. Græc., p. 449, l. 23.) It appears that there were some offences which he did not punish with death; for instance, loss of civil rights was the punishment of attempting to alter one of his laws. (Demosth., c. Aristocr., p. 714, Bekk.) Draco was an archon (Pausan., 9, 36, 8), and, consequently, an Eupatrid; it is not, therefore, to be supposed, that his object was to favour the lower orders, through his code seems to have tended to abridge the power of the nobles. The Athenians, it is said, could not endure the rigour of his laws, and the legislator himself was obliged to withdraw to the island of Ægina. Here he was actually suffocated in the theatre beneath the number of cloaks and garments which the people of the island, according to the usual mode of expressing approbation among the Greeks, showered upon him. He was buried in the theatre. On the legislation of Draco in general, consult Wachsmuth, Hellenische Alterthumsk., 2, 1, p. 239, seqq.—Encycl. Us. Knowl., vol. 9, p. 118.

DRAFCÆ. Vid. Zarangæi.

DRAVUS, a river of Germany, rising in the Norican Alps. (Plin., 3, 25.—Strabo, 314.) It traverses the southern parts of Noricum and Pannonia, running from west to east, and falls into the Danube near the city of Coninacum, or Erdent. It is now the Drave. Ptolemy calls it the Darus. The Greek copyists frequently allowed themselves the license of altering names and adding remarks, which only tended to show their own ignorance. So, in the present instance, they state that this river, which Ptolemy calls Darus, is the same with that named Daris by the barbarians, or the modern Drin. The truth is, Ptolemy means the Dravus, and no other. (Mannert, Geogr., vol. 3, p. 561.)

DREPANUM, I. a town of Sicily, north of Lilybæum, and in the vicinity of Mount Eryx. Here Æneas, according to Virgil, lost his father Anchises. The more correct form of the name is Drepaua (τὰ Δρεπανά). This place was founded in the beginning of the first Punic war by the Carthaginian commander Hamilcar, who removed hither the inhabitants of Eryx, and other places adjacent. (Diod. Sic., 23, 9.) Drepanum and Lilybæum formed the two most important maritime cities held by the Carthaginians in Sicily. Off this place, near the Ægates Islands, was fought the famous naval battle between the Romans commanded by Lutatius Catulus, and the Carthaginians under Hanno. The Romans gained a decisive victory, which put an end to the first Punic war. Drepanum was so called from the curvature of the shore in its vicinity resembling a scythe (δρεπανον). It is now Trapani. (Mannert, Geogr., vol. 9, pt. 2, p. 384, seqq.)—II. A town of Bithynia, on the Sinus Astacenus, called by Constantine the Great, Hellenopolis.—III. A promontory on the Sinus Arabicus, below Arsinoë: it is now Ras-Zafranté.

DRILLO, a river of Illyricum, which falls into the Adriatic at Lissus. This is the largest of the Illyrian streams. Strabo (316) informs us, that it was navigable as far as the country of the Dardani, which is a considerable distance from the sea, as they inhabited the southern part of what is now Servia. This river is formed principally by the junction of two others, the one distinguished in modern geography by the name of the white Drino, which rises in the chain of Mount Bertiscus (Strabon., Chrestom. ap. Geogr. Min., vol. 2, p. 99); the other flows from the south, out of the great lake of Ochrida, the ancient Lychnitis Palus, and unites with the former after a course of nearly sixty miles: this is commonly termed the Black Drino. (Cramer's Ancient Greece, vol. 1, p. 41.)

DROMUS ACHILLIS, a promontory near the mouth of the Borysthenes. (Strabo, 307.—Arrian, Peripl., p. 21.—Peripl. Anonym., p. 8.—Mela, 2, 1.—Plin., 4, 26.) According to the old geographers, Achilles, having entered the Euxine with a hostile fleet, after ravaging the coast, landed on this promontory, and exercised himself and his followers in running and other gymnastic sports. (Mannert, Geogr., vol. 4, p. 234.) It is a low, sandy, and uninhabited neck of land, resembling somewhat a sword in its shape. Strabo evidently exceeds the true measurement, when he states it to be one thousand stadia. Pliny only makes it eighty miles. Its modern name is said to be Kossascharigatsh. (Vid. Leuce.)

DRUENTIVS and DRUENTIA (ὁ Δρουέντιος, Ptol.—ὁ Δρουέντιος, Strabo), a river of Gaul, rising among the Alpes Cottiae, north of Brigantio or Brigantion. It falls into the Rhodanus or Rhone, about three miles below Avenio or Avignon, after a course of one hundred and eighty miles, and is now called the Durance. It is an extremely rapid river, and below the modern town of Sisteron it has been found impracticable to throw a bridge over it. Its inundations are frequent and very destructive. (Strab., 185.—Mannert, Geogr., vol. 2, p. 78.)

DRUIDÆ, the ministers of religion among the ancient Gauls and Britons. Britain, according to Cæsar, was the great school of the Druids, and their chief settlement was in the island called Mona by Tacitus, now Anglesey. The natives of Gaul and Germany, who wished to be thoroughly versed in the mysteries of Druidism, resorted to this island to complete their studies.—Many opinions have been formed respecting the origin of the name. The common derivation is from δρῦς, an oak, either from their inhabiting and teaching in forests, or, as Pliny states, because they never sacrificed but under an oak. But it is hard to imagine how the Druids should come to speak Greek. Some deduce the name from the old British word dru or drew, an oak, whence they take δρῦς to be derived. This last derivation receives considerable support from a passage in Diodorus Siculus (5, 31), who, speaking of the philosophers and priests of Gaul, the same with the Druids, says that they were called Σαρωνίδαί, a term which some of the commentators trace to the old Greek form σάρωνος (ιδος), a hollow oak. Wesseling, however, it must be acknowledged, condemns this reading, and is in favour of receiving into the text the form Δροῦνίδαί, where others read Σαρωνίδαί. Among the many Oriental derivations which have been given, a favourite one is that from the Sanscrit term Druvidh, signifying poor, indigent. In historical conformity with this derivation, it has been urged that, among the Hindus, we may observe in the Sanniassi the professional mendicant, while among the Druids poverty was rather a merit than a disgrace.—The arguments in favour of the Oriental origin of the Druids are deserving of great attention, although too numerous to be here all detailed. Diogenes Laertius and Aristotle class the Druids with the Chaldeans, Persian Magi, and Indians, in which they are followed by other writers. The deities of the Sanscrit school are closely to be traced in the names of the Druidical gods. The importance which the Druids attached to bulls and oxen forms another very striking mark of coincidence. The Druidical mysteries also are said by Davies to have been nearly parallel to the rites of Bhawanee and Eleusis. In the magic rod of the Druids we likewise discern the sacred staff of the Brahmins. Both possessed consecrated beads; both made almost endless lustrations; both wore linen tiaras; and Maurice remarks that the circle, Brahma's symbol, and the crescent, that of Siva, were both Druidical ornaments. So also there was a striking resemblance between the notion entertained by the Druids of a Supreme Being, and that found in the sacred writings of the Hindus.—The Druids formed a distinct caste, possessing the greatest authority, being the learned men and philosophers of the nation, and having also very great authority in the government of the state. Julius Cæsar has left more information concerning them than any other writer. According to him, they performed all public and private sacrifices, explained the doctrines of religion, distributed all kinds of rewards, administered justice at stated times, and determined the punishment which should be inflicted on offenders. Whoever opposed their decisions was excommunicated by them, and was thereby deprived of all share in public worship. They could even pronounce this curse against a whole people; and, in fact, their power had hardly any limits. They appointed the highest officers in all the cities, and these dared not undertake anything without their advice and direction. They were freed from taxes and all public burdens. Instruction in religious and all other kinds of knowledge, the art of war alone excepted, was intrusted entirely to them. They gave oral instruction in the form of verses, which often had a hidden meaning, and which, though amounting to many thousands, were committed to memory by their pupils. According to Cæsar, they believed in the immortality of the soul, and its transmigration through different bodies. They taught, moreover, the nature and motions of the heavenly bodies, the magnitude of the universe and the earth, the nature of things, and the power of the gods. They also practised astrology, magic, and soothsaying. According to Pliny, they were not ignorant of natural philosophy and physic. They had a wonderful reverence for the mistletoe, a parasitical plant, which grows, not from the earth, but on other plants, particularly the oak. This they looked upon as the holiest object in nature. They likewise esteemed the oak sacred. The Druids had a common superior, who was elected by a majority of votes from their own number, and who enjoyed his dignity for life. In their sacrifices, the Druids often immolated human victims. (Cæs., B. G., 6, 13, seqq.—Plin., 16, 44.) Cæsar states that the members of the Gallic nobility might alone enter the order of the Druids. Porphyry, on the other hand (de Abst., 4, 17), makes admission into this priesthood to have been open to all who could obtain the consent of their fellow-citizens. The severity, however, of a long and rigorous novitiate, occupying many years, would operate as an effectual barrier to the admission of many.—As regards the wisdom of which the Druids were the depositaries, it may be remarked, that, among all the early nations of antiquity, a sacerdotal caste of some kind or other appear, by observation of the stars and the phenomena of nature, to have formed for themselves a species of scientific religion, if it may be so termed, which was carefully treasured up by the sacred order, and rendered inaccessible to the people at large. Hence those oral traditions which were always confined to the limits of the sanctuary, and those sacred books which were closed against the profane crowd. Such were, among the Etrurians, the Acherontic and ritual books of Tages, containing the precepts of agriculture, legislation, medicine, the rules of divination, of meteorology, of astrology, and also a system of metaphysics: such were, among the Egyptians, the books of Hermes Trismegistus; such are, among the Hindus, the Vedas, the Pauranas, the Angas, with their innumerable commentaries; and such was the sacred wisdom of the Gallic Druids.—The ablest work on the ancient Druids is the splendid and elaborate production of Mr. Higgins. (The Celtic Druids, by Godfrey Higgins, Esq., F.S.A., 4to, London.) In this will be found a vast body of most interesting information respecting this ancient priesthood. "The Druids," observes Mr. Higgins, "held the same doctrine, in effect, with Pythagoras, the worship of one Supreme Being, a state of future rewards and punishments, the immortality of the soul, and a metempsychosis. These doctrines, their hatred of images, their circular temples open at the top, their worship of fire as the emblem of the Sun, their observation of the most ancient Tauric festival (when the Sun entered Taurus), their seventeenth-letter alphabet, and their system of oral instruction, mark and characterize the Druid in every age and every country of the world, by whatever name the priests of the country may have been known." (Celtic Druids, p. 305.) The Druids exercised, as may well be imagined, great influence over the minds of their more ignorant countrymen. Tacitus (Ann., 14, 30) speaks of the summary punishment inflicted upon them by Suetonius Paulinus, in the reign of Nero. The island of Mona was taken by the Roman troops with great slaughter of the foe, the sacred groves were cut down, and the Druids driven out. On the introduction of Christianity, the Druidical order gradually ceased, and the Druids themselves were regarded as enchanters by the early Christians.

DRUSILLA, I. LIVIA, a daughter of Germanicus and Agrippina, born at Augusta Treverorum (Treves) A.D. 15. She was far from inheriting the excellent qualities of her mother. Her own brother Caligula seduced her, and then gave her in marriage, at the age of seventeen, to Lucius Cassius Longinus, a man of consular rank. Subsequently, however, he took her away from her husband, and lived with her as his own spouse. This unhallowed connexion lasted until the death of Drusilla, A.D. 38, and at her decease Caligula abandoned himself to the most extravagant sorrow. Divine honours were rendered to her memory, and medals were struck in honour of her, with the title of Augusta. She was 23 years of age at the time of her death. (Sueton., Vit. Calig., 24.) Dio Cassius calls the name of her husband Marcus Lepidus, differing in this from Suetonius. He may possibly refer to a second husband, who may have been given her, for form's sake, a short time before her death. (Dio Cass., 59, 3.)—II. A daughter of Agrippa, king of Judæa, remarkable for her beauty. She was at first affianced to Epiphanes, son of Antiochus, king of Comagene. But, on his declining to submit to the rite of circumcision and to Judaize, the marriage was broken off. She was then given to Azizus, king of Emesa. Not long after, however, Drusilla renounced the religion of her fathers, abandoned her husband, and espoused Antonius Felix, a freedman of the Emperor Claudius, and brother to Pallas the freedman of Nero. This is the Felix who was governor of Judæa, and is mentioned in the Acts of the Apostles. Drusilla was with Felix at Cæsarea when St. Paul appeared before the latter. She had a son by her second husband, named Agrippa, who perished in the eruption of Vesuvius which took place during the reign of Titus. (Joseph., Jud. Ant., 19, 9.—Noldius, de Vita et gestis Herodum, p. 463, seqq.)—Tacitus (Hist., 5, 9) calls Drusilla the granddaughter of Cleopatra and Antony, making her, consequently, the daughter of Juba II., king of Mauritania. The Roman historian is in error, for Drusilla was of Jewish origin. And besides, history only assigns to Juba II. a son, named Ptolemy. (Töchon, in Biogr. Univ., vol. 12, p. 46.)

M m

DRŪSUS, I. CLAUDIUS NERO, son of Tiberius Claudius Nero and of Livia, was born B.C. 38, three months after his mother's marriage with Augustus. He served early in the army, and was sent, in 17 B.C., with his brother Tiberius, against the Rheti and Vindelici, who had made an irruption into Italy. He defeated the invaders, pursued them across the Alps, and reduced their country. Horace has celebrated this victory in one of his finest odes (4, 4). Drusus married Antonia Minor, daughter of Antony and Octavia, by whom he had Germanicus and Claudius, afterward emperor, and Livia or Livilla. In 14 B.C., being sent to quell an insurrection in Gaul, occasioned by the extortions of the Roman tax-gatherers, he succeeded by his conciliatory address. In the following year he attacked the Germans, and, carrying the war beyond the Rhine, he obtained a series of victories over the Sicambri, Cherusei, Catti, and Teneteri, and advanced as far as the Visurgis or Weser, for which the senate bestowed on him and his posterity the surname of Germanicus. In 9 B.C., Drusus was made consul, with L. Quintus Crispinus. He was soon after sent by Augustus against the Germans, crossed the Visurgis, and advanced as far as the Albis or Elbe. He imposed a moderate tribute on the Frisians, consisting of a certain quantity of hides, which, being afterward aggravated by the extortion of his successors, caused a revolt in the reign of Tiberius. (Tacit., Ann., 4, 72.) He caused a canal to be cut, for the purpose of uniting the Rhine to the Yssel, which was known long after by the name of Fossa Drusi; and he also began to raise dikes to prevent the inundations of the Rhine, which were completed by Paulinus Pompeius, in the reign of Nero. Drusus did not cross the Aibis, probably because he thought that he had advanced already far enough: he retired towards the Rhine, but, before he reached that river, he died, at the age of thirty, in consequence, as it was reported, of his horse falling upon him, and fracturing his leg. (Liv., Epit., 140.) Tiberius, who was sent for in haste, and found his brother expiring, accompanied his body to Rome, where his funeral was performed with the greatest solemnity. Both Augustus and Tiberius delivered orations in his praise. Drusus was much regretted by both the army and the Romans in general, who had formed great expectations from his manly and generous sentiments. (Tacit., Ann., 1, 3, seqq.—Id. ib., 2, 4¹—Id. ib., 4, 72, &c.—Id. Hist., 5, 19, &c.—Sueton., Vit. Aug., 94.—Id., Vit. Tib., 7.—Id., Vit. Claud., 1, &c.)—II. Cæsar, the son of the Emperor Tiberius by Vipsania daughter of Agrippa. He served with distinction in Pannonia and Illyricum, and was consul with his father, A.D. 21. In a quarrel he had with the imperial favourite Sejanus, he gave the latter a blow in the face. Sejanus, in revenge, seduced his wife Livia or Livilla, daughter of Drusus the elder and of Antonia; and the guilty pair got rid of Drusus by poison, which was administered by the eunuch Lygdamus. The crime remained a secret for eight years, when it was discovered after the death of Sejanus, and Livia was put to death. (Tacit., Ann., 1, 24, &c.—Id. ib., 4, 3, seqq.)—III. Cæsar, son of Germanicus and Agrippina, and brother to Nero Cæsar and Caligula. He married Emilia Lepida, who was induced by Sejanus to betray her husband. Deluded himself by the arts of that evil minister, he conspired against the life of his brother, Nero Cæsar, and was starved to death by order of Tiberius. (Tacit., Ann., 4, 60.—Id. ib., 6, 23, seqq.)—IV. M. Livius. (Vid. Livius.)

DRYADES, nymphs that presided over the woods. The Dryades differed from the Hamadryades, in that these latter were attached to some particular tree, with which they were born, and with which they died; whereas the Dryades were the goddesses of the trees and woods in general, and lived at large in the midst of them. For though δρῦς properly signifies an oak, it was also used for a tree in general. Oblations of milk, oil, and honey were offered to them, and sometimes the votaries sacrificed a goat. The derivation of the name Hamadryades is from ἡμα, "at the same time," and δρῦς, "a tree," for the reason given above. It is plain that δρῦς and the Germanic tree are the same word. Δρῦς has apparently this signification in Il., 22, 126.—Od., 19, 163.—Herod., 7, 218.—Soph., Trach., 763. In Nonnus, δρῦς is constantly tree, and δρῦοεις, wooden. (Keightley's Mythology, p. 237, not.)

ΔΡΥΜΕΛΑ, a town of Phocis, on the banks of the Cephissus, northeast of Elatea. (Pausan., 10, 34.) It was burned and sacked by the Persians under Xerxes, as we are informed by Herodotus (8, 33). Its position is uncertain. Some antiquaries place it at Dadi, others at Oguliniza. (Compare Dodrell's Tour, vol. 2, p. 135.—Gell's Ann., p. 210.)

ΔΡΥΟΡΕΣ, a people of Greece, in the vicinity of Mounts Cēta and Parnassus. (Herodot., 1, 56.—Strabo, 434.) Δις-αρχος, however (v. 30), extends their territory as far as the Ambracian gulf. They were so called, it is supposed, from Dryope, the daughter of Eurypylus, or, according to the poets, from a nymph violated by Apollo. Others derive the name, however, from δρῦς, an oak, and ὄψ, a voice, on account of the number of oaks which grew about the mountains, and the rustling of their leaves. The inhabitants themselves, however, advocated their fabulous origin, and claimed to be the descendants of Apollo; and therefore Hercules, having overcome this people, carried their prisoners to Delphi, where he presented them to their divine progenitor, who commanded the hero to take them with him to the Peloponnesus. Hercules obeyed, and gave them a settlement there, near the Asinean and Hermionian territories: hence the Asineans came to be blended with, and to call themselves, Dryopes. According to Herodotus, however, they passed into Eubœa, and from thence into the Peloponnesus and Asia Minor (8, 73; 1, 146). It is worthy of remark, that Strabo ranks the Dryopes among those chiefly of Thracian origin, who had, from the earliest period, established themselves in the latter country, towards the southern shores of the Euxine. (Strab., 586.)

DUBIS, a river of Gallia, rising at the foot of Mount Jura, and, after a course of 50 miles, falling into the Arar or Saône, near Cabillonum, the modern Chalons. It is now the Doubs or Doux. (Mannert, Geogr., vol. 3, pt. 1, p. 77.) The text of Cæsar (B. G., 1, 38), where he makes mention of this river, is very corrupt, some MSS. reading Adduabis, others Alduadubis, and others again Alduadusius, Alduadubis, and Alduadubis. Cellarius, following Valois (Valesius) and Vossius, gives Dubis as the true lection (Geogr. Ant., vol. 1, p. 36), and this has been followed in the best editions. (Compare the remarks of Oberlinus, ad Cæs., l. c., as to the origin of the corruption.)

DUBRIS PORTUS, a port of Britain, supposed to be Dover. It was in the territory of the Cantii, and 14 miles from Durovernum. At Dubris, according to the Notitia Imperii, was a fortress, erected against the Saxon pirates. (Mannert, Geogr., vol. 2, pt. 2, p. 161.—Cellarius, Geogr. Ant., vol. 1, p. 331.)

DULLIA LEX, I. was brought forward by M. Duillius, a tribune, A.U.C. 304. It made it a capital crime to leave the Roman people without tribunes, or to create any new magistrate from whom there was no appeal. The punishment was scourging and beheading. (Liv., 3, 55.)—II. Another, A.U.C. 392, to regulate what interest ought to be paid for money lent, and fixing it at one per cent.

DULLIUS NEPOS, C. a Roman consul, the first who obtained a victory over the naval power of Carthage, B.C. 260. After his colleague Cn. Corn. Scipio had been taken at sea by the Carthaginians in the first Punic war, Duillius proceeded, with a newly-built Roman fleet, to Sicily, in quest of the enemy, whom he met near the Lipari Islands; and, by means of grappling-irons, so connected the ships of the Carthaginians with his own, that the contest became a sort of land-fight. By this unexpected manœuvre, he took eighty and destroyed thirteen of the Carthaginian fleet, and obtained a naval triumph, the first ever enjoyed at Rome. There were some medals struck in commemoration of this victory, and a column was erected on the occasion. This column (called Columna Rostrata, because adorned with beaks of ships) was, as Livy informs us, struck down by lightning during the interval between the second and third Punic wars. A new column was erected by the Emperor Claudius, and the inscription restored, though probably modernized. It was buried afterward amid the ruins of Rome, until at length, in 1565, its base, which contained the inscription, was dug up in the vicinity of the Capitol. So much, however, was defaced, that many of the letters were illegible. This inscription has been restored, on conjecture, by the learning of modern scholars. (Compare Lipsius, Anclutarium ad Inscript. Smectianas.—Ciacconius, Col. Rostr. Inscr. in Grav. Thes., vol. 4, p. 1811.)

DULICHĪUM, the principal island in the group of the Echinades. Its name occurs more than once in the Odyssey as being well peopled and extensive. (Od., 1, 246; 16, 247.) Its situation, however, has never been determined by those who have commented on the poet; nor is it probable that much light can be thrown upon the subject at this distant period. Strabo (456), who has entered largely on the question, takes much pains to refute those who confounded it with Cephallenia, or considered it as a town of that island. He himself contends, that the Dolicha of his time, situated at the mouth of the Achelous, opposite to Cēniada, and 100 stadia from Cape Araxus, was the real Dulichium. (Compare Steph. Byz., s. v. Δουλιχίον.—Eustath. ad Hom., Od., 1, 246.) But it is very doubtful whether this place was ever of sufficient consequence to apply to Homer's description of that island. Dodwell, who has made some judicious observations on this head, thinks that Dulichium may have been swallowed up by an earthquake; and mentions having been assured by some Greek sailors that there was, about two miles from Cephallenia, an immersed island, extending out for seven miles. (Classical Tour, vol. 1, p. 107, seqq.—Cramer's Anc. Greece, vol. 2, p. 27.)

DEMNORIX, a powerful and ambitious chieftain of the Ædui, and brother to Divitiacus. He was disaffected towards Cæsar and the Romans, and, when the former was on the point of sailing for Britain, and had ordered Dumnorix to accompany him, the Ædun, on a sudden, marched away with the cavalry of his nation, and directed his course homeward. He was pursued and put to death. (Cæs., B. G., 1, 3.—Id. ib., 1, 20.—Id. ib., 5, 6, seqq.)

DURIUS, a river of Spain, rising in the chain of Mons Iubeda, near the sources of which are the ruins of ancient Numantia. (Strabo, 152.) Ptolemy (2, 5) calls it the Δωρία, and Dio Cassius (37, 52) the Δάριος. It flowed to the west, through the territories of the Arevaci and Vaccæi, and formed a dividing line between the Lusitani and Vettones on the south, and the Callaici on the north. It empties into the Atlantic after a course of nearly 300 miles, but is navigable only seventy miles from its mouth, on account of the rapid current. Its modern name is the Douro. The sands of the Durus are spoken of by the ancients as being auriferous. (Sil. Ital., 1, 234.) At the mouth of this river stood Calle, commonly styled Portus Calles, from a corruption of which last comes the modern name of Portugal. (Mannert, Geogr., vol. 1, p. 340.—Ukert, Geogr., vol. 2, p. 290.)

DUROCASSES (called also Droca and Fanum Druidum), a city of the Ebuovices, in Gallia Lugdunensis, southwest of Lutetia. In its vicinity was the principal residence of the Druids in Gaul. The modern name is Dreux. (Cæs., B. G., 6, 13.—Thuan., Hist., 34, seq.)

DUROCORŌRUM, the capital of the Remi, on the Vesle, one of the branches of the Axona or Aisne. It is now Rheims. (Cæs., B. G., 6, 44.)

ΔΥΜÆ, the last of the Achaean towns to the west, situate about forty stadia beyond the mouth of the Peyrus or Pirus. Pausanias states (7, 18), that its more ancient name was Palea. Strabo is of opinion, that the appellation of Dyme had reference to its western situation, with regard to the other cities of the province (πασῶν δυσμικωτάτη, ὡς οὐ καὶ τοῦνομα). He adds, that it was originally called Stratos. (Strabo, 387.) The epithet of Cauconis, applied to this city by the poet Antimachus, would lead to the supposition that it was once occupied by the ancient Caucones. (Ap. Schol. Lycophron, v. 589.) Dymæ is mentioned as one of the twelve towns of Achaia by Herodotus (1, 146). Its territory, from being contiguous to Elis and Ætolia, was frequently laid waste during the Social war by the armies of those countries then united. (Cramer's Anc. Greece, vol. 3, p. 71.)

ΔΥΡΑΣ, a river of Thessaly, twenty stadia beyond the Sperchius, said to have sprung from the ground in order to assist Hercules when burning on Oeta. (Herodot., 7, 199.—Strabo, 428.)

ΔΥΡΙΣ, the name given to Mount Atlas by the neighbouring inhabitants. (Ὅρος ἐστίν, ὅπερ οἱ μὲν Ἑλληνες Ἀτλαντα καλοῦσιν, οἱ βάρβαροι δὲ Δύριν.—Strabo, 825.) Mr. Hodgson, in a pamphlet on the affinities of the Berber languages, after observing that the Atlas chain of mountains was called by the ancient geographers, besides their common appellation, Dyris or Dyrim, and Adderis or Aderim, indulges in the following etymological remarks (p. 5, seqq.). "These names appear to me to be nothing else than the Berber words Athraer, Edhrarin, which mean a mountain or mountains, differently corrupted from what they had been before they were changed to Atlas. Adrar, Athraer, Edhrarin, Adderis, or Adderim, are evidently the same word, with such variations as may naturally be expected when proper names pass from one language to another. There is surely not more, nor perhaps so much, difference between them as between Antwerpen and Amberes (the Spanish name for Antwerp), Mecklin and Malines, Lugdunum and Lyons, Ὀδυσσεύς and Ulysses, Καρχηδών and Carthage. And if the Romans or the Greeks changed Adhrar and Edhrarin into Adderis, or in the accusative Adderim, why from Adderis might they not have made Adras, Atras, or Atlas? The weight of probability, at least, seems to be in favour of this supposition." (Transactions of the American Philosophical Society, vol. 4, new series.)

EĀNUS, a name of Janus among the ancient Latins. Cornificius, quoted by Macrobius (Sat., 1, 9), maintained that Cicero (N. D., 2, 27) meant this appellation, and not Janus, when he derived the name ab eundo.

ΕΒΟΡΑ, I. a city of Lusitania, to the south of the Tagus and north of the Anas, called also Liberaltias Julia. (Plin., 4, 22.—Mela, 3, 1.) It is now Evora, the chief city of the province of Alentejo.—II. A fortress in Hispania Bætica, on the eastern bank of the

Bætis. (Mela, 3, 1.)—III. A city of Hispania Tarraconensis, near the river Tamaris. It is supposed to coincide with the modern village of Muros, near the mouth of the Tambre. Others, however, are in favour of the harbour of Obre, at the mouth of the Tamara. (Bischoff und Möller, Wörterb. der Geogr., p. 446.)

ΕΒΟΡΑCUM, a city of Britain, in the territory of the Brigantes, now York. Eboracum was, next to Londonium or London, the most important city in the whole island. It formed a convenient post, and place of arms, for the Romans during the continual wars waged by them against the northern nations of Britain. Septimius Severus died here. The modern city can still show many vestiges of Roman power and magnificence. (Mannert, Geogr., vol. 2, pt. 2, p. 123.)

ΕΒΥΔÆ, the western isles of Britain, now Hebrides. Ptolemy (2, 2) places them to the north of Hibernia, and makes them five in number. The name Ebudæ was borrowed by the Romans from the Greek appellation Ἐβουδαί. Two of the five properly bear the name of Ebudæ; the remaining three were called Maleus, Epidium, and Ricina. Pliny (4, 16) calls them all Hebrides Insulæ, "Ebudes," says Salmasius, "Mela nullas recenset, et nullas Emodas Ptolemæus. Vix sane mihi dubium est, quin Emodæ, vel Emodæ, et Ebudæ eadem sint." (Salmas. ad Solin., 1, 22.)

ΕΒΥΡΟΝΕΣ, I. a nation of Belgic Gaul, to the west of the Ubii and the Rhine, and to the south of the Menapii. Their territory corresponded to the present country of Liège (le pays de Liège). Under the conduct of Ambiorix they defeated Sabinus and Cotta, the lieutenants of Cæsar, having induced them to quit their winter-quarters, and then having attacked them on the route. Cæsar inflicted a terrible retaliation, desolating the country, and almost annihilating their race. The Tungri afterward took possession of the vacated seats of the Eburones. The capital of the Eburones was Aduatua. This was rebuilt by the Tungri, and is now Tongres. (Cæs., B. G., 2, 4, seqq.—Id. ib., 5, 26, seqq.—Id. ib., 6, 33.)

ΕΒΥΣΟΣ (Ἐβύσσος, Gronov. ad Strab., ed Oxon., p. 216.—Βούσος, Dionys. Perieg.), one of the Pityusæ, or Pine-islands, so named by the Greeks from the number of pine-trees which grew in them (πίτυς, pinus). The island of Ebusus was the largest of the number, and very fertile in the production of vines, olives, and large figs, which were exported to Rome and elsewhere. (Compare Mela, 2, 7.—Plin., 3, 5.—Id., 15, 9.—Fest. Avien., v. 621.) It was famed also for its wool: but that no poisonous animal existed here is a mere fable of former days. Some of the ancient writers call it simply Pityusa. (Diod. Sic., 5, 16.—Compare Livy, 28, 37, who, however, in another place (22, 20), names it Ebusus.) Agathemerus (Geogr., 1, 5) speaks of the larger Pityusa in contradistinction to the smaller. It is about forty miles from the Mediterranean coast of Spain, and is now named, by a slight corruption, Iviza. It still produces abundance of corn, wine, oil, fruit, &c., and a great deal of salt is made in it by natural evaporation. Its size is 190 square miles; the population about 15,000. Diodorus (l. c.) compares this island, in point of size, with Corceyra. The chief place on the island was Ebusus, which had an excellent harbour, and was inhabited in part by Phœnicians. (Diod. Sic., 5, 16.—Sil. Ital., 3, 362.)

ΕCΒΑΤΑΝΑ (ἑρυν), I. the capital of Media, situate, according to Diodorus (2, 3), about twelve stadia from Mount Orontes. The genuine orthography of the word appears to be Agbatana (Ἀγβάτανα). Stephanus of Byzantium says that this form Ἀγβάτανα was employed by Ctesias. Bähr, however, the latest editor of Ctesias, retains Εκβάτανα, not because he thinks it the true reading, but from a reluctance to change the form of the word in opposition to the MSS. But the same editor, in his Herodotus (1, 98), adopts Ἀγβάτανα with Wesseling, for here the MSS. favour it.

Isidorus Characenus has Ἀποβάτα, a manifest error. Reland (Diss. Miscell., pt. 2, p. 107) deduces the name from the Persian Ac, "a lord" or "master," and Abadan, "a cultivated and inhabited place."—Ecbatana, being in a high and mountainous country, was a favourite residence of the Persian kings during summer, when the heat of Susa was almost insupportable. The Parthian kings also, at a later period, retired to it in the summer to avoid the excessive heat of Ctesiphon. According to Herodotus (1, 98), Ecbatana was built near the close of the eighteenth century B.C. by Dejoces, the founder of the Median monarchy. The book of Judith (1, 2) assigns the building of this city, or, rather, the erection of its citadel, to Arphaxad, in the twelfth year of the reign of Nebuchadnezzar, king of Assyria. Some writers make Arphaxad the same with Dejoces, while others identify him with Phraortes, the son of the latter, who might have repaired the city, or else made some additions to it.—Herodotus furnishes us with no hint whence we may infer the relative position of Ecbatana on the map of Media. His description of the fortress or citadel, however, is particular. "The Medes," he remarks, "in obedience to their king's command, built these spacious and massy fortifications now called Ecbatana, circle within circle, according to the following plan. Each inner circle overtops its outer neighbour by the height of the battlements alone. This was effected partly by the nature of the ground, a conical hill, and partly by the building itself. The number of the circles was seven; within the innermost were built the palace and the treasury. The circumference of the outermost wall and of the city of Athens may be regarded as nearly equal. The battlements of the first circle are white; of the second, black; of the third, scarlet; of the fourth, azure; of the fifth, orange. All these are brilliantly coloured with different paints. But the battlements of the sixth circle are silvered over, while those of the seventh are gilt. Dejoces constructed these walls around his palace for his own personal safety. But he ordered the people to erect their houses in a circle around the outward wall." (Herod., 1, 98, seq.)—The Orientals, however, according to Diodorus Siculus, claimed a far more ancient origin for Ecbatana. They not only described it as the capital of the first Median monarchy, founded by Arbaces, but as existing prior to the era of the famed and fabulous Semiramis, who is said to have visited Ecbatana in the course of her royal journeys, and to have built there a magnificent palace. She also, with immense labour and expense, introduced abundance of excellent water into the city, which before had been badly supplied with it, and she effected this object by perforating the adjacent Mount Orontes, and forming a tunnel, fifteen feet broad, and forty feet high, through which she conveyed a lake-stream. (Diod. Sic., 2, 13.) Ecbatana continued a splendid city under the Persian sway, the great king spending at this place the two hottest months of the year. (Eliau, l. c.—Xen., l. c.) The Macedonian conquest did not prove destructive to Ecbatana, as it had to the royal palace at Persepolis. Alexander deposited in Ecbatana the treasures taken from Persepolis and Pasargada, and one of the last acts of his life was a royal visit to the Median capital. Although not equally favoured by the Seleucids, it still retained the traces of its former grandeur; and Polybius has left on record a description of its state under Antiochus the Great, which shows that Ecbatana was still a splendid city, though it had been despoiled of many of its more costly decorations. (Polyb., 10, frag. 4.) When the Seleucids were driven from Upper Asia, Ecbatana became the favourite summer residence of the Arsacids, and we have the authority of Tacitus to show, that, at the close of the first century, it still continued to be the Parthian capital. (Tacit., Ann., 15, 31.) When the Persians, under the house of Sassan, A.D. 226, recovered the dominion of Upper Asia, Ecbatana, both as an ancient seat of empire and as a place situated far from the immediate scene of warfare between the Persians and the Romans, continued to be a favourite and secure place of residence. The natural bulwarks of Mount Zagros were never forced by the Roman legions, nor did the matrons of Ecbatana ever behold the smoke of a Roman camp. Consequently, we find, from Ammianus Marcellinus, that near the close of the fourth century, Ecbatana continued to be a great and a fortified city.—The site of Ecbatana has been a matter of dispute among modern scholars. Gibbon and Sir W. Jones are in favour of the present Tabriz. The claims, however, of this town are now completely set aside. Mr. Williams contends for Ispahan. (Geography of Anc. Asia, p. 10, seqq.) He is ably refuted, however, in the Journal of Education (No. 4, p. 305, seqq.). D'Anville, Mannert, and others declare for Hammedan, which is undoubtedly the true opinion. The route of commerce between the low country, in the neighbourhood of the ancient Seleucia, and the modern Bagdad and the high table-land of Iran, is determined by the physical character of the country, and has continued the same from the earliest recorded history of those countries to the present day. The places marked in the Itinerary of Isidorus Characenus, as lying in Seleucia and Ecbatana, are the places indicated by modern travellers as lying on the route between Bagdad and Hammedan.—Mr. Kinneir describes the climate of Hammedan as delightful during eight months of the year; but in winter the cold is excessive, and fuel with difficulty procured. Hammedan lies in a low plain at the foot of Mount Elwund, which belongs to the mountain-chain that forms the last step in the ascent from the lowlands of Irak-Arabi to the high table-land of Iran. The summit of Elwund is tipped with continual snow. (Kinneir's Persia, p. 126.)—II. A town of Syria, in Galilee Inferior, at the foot of Mount Carmel, supposed to coincide with the modern Caiffa. Here Cambyzes gave himself a mortal wound as he was mounting his horse, and thus fulfilled the oracle which had warned him to beware of Ecbatana. (Herod., 3, 64.)

ECHIDNA, a monster sprung from the union of Chrysaor with Callirhoe, the daughter of Oceanus. She is represented as a beautiful woman in the upper parts of the body, but as a serpent below the waist. (Hesiod, Theog., 297.)

ECHINADES, islands formerly lying opposite the mouth of the Achelous, but which, in process of time, have for the most part become connected with the land by the alluvial deposits of the muddy waters of the river. These rocks, as they should rather be termed, were known to Homer, who mentions them as being inhabited, and as having sent a force to Troy under the command of Meges, a distinguished warrior of the Iliad. (Il., 2, 625.) They are said by some geographers to be now called Cuculari; but this name belongs to certain small, pointed isles near them, called from their appearance Oziæ (Ὀζία) by the ancients. (Cramer's Anc. Greece, vol. 2, p. 26.)

ECHINUSSA. Vid. Cimolus.

ECHION, one of the men who sprang from the dragon's teeth sown by Cadmus. He, along with four others, survived the conflict that ensued, and assisted Cadmus in building Thebes. The monarch gave him his daughter Agave in marriage, by whom he had Pentheus. After the death of Cadmus he reigned in Thebes. Hence the epithet "Echionean," applied by the poets to that city. (Ovid, Met., 3, 311.—Horat., Od., 4, 4, 64.)

ECHIONIDES, a patronymic given to Pentheus as descended from Echion. (Ovid, Met., 3, 311.)

ECHIONIUS, an epithet applied to the city of Thebes, as founded by the aid of Echion. (Ovid, Met., 3, 311.—Horat., Od., 4, 4, 64.)

ECHO, a daughter of the Air and Tellus, who chiefly resided in the vicinity of the Cephissus. She was once one of Juno's attendants; but, having offended that goddess by her deception, she was deprived, in a great measure, by her, of the power of speech. Juno declared, that in future she should have but little use of her tongue; and immediately she lost all power of doing any more than repeat the sounds which she heard. Echo happening to see the beautiful youth Narcissus, became deeply enamoured of him. But, her love being slighted, she pined away till nothing remained of her but her voice and bones. The former still exists, the latter were converted into stone. (Ovid, Met., 3, 341, seqq.)

ECTĒNES, a people who, according to Pausanias, first inhabited the territory of Thebes, in Boeotia. Ogyges is said to have been their first king. They were exterminated by a plague, and succeeded by the Hyantes. (Compare Strabo, 401.—Pausan., 9, 5.—Lycophr., v. 433.)

EDDESSA, I. a city of Mesopotamia, in the district of Osroene, on the banks of a small river called Scirtus. It lay northeast of Zeugma, and southeast of Samosata, and, according to the Itin. Ant., nine geographical miles from the Euphrates and Zeugma (ed. Wesseling, p. 185). Procopius (Pers., 2, 12) places it a day's journey from Batnæ; and an Arabian writer cited by Wesseling (ad Itin. Ant., l. c.), about six parasangs or four miles. Edessa is said to have been one of those numerous cities which were built by Seleucus Nicator, and was probably called after the city of the same name in Macedonia. It was once a place of great celebrity, and famous for a temple of the Syrian goddess, which was one of the richest in the world. During the intestine broils which greatly weakened the kingdom of Syria, Angurus or Abgarus seized on this city and its adjacent territory, which he erected into a kingdom, and transmitted the royal title to his posterity. We learn from St. Austin that our Saviour promised Abgarus that the city should be impregnable; and Euagrius (Hist. Eccles., 4, 27) observes, that although this circumstance was not mentioned in our Lord's letter, still it was the common belief; which was much confirmed when Chosroes, king of Persia, after having set down before it, was obliged to raise the siege. This is all, however, a pious fable.—Edessa was called Callirhoë, from a fountain contained within it. (Plin., 5, 24.) The sources of this fountain still remain, and the inhabitants have a tradition that this is the place where Abraham offered up his prayer previous to his intended sacrifice of Isaac. (Compare Niebuhr, vol. 2, p. 407.—Tavernier, lib. 2, c. 4.) In later times it was termed Roha, or, with the article of the Arabs, Orrhoa, and by abbreviation Orrha. This appellation would seem to have arisen from the circumstance of Edessa having been the capital of the district Osroene, or, as it was more probably called, Orrhoene. The modern name is Orrhoa or Orfa. (Chron. Edess. in Assemanii Bibl. Orient., vol. 1, p. 388.) The Arabians revere the spot as the seat of learned men and of the purest Arabic. (Abulpharag., Hist. Dynast., p. 16, ed. Wesseling, ad loc.)—II. A city of Macedonia, called also Edessa and Ægæ, situate on the Via Egnatia, thirty miles west of Pella. According to Justin (7, 1) it was the city occupied by Caranus on his arrival in the country, and it continued apparently to be the capital of Macedonia, until the seat of government was transferred to Pella. Even after this event it remained the place of sepulture for the royal family, since we are told that Philip and Eurydice, the king and queen of Macedon, who had been put to death by Olympias, were buried here by Cassander. (Athen., 4, 41.) Pausanias (1, 6) states, that Alexander was to have been interred here; and when Pyrrhus, king of Epirus, had taken and plundered the town, he left there a body of Gauls, who opened the royal tombs in hopes of finding treasure. It was here that Philip was assassinated by Pansanias while celebrating the marriage of his daughter Cleopatra with Alexander, king of Epirus. (Diod. Sic., 16, 92.) It is uncertain which of the two appellations is the more ancient, Ægæ or Edessa; the latter form is always used by later writers. (Hierocl., Synecd., p. 638.) It is generally agreed that the town called Vodina, situate on the river Vistritza, which issues from the Lake of Ostrorog, represents this ancient city; but it may be observed, that the name of Bodena appears to be as old as the Byzantine historians. (Cedrenus, vol. 2, p. 705.—Glycas, p. 309.) Dr. Clarke, in his travels (Greece, Egypt, &c., vol. 7, p. 434, seqq.), quotes a letter from Mr. Fiolt of Cambridge, who had visited Vodina, and which leaves no doubt as to its identity with Edessa. He says, "it is a delightful spot. There are sepulchres cut in the rock, which the superstitious inhabitants have never plundered, because they are afraid to go near them. I went into two, and saw the bodies in perfect repose, with some kinds of ornaments, and clothes, and vases. There is a beautiful inscription in the town. The fall of waters is magnificent." (Cramer's Ancient Greece, vol. 1, p. 226, seqq.)

EDETĀNI, a people of Spain, south of the Iberus. They occupied what corresponds with the northern half of Valencia, and the southwestern corner of Aragon. (Mannert, Geogr., vol. 1, p. 426.—Ukert, vol. 2, p. 413, seqq.)

EDŌNI or EDŌNES, a people of Thrace, on the left bank of the Strymon. It appears from Thucydides (2, 99), that this Thracian clan once held possession of the right bank of the Strymon as far as Mygdonia, but that they were ejected by the Macedonians. The name of this tribe is often used by the poets to express the whole of the nation of which they formed a part. (Soph., Ant., 955.—Eur., Hee., 1153.)

EEŖION, the father of Andromache, and king of Hypoplacian Thebe in Troas. (Hom., II, 6, 396.)—II. The commander of the Athenian fleet, conquered by the Macedonians under Chtus, near the Echinades. (Diod. Sic., 18, 15.)

EEERĪA, a nymph of Aricia in Italy, the spouse and instructress of Numa. (Vid. Numa.) Some regarded her as one of the Camenæ. According to the old legend, when Numa died, Egeria melted away in tears into a fountain. Niebuhr places the grove of Egeria below S. Balbina, near the baths of Caracalla. (Roman History, vol. 1, p. 202, Cambr. transl.) Wagner, in a dissertation on this subject, is in favour of the valley of Caffarella, some few miles from the present gate of Saint Sebastian. (Wagner, commentatio de Egeria fonte, et specu ejusque situ.—Marbourg, 1824.)

EGESTA. Vid. Ægesta.

EGNATIA, a town of Apulia, on the coast, below Barium. It communicated its name to the consular way that followed the coast from Canusium to Brundisium. (Strabo, 282.) Its ruins are still apparent near the Torre d'Aguzzo and the town of Monopoli. (Pratilli, Via Appia, lib. 4, c. 16.—Romanelli, vol. 2, p. 143.) Pliny states (2, 107), that a certain stone was shown at Egnatia, which was said to possess the property of setting fire to wood that was placed upon it. It was this prodigy, seemingly, which afforded so much amusement to Horace (Sat., 1, 5, 98), and from the expression limine sacro employed by the poet, the stone in question would appear to have been placed in the entrance of a temple, serving for an altar. What Horace, however, regarded as a mere trick, has been thought to have had more of reality about it than the poet supposed. Some commentators imagine that the stone was placed over a naphtha spring, with an aperture in it for the flame to pass through; a simple contrivance which the priests would not fail to turn to good account. So La Lande found in Italy, on a hill near Petra Mala, not far from Firenzuola, flames breaking forth from the ground, the vapour from which resembled petroleum in smell. (Voyage d'un François en Italie, vol. 2, p. 134.—1765.) Compare also the remarks of Salmاسius on the account given by Solinus of a volcanic hill near Agrigentum in Sicily. (Solin., c. 5.—Salmاس., ad loc., p. 89, seqq.)

EION, a port at the mouth of the Strymon, twenty-five stadia from Amphipolis, of which, according to Thucydides (4, 102), it formed the harbour. This historian affirms it to have been more ancient than Amphipolis. It was from Eion that Xerxes sailed to Asia, according to Herodotus, after the battle of Salamis. (Herodot., 8, 118.) Bogen was left in command of the town on the retreat of the Persian armies, and made a most gallant resistance when besieged by the Grecian forces under Cimon. On the total failure of all means of subsistence, he ordered a vast pile to be raised in the centre of the town, and having placed on it his wives, children, and domestics, he caused them to be slain; then, scattering everything of value in the Strymon, he threw himself on the burning pile and perished in the flames. (Herodot., 7, 107.—Thucyd., 1, 98.) After the capture of Amphipolis, the Spartans endeavoured to gain possession of Eion also, but in this design they were frustrated by the arrival of Thucydides with a squadron from Thasos, who repelled the attack. (Thucyd., 4, 107.) Cleon afterward occupied Eion, and thither the remains of his army retreated after their defeat before Amphipolis. (Thucyd., 5, 10.) This place is mentioned by Lycephron (v. 417). In the middle ages a Byzantine town was built on the site of Eion, which now bears the name of Contessa. (Cramer's Ancient Greece, vol. 1, p. 295, seqq.)

ELÆA, the port of the city of Pergamus. According to some traditions, it had been founded after the siege of Troy, by the Athenians, under the command of Mnestheus. (Strab., 622.) Elæa was distant 12 stadia from the mouth of the Caicus, and 120 from Pergamus. (Strab., 615.) The modern name is Ialea or Lalea. Smith places the ruins of this city at no great distance from Clisiakivi, on the road from Smyrna to Berganat. (Account of the Seven Churches of Asia, p. 7.—Liv., 36, 43.—Pausan., 9, 5.)

ELAGABALUS, I. the surname of the sun at Emesa.—II. The name of a Roman emperor. (Vid. Emesa and Heliogabalus.)

ELAPHÉBOLIA, a festival in honour of Diana the Huntress. In the celebration a cake was made in the form of a deer, ἐλαφος, and offered to the goddess. It owed its institution to the following circumstance. When the Phocians had been severely defeated by the Thessalians, they resolved, by the persuasion of a certain Deiphantus, to raise a pile of combustible materials, and burn their wives, children, and effects, rather than submit to the enemy. This resolution was unanimously approved of by the women, who decreed Deiphantus a crown for his magnanimity. When everything was prepared, before they fired the pile, they engaged their enemies, and fought with such desperate fury, that they totally routed them, and obtained a complete victory. In commemoration of this unexpected success, this festival was instituted to Diana, and observed with the greatest solemnity. (Athen., 14, p. 646, e.—Castellanus, de Fest. Græc., p. 115.)

ELATÆA, the most considerable and important of the Phocian cities after Delphi, situate, according to Pausanias (10, 34), one hundred and eighty stadia from Amphicæa, on a gently rising slope, above the plain watered by the Cephissus. It was captured and burned by the army of Xerxes (Herodot., 8, 33), but, being afterward restored, it was occupied by Philip, father of Alexander, on his advance into Phocis to overawe the Athenians. The alarm and consternation produced at Athens by his approach is finely described by Demosthenes in his Oration de Corona (p. 284.—Compare Æschin. in Ctes., p. 73.—Strab., 424). Some years after, Elæata made a successful defence against the arms of Cassander. It was, however, reduced by Philip, son of Demetrius, who bribed the principal inhabitants. (Pausan., l. c.) During the Macedonian war, this town was besieged by the Roman consul, T. Flamininus, and taken by assault. (Liv., 32, 18, seqq.—Polyb., 5, 26.—Id., 18, 26.) An attack subsequently made on Elæata by Taxilus, general of Mithradates, was successfully repelled by the inhabitants; in consequence of which exploit they were declared free by the Roman senate. (Pausan., l. c.) Strabo speaks of its advantageous situation, which commanded the entrance into Phocis and Beotia. Other passages relative to this place will be found in Plutarch (Vit. Syll.), Appian (Bell. Mithrad.), Theophrastus (Hist. Plant., 8, 8, 2), and Scylax (p. 23). Its ruins are to be seen on a site called Elephtha, on the left bank of the Cephissus, and at the foot of some hills which unite with the chains of Cnemis and Ceta. Sir W. Gell, in his Itinerary, notices the remains of the city walls, as well as those of the citadel, and the ruins of several temples (p. 216.—Compare Dodwell, vol. 2, p. 140). At the distance of about twenty stadia to the east was the temple of Minerva Cranaea, described by Pausanias: its remains were discovered by Sir W. Gell and Mr. Dodwell. (Cramer's Ancient Greece, vol. 2, p. 179.)

ELÄVER, a river of Gaul, rising in the same quarter with the Jiger, and, after pursuing a course almost parallel with it, falling into this same stream below Nerers. It is now the Allier. (Cæs., B. G., 8, 34 and 53.—Mannert, Geogr., vol. 2, pt. 1, p. 119.)

ELECTRA, I. one of the Oceanides, wife of Atlas, and mother of Dardanus by Jupiter. (Orid. Fast., 4, 31).—II. A daughter of Atlas and Pleione, and one of the Pleiades. (Vid. Pleiades).—III. One of the daughters of Agamemnon. Upon the murder of her father, on his return from Troy, Electra rescued her brother Orestes, then quite young, from the fury of Ægisthus, by despatching him to the court of her uncle Electryon, king of Phocis. There Orestes formed the well-known attachment for his cousin Pylades, which, in the end, led to the marriage of Electra with that prince. According to one account, Electra had previously been compelled, by Ægisthus, to become the wife of a Mycenaean rustic, who, having regarded her merely as a sacred deposit confided to him by the gods, restored her to Orestes on the return of that prince to Mycenæ, and on his accession to the throne of his ancestors. Electra became, by Pylades, the mother of two sons, Strophius and Medon. Her story has formed the basis of two plays, the one by Sophocles, the other by Euripides. (Soph., Electr.—Eurip., Electr.)

ELECTRIDES, islands fabled to have been in the Adriatic, off the mouths of the Padus or Po, and to have abounded with amber (electrum), whence their name. (Vid. Eridanus.)

ELECTRYON, son of Perseus and Andromeda, and king of Mycenæ. He was the father of Alcmena. Electryon undertook an expedition against the Teleboans in order to avenge the death of his sons, whom the sons of Taphius, king of the Teleboans, had slain in an encounter. Returning victorious, he was met by Amphitryon, and killed by an accidental blow. (Apollod., 2, 4, 6.—Vid. Alcmena.)

ELEPHANTINE, an island of Egypt, in the Nile, with a city of the same name, about a semi-stadium distant from Syene. Pliny (5, 9) calls it Elephantis Insula

It is of small size, being, according to the French measurement, 700 toises long and 200 broad. The island was remarkable for its fertility, and it is therefore easy to believe, that, in early ages, when, according to Manetho, Egypt was divided into several dynasties, one of these had its capital on this island. The cataracts of the Nile are not far distant, and hence Elephantine became the dépôt for all the goods that were destined for the countries to the south, and that required land-carriage in this quarter in order to avoid the falls of the river. The Nile has here a very considerable breadth, and it is natural to suppose, that, on its entrance into Egypt, the inhabitants were desirous of ascertaining the rise of the stream at the period of its annual increase. Hence we find a Nilometer here, on the banks of the river. (Strabo, 817.) In the time of the Pharaohs, the garrison stationed on the frontiers against the Æthiopians had their headquarters at Elephantine. In the Roman times, however, the frontiers were pushed farther to the south. In the fourth century, when all Egypt was strongly guarded, the first Cohors Theodosiana was stationed in this island, according to the Notitia Imperii.—It is surprising that merely the Greek name for this island has come down to us, since Herodotus was here during the Persian sway, when Grecian influence could by no means have been strong enough to supplant the original name by one which is evidently a mere translation of it. The modern name of Elephantine is Gezyret Assuan, “the Island of Syene.” There are some ruins of great beauty remaining, and, in particular, a superb gate of granite, which formed the entrance of one of the porticoes of the temple of Cnept. ELEUSINIA, a great festival observed every fourth year by the Celeans, Phliasians, as also by the Pheneates, Lacedæmonians, Parrhasians, and Cretans; but more particularly by the people of Athens every fifth year, at Eleusis in Attica, where it was said to have been introduced by Eumolpus, B.C. 1356. It was the most celebrated of all the religious ceremonies of Greece, whence it is often called, by way of eminence, μυστήρια, the mysteries. It was so superstitiously observed, that if any one ever revealed it, it was supposed that he had called divine vengeance upon his head, and it was unsafe to live in the same house with him. Such a wretch was publicly put to an ignominious death. This festival was sacred to Ceres and Proserpina; everything contained a mystery; and Ceres herself was known only by the name of ἄχθεια, from the sorrow (ἄλγος) which she suffered for the loss of her daughter. This mysterious secrecy was solemnly observed, and enjoined on all the votaries of the goddess; and if any one ever appeared at the celebration, either intentionally or through ignorance, without proper introduction, he was immediately punished with death. Persons of both sexes and all ages were initiated at this solemnity, and it was looked upon as so heinous a crime to neglect this sacred part of religion, that it was one of the heaviest accusations which contributed to the condemnation of Socrates. The initiated were under the more particular care of the deities, and therefore their lives were supposed to be attended with more happiness and real security than those of other men. This benefit was not only granted during life, but it extended beyond the grave, and they were honoured with the first places in the Elysian fields, while others were left to wallow in perpetual filth and ignominy. As the benefits of expiation were so extensive, particular care was taken in examining the character of those who were presented for initiation. Such as were guilty of murder, though against their will, and such as were convicted of impiety or any heinous crime, were not admitted; and the Athenians suffered none to be initiated but those that were members of their city. This regulation, which compelled, according to the popular belief, Hercules, Castor, and Pollux to become citizens of Athens, was strictly observed in the first ages of the institution, but afterward all persons, barbarians excepted, were freely initiated. The festivals were divided into the greater and less mysteries. The less were instituted from the following circumstance: Hercules passed near Eleusis while the Athenians were celebrating the mysteries, and desired to be initiated. As this could not be done because he was a stranger, and as Eumolpus was unwilling to displease him on account of his great power, and the services which he had done to the Athenians, another festival was instituted without violating the laws. It was called μικρά, and Hercules was solemnly admitted to the celebration, and initiated. These minor mysteries were observed at Agræ near the Ilissus. The greater were celebrated at Eleusis, from which place Ceres has been called Eleusinia. In later times the smaller festivals were preparatory to the greater, and no person could be initiated at Eleusis without a previous purification at Agræ. This purification they performed by keeping themselves pure, chaste, and unpolluted during nine days, after which they came and offered sacrifices and prayers, wearing garlands of flowers, called ἵμερα or ἱμερα, and having under their feet Διὸς κόδιον, Jupiter's skin, which was the skin of a victim offered to that god. The person who assisted was called ὑδρανός, from ὕδωρ, water, which was used at the purification; and they themselves were called μῦσται, the initiated. A year after the initiation at the less mysteries they sacrificed a sow to Ceres, and were admitted into the greater, and the secrets of the festivals were solemnly revealed to them, from which they were called ἐφόροι and ἐπόπται, inspectors. The institution was performed in the following manner; the candidates, crowned with myrtle, were admitted by night into a place called μυστήριος σηκός, the mystical temple, a vast and stupendous building. As they entered the temple, they purified themselves by washing their hands in holy water, and received for admonition that they were to come with a mind pure and undefiled, without which the cleanliness of the body would be unacceptable. After this the holy mysteries were read to them from a large book called πέτραμα, because made of two stones, πέτραι, fitly cemented together; and then the priest, called ἱεροφάντης, proposed to them certain questions, to which they readily answered. After this, strange and fearful objects presented themselves to their sight; the place often seemed to quake, and to appear suddenly resplendent with fire, and immediately covered with gloomy darkness and horror. Sometimes flashes of lightning appeared on every side. At other times thunder, hideous noises, and howlings were heard, and the trembling spectators were alarmed by sudden and dreadful apparitions. This was called αὐτοψία, intuition. When these ceremonies were ended, the word κόγξ was uttered by the officiating priest, which implied that all was ended, and that those present might retire. In the common text of Hesychius, the words κόγξ ὁμπαξ are said to have been uttered on this occasion (Κόγξ, ὁμπαξ; ἐπιφώνημα τετελεσμένους), and various explanations have been attempted to be given. Wilford, for example, makes the words in question to have been Κόγξ, Ὀμ, Πάξ, and maintains that they are pure Sanscrit, and used this day by the Brahmins, at the conclusion of sacred rites! (Asiatic Researches, vol. 5, p. 297.) Münter, Creuzer, Ouvartoff, and others, have adopted the opinion of Wilford. (Münter, Erklärung einer griech. Inschrift. p. 18.—Creuzer, Symbolik, vol. 4, p. 573.—Ouvartoff, Essai sur les Myst. d'Eleusis, p. 26, seqq.—Schelling, über die Gottheit von Samothrak, p. 91.) The speculations of all these writers, as well as the opinion of Von Hammer, who derives the word 'Ομπαζ from the Persian Cambaksch, which denotes, according to him, "not sui compos," have been very unceremoniously put to flight by Lobeck. This able and judicious critic has emended the text of Hesychius so as to read as follows: Κόγξ, ὁμοίως πάζ, ἐπιφώνημα τετελεσμένους, and thus both κόγξ and πάζ are nothing more than mere terms of dismissal. The former of these is borrowed from the language of the Athenian assemblies for voting. The pebble or ballot was dropped into the urn through a long conical tube; and as this tube was probably of some length, and the urn itself of considerable size, in order to enable several hundred persons to vote, the stone striking against the metal bottom made a sharp, loud noise. This sound the Athenians imitated by the monosyllable κόγξ. Hence the term κόγξ came to denote that all was ended, that the termination of an affair was reached; and hence Hesychius assimilates it to the form πάζ, which appears to have had the same force as the Latin interjection pax. (Lobeck, Aglaophamus, p. 776, seqq.—Philol. Museum, No. 2, p. 425, not.)—But to return to the mysteries: the garments in which the new-comers were initiated were held sacred, and of no less efficacy to avert evils than charms and incantations. From this circumstance, therefore, they were never left off before they were totally unfit for wear, after which they were appropriated for children, or dedicated to the goddess. The chief person that attended at the initiation was called ιεροφάντης, the revealer of sacred things. He was a citizen of Athens, and held his office during life, though, among the Celeans and Philiassians, it was limited to the period of four years. He was obliged to devote himself totally to the service of the deities; and his life was to be chaste and single. The Hierophant had three attendants; the first was called δραδούχος, torch-bearer, and was permitted to marry; the second was called κῆρυξ, a crier; the third administered at the altar, and was called ὁ ἐπὶ βωμῷ. There were, besides these, other inferior officers, who took particular care that everything was performed according to custom. The first of these, called βασίλευς, was one of the archons; he offered prayers and sacrifices, and took care that there was no indecency or irregularity during the celebration. Besides him there were four others, called ἐπιμελῆται, curators, elected by the people. One of them was chosen from the sacred family of the Eumolpidæ; the other was one of the Ceryces, and the rest were from among the citizens. There were also ten persons who assisted at this and every other festival, called ιεροποιοί, because they offered sacrifices.—This festival was observed in the month Boedromion or September, and continued nine days, from the 15th till the 23d. During that time it was unlawful to arrest any man, or present any petition, on pain of forfeiting a thousand drachmas, or, according to others, on pain of death. It was also unlawful for those who were initiated to sit upon the cover of a well, to eat beans, mullets, or weazels. If any woman rode to Eleusis in a chariot, she was obliged, by an edict of Lycurgus, to pay 6000 drachmas. The design of this law was to destroy all distinction between the richer and poorer sort of citizens.—The first day of the celebration was called ἀννυμός, assembly, as it might be said that the worshippers first met together. The second day was called ἀλαβε μύσται, to the sea, you that are initiated, because they were commanded to purify themselves by bathing in the sea. On the third day sacrifices, and chiefly a mullet, were offered; as also barley from a field of Eleusis. These oblations were called Θύα, and held so sacred that the priests themselves were not, as in other sacrifices, permitted to partake of them. On the fourth day they made a solemn procession, in which the καλάθιον, holy basket of Ceres, was carried about in a consecrated cart, while on every side the people shouted, χαῖρε, Δημήτερ, hail, Ceres! After these followed women, called κιστοφόροι, who carried baskets, in which were sesamum, carded wool, grains of salt, a serpent, pomegranates, reeds, ivy-boughs, certain cakes, &c. The fifth was called ἡ τῶν λαμπάδων ἡμέρα, the torch-day, because on the following night the people ran about with torches in their hands. It was usual to dedicate torches to Ceres, and contend which should offer the largest in commemoration of the travels of the goddess, and of her lighting a torch at the flames of Mount Ætna. The sixth day was called Ἰαχχος, from Iacchus, the son of Jupiter and Ceres, who accompanied his mother in her search after Proserpina, with a torch in his hand. From that circumstance his statue had a torch in its hand, and was carried in solemn procession from the Ceramicus to Eleusis. The statue, with those that accompanied it, called Ἰαχχαγωγοί, was crowned with myrtle. In the way nothing was heard but singing and the noise of brazen kettles, as the votaries danced along. The way through which they issued from the city was called ιερά ὁδός, the sacred way; the resting-place, ιερά σκῆη, from a fig-tree which grew in the neighbourhood. They also stopped on a bridge over the Cephissus, where they derided those that passed by. After they had passed this bridge, they entered Eleusis by a place called μυστικὴ εἰσοδος, the mystical entrance. On the seventh day were sports, in which the victors were rewarded with a measure of barley, as that grain had been first sown in Eleusis. The eighth day was called Ἐπιδaurίαν ἡμέρα, because once Æsculapius, at his return from Epidaurus to Athens, was initiated by the repetition of the less mysteries. It became customary, therefore, to celebrate them a second time upon this, that such as had not hitherto been initiated might be lawfully admitted. The ninth and last day of the festival was called πλημοχύαι, earthen vessels, because it was usual to fill two such vessels with wine, one of which being placed towards the east, and the other towards the west, which, after the repetition of some mystical words, were both thrown down, and the wine being spilled on the ground, was offered as a libation. The Eleusinian mysteries lasted about eighteen hundred years, and were finally abolished by Theodosius the Great.—Various opinions, as may well be supposed, have been entertained by modern scholars respecting the nature and end of the Eleusinian mysteries. The following are some of the results of the inquiries of the learned and judicious Lobeck. (Aglaophamus, p. 3, seqq.)—In the very early ages of Greece and Italy, and probably of most countries, the inhabitants of the various independent districts into which they were divided had very little communication with each other, and a stranger was regarded as little better than an enemy. Each state had its favourite deities, under whose especial protection it was held to be, and these deities were propitiated by sacrifices and ceremonies, which were different in different places. It is farther to be recollected, that the Greeks believed their gods to be very little superior in moral qualities to themselves, and they feared that if promises of more splendid and abundant sacrifices and offerings were made to them, they might not be able to resist the temptation. As the best mode of escaping the calamity of being deserted by their patrons, they adopted the expedient of concealing their names, and of excluding strangers from their worship. Private families, in like manner, excluded their fellow-citizens from their family-sacrifices; and in those states where ancient acrolites and such like were preserved as national palladia, the sight of them was restricted to the magistrates and principal persons in the state. (Aglaoph., p. 65, 273, 274.) We are to recollect, that Eleusis and Athens were long independent of each other. (Aglaoph., p. 214, 1351.—Müller, Dorians, vol. 1, p. 201.) The worship of Ceres and Proserpina was the national and secret religion of the Eleusinians, from which the Athenians were of course excluded, as well as all other Greeks. But when Eleusis was conquered, and the two states coalesced, the Athenians became participators in the worship of these deities; which, however, remained so long confined to them, as to have given rise to a proverb (Ἀττικοὶ τὰ Ἐλευσινία), applied to those who met together in secret for the performance of any matter. (Aglaoph., p. 271.) Gradually, with the advance of knowledge, and the decline of superstition and national illiberality, admission to witness the solemn rites celebrated each year at Eleusis was extended to all Greeks of either sex and of every rank, provided they came at the proper time, had committed no inexcusable offence, had performed the requisite previous ceremonies, and were introduced by an Athenian citizen. (Aglaoph., p. 14, 28, 31.) These mysteries, as they were termed, were performed with a considerable degree of splendour, at the charge of the state, and under the superintendence of the magistrates; whence it follows, as a necessary consequence, that the rites could have contained nothing that was grossly immoral or indecent. (Aglaoph., p. 116.) There does not appear to be any valid reason for supposing, as many do, that a public discourse on the origin of things and that of the gods, and on other high and important matters, was delivered by the Hierophant, whose name would rather seem to be derived from his exhibiting the sacred things, ancient statues probably of the goddesses, which were kept carefully covered up, and only shown on these solemn occasions. The delivery of a public discourse would, in fact, have been quite repugnant to the usages of the Greeks in their worship of the gods; and the evidence offered in support of this supposition is extremely feeble. But the singing of sacred hymns, in honour of the goddess, always formed a part of the service. (Aglaoph., p. 63, 193.—Müller, Prolegom., p. 259, seq.) The ancient writers are full of the praises of the Eleusinian mysteries, of the advantage of being initiated, i. e., admitted to participate in them, and of the favour of the gods in life, and the cheerful hopes in death, which were the consequence of it. Hence occasion has been taken to assert, that a system of religion little inferior to pure Christianity was taught in them. But these hopes, and this tranquillity of mind and favour of heaven, are easy to be accounted for without having recourse to so absurd a supposition. Every act performed in obedience to the will of Heaven is believed to draw down its favour on the performer. The Mussulman makes his pilgrimage to the Kaaba at Mecca, the Catholic to Loretto, Compostella, or elsewhere; and each is persuaded that, by having done so, he has secured the divine favour. (Aglaoph., p. 70, seq.) So the Greek who was initiated at Eleusis (the mysteries of which place, owing to the fame in which Athens stood, and the splendour and magnificence with which they were performed, eclipsed all others) retained ever after a lively sense of the happiness which he had enjoyed, when admitted to view the interior of the illuminated temple, and the sacred relics which it contained, when, to his excited imagination, the very gods themselves seemed visibly to descend from their Olympian abodes, amid the solemn hymns of the officiating priests. Hence there naturally arose a persuasion, that the benign regards of the gods were bent upon him through after life; and, as man can never divest himself of the belief of his continued existence after death, a vivid hope of enjoying bliss in the life to come. It was evidently the principle already stated, of seeking to discover the causes of remarkable appearances, which gave origin to most of the ideas respecting the recondite sense of the actions and ceremonies which took place in the Eleusinian mysteries. The stranger, dazzled and awed by his own conception of the sacredness and importance of all he beheld, conceived that nothing there could be without some mysterious meaning. What this might be he inquired of the officiating ministers, who, as various passages in Herodotus and Pausanias show, were seldom without a legend or Sacred Account (ἱερὸς λόγος), as it was called, to explain the dress or ceremony, which owed, perhaps, its true origin to the caprice or sportive humour of a ruder period. Or if the initiated person was himself endowed with inventive power, he explained the appearances according, in general, to the system of philosophy which he himself had embraced. (Aglaoph., p. 180, seq.) It was thus that Porphyry conceived the Hierophant to represent the Platonic Demiurgus or creator of the world; the torch-bearer (φάρος) the sun; the altar-man (ὁ ἐπὶ βωμῷ), the moon; the herald (κῆρυξ) Hermes; and the other ministers the inferior stars. These fancies of priests and philosophers have been formed by modern writers into a complete system, and Saint-Croix in particular describes the Eleusinian mysteries with as much minuteness as if he had been actually himself initiated. (Compare Warburton's Dis. Legation.—Saint-Croix, Recherches sur les Mystères, &c.)—It is to be observed, in conclusion, with respect to the charges of impiety and immorality brought against the Eleusinian mysteries by some Fathers of the Church, that this arose from their confounding them with the Bacchic, Isiac, Mithraic, and other private mysteries, mostly imported from Asia, which were undoubtedly liable to that imputation. It must always be remembered, that those of Eleusis were public, and celebrated by the state. (Aglaoph., p. 116, 197, 202, 1263.—Müller, Proleg., p. 248, seq.—Keightley's Mythology, p. 181, seq.)

ELEUSIS or ELEUSIN, I. an ancient city of Bœotia, which stood, according to tradition, near Copæ and the Lake Copais, and was, together with another ancient city, named Athenæ, inundated by the waters of that lake. (Strab., 407.) Stephanus of Byzantium reports, that when Crates drained the waters which had overspread the plains, the city of Athenæ became visible (s. v. Ἀθῆναι). Compare Müller, Gesch. Hellenisch. Stämme und Städte, vol. 1, p. 57, seqq.—II. A city of Attica, equidistant from Megara and the Piræus, and famed for the celebration of the mysteries of Ceres. According to some writers, it derived its name from a hero, whom some affirmed to be the son of Mercury, but others of Oryges. (Pausan., 1, 38.—Compare Aristid., Rhet. Eleus., vol. 1, p. 257.) Its origin is certainly of the highest antiquity, as it appears to have already existed in the time of Cecrops. (Strabo, 387), but we are not informed by whom, or at what period, the worship of Ceres was introduced there. Eusebius places the building of the first temple in the reign of Pandion (Chron., 2, p. 66); but, according to other authors, it is more ancient. (Ann. Alex., Strom., 1, p. 381.—Tatian, ad Græc., c. 61.) Cereus is said to have been king of Eleusis when Ceres first arrived there. (Horn., Hymn. in Cere., 96.—Id. ibid., 356.—Id. ibid., 471.) Some etymologists suppose that Eleusis was so called, because Ceres, after traversing the whole world in pursuit of her daughter, came here (ἐλκύνω, venio), and ended her search. Diodorus Siculus (5, 69) makes the name Eleusis to have been given this city, as a monument to posterity, that corn and the art of cultivating it were brought from abroad into Attica; or, to use the words of the historian, "because the person who brought thither the seed of corn came from foreign parts." At one period Eleusis was powerful enough to contend with Athens for the sovereignty of Attica. This was in the time of Eumolpus. The controversy was ended by a treaty, wherein it was stipulated that Eleusis should yield to the control of Athens, but that the sacred rites of Ceres should be celebrated at the former city. Ceres and Triptolemus were both worshipped here with peculiar solemnity, and here also was shown the Rarius Campus, where Ceres was said to have first sown corn. (Pausanias, 1, 38.) Dodwell observes, that the soil, though arid, still produces abundant harvests (vol. 1, p. 583). The temple of Eleusis was burned by the Persian army, in the invasion of Attica (Herod., 9, 65), but was rebuilt, under the administration of Pericles, by Ictinus, the architect of the Parthenon. (Strabo, 395.—Plut., Vit. Periclis.) Strabo says, that the mystic cell of this celebrated edifice was capable of containing as many persons as a theatre. A portico was afterward added by Demetrius Phalereus, who employed for that purpose the architect Philo. This magnificent structure was entirely destroyed by Alaric A.D. 396 (Eunap., Vit. Soph., p. 75), and has ever since remained in ruins. Eleusis, though so considerable and important a place, was classed among the Attic demi. (Strabo, l. c.) It belonged to the tribe Hippothontis. (Steph. Byz., s. v. 'Ελευσίς.) Livy speaks of the citadel as being a fortress of some strength, comprised within the sacred precincts of the temple (31, 25.—Compare Scylax Periplus, p. 21); and Dodwell observes (vol. 1, p. 584), that the acropolis was elevated upon a rocky ridge, which rises to the north of the temple of Ceres.—Eleusis, now called Lessina, is an inconsiderable village, inhabited by a few Albanian Christians. (Chandler's Travels, c. 42.) The colossal statue of the Eleusinian Ceres, the work of Phidias, after having suffered many mutilations, was brought over to England by Dr. Clarke and Mr. Cripps in 1801, and now stands in the vestibule of the University Library at Cambridge. The temple itself was subsequently cleared by Sir Wm. Gell. (Cramer's Ancient Greece, vol. 2, p. 360, seqq.)

ELEUTHERĀ, a city of Attica, on the road from Eleusis to Plataea, which appears to have once belonged to Boeotia, but finally became included within the limits of Attica. (Strabo, 412.) Pausanias reports (1, 38), that the Eleutherians were not conquered by the Athenians, but voluntarily united themselves to that people, from their constant enmity to the Thebans. Bacchus is said to have been born in this town. (Diod. Sic., 3, 65.) This ancient site probably corresponds with that now called Gypto Castro, where modern travellers have noticed the ruins of a considerable fortress situated on a steep rock, and apparently designed to protect the pass of Cithæron. (Dodwell's Tour, vol. 1, p. 283.—Cramer's Ancient Greece, vol. 2, p. 407.)

ELEUTHERĪA, a festival celebrated at Plataea in honour of Jupiter Eleutherius, or the assertor of liberty, by delegates from almost all the cities of Greece. Its institution originated in this: after the victory obtained by the Grecians under Pausanias over Mardonius, the Persian general, in the vicinity of Plataea, an altar and statue were erected to Jupiter Eleutherius, who had freed the Greeks from the tyranny of the barbarians. It was farther agreed upon in a general assembly, by the advice of Aristides the Athenian, that deputies should be sent every fifth year from the different cities of Greece to celebrate the Eleutheria, or festival of liberty. The Plataeans celebrated also an anniversary festival in memory of those who had lost their lives in that famous battle. The celebration was thus: at break of day a procession was made with a trumpeter at the head, sounding a signal for battle. After him followed chariots loaded with myrrh, garlands, and a black bull, and certain free young men, as no signs of servility were to appear during the solemnity, because they in whose honour the festival was instituted had died in the defence of their country. They carried libations of wine and milk in largeearred vessels, with jars of oil and precious ointments. Last of all appeared the chief magistrate, who, though not permitted at other times to touch iron, or wear garments of any colour but white, yet appeared clad in purple, and, taking a water-pot out of the city chamber, proceeded through the middle of the town with a sword in his hand, towards the sepulchres. There he drew water from a neighbouring spring, and washed and anointed the monuments: after which he sacrificed a bull upon a pile of wood, invoking Jupiter and Mercury, and inviting to the entertainment the souls of those happy heroes who had perished in the defence of their country. After this, he filled a bowl with wine, saying, "I drink to those who lost their lives in the defence of the liberties of Greece."—There was also a festival of the same name observed by the Samians in honour of the god of Love—Slaves also, when they obtained their liberty, kept a holyday, which they called Eleutheria.

ELEUTHĒRO-CILICES, a name given to those of the Cilicians who had fled to the mountains when the Greek settlers established themselves in that country. The appellation, which means "Free Cilicians," has reference to their independent mode of life. The Greeks, however, connected a fable with this. According to them, when Myrina, queen of the Amazons, was spreading her conquests over Asia Minor, the Cilicians were the only people that voluntarily surrendered to her, and hence they were allowed to retain their freedom. (Diod. Sic., 3, 55.) Xenophon also makes mention of the Cilician mountaineers (Anab., 1, 2), and of their having cut to pieces some Greek troops, a part of those in the army of Cyrus, who had lost their way. Cicero came in contact with them during his government in Cilicia, and partially reduced them under the Roman sway, but they soon after became as free and independent as ever. (Ep. ad Fam., 15, 4; ad Att., 5, 20.)

ELEUTHĒRO-LACŌNES, a title conferred by Augustus on a considerable part of the Laconian nation, consisting of several maritime towns, for the zeal which the inhabitants had early testified in favour of the Romans. Enfranchisement and other privileges accompanied the title. (Strabo, 336.—Pausan., 3, 21.)

ELEUTHĒROPOLIS, a city of Palestine, placed by the Itin. Ant. 24 miles northeast from Ascalon, and 20 miles southwest from Jerusalem. It was founded in the third century, but by whom is uncertain. (Amm. Marcell., 23, 1.) Hence, owing to its late foundation, no mention of it occurs in Ptolemy or Josephus. In the days of Eusebius and Jerome, however, it was an important and flourishing city, and these writers estimate the distances and positions of places from this and Elia or Jerusalem. St. Epiphanius was born here. (Sozom., 6, 32.—Compare Cellarius, Geogr. Ant., vol. 1, p. 490.)

ELEUTHO, a surname of Lucina, from her coming, when invoked, to the aid of women in labour. (Pind., Ol., 6, 72.)

ELICIES, a surname of Jupiter, worshipped on Mount Aventine. The Romans gave him this name, according to Ovid (Fast., 3, 328), because they believed that they could, by a set form of words, draw him down (elicere) from the sky, to inform them how to expiate prodigies, &c. M. Salverte, in his curious and learned work on the Occult Sciences of the Ancients (Des Sciences Occultes, ou Essai sur la Magic, &c., Paris, 1829, 2 vols. 8vo), takes up this subject of Jupiter Elicius, and seeks to connect it with a knowledge of the art of drawing down the electric fluid from the clouds. Medals and traditions are the grounds on which he rests. "M. La Boessière," he states, "mentions several medals which appear to have a reference to this subject. One described by M. Duchoul represents the temple of Juno, the goddess of the air: the roof which covers it is armed with pointed rods. Au-other, described and engraved by Pellerin, bears the legend Jupiter Elicius; the god appears with the lightning in his hand; beneath is a man guiding a winged stag; but we must observe, that the authenticity of this medal is suspected. Finally, other medals cited by Duchoul, in his work on the Religion of the Romans, present the exergue; XV. Viri Sacris Faciundis; and bear a fish covered with points placed on a globe or on a patera. M. la Boessière thinks, that a fish or a globe, thus armed with points, was the conductor employed by Numa to withdraw from the clouds the electric fire. And, comparing the figure of this globe with that of a head covered with erect hair, he gives an ingenious and plausible explanation of the singular dialogue between Numa and Jupiter, related by Valerius Antias, and ridiculed by Arnobius (lib. 5.), probably without its being understood by either.—The history of the physical attainments of Numa deserves particular examination. At a period when lightning was occasioning continual injury, Numa, instructed by the nymph Egeria, sought a method of appeasing the lightning (fulmen pacare); that is to say, in plain language, a way of rendering this meteor less destructive. He succeeded in intoxicating Faunus and Picus, whose names in this place probably denote only the priests of these Etruscan divinities; he learned from them the secret of making, without any danger, the thundering Jupiter descend upon earth, and immediately put it in execution. Since that period, Jupiter Elicius, or Jupiter who is made to descend, was adored in Rome. Here the veil of the mystery is transparent: to render the lightning less injurious, to make it, without danger, descend from the bosom of the clouds; and the effect and the end are common to the beautiful discovery of Franklin, and to that religious experiment which Numa frequently repeated with success. Tullus Hostilius was less fortunate. 'It is related,' says Livy, 'that this prince, in searching the memoirs left by Numa, found among them some instructions relative to the secret sacrifices offered to Jupiter Elicius. He attempted to repeat them; but in the preparations or in the celebration he deviated from the sacred rite. . . . Exposed to the anger of Jupiter, evoked by a defective ceremony (sollicitati prava religione), he was struck by the lightning and burned, together with his palace' (1, 31.—Compare Plin., 2, 53.—Id., 38, 4). An ancient annalist quoted by Pliny, expresses himself in a more explicit manner, and justifies the liberty we take in departing from the sense commonly given to the sentences of Livy by his translators. Guided by the books of Numa, Tullus undertook to evoke Jupiter by the aid of the same ceremonies which his predecessors had employed. Having departed from the prescribed rite, he was struck by the lightning and perished. (Lucius Piso, ap. Plin., 28, 2.) For the words rites and ceremonies, substitute the words physical process, and we shall perceive that the fate of Tullus was that of Professor Reichmann. In 1753 this learned man was killed by the lightning, when repeating too incautiously the experiments of Franklin." (Salverte, vol. 2, p. 154.) The art thus veiled under the name of rites of Jupiter Elicius, and Ζεύς καταιβήτης, M. Salverte considers as having been employed by the various imitators of thunder. Going back to the age of Prometheus, it affords an explanation of the fable of Salmoëus; it was employed by Zoroaster to kindle the sacred fire (Dion Chrysost., Orat. Borysth.), and perform, in the initiation of his followers, some of the miracles, of which a traditional belief still exists in the East. It may be inferred, that in the time of Ctesias the same art was known in India, and that the Jews were not unacquainted with its effects would appear from some remarks of Michaelis cited by M. Salverte. He remarks, "1. That there is nothing to indicate that the lightning ever struck the temple of Jerusalem during the lapse of a thousand years. 2. That, according to the account of Josephus (Bell. Jud., 5, 14), a forest of spikes with golden or gilt points, and very sharp, covered the roof of this temple; a remarkable feature of resemblance with the temple of Juno represented on the Roman medals. 3. That this roof communicated with the caverns in the hill of the temple, by means of metallic tubes, placed in connexion with the thick gilding that covered the whole exterior of the building. The points of the spikes there necessarily produced the effect of lightning-rods. . . . How are we to suppose that it was only by chance they discharged so important a function; that the advantage received from it had not been calculated; that the spikes were erected in such great numbers only to prevent the birds from lodging upon and defiling the roof of the temple! Yet this is the sole utility which the historian Josephus attributes to them. His ignorance is an additional proof of the facility with which the higher branches of knowledge must be lost, so long as men, instead of forming them into an organized system of science, sought only an empirical art of operating wonders." (Salverte, vol. 2, p. 166.—Foreign Quarterly, No. 12, p. 449, seqq.)

ELIÆR, a name given to the school of philosophy established by Phædo of Elis. (Laert., 2, 106.) It was instituted after the Socratic model by Phædo of Elis, and was continued by Plistanus an Elian, and afterward by Menedemus of Eretria. (Enfield's History of Philosophy, vol. 1, p. 204.)

ELIMÆA or ELIMIOTIS, a region of Macedonia, to the east of Symphalia. It was at one time independent, but was afterward conquered by the kings of Macedonia, and finally included by the Romans in the fourth division of that province. (Thucyd., 2, 99.—Liv., 45, 30.) Though a mountainous and barren tract, Elimeæ must have been a very important acquisition to the kings of Macedonia, from its situation with regard to Epirus and Thessaly, there being several passages leading directly into those provinces from Elimeæ. The mountains which separated Elimeæ from Thessaly were the Cambunii Montes of Livy (42, 53), which cross nearly at right angles the chain of Pindus to the west, and that of Olympus to the east. Ptolemy has assigned to the Elimioteæ a maritime situation on the coast of Illyria, which cannot be correct (p. 81), but elsewhere he places them in the interior of Macedonia (p. 83), and writes the name Elymioteæ. According to Stephanus of Byzantium, there was a town named Elimeæ or Elimeum, which tradition reported to have been founded by Elymas, a Tyrrhenian chief (s. v. Elymetæ). Ptolemy calls it Elyma. Livy probably alludes to this city in his account of the expedition undertaken by Perses against Stratus, when that prince assembled his forces and reviewed them at Elymea (43, 21). This capital of Elimiotis stood, perhaps, on the Haliacmon, not far from Greuno. (Cramer's Ancient Greece, vol. 1, p. 200, seqq.)

ELIS, I. a district of the Peloponnesus, lying west of Arcadia. At the period of the Peloponnesian war, the name of Elis was applied to the whole of that northwestern portion of the peninsula situated between the rivers Larissus and Neda, which served to separate it from Achaia and Messenia. (Strabo, 336.) But in earlier times, this tract of country was divided into several districts or principalities, each occupied by a separate clan or people. Of these the Cæoneæ were probably the most ancient, and also the most widely disseminated, since we find them occupying both extremities of the province, and extending even into Achaia. (Strabo, 342.) Strabo affirms, that, according to some authors, the whole of Elis once bore the name of Cauconia. Next to these were the Epei, who are placed by Homer (Od., 15, 296) in the northern part of the province, and next to Achaia. Pausanias who seems to have regarded them as indigenous, derives their name from Epeus, son of Endymion, or of the earliest sovereigns of the country ; on his death his brother Atolus succeeded to his crown ; but, as he was shortly after forced to fly his country for an involuntary crime, the sovereignty devolved on Eleus, descended also from Endymion, who gave his name to the Elean people (5, 1). The former appellation, however, still continued to predominate, as we may infer from the poems of Homer, who mentions Elis as a district of the Epei, without ever naming the Elei. Strabo also states, that Elis did not become the capital of the country till after the Persian war, at which period it was formed into a city by the union of several smaller towns. Prior to the siege of Troy, the Epei are said to have been greatly reduced by their wars with Hercules, who conquered Augeas their king, and the Pylans commanded by Nestor. They subsequently, however, acquired a great accession of strength by the influx of a large colony from Ætolia, under the conduct of Oxylus, and their numbers were further increased by a considerable detachment of the Dorians and Heraclidæ. (Strabo, 354.—Pausan., 5, 3.) Iphitus, descended from Oxylus, and a contemporary of Lycurgus, re-established the Olympic games, which, though instituted, as it was said, by Hercules, had been interrupted for several years. (Pausan., 5, 4.) The Pisatæ having remained masters of Olympia from the first celebration of the festival, long disputed its possession with the Eleans, but they were finally conquered, when the temple and presidency of the games fell into the hands of their rivals. The preponderance obtained by the latter is chiefly attributable to the assistance they derived from Sparta, in return for the aid afforded to that power in the Messenian war. From this period we may date the ascendancy of Elis over all the other surrounding districts hitherto independent. It now comprised not only the country of the Epei and Caucones, which might be termed Elis Proper, but the territories of Pisa and Olympia, forming the ancient kingdom of Pelops, and the whole of Triphylia, which, according to Strabo's view of the Homeric geography, constituted the greater part of Nestor's dominions. (Strabo, 355.) The Eleans were present in all the engagements fought against the Persians, and, in the Peloponnesian war, zealously adhered to the Spartan confederacy, until the conclusion of the treaty after the battle of Amphipolis, when an open rupture took place between this people and the Lacedæmonians, in consequence of protection and countenance afforded by the latter to the inhabitants of Lepreum, who had revolted from them. (Thucyd., 5, 31.) Such was the resentment of the Eleans on this occasion, that they imposed a heavy fine on the Lacedæmonians, and prohibited their taking part in the Olympic games. They also made war upon Sparta, in conjunction with the Mantineans, Argives, and Athenians ; and it was not till after the unsuccessful battle of Mantinea that this confederacy was dissolved. (Thucyd., 5, 81.) The Lacedæmonians, on the other hand, avenged those injuries by frequent incursions into the territory of Elis, the fertility of which presented an alluring prospect of booty to an invading army. They were beaten, however, at Olympia under the command of Agis (Xen., Hist. Gr., 3, 2, 16.—Pausan., 5, 4) ; and again repulsed before the city of Elis, whither they had advanced under Pausanias, in the 3d year of the 94th Olympiad. (Diod. Sic., 14, 17.) At length the Eleans, wearied with the continual incursions to which their country was exposed, since it furnished entire subsistence to the army of the enemy, gladly sued for peace, and renewed their ancient alliance with Sparta. (Xen., Hist. Gr., 3, 2.—Pausan., 1 c.) Not long after, however, we find them again at arms, together with the Boeotians and Argives, against that power. (Xen., Hist. Gr., 7, 2.) At the battle of Mantinea, they once more fought under the Spartan banners, jealousy of the rising ascendancy obtained by the Thebans having led them to abandon their interests. (Xen., Hist. Gr., 7, 5, 1.) Pausanias writes, that when Philip acquired the dominion of Greece, the Eleans, who had suffered much from civil dissensions, joined the Macedonian alliance, but refused to fight against the Athenians and Thebans at Chæronea, and on the death of Alexander they united their arms with those of the other confederates, who carried on the war of Lamia against Antipater and the other commanders of the Macedonian forces. Some years after, Aristotimus, son of Damaretus, through the assistance of Antigonus Gonatas, usurped the sovereignty of Elis ; but a conspiracy having been formed against him, he was slain at the altar of Jupiter Servator, whither he had fled for refuge. (Pausan., 5, 4, 5.) During the Social war, the Eleans were the firmest allies of the Ætolians in the Peloponnesus ; and though they were on more than one occasion basely deserted by that people, and sustained heavy losses in the field, as well as from the devastation of their territory and the capture of their towns, they could not be induced to desert their cause and join the Achæan league. (Polyb., 4, 5, seqq.—Id., 4, 59, seqq.—Id., 4, 71, seqq.—Id., 5, 17, seqq.) These events, described by Polybius, are the last in which the Eleans are mentioned as an independent people : for though they do not appear to have taken any part in the Achæan war, they were included with the rest of the Peloponnesus in the general decree, by which the whole of Greece was annexed to the Roman empire.—Elis was by far the most fertile and populous district of the Peloponnesus, and its inhabitants are described as fond of agriculture and rural pursuits. (Polyb., 4, 73.) It is remarked by Pausanias (5, 5), that Elis was the only part of Greece in which the byssus was known to grow. Another extraordinary circumstance relative to this province was, that no mules were engendered in it, though they abounded in the adjoining countries. This phenomenon had been noticed before by Herodotus (1, 30), who reports that it was looked upon as resulting from the curse of Heaven—Elis was divided into three districts, Elis Proper, Pisatis, and Triphylia. The first of these occupied the northern section of the country, and has already been alluded to : the second, or Pisatis, was that part of the Elean territory through which flowed the Alpheus after its junction with the Erymanthus. It derived its name from the city of Pisa : the third, or Triphylia, formed the southern division. Some authors have derived the name of this portion of Elis from Triphylus, an Arcadian prince. (Polyb., 4, 77.) But others ascribe it with more probability to the circumstance of its inhabitants having sprung from three different nations (τρία ἔθλα), the Epei, the Minyæ or Arcadians, and the Eleans. (Strabo, 337.—Cramer's Ancient Greece, vol. 3, p. 77, seqq.)—II. The capital of Elis, situated, as we learn from Strabo, on the Peneus, at the distance of 120 stadia from the sea. It was, like many other towns of Greece, at first composed of several detached villages, which, being united after the Persian war, formed one considerable city. It always, however, remained without walls ; as it was deemed sacred, and under the immediate protection of the god whose festival was there solemnized. Hence, in early times, according to Ephorus, those troops which were obliged to traverse this country delivered up their arms on entering it, and received them again upon quitting the frontier. (Ap. Strabo, 357.—Compare Xen., Hist. Gr., 3, 2, 20.) But this primitive state of things was not of long duration : for we subsequently find the Elean territory as little respected as any other Grecian state by the powers at war with that republic ; still the peace and tranquillity thus enjoyed for a time by the Eleans, together with the vast concourse of persons attracted by the Olympic games, greatly contributed to the prosperity and opulence of their city. The remains of Elis are now called Palaepoli, but they are inconsiderable, neither are they interesting from their state of preservation. (Compare the remarks of Chandler, Travels, vol. 2, ch. 74.—Dodgell, vol. 2, p. 316.—Gell, Itin. of the Morea, p. 32.—Cramer's Ancient Greece, vol. 3, p. 88, seqq.)

ELISSA, another name for Dido. (Vid. Dido.)

ELLOPIA, a district of Eubœa, in the northern part of the island, in which Histiaea was situated. According to some, it derived its name from Ellops, a son of Ion, who settled here. (Strab., 445.)

ELPINICE, a daughter of Miltiades. (Vid. Callias and Cimon.)

ELYMAIS, a province of Persia, lying to the south of Media, and forming the northern part of the larger district of Susiana. It derived its name from the Elymaei. These were originally seated in the north (Polyb., 5, 44), but in process of time spread themselves over all the rest of Susiana, to the shores of the Persian Gulf. (Strab., Epit., 11, p. 1264, ed. Ozon.) Elymais, the metropolis of the province, was famed for a rich temple, which Antiochus Epiphanes attempted to plunder; he was beaten off, however, by the inhabitants. The temple was afterward plundered by one of the Parthian kings, who found in it, according to Strabo, 10,000 talents. (Mannert, Geogr., vol. 5, pt. 2, p. 158.)

ELYMŌTIS, a district of Macedonia, in the south-west, bordering on Thessaly and Epirus.

ELYSIŪ CAMPI, the abode of the blessed in another world, where they enjoyed all manner of the purest pleasures. In the Homeric mythology, the Elysian fields lay on the western margin of the earth, by the stream of Oceanus, and to them the mortal relatives of the king of the gods were transported, without tasting of death, to enjoy an immortality of bliss. (Od., 4, 563, seqq.) In the time of Hesiod, the Elysian Plains had become the Isles of the Blessed, in the Western Ocean. (Op. et D., 169.) Pindar, who has left a glowing description of Elysium, appears to reduce the number of these happy islands to one. (Ol., 2, 129.) At a later day, a change of religious ideas ensued, brought about by the increase of geographical knowledge, and Elysium was moved down to the lower world, as the place of reward for the good. The poetical conceptions respecting Elysium made it a region dowered with perpetual spring, clothed with continual verdure, enamelled with flowers, shaded by pleasant groves, and refreshed by never-failing fountains. Here the righteous lived in perfect felicity, communing with each other, bathed in a flood of light proceeding from their own sun, and the sky at eve being lighted up by their own constellations: “solenque suum, sua sidera norunt.” (Virg., Æn., 6, 541.) Their employments below resembled those on earth, and whatever had warmly engaged their attention in the upper world, continued to be a source of virtuous enjoyment in the world below. (Virg., Æn., 6, 653.)

EMATĪA, the more ancient name of Macedonia. Polybius (fragm., 24, 8) and Livy (40, 3) expressly assert, however, that Emathia was originally called Pæonia, though Homer certainly mentions them as two distinct countries. (Cramer's Ancient Greece, vol. 1, p. 226.)

EMERĪTA AUGUSTA, a town of Lusitania, below Norba Caesarca, on the northern bank of the Anas. It is now Merida. (Plin., 9, 41.)

EMĒSA, an ancient city of Syria, situate near the eastern bank of the Orontes, southeast of Epiphania. It was the birthplace of the Emperor Heliogabalus, and contained a famous temple of the Sun, in which Heliogabalus was priest. It is now called Hems, and is merely a large ruinous town, containing about 2000 inhabitants, though formerly a strong and populous city. (Amm. Marcell., 26, 18.)

EMŌDI MONTES, part of a chain of mountains in Asia. Pliny (6, 16) states, that the Fmora Montes, and those of Imaus, Paropamisus, and Caucasus were connected together. That part of the chain which Alexander crossed in order to invade Bactriana was called Paropamisus, the more easterly continuation of the range was termed Emodi Montes, and its still farther continuation, even to the Eastern Ocean, was styled Imaus. (Vid. Imaus.)

EMPEDOCLES, a native of Agrigentum in Sicily, who flourished about 450 B.C. He was distinguished not only as a philosopher, but also for his knowledge of natural history and medicine, and as a poet and statesman. After the death of his father Meto, who was a wealthy citizen of Agrigentum, he acquired a great weight among his fellow-citizens by espousing the popular party and favouring democratic measures. His consequence in the state became at length so great, that he ventured to assume several of the distinctions of royalty, particularly a purple robe, a golden girdle, a Delphic crown, and a train of attendants, always retaining a grave and commanding aspect. The skill which he possessed in medicine and natural philosophy enabled him to perform many wonders, which he passed upon the superstitious and credulous multitude for miracles. He pretended to drive away noxious winds from his country, and thereby put a stop to epidemic diseases. He is said to have checked, by the power of music, the madness of a young man who was threatening his enemy with instant death; to have restored a woman to life who had lain breathless thirty days; and to have done many other things, equally astonishing, after the manner of Pythagoras. On account of all this, he was an object of universal admiration, so that when he came to the Olympic games the eyes of all the people were fixed upon him. Besides medical skill, Empedocles possessed poetical talents. The fragments of his verses are scattered throughout the ancient writers, and Fabricius is of opinion that he was the real author of that ancient fragment which bears the name of the “Golden Verses of Pythagoras.” Gorgias of Leontini, the well-known orator, was his pupil, whence it may seem reasonable to infer, that Empedocles was also no inconsiderable master of the art of eloquence. According to the common account, he threw himself into the burning crater of Ætna, in order that, the manner of his death not being known, he might afterward pass for a god; but the secret was discovered by means of one of his brazen sandals, which was thrown out from the mountain in a subsequent eruption of the volcano. This story is rejected, however, as fictitious by Strabo and other judicious writers. The truth probably was, as Timæus relates, that, towards the close of his life, Empedocles went into Greece and never returned, whence the exact time and manner of his death remain unknown. According to Aristotle, he died at 60 years of age.—His masters in philosophy are variously given. By some, like the Eleatic generally, he is called a Pythagorean, in consequence of a resemblance of doctrine in a few unessential points. But the principles of his theory evidently show that he belongs to the Eleatic school, though the statement which makes him a disciple of Parmenides rests apparently upon no better foundation than a comparison of their systems: as, in like manner, the common employment of the mechanical physiology has led to an opinion that he was a hearer of his contemporary Anaxagoras. Empedocles taught, that originally All was one: God eternal and at rest; a sphere and a mixture (σφαῖρα, μίγμα), without a vacuum, in which the elements of things were held together in undistinguishable confusion by love (φιλία), the primal force which unites the like to like. In a portion of this whole, however, or, as he expresses it, in the members of the Deity, strife (εἰς), the force which binds like to unlike, prevailed, and gave the elements a tendency to separate themselves, whereby the first become perceptible as such, although the separation was not so complete but that each contained portions of the others. Hence arose the multiplicity of things. By the vivifying counteraction of love, organic life was produced, not, however, so perfect and so full of design as it now appears; but, at first, single limbs, then irregular combinations, till ultimately they received their present adjustments and perfection. But, as the forces of love and hate are constantly acting upon each other for generation or destruction, the present condition of things cannot persist for ever, and the world which, properly, is not the All, but only the ordered part of it, will again be reduced to a chaotic unity, out of which a new system will be formed, and so on for ever. There is no real destruction of anything, but only a change of combinations.—Of the elements (which he seems to have been the first to exhibit as four distinct species of matter), fire, as the rarest and most powerful, he held to be the chief, and, consequently, the soul of all sentient and intellectual beings which issue from the central fire, or soul of the world. The soul migrates through animal and vegetable bodies in atonement for some guilt committed in its unembodied state, when it is a demon; of which he supposed that an infinite number existed. The seat of a demon, when in a human body, is the blood. Closely connected with this view of the objects of knowledge was his theory of human knowledge. In the impure separation of the elements, it is only the predominant one that the senses can apprehend; and, consequently, though man can know all the elements of the whole singly, he is unable to see them in their perfect unity, wherein consists their truth. Empedocles therefore rejects the testimony of the senses, and maintains that pure intellect alone can arrive at a knowledge of the truth. This is the attribute of the Deity; for man cannot overlook the work of love in all its extent; and the true unity is open only to itself. Hence he was led to distinguish between the world as presented to our senses (κόσμος αἰσθητός), and its type the intellectual world (κόσμος νοητός).—The fragments of Empedocles were published, with a commentary, by Sturz, Lips., 1805, 8vo, and by Peyron, Lips., 1810, 8vo. (Enfield, Hist. Phil., vol. 1, p. 402.—Encyc. Useful Knowl., vol. 9, p. 382.)

ΕΜΠΟΡΙÆ, a country of Africa Propria, called also Byzacium, situate to the north of the Syrtis Minor. (Polyb., 3, 23.) In it stood Leptis Minor, below Hadrumetum. This city is said to have paid to the Carthaginians a talent each day. It was, in fact, a very fruitful district; and Polybius says, that almost all the hopes of the Carthaginians depended on the revenue they drew from it. (Compare Scylax, p. 49.) To this were owing the anxiety and state jealousy of the Carthaginians, that the Romans should not sail beyond the Fair promontory which lay before Carthage, and become acquainted with a region which they might be tempted to conquer. (Mannert, Geogr., vol. 10, pt. 2, p. 160.)

ENCELADUS, one of the giants that warred against Jove. Minerva flung upon him, as he fled, the island of Sicily, where his motions caused, according to the poets, the eruptions of Ætna. (Pind., Pyth., 8, 15.—Id., Nem., 1, 100.—Id. ib., 4, 40.—Eurip., Ion, 204, seqq.—Apollod., 1, 6, 2.)

ENDYMION, the son of Æthlius and Calyce. He led a colony of Æolians from Thessaly, and founded the city of Elis. Endymion, it is said, gained the love of the goddess Selene, or the Moon, and she bore him fifty daughters. (Pausan., 5, 1.) Jove, as a favour, allowed him to live as long as he pleased (Schol. ad Apoll. Rh., 4, 57); or, as others said, granted him the boon of perpetual sleep. The place of his repose was a cavern of Mount Latmus in Caria, and thither Selene used to repair to visit him. Some said he was made immortal for his righteousness; others, that, like Ixion, when raised to heaven, he aspired to the love of

Juno, and was hurled to Erebus. (Schol. ad Apoll. Rh., l. c.)—There can be very little doubt that this mysterious being was originally an object of worship, and that he was converted into a hero in the usual manner. The sire assigned to him is nothing more than a personification of the Olympic Games. His union with the moon, and their fifty daughters, will perhaps furnish a key to his true nature. In these daughters Bockh sees the fifty lunar months which formed the Olympic cycle of four years. In such case, Endymion would probably be the sun, who, with the moon, is the author of the months; or, supposing the myth anterior to the institution of the Olympic games, the daughters may have been the weeks of the year (the round number being employed as usual), of which the sun and moon are the parents. The conjunction of these bodies at the time of new moon is a matter of common observation. Endymion is perhaps the setting sun, who goes into (ἐνδύει) the sea, or, possibly, in the early myth, into the cavern where he meets the moon. (Müller, Proleg., p. 223.—Keightley's Mythology, p. 439, seqq.) The rationalizers said, that Endymion was a hunter, who used to go to the chase at night, when the beasts came out to feed, and to sleep in a cavern during the day; and hence he was supposed to be always asleep. (Schol. ad Apoll. Rh., l. c.)

ΕΝΙΠΕΥΣ, I. a river of Macedonia, in the district of Pieria, rising in Mount Olympus, and, though nearly dry in summer, becoming a considerable torrent in winter from the heavy rains. Its rugged and steep banks, which in some places attained a height of 300 feet, served for a long time as a defence to the Macedonian army under Perseus, when encamped on its left bank, until Paulus Æmilius, by sending a considerable detachment round the Perrhæbian mountains, threatened the rear of the enemy, and forced him to abandon his advantageous situation. (Liv., 44, 8 and 35.—Plut., Vit. Paul. Æmil.) The modern name of this stream, according to Dr. Clarke, is Malathria. (Travels—Greece, Egypt, &c., vol. 7, p. 390.)—II. A river of Thessaly, flowing into the Apidanus, which afterward enters the Peneus. It rose in Mount Othrys (Strabo, 256), and flowed from Achaia, or the southwestern part of Phthiotis, as we learn from Thucydides (4, 78), who remarks that Brasidas was arrested in his march through Thessaly when about to cross the Enipeus. It is now called the river of Goura. Near the Enipeus, and not far from its junction with the Apidanus, was situate the city of Pharsalus. (Cramer's Ancient Greece, vol. 1, p. 399.)—III. A small river of Elis, flowing near the city of Salmone. (Apollod., 1, 9, 8.) In Strabo's time it was called the Barnichius. (Strab., 356.)

ENNA, a city of Sicily, one of the most ancient seats of the Siculi, and celebrated over the whole island, not so much for its size and opulence, as for its being the principal centre of the worship of Ceres. The adjacent country was remarkable for its fertility; and in the plains of Enna Proserpina was sporting when Pluto carried her away to be mistress of the lower world. Here, too, she had Minerva and Diana for her youthful companions. (Diod. Sic., 5, 3.) In the neighbourhood of the city was a cave, facing the north, through which the King of Hades is said to have driven his chariot as he was bearing off his prize. We have in this, no doubt, some old Siculan legend, appropriated by the Greeks to goddesses of their own mythology. Enna was regarded as the navel of Sicily (ὀμφαλὸς Σικελίας.—Callim., Hymn. in Cer., v. 15.—Compare Cic. in Verr., 4, 48, seqq.), and here Ceres and Proserpina had one of their most sacred temples. In a political point of view Enna was never of any importance. From the hands of the Carthaginians it fell into those of the Romans, and subsequently, when about to abandon the latter and return to their former masters, the inhabitants met with prompt and signal chastisement. (Liv., 24, 38, seqq.) From this period the city gradually declined. The site of the ancient place is at present occupied by the modern Castro Giovanni, but nearly all traces of the blooming meads in its neighbourhood have disappeared. (For some account of the modern place and its vicinity, consult Hoar's Classical Tour, vol. 2, p. 247, seqq.)

ENNÆA HODOL, a spot in Thrace, near which the city of Amphipolis was founded. It appears to have derived its name, which means "the Nine Ways," from the number of roads which met here from different parts of Thrace and Macedon. This supposition is confirmed by travellers who have explored the adjacent country, and who report, that all the principal communications between the coast and plains must have led through this pass. It was here, according to Herodotus (7, 114), that Xerxes and his army crossed the Strymon on bridges, after having offered a sacrifice of white horses to that river, and buried alive nine youths and maidens. (Walpole's Collection, p. 510. — Cramer's Anc. Greece, vol. 1, p. 292.)

ENNIUS, Quintus, a poet, who has generally received the distinguished appellation of the Father of Roman Song. He was born at Rudia, a town of Calabria, and lived from B.C. 239 to B.C. 169. (Cic., Brutus, c. 18.—Id., de Senect., c. 5.) In his early youth he went to Sardinia; and, if Silius Italicus (12, 393) may be believed, he served in the Calabrian levies, which, in the year 216 B.C., followed Titus Manlius to the war which he waged in that island against the favourites of the Carthaginian cause. After the termination of the campaign, he continued to live for twelve years in Sardinia. Aurelius Victor says he taught Cato Greek in Sardinia ("In prætura Sardiniam subegit, ubi ab Ennio Græcis literis institutus"); but this is inconsistent with what is delivered by Cicero, that Cato did not acquire Greek till his old age. (De Senect., c. 8.) Ennius was at last brought to Rome by Cato the Censor, who, in 204 B.C., visited Sardinia, on returning as quæstor from Africa. (Corn. Nep., Vit. Cat.) At Rome he fixed his residence on the Aventine Hill, where he lived in a very frugal manner, having only a single maid as an attendant. (Hieron., Chron. Euseb., p. 37.) He instructed, however, the patrician youth in Greek, and acquired the friendship of many of the most illustrious men in the state. Being distinguished in arms as well as letters, he followed M. Fulvius Nobilior during his expedition to Ætolia (Cic., pro Archia, c. 10.—Id., Tusc. Disp., 1, 2); and, in 185 B.C., he obtained the freedom of the city, through the favour of Quintus Fulvius Nobilior, the son of his former patron, Marcus. (Cic., Brutus, c. 20.) He was also protected by the elder Scipio Africanus, whom he is said to have accompanied in most of his campaigns. (Claudian., de Laud. Stilic., lib. 3, præf.) It is not easy, however, to see in what expeditions he could have attended this renowned general. Scipio's Spanish and African wars were concluded before Ennius was brought from Sardinia to Rome; and the campaign against Antiochus was commenced and terminated while he was serving under Fulvius Nobilior in Ætolia. In his old age he obtained the friendship of Scipio Nasica; and the degree of intimacy subsisting between them has been characterized by the well-known anecdote of their successively feigning to be from home. (Cic., de Orat., 2, 68.) He is said to have been intemperate in drinking (Horat., Epist., 1, 19, 7), which brought on the disease called Morbis Articularis, a disorder resembling the gout, of which he died at the age of seventy, just after he had exhibited his tragedy of Thyestes. (Ser. Sammonicus, de Medicina, c. 37.) The evils, however, of old age and indigence were supported by him, as we learn from Cicero, with such patience, and even cheerfulness, that one would almost have imagined he derived satisfaction from circumstances which are usually regarded as, of all others, the most dispiriting and oppressive. (De Senect., c. 5.) The honours due to his character and talents were, as is frequently the case, reserved till after his death, when a bust of him was erected in the family tomb of the Scipios. (Cic., pro Arch., c. 9.—Val. Max., 8, 15, 1.) In the days of Livy the bust still remained near that sepulchre, beyond the Porta Capena, along with the statues of Africanus and Scipio Asiaticus (Liv. 38, 56). The tomb was discovered in 1780, on a farm situated between the Via Appia and Via Latina. The slabs, which have been removed to the Vatican, contained several inscriptions, commemorating different persons of the Scipian family. There were neither statues nor any memorials remaining of Africanus himself or Asiaticus (Baumes, Civil History of Rome, vol. 1, p. 357.—Hobhouse, Illustrations of Childe Harold, p. 167); but a laurelled bust of Pappirius stone, which was found here, and which now stands on the sarcophagus of Scipio Barbatus in the Vatican, is supposed to be that of Ennius. (Rome in the 19th Century, Letter 36, vol. 2, p. 401, Am. ed.) There is also still extant an epitaph, reported to have been written for himself (Cic., Tusc. Disp., 1, 15), strongly characteristic of that overweening conceit, and high estimation of his own talents, which are said to have formed a principal defect in his character:

"Adspicite, O cives, senis Enni imaginis formam.
Hic vestrum paxit maxima facta patrum.
Nemo me laetymus decorat, nec funera fletu
Fuxit—cur? volito vivus per ora virum."

To judge by the fragments of his works which remain, Ennius greatly surpassed his predecessors, not only in poetical genius, but in the art of versification. By his time, indeed, the best models of Greek composition had begun to be studied at Rome. Ennius particularly professed to have imitated Homer, and tried to persuade his countrymen that the soul and genius of that great poet had revived in him, through the medium of a peacock, according to the process of Pythagorean transmigration. From a passage in Lucretius (1, 118, seqq.), it would appear, that Ennius somewhere in his works had described a descent into hell, through which he feigned that the shade of Homer had conducted him in the same manner as Dante afterward chose Virgil for his mystagogue. Accordingly, we find in the works of Ennius innumerable imitations of the Iliad and Odyssey. It is, however, the Greek tragic writers whom he has chiefly imitated; and indeed it appears, from the fragments that remain, that all his plays were rather translations from the dramas of Sophocles and Euripides, on the same subjects which he has chosen, than original tragedies. They are founded on the old topics of Priam and Paris, Hector and Hecuba. Nor, although Ennius was the first writer who introduced satiric composition into Rome, are his pretensions, in this respect, to originality, very distinguished. He adapted the ancient satires of the Tuscan and Oscan stage to the closet, by refining their grossness, softening their asperity, and introducing raileries, borrowed from the Greek poets, with whom he was familiar. His satires thus appear to have been a species of ecento, made up from passages of various poems, which, by slight alterations, were humorously or satirically applied, and chiefly to the delineation of character. The fragments which remain of those satires are too short and broken to allow us even to divine their subject. Quintilian mentions, that one of the satires contained a dialogue between Life and Death, contending with each other, a mode of composition suggested perhaps by the allegory of Prodicus. We are farther informed by Aulus Gellius (2, 29), that he introduced into another satire, with great skill and beauty, Æsop's fable of the Larks, now well known through the imitation of Fontaine (liv. 4, ch. 22—"L'Alouette et ses petits avec le maître d'un champ"). It is certainly much to be regretted that we possess such scanty fragments of these productions, which would have been curious as the first attempts at a species of composition, which was carried to such perfection by succeeding Latin poets, and which has been regarded as almost peculiar to the Romans. The great work, however, of Ennius, and of which we have still considerable remains, was his Annals, or Metrical Chronicles, devoted to the celebration of Roman exploits, from the earliest periods to the conclusion of the Istrian war. These annals were written by our poet in his old age; at least Aulus Gellius informs us, on the authority of Varro, that the twelfth book was finished by him in his sixty-seventh year (17, 21). The annals of Ennius were partly founded on those ancient traditions and old heroic ballads, which Cicero, on the authority of Cato's Origines, mentions as having been sung at feasts by the guests, many centuries before the age of Cato, in praise of the heroes of Rome. Niebuhr has attempted to show, that all the memorable events of Roman history had been versified in ballads or metrical chronicles, in the Saturnian measure, before the time of Ennius; who, according to him, merely expressed in the Greek hexameter what his predecessors had delivered in a ruder strain, and then maliciously depreciated these ancient compositions, in order that he himself might be considered as the founder of Roman poetry. The chief work, according to Niebuhr, from which Ennius borrowed, was a romantic epopée, or chronicle, made up from these heroic ballads, about the end of the fourth century of Rome, commencing with the accession of Tarquinius, and ending with the battle of Regillus.—Ennius begins his Annals with an invocation of the nine Muses, and the account of a vision in which Homer had appeared to him, and related the story of the metamorphosis already mentioned. He afterward invokes a great number of the gods, and then proceeds to the history of the Alban kings, the dream of the Vestal virgin Ilia, which announced her pregnancy by Mars and the foundation of Rome. The reigns of the kings, and the contests of the republic with the neighbouring states previous to the Punic war, occupy the metrical annals to the end of the sixth book. It should be observed, in passing, that the Annals were not separated by Ennius himself into books; but were so divided, long after his death, by the grammarian Q. Vargunteus. (Sueton., de Illust. Gramm., c. 2.) Cicero, in his Brutus (c. 19), says that Ennius did not treat of the first Punic war, as Nævius had previously written on the same subject. P. Merula, however, who edited the fragments of Ennius, is of opinion that this passage of Cicero can only mean that he had not entered into much detail of its events, as he finds several lines in the seventh book which, he thinks, evidently apply to the first Carthaginian war, particularly the description of naval operations, and the building of the first fleet with which the Carthaginians were attacked by the Romans. In some of the editions of Ennius, the character of the friend and military adviser of Servilius, generally supposed to be intended as a portrait of the poet himself, is ranged under the seventh book. The eighth and ninth books of these Annals, which are much mutilated, detail the events of the second Carthaginian war in Italy and Africa. This was by much the most interesting part of the copious subject which Ennius had chosen, and a portion of it on which he would probably exert all the force of his genius, in order the more to honour his friend and patron Scipio Africanus. The tenth, eleventh, and twelfth books of the Annals of Ennius contain the war with Philip of Macedonia. In the commencement of the thirteenth, Hannibal excites Antiochus to a war against the Romans. In the fourteenth book, the consul Scipio, in the prosecution of this contest, arrives at Ilium, which he thus apostrophizes:

"O patria! O divum domus Ilium, et incluta bello Pergama!"

Different Latin writers extol the elegant lines of Ennius immediately following, in which the Roman soldiers, alluding to its magnificent revival in Rome, exclaim with enthusiasm, that Ilium could not be destroyed:

Nec quom capta capci, nec quom combusta cremari," a passage which has been closely imitated in the seventh book of Virgil (v. 294, seqq.). The fifteenth book relates the expedition of Fulvius Nobilior to Ætolia, which Ennius himself is said to have accompanied. In the two following books he prosecutes the Istrian war. The concluding, or eighteenth book, seems to have been in a great measure personal to the poet himself. Connected with his annals there is a poem of Ennius devoted to the celebration of the exploits of Scipio, in which occurs a much-admired description of the calm of evening, where the flow of the versification is finely modulated to the still and solemn imagery. Horace, in one of his odes (4, 8), strongly expresses the glory and honour which the Calabrian muse of Ennius had conferred on Scipio by this poem devoted to his praise.—The historical poems of Ennius appear to have been written without the introduction of much machinery or decorative fiction; and whether founded on ancient ballads or framed conformably to historical truth, they are obviously deficient in those embellishments of imagination which form the distinction between a poem and a metrical chronicle. In the subject which he had chosen, Ennius wanted the poetic advantages of distance in place or time. But though not master of a shell round which the passions would throng, or at the sound of which a whole people would fall prostrate, as at the first breath of Jubal's lyre, still the Annals of Ennius, as a national work, were highly gratifying to a proud, ambitious people, and, in consequence, continued long popular at Rome. They were highly relished in the days of Horace and Virgil; and as far down as the reign of Marcus Aurelius, they were recited in theatres and other public places for the amusement of the people. (Aulus Gellius, 18, 5.) The Romans, indeed, were so formed on his style, that Seneca called them populus Ennianus, an Ennian race, and said that both Cicero and Virgil were obliged, contrary to their own judgment, to employ antiquated terms, in compliance with the reigning prejudice. (Aul. Gell., 12, 2.) From his example, too, added to the national character, the historical epic became in future times the great poetical resource of the Romans, who versified almost every important event in their history. Besides the Pharsalia of Lucan, and the Punica of Silius Italicus, which still survive, there were many works of this description which are now lost. Varro Attacinus chose as his subject Cæsar's war with the Sequani; Varius, the deeds of Augustus and Agrippa; Valgius Rufus, the battle of Actium; Albinovanus, the exploits of Germanicus; Cicero, those of Marius, and the events of his own consulship.—The poem of Ennius, entitled Phagetica, is curious; since one would hardly suppose that, in this early age, luxury had made such progress, that the culinary art should have been systematically or poetically treated. All that we know, however, of the manner in which it was prepared or served up, is from the Apologia of Apuleius. It was, as its name imports, a didactic poem on catables, particularly fish. It is well known, that previous to the time of Ennius, this subject had been discussed, both in prose and verse, by various Greek authors, and was particularly detailed in the poem of Archestratus the Epicurean. It appears from a passage of Apuleius, that the work of Ennius was a digest of all the previous books on this subject. The eleven lines which remain, and which have been preserved by Apuleius, mention the places where different sorts of fish are found in greatest perfection and abundance. Another poem of Ennius, entitled Epicharmus, was so called because it was translated from the Greek work of Epicharmus, the Pythagorean, on the Nature of Things, in the same manner as Plato gave the name of Timæus to the book which he translated from Timæus the Locrian. The fragments of this work of Ennius are so broken and corrupted, that it is impossible to follow the plan of his poem, or the system of philosophy which it inculcated. It appears, however, to have contained many speculations concerning the elements of which the world was primarily composed, and which, according to him, were water, earth, air, and fire (Varro, R. R., 1, 4); as also with regard to the preservative powers of nature. Jupiter seems merely to have been considered by him as the air, the clouds, and the storm—Ennius, however, whose compositions thus appear to have been formed entirely on Greek originals, has not availed himself so successfully of these writings as Virgil has done of the works of Ennius himself. The prince of Latin poets has often condescended to imitate long passages, and sometimes to copy whole lines, from the Father of Roman Song. This has been shown, in a close comparison, by Macrobius, in his Saturnalia (6, 1, seqq.). Lucretius and Ovid have also frequently availed themselves of the works of Ennius. His description of the cutting of a forest, in order to fit out a fleet against the Carthaginians, in the seventh book, has been imitated by Statius in the tenth book of the Thebais. The passage in his sixth Satire, in which he has painted the happy situation of a parasite, compared with that of the master of a feast, is copied in Terence's Phormio (2, 2).—It appears, then, that Ennius occasionally produced verses of considerable harmony and beauty, and that his conceptions were frequently expressed with energy and spirit. It must be recollected, however, that the lines imitated by Virgil, and the other passages which are usually selected with reference to the imitation of the early bard by other poets, are very favourable specimens of his taste and genius. Many of his verses are harsh and defective in their mechanical construction; others are frigidly prosaic; and not a few are deformed with the most absurd conceits, not so much in the idea, as in a jingle of words and extravagant alliteration.—On the whole, the works of Ennius are rather pleasing and interesting, as the early blossoms of that poetry which afterward opened to such perfection, than estimable from their intrinsic beauty. But, whatever may have been the merit of the works of Ennius, of which we are now but incompetent judges, they were at least sufficiently various. Epic, dramatic, satiric, and didactic poetry were all successively attempted by him; and we also learn that he exercised himself in the lighter species of verse, as the epigram and acrostic. (Cic., de Dir., 2, 54.) For this novelty and exuberance it is not difficult to account. The fountains of Greek literature, as yet untasted in Latium, were open for his imitation. He stood in very different circumstances from those Greek bards who drew solely from the resources of their own genius; or from his successors in Latin poetry, who wrote after the best productions of Greece had become familiar to the Romans. He was thus placed in a situation in which he could enjoy all the popularity and applause due to originality, without undergoing the labour of invention, and might rapidly run with success through every mode of the lyre, without possessing any incredible diversity of genius.—Thus far we have spoken of the poetical productions of Ennius; but the most curious point connected with his literary history is his prose translation of the celebrated work of

Euhemerus, entitled Ἱερὰ Ἀναγραφή. The translation, as well as the original work, is lost. Some fragments, however, have been saved by St. Augustine and Lactantius. It is clear, notwithstanding their observance of prodigies and religious ceremonies, that there prevailed a considerable spirit of free thinking among the Romans in the days of Ennius. This is exemplified, not merely by his translation of Euhemerus, and the definition of the nature of Jupiter in his Epicharmus, but by various passages in dramas adapted for public representation, and which deride the superstitions of augurs and soothsayers, as well as the false ideas entertained of the worshipped divinities. Polybius, too, who flourished shortly after Ennius, speaks of the fear of the gods and the inventions of augury merely as an excellent political engine, at the same time that he reprehends the rashness and absurdity of those who were endeavouring to extirpate such useful opinions.—The fragments of Ennius will be found in the Fragmenta Veterum Poetarum Latinorum, by Robert and Henry Stephens, Paris, 1564; in the Fragmenta Veter. Tragic. Latin., by Serivierus, L. Bat., 1620; in the Opera et Fragmenta Veter. Poet. Lat., by Maittaire, Lond., 1713 (vol. 2, p. 1456, seqq.); in the Poeta Scenici Latinorum of Bothe, Halberst., 1823 (vol. 5, pt. 1, Fragment. Tragic.; pt. 2, *Fragment. ENTELLA, a city of Sicily, in the western quarter of the island, near the river Hypsa and northeast of Selinus. It was one of the three cities said to have been founded by Ægestes, a fable which clearly indicates the great antiquity at least of the place, and marks it as of Sicilian origin. We find it at one time under the power of Carthage, though with a free constitution. At a subsequent period it received a body of Campanian troops, which had been disbanded by Dionysius the elder, and it met with the same fate that all those cities encountered which had received the Campani within their walls; the male inhabitants were slaughtered, and the city became the property of these mercenaries. This change of masters, however, made no alteration in the affairs of Entella as far as its standing with Carthage was concerned: the Campani sided with the last-mentioned power as the former inhabitants had done, and were, in consequence, besieged by Dionysius, who finally captured the city. (Diod. Sic., 14, 9.—Id., 15, 73.—Id., 16, 67.) We hear little of the place in later times. The ruins of the ancient city are still called Entella, and are situate to the east of Poggio Reale, near the modern river Balici. (Manneri, Geogr., vol. 9, pt. 2, p. 444.)

ENTELLUS, a Sicilian, who, though advanced in years, entered the lists against the Trojan Dares, and conquered him in a pugilistic encounter. He had been, in earlier years, the friend and companion in arms of Eryx. (Virg., Æn., 5, 387, seqq.)

ENYALIOS (Ἐνυάλιος), a surname frequently given to Mars in the Iliad, and corresponding with the name Enyo (Ἐνύω) given to Bellona. (Hom., Il., 8, 264.—Id. ib., 13, 519.—Id. ib., 17, 259, &c.)

ENYO (Ἐνύω), the daughter of Phorcys and Ceto, according to Hesiod (Theog., 273). She was a war-goddess, and one of the companions of Mars, and answers to the Bellona of the Romans. Some mythologists make her the sister, others the wife, of Mars. (Vid. Bellona.)

EOS (Ἥως), the name of Aurora among the Greeks, whence the epithet Eous is applied to all the eastern parts of the world. (Ovid, Fast., 3, 406; A. A., 3, 537; 6, 478.—Virg., G., 1, 288; 2, 115.)

EPAMINONDAS, a Theban statesman and soldier, in whose praise, for both talents and virtue, there is a remarkable concurrence of ancient writers. Nepos observes that, before Epaminondas was born, and after his death, Thebes was always in subjection to some other power: on the contrary, while he directed her councils, she was at the head of Greece. His public life extends from the restoration of democracy by Pelopidas and the other exiles, B.C. 379, to the battle of Mantinea, B.C. 362. In the conspiracy by which that revolution was effected he took no part, refusing to stain his hands with the blood of his countrymen; but thenceforward he became the prime mover of the Theban state. His policy was first directed to assert the right, and to secure the power to Thebes of controlling the other cities of Bœotia, several of which claimed to be independent. In this cause he ventured to engage his country, single handed, in war with the Spartans, who marched into Bœotia, B.C. 371, with a force superior to any which could be brought against them. The Theban generals were divided in opinion whether a battle should be risked; for to encounter the Lacedæmonians with inferior numbers was universally esteemed hopeless. Epaminondas prevailed with his colleagues to venture it; and devised on this occasion a new method of attack. Instead of joining battle along the whole line, he concentrated an overwhelming force on one point, directing the weaker part of his line to keep back. The Spartan right being broken and their king slain, the rest of the army found it necessary to abandon the field. This memorable battle was fought at Leuctra. The moral effect of it was much more important than the mere loss inflicted upon Sparta, for it overthrew the prescriptive superiority in arms claimed by that state ever since its reformation by Lycurgus. This brilliant success led Epaminondas to the second object of his policy, the overthrow of the supremacy of Sparta, and the substitution of Thebes as the leader of Greece in the democratic interest. In this hope a Theban army, under his command, marched into the Peloponnesus early in the winter, B.C. 369, and, in conjunction with the Eleans, Arcadians, and Argives, invaded and laid waste a large part of Laconia. Numbers of the Helots took that opportunity to shake off a most oppressive slavery; and Epaminondas struck a deadly blow at the power of Sparta, by establishing these descendants of the old Messenians on Mount Ithome in Messenia, as an independent state, and inviting their countrymen, scattered through Italy and Sicily, to return to their ancient patrimony. Numbers obeyed the call. This memorable event is known in history as the return of the Messenians, and two hundred years had elapsed since their expulsion. In 368 B.C., Epaminondas again led an army into the Peloponnesus; but, not fulfilling the expectations of the people, he was disgraced, and, according to Diodorus (15, 71), was ordered to serve in the ranks. In that capacity he is said to have saved the army in Thessaly, when entangled in dangers which threatened it with destruction; being required by the general voice to assume the command. He is not again heard of in a public capacity till B.C. 366, when he was sent to support the democratic interest in Achaia, and by his moderation and judgment brought that whole confederation over to the Theban alliance, without bloodshed or banishment. It soon became plain, however, that a mere change of masters, Thebes instead of Sparta, would be of no service to the Grecian states. Achaia first, then Elis, then Mantinea and great part of Arcadia, returned to the Lacedæmonian alliance. To check this defection, Epaminondas led an army into the Peloponnesus for the fourth time, B.C. 362. Joined by the Argives, Messenians, and part of the Arcadians, he entered Laconia, and endeavoured to take Sparta by surprise; but the vigilance of Agesilaus just frustrated his scheme. Epaminondas then marched against Mantinea, near which was fought the celebrated battle in which he fell.

The disposition of his troops on this occasion was an improvement on that by which he had gained the battle of Leuctra, and would have had the same decisive success, but that, in the critical moment, when the Lacedæmonian line was just broken, he received a mortal wound. The Theban army was paralyzed by this misfortune; nothing was done to improve a victory which might have been made certain; and this battle, on which the expectation of all Greece waited, led to no important result. "Each party," says Xenophon, "claimed the victory, and neither gained any advantage: indecision, trouble, and confusion, more than ever before that battle, pervaded Greece."—Whether Epaminondas could much longer have upheld Thebes in the rank to which he had raised her, is very doubtful: without him she fell at once to her former obscurity. His character is certainly one of the fairest recorded in Greek history. His private life was moral and refined; his public conduct uninfluenced by personal ambition or by personal hatred. He was a sincere lover of his country; and if, in his schemes for her advancement, he was indifferent to the injury done to other members of the Grecian family, this is a fault from which, perhaps, no Greek statesman except Aristides was free. (Xen., Hist. Gr.—Plut., Vit. Pelop.—Encycl. Us. Knowl., vol. 9, p. 466.)

ΕΡΑΨΗΥΣ, a son of Jupiter and Io. This mythological personage is the instrument by which Grecian vanity derived the rulers of more ancient countries from its own gods and princes. Epaphus, according to the legend, was born in Egypt, and married Memphis, the daughter of the Nile, by whom he had a daughter named Libya. The same fable made him the founder of Memphis. (Æsch., Prom. Vinet., 850, seqq.—Herod., 2, 153.—Ovid, Met., 1, 699, seqq.) Libya bore to Neptune Agenor, the father of Cadmus and Europa, and also Belus, who had by another daughter of the Nile, named Auchinoë, two sons, Danaus and Ægyptus. (Apollod., 2, 1, 4.) For some remarks on the name Epaphus, and on the whole legend, vid. Io.

ΕΡΕΤ, a people of Elis. (Vid. Elis I.)

ΕΡΕΨΥΣ, son of Panopeus, was the fabricator of the famous wooden horse which proved the ruin of Troy. (Virg., Æn., 2, 264.—Justin, 20, 2.—Pausan., 10, 26.)

ΕΡΗΨΥΣ, a celebrated city of Ionia, near the mouth of the river Cæyster, called by Pliny (5, 29), "Alterum lumen Asiae." Mythology assigns, as its founders, Ephesus the son of the river Cæyster, and Cresus (Κρήσορ) a native of the soil. (Pausan., 7, 2.) Another account makes it to have been settled by Ephesus, one of the Amazons. (Steph. Byz., s. v.—Éty-mol. Mag., s. v.—Berkel, ad Steph. Byz., l. c.) According to a third tradition, the place owed its origin to the Amazons, who were permitted to settle here by Hercules their conqueror. Hence the name of the city, Ἐφεσος, from ἔφεσις, permission. A fourth legend makes the Amazons, when pursued by Hercules and Theseus, to have fled for refuge to an altar of Diana, and supplicated the protection of the goddess, which she accordingly granted: (καταφεύγουσας ἐπὶ τινι βωμῷ Ἀρτέμιδος, δεῖσθαι σωτηρίας τυχύνει, τὴν δὲ ἔφεσιν ἀντάσαι τὴν σωτηρίαν: ὅθεν Ἐφεσον κληθῆναι τὸ χωρίον, καὶ τὴν Ἀρτέμιν Ἐφεσίαν. Ety-mol. Mag.) It is curious to observe how the name of the Amazons mingles in with some of these traditions. (Consult remarks under that article.) If we follow the graver authority of Strabo (640), we will find a settlement to have been first made in this quarter by the Carians and Leleges. Androclus, the son of Codrus, came subsequently with a body of Ionian colonists. (Pausan., 7, 2.) He protected the natives who had settled from devotion about the temple of Diana, and incorporated them with his followers; but expelled those who inhabited the town above, which the Carians and Lele-ges had built on Mount Prion. (Pausan., l. c.) It is recorded that Prion had, in former times, been called Lepre Akte (Λεπρή Ἀκτὴ); and a part behind Prion was still called the Back of Lepre when Strabo wrote. Pliny (5, 29) enumerates other names for the city, such as Ortygia, Smyrna, Trachea, &c.—Lysimachus, wishing to protect Ephesus from the inundations to which it was yearly exposed by the overflowings of the Cayster, built a city up on the mountain, and surrounded it with walls. The inhabitants were unwilling to remove into this, but a heavy rain falling, and Lysimachus stopping the drains and flooding their houses, they were glad to exchange. (Strabo, 640.) The port of Ephesus had originally a wide mouth, but foul with mud lodging in it from the Cayster. Attalus Philadelphus and his architect were of opinion that, if the entrance were contracted, it would become deeper, and in time be capable of receiving ships of burden. But the slime, which had before been moved by the flux and reflux of the tide, and carried off, being stopped, the whole basin, quite to the mouth, was rendered shallow. This port is a morass, which communicates with the Cayster, as might be expected, by a narrow mouth; and at the water's edge, near the ferry, as well as in other places, may be seen the wall intended to embank the stream, and give it force by confinement. The masonry is of that kind termed incertum, in which the stones are of various shapes, but nicely joined. The situation was so advantageous as to overbalance the inconveniences attending the port. The town increased daily, and under the Romans was considered the chief emporium of Asia this side of Taurus. In the arrangement of the provinces under the Eastern emperors it became the capital of the province of Asia. (Hierocles, p. 658.) Towards the end of the eleventh century, Ephesus experienced the same fate as Smyrna. A Turkish pirate, named Tangripanes, settled here. But the Greek admiral, John Ducas, defeated him in a bloody battle, and pursued the flying Turks up the Mæander to Polybotum. In 1306 it was among the places which suffered from the exactions of the Grand Duke Roger; and, two years after, it surrendered to Sultan Saisan, who to prevent future insurrections, removed most of the inhabitants to Tyrium, where they were massacred. In the conflicts which desolated Asia Minor at a subsequent period, Ephesus was again a sufferer, and the city became at length reduced to a heap of ruins. The modern name is Aias-aluk, or, more properly, this is the appellation of a small village inhabited by a few Turkish families, standing chiefly on the south side of the castle hill, among bushes and ruins. The name is supposed to be a corruption of Agios Theologos, from the circumstance of a famous church of St. John the Divine having once stood near the spot. When Smith wrote in 1677, Ephesus was already "reduced to an inconsiderable number of cottages, wholly inhabited by Turks." Ryeat confirms this observation. "This place, where once Christianity so flourished as to be a mother church and the see of a metropolitan bishop, cannot now show one family of Christians: so hath the secret providence of God disposed affairs, too deep and mysterious for us to search into." From Chishull we learn that, in 1699, "the miserable remains of the church of Ephesus resided, not on the spot, but at a village called Kirkingecui." Tournefort, however, says there were thirty or forty Greek families; but as he wrote about the same time as Chishull, this is probably a mistake. Pococke, who visited Ephesus about 1740, says that there was not at that time a single Christian within two leagues round Ephesus. "I was at Ephesus in January, 1824," says Mr. Arundell; "the desolation was then complete; a Turk, whose shed we occupied, his Arab servant, and a single Greek, composed the entire population, some Turcomans excepted, whose black tents were pitched among the ruins.

The Greek revolution, and the predatory excursions of the Samiotes, in great measure accounted for this desertion." In the records of our religion Ephesus is ennobled as the burying-place of Timothy, the companion of St. Paul, and the first bishop of Ephesus, whose body was afterward translated to Constantinople by the founder of that city, or by his son Constantius, and placed with Saint Luke and Saint Andrew in the church of the apostles. The story of St. John the Divine was deformed in an early age with gross fiction; but he also was interred at Ephesus, and, as appears from one narration, on Mount Prion.—Ephesus was famed for its splendid temple of Diana. The statue of the goddess was regarded with peculiar veneration, and was believed by the vulgar to have fallen from the skies. It was never changed, though the temple had been more than once restored. This rude object of primeval worship was a block of wood, said by some to be of beech or elm, by others cedar, ebony, or vine, and attesting its very great antiquity by the fashion in which it had been formed. It was carved into the similitude of Diana, not as the elegant huntress, but an Egyptian hieroglyphic, which we call the goddess of nature, with many breasts, and the lower parts formed into an Hermæan statue, grotesquely ornamented, and discovering the feet beneath. It was gorgeously apparelled; the vest embroidered with emblems and symbolical devices; and, to prevent its tottering, a bar of metal, it is likely of gold, was placed under each hand. A veil or curtain, which was drawn up from the floor to the ceiling, hid it from view, except while service was performing in the temple. This image was preserved till the later ages in a shrine, on the embellishment of which mines of wealth were consumed. The priests of Diana suffered emasculation, and virgins were devoted to inviolable chastity. They were eligible only from the superior ranks, and enjoyed a great revenue, with privileges, the eventual abuse of which induced Augustus to restrain them. It may be imagined that many stories of her power and interposition were current and believed at Ephesus. A people convinced that the self-manifestations of their deity were real, could not easily be turned to a religion which did not pretend to a similar or equal intercourse with its divinity. And this is, perhaps, the true reason why, in the early ages of Christianity, a belief of supernatural interposition by the Panagia, or Virgin Mary, and by saints appearing in daily or nightly visions, was encouraged and inculcated. It helped by its currency to procure and confirm the credulous votary, to prevent or refute the cavils of the heathen, to exalt the new religion, and to deprive the established of its ideal superiority.—The address of the town clerk to the Ephesians: "Ye men of Ephesus, what man is there who knoweth not that the city of the Ephesians is a worshipper of the great goddess Diana, and of the image that fell down from Jupiter?" is curiously illustrated by an inscription found by Chandler near the aqueduct, commencing as follows: "Inasmuch as it is notorious that, not only among the Ephesians, but also everywhere among the Greek nations, temples are consecrated to her, and sacred portions," &c.—The reputation and the riches of their goddess had made the Ephesians desirous of providing for her a magnificent temple. The fortunate discovery of marble in Mount Prion gave them new vigour. The cities of Asia, so general was the esteem for the goddess, contributed largely; and Cræsus was at the expense of many of the columns. The spot chosen for it was a marsh, as most likely to preserve the structure free from gaps, and uninjured by earthquakes. The foundation was made with charcoal rammed, and with fleeces. The souterrain consumed immense quantities of marble. The edifice was exalted on a basement with ten steps. The architects were Ctesiphon of Crete and his son Metagenes, 541

B.C.; and their plan was continued by Demetrius, a priest of Diana; but the whole was completed by Daphnion of Miletus, and a citizen of Ephesus, the building having occupied 220 years. It was the first specimen of the Ionic style, in which the fluted column and capital with volutes were introduced. The whole length of the temple was 425 feet, and the breadth 220; with 127 columns of the Ionic order and Parian marble, each of a single shaft, and sixty feet high. These were donations from kings, according to Pliny (36, 14), but there is reason to doubt the correctness of the text where this assertion is made. Of these columns thirty-six were carved; and one of them, perhaps as a model, by Scopas. The temple had a double row of columns, fifteen on either side; and Vitruvius has not determined if it had a roof; probably over the cell only. The folding doors or gates had been continued four years in glue, and were made of cypress wood, which had been treasured up for four generations, highly polished. These were found by Mutianus as fresh and as beautiful 400 years after as when new. The ceiling was of cedar; and the steps for ascending the roof (of the cell?) of a single stem of a vine, which attested the durable nature of that wood. The dimensions of this great temple excite ideas of uncommon grandeur from mere massiveness; but the notices we collect of its internal ornament will increase our admiration. It was the repository in which the great artists of antiquity dedicated their most perfect works to posterity. Praxiteles and his son Cephisodorus adorned the shrine; Scopas contributed a statue of Hecate; Timarete, the daughter of Micon, the first female artist upon record, finished a picture of the goddess, the most ancient in Ephesus; and Parrhasius and Apelles employed their skill to embellish the walls. The excellence of these performances may be supposed to have been proportionate to their price; and a picture of Alexander grasping a thunderbolt, by the latter, was added to the superb collection at the expense of twenty talents of gold. This description, however, applies chiefly to the temple as it was rebuilt, after the earlier temple had been partially burned, perhaps the roof of timber only, by Hierostratus, who chose that method to ensure to himself an immortal name, on the very night that Alexander the Great was born. Twenty years after, that magnificent prince, during his expedition against Persia, offered to appropriate his spoils to the restoration of it, if the Ephesians would consent to allow him the sole honour, and would place his name on the temple. They declined the proposal, however, with the flattering remark, that it was not right for one deity to erect a temple to another: national vanity was, however, the real ground of their refusal. The architect who superintended the erection of the new edifice was Dmocrates, of whose aid Alexander afterward availed himself in building Alexandria. (Vitruv., 2, pref.—Compare Strabo, 640.—Phut., Vit. Alex., 72.—Plin., 7, 37.—Solin., 40.) The extreme sanctity of the temple inspired universal awe and reverence. It was for many ages a repository of foreign and domestic treasure. There property, whether public or private, was secure amid all revolutions. The conduct of Xerxes was an example to subsequent conquerors, and the impiety of sacrilege was not extended to the Ephesian goddess. But Nero deviated from this rule. He removed many costly offerings and images, and an immense quantity of silver and gold. It was again plundered by the Goths from beyond the Danube in the time of Gallienus; a party under Raspa crossing the Hellespont and ravaging the country until compelled to retreat, when they carried off a prodigious booty. (Treb. Pollio, in Gallien., c. 6.) The destruction of so illustrious an edifice deserved to have been carefully recorded by contemporary historians. We may conjecture that it followed the triumph of Christianity. The Ephesian reformers, when authorized by the imperial edicts, rejoiced in the opportunity of insulting Diana, and deemed it pious to demolish the very ruin of her habitation. When, under the auspices of Constantine and Theodosius, churches were erected, the pagan temples were despoiled of their ornaments, or accommodated to other worship. The immense dome of Santa Sophia now rises from the columns of green jasper which were originally placed in the temple of Diana, and were taken down and brought to Constantinople by order of Justinian. Two pillars in the great church at Pisa were also transported thence. The very site of this stupendous and celebrated edifice is even yet undetermined. The following are the principal data which may assist in fixing it. The distance between the site of the temple and the quarries on Mount Prion did not exceed 8000 feet, and no rising intervened, but the whole space was level plain. It was distinct from the city, at the distance of nearly a stadium; for Marc Antony allowing the sanctuary to reach somewhat more than a stadium from it, a part of the city was comprised within those limits. It was without the Magnesian gate, which Chandler supposes to be that next to Aiasalue; and in the second century was joined to the city by Damianus, a sophist, who continued the way down to it through the Magnesian gate, by erecting a stoa or portico of marble, a stadium in length, inscribed with the name of his wife, and intended to prevent the absence of ministers when it rained. It was near the agora or market place of the first city, besieged by Croesus, though distant seven stadia, or a mile wanting half a quarter, from it. The monument of Androclus was shown in the second century near the road going from the temple of Diana by the Olympian towards the Magnesian gate. The ancient city was built on Tracheia, and by the Athenæum and Hypelæus. The Athenæum was without the new city of Lysimachus, and the fountain Hypelæus was near the sacred port. In the plain of Ephesus were anciently two lakes, formed partly by stagnant water from the river Selinus, which ran opposite the temple of Diana, probably from Mount Galleus. Pliny says: "Templum Dianæ complexi e diversis regionibus duo Selimutes." It has been supposed, adds Chandler, that the souterrain by the morass or city-port, with two pieces of ancient wall, of square stone, by one of which is the entrance to it, are relics of the temple; but this was nearly in the centre of the city of Lysimachus; and Dallaway says, "Close upon the brink of the present morass, once covered by the sea, upon a rising ground, are accumulated walls of brick, faced with large slabs of marble, and of sufficient extent to encourage Tournefort and the English travellers in a conjecture that this structure was the far-famed temple of Diana." Every circumstance of description, adds Arundell, accords with this spot, except the distance from the city wall; and among the fallen masonry are broken shafts of porphyry, twelve feet long and four in diameter, more complete and polished than others which surround them. Might not this have been the church dedicated by Justinian to St. John? The souterrain under the supposed site is said by Rycaut to have a descent of about thirty stairs, and by Van Egmont to be a very narrow and difficult passage, having spacious caverns, composed of amazingly large black stones. But these may as well have been the foundations of other ancient buildings as of the temple, and evidently Chandler does not agree in the opinion that this was the site: for he says, "the vaulted substructions by the stadium might, it is believed, furnish an area corresponding better, and more suited to receive the mighty fabric; which, however, it has been shown above, was in the plain, and distinct, though not remote, from the present city." Count Caylus, (Memoires de Literature, vol. 53) says: "Les fondations qui subsistent encore aujourd'hui, ne ressemblent point à la description de Plin," &c., and he has no other mode of accounting for this difference, than by supposing it might have been rebuilt after the time of Pliny, perhaps in the reign of Gallienus, after it had been pillaged and burned by the Goths. Dallaway suggests, that the massive walls of, and adjoining to, the gymnasium may be those of the temple. The grandeur of its plan and dimensions, which are still marked by a long nave, finished by an arch of great expanse at either termination, seems to favour the pretensions of this edifice above those of the other. In various points of description they correspond, excepting that this was beyond the limits of the city walls; for the circumstance of having been washed by the sea applies equally to both ruins. But the Turks, from whose barbarous corruptions or analogous terms the real and more ancient name is in some instances to be collected, call this particular ruin "Kislar Scrai," or the palace of virgins. The same name induced Dr. Pococke, when investigating Alexandria Troas, to decide on a building as another temple of Diana. Perhaps the most probable solution of the difficulty will be, that the entire remains of the temple are buried under the soil. In the valley above Noliun is a fine Ionic column, evidently in its original situation, but of which not more than three or four feet are visible; the remainder is buried by the rapid accumulation of soil; and Mr. Cockerell calculates, that of the temple at Sardis 25 feet remain still covered with earth: the accumulation from the Cayster must be vastly greater and more rapid. The relative position of the temple with the Selinusian lakes would be in favour of a conjecture that it stood considerably lower down, and more towards the northeast than the spot usually assigned to it. This would agree better with the distance from the city, and its situation without the Magnesian gate, which can never be imagined to be that, as Chandler supposes, next to Alasaluc. EPHIALTES, a giant, son of Aloeus. (Vid. Αλόιδæ.)

ΕΦΟΡΟΙ (Εφοροι), a body of magistrates at Sparta, who were possessed of great privileges. The institution of this office is usually ascribed to Theopompus, the grandson of Charilaus the Proclid; but it has been inferred, from the existence of an ephorality in other Dorian states before the time of Theopompus, and from its being apparently placed among the institutions of Lycurgus by Herodotus (1, 65) and Xenophon (de Rep. Lac., 8, 3), that it was an ancient Dorian magistracy. Arnold supposes that the ephori, who were five in number, were coeval with the first settlement of the Dorians in Sparta, and were merely the municipal magistrates of the five hamlets which composed the city (Müller, Dorians, vol. 2, p. 550, Eng. transl.); but that afterward, when the Heraclidæ began to encroach upon the privileges of the other Dorians, and, it would seem, in the reign of Theopompus, who endeavoured to diminish the powers of the general assembly of the Spartan aristocracy, the Dorians, in the struggle which ensued, gained for the ephori an extension of authority, which placed them virtually at the head of the state, although the nominal sovereignty was still kept in the hands of the Heraclidæ. (Arnold, ad Thucyd., 1, 87.—Append., 2, vol. 1, p. 646.) Thus the ephori were popular magistrates, as far as the Dorians themselves were concerned, and were, in fact, the guardians of their rights from the encroachments of the kings; though they were, in relation to the Perieci (Περιεκοί), the oppressive instruments of an overbearing aristocracy. (Plato, de Leg., 4, p. 712, d.) The ephori were chosen in the autumn of every year; the first gave his name to the year. Every Spartan was eligible to the office, without any regard to age or wealth. They were empowered to fine whom they pleased, and exact immediate payment of the fine. They could suspend the functions of any other magistrate, and arrest and bring to trial even the kings. (Xen., de Rep. Lac., 8, 4.) They presided and put the vote in the public assemblies (Thucyd., 1, 87), and performed all the functions of sovereignty in receiving and dismissing embassies (Xen., Hist. Gr., 2, 13, 19), treating with foreign states (Herod., 9, 8), and sending out military expeditions (Xen., Hist. Gr., 2, 4, 29). The king, when he commanded, was always attended by two of the ephori, who exercised a controlling power over his movements. (Herod., 9, 76.) The ephori were murdered on their seats of justice by Cleomenes III., and their office was overthrown (Plut., Vit. Cleom., c. 8), but they were restored by Antigonus Doson and the Achaëans in 222 B.C. (Polyb., 2, 70.—Pausan., 2, 9, 2); and the office subsisted under the Roman dominion. (Boeckh, Corp. Inscript., 1, p. 604, seqq.) Some able remarks on this magistracy may be found in Müller's Dorians, vol. 2, p. 115, seqq., and Tittmann's Darstellung der Griech. Staatsverfass., p. 104, seqq. (Encycl. Us. Knowl., vol. 9, p. 469.)

ΕΦΟΡΟΣ, a Greek historian, born at Cyme in Æolis, 405 B.C. He survived the passage of Alexander into Asia (333 B.C.), which he mentioned in his history. (Clem. Alex., Strom. 1, p. 337, a.) He studied rhetoric under Isocrates, but with so little success, that, after he had returned from Athens, his father Demophilus sent him back to the rhetorician for fresh instruction. (Plut., Vit. Isocr., p. 366, ed. Wytttenb.) Isocrates, perceiving his unfitness for public speaking, recommended him to turn his attention to historical composition (Senec., de Tranq. An. c. 6); but his style was low and slovenly even in his histories, and Plutarch remarks upon the silliness of the set speeches which he introduced. (Polit. Praecon., p. 803, b.) Polybius observes that, though in his account of naval matters he is sometimes happy, he always fails in describing battles by land, and was entirely ignorant of tactics. (Excerpt. Vatican., p. 391.) Ephorus wrote, 1. A History of Greece, in thirty books, beginning with the siege of Troy, and terminating with the siege of Perinthus (340 B.C.). Part of the thirtieth book was written by his son Demophilus. (Diod. Sic., 16, 14.) 2. On Inventions, in two books. 3. On Goods and Ills, in twenty-four books. 4. On Remarkable Objects in various Countries, in fifteen books. 5. The Topography of Cyme. 6. On Diction.—The fragments of these works have been collected by Marx, Carlsruhe, 1815. (Encycl. Us. Knowl., vol. 9, p. 469.—Schöll, Hist. Lit. Gr., vol. 2, p. 182.)

ΕΦΥΡΑ, I. the ancient name of Corinth, which it received from a nymph of the same name, and hence Ephyrus is equivalent to "Corinthian." (Vid. Κορινθίους.)—II. A city of Epirus, at the head of the bay or harbour called Glykys Limen. It is mentioned by Homer and other writers. Homer, in several passages of the Iliad and Odyssey, alludes to one or more cities of this name. The Ephyræ, which was situated on the banks of the river Selleis (Il., 2, 659), is positively ascribed by Strabo (333) to Elis in Peloponnesus, though he allows that many commentators on the poet were of opinion that he there adverted to the Thesprotian city of the same name. Eustathius observes on the verse above cited, that, as there were nine towns so called, it was no easy matter to ascertain to which reference was made. It seems probable, however, that the Ephyræ, which is twice noticed in the Odyssey (1, 259, and 2, 328) as a land abounding in poisonous drugs, is the one in question, since it was evidently near Ithaca, and the river Selleis is not named in either of the passages. This city is also spoken of by Pindar (Nem., 7, 53); from which passage we may infer, with Pausanias, that it was the capital of the ancient kings of Thesprotia, and where, on the attempt of Theseus and Pirithoüs to carry off the wife of Aidoneus, they were both taken prisoners and detained. (Pausan., 1, 17.—Compare Apollodorus, 2, 7.—Diod. Sic., 4, 36.) It appears from Strabo (324) and other authorities, that this town afterward took the name of Cichyrus, but on what occasion we are not informed. Mr. Hughes, who has explored with great attention this part of Epirus, reports, "that the ruins of Ephyra are to be seen at no great distance from the Acherusian lake, near a deserted convent dedicated to St. John. Though the walls lie for the most part in a confused mass of ruins, they may be distinctly traced in a circular figure: those parts which remain perfect exhibiting a specimen of masonry apparently more rude even than Tiryns itself, though the blocks used are not of so large dimensions." (Travels, vol. 2, p. 312.—Cramer's Ancient Greece, vol. 1, p. 113, seqq.)

EPICHRMUS, the first Greek comic writer of whom we have any certain account. He was a Syracusan, either by birth or emigration. (Theocritus, Epig., 17.) Some make him a native of Crastus, some of Cos (Suidas—Eudocia, p. 166); but all agree that he passed his life at Syracuse. It was about B.C. 500, Olymp. 70, 1, thirty-five years after Thespis began to exhibit, eleven years after the commencement of Phrynichus, and just before the appearance of Æschylus as a tragedian, that Epicharmus produced the first comedy properly so called. Before him this department of the drama was, as we have every reason to believe, nothing but a series of licentious songs and sarcastic episodes, without plot, connexion, or consistency. He gave to each exhibition one single and unbroken fable, and converted the loose interlocutions into regular dialogue. (Aristot., Poet., 5, 5.) The subjects of his comedies, as we may infer from the extant titles of thirty-five of them, were partly parodies of mythological subjects, and, as such, not very different from the dialogue of the satyric drama, and partly political, and in this respect may have furnished a model for the dialogue of the Athenian comedy. Tragedy had, some years before the era of Epicharmus, begun to assume its staid and dignified character. The woes of heroes and the majesty of the gods had, under Phrynichus, become its favourite theme. The Sicilian poet seems to have been struck with the idea of exciting the mirth of his audience by the exhibition of some ludicrous matter dressed up in all the grave solemnity of the newly-invented art. Discarding, therefore, the low drolleries and scurrilous invectives of the ancient καμωδία, he opened a novel and less invidious source of amusement, by composing a set of burlesque dramas upon the usual tragic subjects. (Athenæus, 15, p. 698, ed. Schweigh., vol. 5, p. 555.) They succeeded, and the turn thus given to comedy long continued; so that when it once more returned to personality and satire, as it afterward did, tragedy and tragic poets were the constant objects of its parody and ridicule. The great changes thus effected by Epicharmus justly entitled him to be called the Inventor of Comedy (Theocritus, Epig., 17), though it is probable that Phormis or Phormis preceded him by a few Olympiads. (Aristot., Poet., 3, 5.—Athenæus, 14, p. 652, a.) But his merits rest not here: he was distinguished for elegance of composition as well as originality of conception. Demetrius Phalereus (compare Fossius, de Poet. Gr., 6, p. 31) says, that Epicharmus excelled in the choice and collocation of epithets: on which account the name of Ἐπιχάρμους was given to his kind of style, making it proverbial for elegance and beauty. Aristotle (Rhet., 3, 9) lays one fault to his charge as a writer, the employment of false antitheses. So many were his dramatic excellences, that Plato terms him the first of comic writers (Theætetus, p. 33), and in a later age and foreign country, Plautus chose him as his model. (Horat., Epist., 2, 2, 58.) The plays of Epicharmus, to judge from the fragments still left us, abounded in apophthegms, little consistent with the idea we might otherwise have entertained of their nature, from our knowledge of the buffooneries whence his comedy sprung, and the writings of Aristophanes, his partially extant successor. But Epicharmus was a philosopher and a Pythagorean. (Diog. Laert., 8, 78.) In the midst of merriment, he failed not to inculcate, in pithy gnōmæ, the otherwise distasteful lessons of morality to the gay and thoughtless, and, sheltered by comic license, to utter offensive political truths, which, promulgated under any other circumstances, might have subjected the sage to the vengeance of a despotic government. We find Epicharmus still composing comedies B.C. 485 (Suidas, s. v. Ἐπίχ.); and again during the reign of Hiero, B.C. 477. (Clinton, Fasti Hellenici, B.C. 477.) He died at the age of ninety or ninety-seven years. Epicharmus is said by some authorities to have added the letters ξ , η , ψ , ω , to the Greek alphabet. (Theatre of the Greeks, 2d ed., p. 162, seqq.—Matthiæ, G. G., vol. 1, p. 13, Blomfield's transl.—Compare, however, Thiersch's G. G., Sandford's transl., vol. 1, p. 25, seqq.)

ΕΠΙΧΡΕΤΗΣ, an eminent Stoic philosopher, born in a servile condition at Hierapolis in Phrygia. The year of his birth is not known, nor are we able to make any very close approximation to it. He must have been born, however, before the end of Nero's reign, 68 A.D., else he could not have been more than twenty-one when Domitian published that edict against philosophers, in 89 A.D., in consequence of which Epictetus retired from Rome. At the age of twenty-one he was not likely to have attained sufficient notoriety to bring him within the operation of such an edict. Epictetus, then, was born most probably during one of the last eight years of Nero's reign. The names and condition of his parents are unknown: neither do we know how he came to be brought to Rome. But in this city he was for some time a slave to Epaphroditus, a freedman of Nero's, who had been one of his body-guard. An anecdote related by Origen, which illustrates the fortitude of Epictetus, would also show, if it were true, that Epaphroditus was a most cruel master. Epictetus, when his master was twisting his leg one day, smiled and quietly said, "You will break it;" and when he did break it, only observed, "Did I not tell you that you would do so?" (Orig. c. Cels., 7, p. 368.) We are not told how or when Epictetus managed to effect his freedom; but he could not have been still a slave when he left Rome in consequence of an edict against philosophers. This event, the only one in his life the date of which we can assign, took place, as has been said, in the year 89 A.D., being the eighth year of Domitian's reign. Epictetus then retired to Nicopolis in Epirus, and it is a question whether he ever returned to Rome. The chief ground for believing that he did is a statement of Spartian (Vit. Hadr., 16), that Epictetus lived on terms of intimacy with the Emperor Hadrian; while it is agreed, on the other hand, that there is no good evidence of any of his discourses having been delivered at Rome, but that they contain frequent mention of Nicopolis. This argument, however, is hardly sufficient to overthrow the express testimony of Spartian. We do not know when he died. Suidas says that he lived till the reign of Marcus Aurelius; but, though some support for this opinion is sought to be obtained from Themistius (Or., 5, ad Jovian. Imp.), yet the authority of Anulus Gellius is strong on the other side, who, writing during the reign of the first Antonine, speaks of Epictetus, in two places, as being dead. (Noct. Att., 2, 18.—Ib., 17, 19.) Epictetus led a life of exemplary contentment, simplicity, and virtue, practising in all particulars the morality which he taught. He lived for a long while in a small hut, with no other furniture than a bed and lamp, and without an attendant; until he benevolently adopted a child whom a friend had been compelled by poverty to expose, and hired a nurse for its sake.—Epictetus was a teacher of the Stoic philosophy, and the chief of those who lived during the period of the Roman empire. His lessons were principally, if not solely, directed to practical morality. His favourite maxim, and that into which he resolved all practical morality, was “bear and forbear,” ἀνέχων καὶ ἀπέχων. He appears to have differed from the Stoics on the subject of suicide. (Arrian, Epict., 1, 8.) We are told by Arrian, in his Preface to the “Discourses,” that he was a powerful and exciting lecturer; and, according to Origen (c. Cels., 7, ad init.), his style was superior to that of Plato. It is a proof of the estimation in which Epictetus was held, that, on his death, his lamp was purchased by some more eager than wise aspirant after philosophy for three thousand drachmas, or over five hundred dollars of our currency. (Lucian, adv. Indoct. libr. e ment., vol. 8, p. 15, ed Bip.) Though it is said by Suidas that Epictetus wrote much, there is good reason to believe that he himself wrote nothing. His Discourses were taken down by his pupil Arrian, and published after his death in six books, of which four remain. The same Arrian compiled the Enchiridion, and wrote a life of Epictetus, which is lost. Some fragments have been preserved, however, by Stobæus. Simplicius has also left a commentary on his doctrine, in the Eclectic manner. The best edition of the remains of Epictetus is that of Schweighæuser, 6 vols. 8vo, Lips., 1799. The same editor has published the Enchiridion, together with the Tablet of Cebes, in a separate volume (Lips., 1797, 8vo). There is an English version of the Enchiridion or Manual by Mrs. Carter. (Fabric., Bibl. Græc., ed. Harles., vol. 5, p. 64.—Engfeld., Hist. Philos., vol. 2, p. 121.—Encycl. Us. Knowl., vol. 9, p. 471.)

EPICURUS, a celebrated philosopher, born in the year 341 B.C., seven years after the death of Plato. He was a native of the Island of Samos, whither his father had gone from Athens, in the year 352 B.C., among 2000 colonists then sent out by the Athenians. (Strabo, 638.) Yet he was an Athenian by right, belonging to the borough Gargettus, and to the tribe Ægeis. His father Neocles is said to have been a schoolmaster, and his mother Chæristra to have practised arts of magic, in which it was afterward made a charge against Epicurus, that, when he was young, he assisted her. (Diog. Laert., 10, 4.) Having passed his early years in Samos and Teos, he went to Athens at the age of eighteen. We are told that he had begun to study philosophy when only fourteen, having been incited thereto by a desire, which the teachers to whom he had applied had failed to satisfy, of understanding Hesiod's description of chaos; and that he began with the writings of Democritus. In Samos he is said to have received lessons from Pamphilus, a follower of Plato. (Suid.—Cic., N. D., 1, 26.)—On the occasion of this his first visit to Athens, Epicurus stayed there for a very short time. He left it in consequence of the measures taken by Perdiccas after the death of Alexander the Great, and went to Colophon to join his father. In his 32d year, 310 B.C., he went to Mytilene, where he set up a school. Staying only one year at this latter place, he next proceeded to Lampsacus, where he taught for four years. He returned to Athens in the year 306 B.C., and now founded the school, which ever after was named from him the Epicurean. He purchased a garden for 80 minæ (about 1400 dollars), wherein he might live with his disciples and deliver his lectures, and henceforth remained in Athens, with the exception only of two or three visits to his friends in Asia Minor, until his death, B.C. 270. The disease which brought him to his death was the stone. He was in his seventy-second year when he died, and he had then been settled in Athens as a teacher for 36 years. Epicurus is said by Diogenes Laertius (10, 9) to have had so many pupils that even whole cities could not contain them. Hearers came to him from distant places; very many from Lampsacus; and while men often deserted other schools to join that of Epicurus, there were only two instances, at most, of Epicurus being deserted for any other teacher. Epicurus and his pupils lived together in the garden of which we have spoken, in a state of friendship, which, as it is usually represented, could not be surpassed; abstaining from putting their property together and enjoying it in common, for the quaint yet significant reason that such a plan implied mutual distrust. The friendship subsisting between Epicurus and his pupils is commemorated by Cicero (de Fin., 1, 20). In this garden, too, they lived in the most frugal and virtuous manner, though it was the delight of the enemies of Epicurus to represent it differently, and though Timocrates, who had once been his pupil, and had abandoned him, spread such stories as that Epicurus used to vomit twice a day after a surfeit, and that many immodest women were inmates of the garden. (Vind. Leontium.) An inscription over the gate of the garden told him who might be disposed to enter, that barley-cakes and water would be the fare provided for him (Senec., Ep., 31); and such was the chastity of Epicurus, that one of his principal opponents, Chrysippus, endeavoured to account for it, so as to deny him any merit, by saying that he was without passions. (Stob., Serm., 117.) Epicurus did not marry, in order that he might be able to prosecute philosophy without interruption. His most attached friends and pupils were Hermachus of Mytilene, whom he appointed by will to succeed him as master of the school; Metrodorus, who wrote several books in defence of his system, and Polyænus. Epicurus's three brothers, Neocles, Chæredemus, and Aristobulus, also followed his philosophy, as also one of his servants, Mys, whom at his death he made free. Besides the garden in Athens, from which the followers of Epicurus, in succeeding time, came to be named the philosophers of the garden (Juv., Sat., 13, 122.—Id., 14, 319), Epicurus possessed a house in Melite, a village near Athens, to which he used often to retire with his friends. On his death he left this house, together with the garden, to Hermachus, as head of the school, to be left by him again to whosoever might be his successor.—In physics Epicurus trod pretty closely in the footsteps of Democritus; so much so, indeed, that he was accused of taking his atomic cosmology from that philosopher without acknowledgment. He made very few, and these unimportant, alterations. (Cic., de Fin., 1, 6.) According to Epicurus, as also to Democritus and Leucippus before him, the universe consists of two parts, matter and space, or vacuum in which matter exists and moves; and all matter, of every kind and form, is reducible to certain indivisible bodies or atoms, which are eternal. These atoms, moving, according to a natural tendency, straight downward, and also obliquely, have thereby come to form the different bodies which are found in the world, and which differ in kind and shape, according as the atoms are differently placed in respect to one another. It is clear that, in this system, a creator is dispensed with; and indeed Epicurus, here again following Democritus, set about to prove, in an a priori way, that this creator could not exist, inasmuch as nothing could arise out of nothing, any more than it could utterly perish and become nothing. The atoms have existed always, and always will exist; and all the various physical phenomena are brought about, from time to time, by their various motions.—It remains to speak of the Epicurean system of ethics. Setting out from the two facts that man is susceptible of pleasure and pain, and that he seeks the one and avoids the other, Epicurus propounded, that it is a man's duty to endeavour to increase to the utmost his pleasures, and diminish to the utmost his pains; choosing that which tends to pleasure rather than that which tends to pain, and that which tends to a greater pleasure or to a lesser pain rather than that which tends respectively to a lesser pleasure or a greater pain. He used the terms pleasure and pain in the most comprehensive way, as including pleasure and pain of both mind and body; and he esteemed the pleasures and pains of the mind as incomparably greater than those of the body. Making, then, good and evil, or virtue and vice, depend on a tendency to increase pleasure and diminish pain, or the opposite, he arrived, as he easily might do, at the several virtues to be inculcated and vices to be denounced. And when he got thus far, even his adversaries had nothing to say against him. It is strange that they should have continued to revile the principle, no matter by what name it might be called, when they saw that it was a principle which led to truth.—The period in which Epicurus opened his school was peculiarly favourable. In the room of the simplicity of the Socratic doctrine, nothing now remained but the subtlety and affectation of Stoicism, the unnatural severity of the Cynics, or the debasing doctrine of indolgence taught and practised by the followers of Aristippus. The luxurious refinement which now prevailed in Athens, while it rendered every rigid scheme of philosophy, as well as all grossness of manners, unpopular, inclined the younger citizens to listen to a preceptor who smoothed the stern and wrinkled brow of philosophy, and, under the notion of conducting his followers to enjoyment in the bower of tranquillity, led them unawares into the path of moderation and virtue. Hence the popularity of his school. It cannot be denied, however, that, from the time when this philosopher appeared to the present day, an uninterrupted course of censure has fallen upon his memory; so that the name of his sect has almost become a proverbial expression for everything corrupt in principle and infamous in character. The charges brought against Epicurus are, that he superseded all religious principles by dismissing the gods from the care of the world; that if he acknowledged their existence, it was only in conformity to popular prejudice, since, according to his system, nothing exists in nature but material atoms; that he discovered great insolence and vanity in the disrespect with which he treated the memory of former philosophers, and the characters and persons of his contemporaries; and that both he and his disciples were addicted to the grossest sensuality. These accusations, too, have been not only the voice of common rumour, but more or less confirmed by men distinguished for their wisdom and virtue—Zeno, Cicero, Plutarch, Galen, and a long train of Christian fathers. With respect to the first charge, it certainly admits of no refutation. The doctrine of Epicurus concerning nature militated directly against the agency of a Supreme Being in the formation and government of the world; and his misconceptions with respect to mechanical motion, and the nature of divine happiness, led him to divest the Deity of some of his primary attributes. It does not, however, appear that he entirely denied the existence of superior powers. Cicero charges him with inconsistency in having written books concerning piety and the reverence due to the gods, and in maintaining that the gods ought to be worshipped, while he asserted that they had no concern in human affairs. That there was an inconsistency in this is obvious. But Epicurus professed, that the universal prevalence of the ideas of gods was sufficient to prove that they existed; and, thinking it necessary to derive these ideas, like all other ideas, from sensations, he imagined that the gods were beings of human form, hovering about in the air, and made known to men by the customary emanations. He believed that these gods were eternal, and supremely happy, living in a state of quiet, and meddling not with the affairs of the world. He contended that they were to be worshipped on account of the excellence of their nature, not because they could do men either good or harm. (Cic., N. D., 1, 41.—Senec., de Benef., 4, 19.)—Our chief sources of information respecting the doctrines of Epicurus are, the 10th book of Diogenes Laertius, and the poem of Lucretius "De Rerum Natura." Information is also furnished by the writings of Cicero, especially the "De Finibus" and the "De Natura Deorum;" by those of Seneca, and by the treatise of Plutarch entitled "Against Colotes." Epicurus, according to Diogenes Laertius, was a more voluminous writer than any other philosopher, having written as many as 300 volumes, in all of which he is said to have studiously avoided making quotations. All that now remains of his works are the Letters contained in the 10th book of Diogenes Laertius, and parts of two books of his treatise on Nature (περί φύσεως), which were discovered at Herculaneum. The last were published at Leipzig in 1818, being edited by Orelli. A critical edition of the first two letters was given by Schneider, at Leipzig, 1813.—The Epicurean school was carried on, after Hermarchus, by Polystratus and many others, concerning whom nothing is known; and the doctrines which Epicurus had taught underwent few modifications. When introduced among the Romans, these doctrines, though very much opposed at first, were yet adopted by many distinguished men, as Lucretius, Atticus, Horace. Under the emperors, Pliny the Younger, and Lucian of Samosata, were Epicureans. (Engfeld, Hist. Phil., vol. 1, p. 445, seqq.—Enfield, Us. Knowl., vol. 9, p. 472.—Good's Lucretius, Prolegom.—Id., Book of Nature, vol. 1, p. 48, seqq., &c.)

EPIDAMNUS, a city of Illyricum, on the coast, north of Apollonia. Its foundation is universally ascribed to the Coreyreans, who, in compliment to Corinth, their metropolis, invited a citizen of that town to head their new colony. (Thucyd., 1, 24.) But we are not informed what circumstances led to the change in its name from Epidamnus to that of Dyrrachium, by which it is more commonly known to the Latin writers. Some have thought that Epidamnus and Dyrrachium were two different towns, the latter of which was the emporium of the former. Others affirmed, that the Romans, considering the word Epidamnus to be of evil omen, called it Dyrrachium from the ruggedness of its situation. (Appian, B. C., 2, 39.—Pomp. Mel., 2, 3.—Plin., H. N., 3, 23.) It is pretty evident, however, that the word Δυρράχιον is of Greek, and not of Latin origin, for we find it used by the poet Euphorion of Chalcis in a verse preserved by Stephanus of Byzantium, s. v. Δυρράχιον. The fact seems to be, that the founders of Epidamnus gave the name of Dyrrachium or Dyrrhachium to the high and craggy peninsula on which they built their town. Strabo (316) certainly applies this appellation to the Chersonese, as does the poet Alexander cited by Stephanus, s. v. Δυρράχιον, and this, in time, may have usurped the place of the former name. It is probable, also, that the town called Dyrrachium did not exactly occupy the site of the ancient Epidamnus; indeed, this is plainly asserted by Pausanias (5, 10). Eusebius refers the foundation of Epidamnus to the second year of the 38th Olympiad, or about 625 B.C. Periander was then tyrant of Corinth, and nearly at the same period Cyrene was founded by Battus. Placed at the entrance of the Adriatic, in a situation most advantageous for commerce, which was also favoured by its relations with Coreyra and Corinth, Epidamnus early attained to a considerable degree of opulence and power. It possessed a treasury at Olympia (Pausan., 6, 19), and its citizens vied with those of the most celebrated states of Greece in wealth and accomplishments. (Herodot., 6, 127.) And though the jealousy of the neighbouring barbarians had often prompted them to disturb the peace of the rising colony, it successfully withstood all their attacks until dissension and faction, that bane of the Grecian states, entailed upon the city their attendant evils, and so impaired its strength that it was forced to seek from the Corcyreans that aid against foreign as well as domestic enemies which its necessities required. The refusal of Corcyra compelled the Epidamnians to apply to Corinth, which gladly sought this opportunity of increasing its influence at the expense of that of Corcyra. A Corinthian force, together with a fresh supply of colonists, was accordingly despatched by land to the aid of Epidamnus, and contributed greatly to restore order and tranquillity. The Corcyreans, however, who were on no friendly terms with the Corinthians, could not brook this interference in the affairs of their colony; they also equipped a fleet, which, on its arrival at Epidamnus, summoned that town to receive back those citizens who had been banished, and to send away the Corinthian reinforcement. On the rejection of this proposal by the Epidamnians, the Corcyreans, in conjunction with the neighbouring Illyrians, besieged the town, and, after some days, compelled it to surrender. These are the events which Thucydides has related at length, from their intimate connexion with the origin of the Peloponnesian war. We know but little of the fortunes of Epidamnus from this period to its conquest by the Romans. Aristotle, in his Politics (5, 1), notices a change which took place in its constitution, from the government of magistrates called phylarchs to that of a senate. The character of its inhabitants, which was once virtuous and just, was also impaired by luxury and vice, if we may credit Plautus, who portrays them in his Menæchmi. (Act. 2, Sc. 1.) That Venus was particularly worshipped here we learn from Catullus (36, 11).—Dyrrachium became the scene of the contest between Cæsar and Pompey. The latter general, having been compelled to withdraw from Italy by his enterprising adversary, retired to Dyrrachium on the opposite coast of Illyria, and having collected all his forces round that city, determined to make a stand against the enemy. Cæsar soon followed him thither, having formed the bold design of blockading his adversary in his intrenched camp close to the town. This led to a series of operations, which are detailed at length by Cæsar himself; the success of which continued doubtful until Pompey at length forced his enemy to retire, and was thus enabled to transfer the seat of war into Thessaly. (Cæs., B. C., 3, 41, seqq.—Appian, B. C., 2, 40.) In addition to the strength of its situation, Dyrrachium was of importance to the Romans from its vicinity to Brundisium. Cicero landed there on his banishment from Italy, and speaks of the kindness he experienced from the inhabitants. (Ep. ad Fam., 14, 1.) We learn, indeed, from Ælian (V. H., 13, 16), that the laws of this city were particularly favourable to strangers. Dio Cassius observes, that Dyrrachium sided with Antony during the last civil wars of the republic; and thence it was that Augustus, after his victory, rewarded his soldiers with estates in its territory. The Byzantine historians speak of it as being still a considerable place in their time. (Ann. Comnen., 1, 41.—Cedren., Basil. Imp., p. 703.—Niceph., Callist., 17, 3.) But it is now scarcely more than a village, which is rendered unhealthy by its proximity to some marshes. Its modern name is Durazzo. (Cramer's Ancient Greece, vol. 1, p. 49, seqq.)

EPIDAURIA, a festival at Athens in honour of Æsculapius.

EPIDAUROS, I. a city of Argolis, on the shores of the Saronic Gulf, opposite the island of Ægina. Its territory extended along the coast for the space of fifteen stadia, while towards the land it was encircled by lofty mountains, which contributed to its security. (Strabo, 374.) The more ancient appellation of this city was Epicarus; its founders having been Carians, as Aristotle reported, who were afterward joined by an

Ionian colony from Attica (ap. Strab., l. c.). On the arrival of the Heraclidæ and Dorians, Epidaurus submitted to their arms, and received a colony from Argos under Deiphontes. (Pausan., 2, 34.) It afterward contributed, as Herodotus informs us (1, 146, and 7, 99), to the foundation of several Dorian cities in Asia Minor. The constitution of Epidaurus was originally monarchical; in the time of Periander of Corinth, his father-in-law, Procles, was tyrant of Epidaurus. (Herod., 3, 53.) Afterward the government was aristocratical; the chief magistrates being called Artyne or Artyui, as at Argos (Thucyd., 5, 47), and being the presidents of a council of one hundred and eighty. The common people were termed Konipedes (Κονίποδες) or dusty-feet, in allusion to their agricultural pursuits. (Plut., Quæst. Gr., 1.) Epidaurus was the mother-city of Ægina and Cos, the former of which was once dependant upon it; afterward, however, the Æginetæ emancipated themselves from this state of vassalage, and, by means of their navy, did much injury to the Epidaurian territory. (Herod., 5, 83.) The Epidaurians sent ten ships to Salamis, and 800 heavy-armed soldiers to Plataea. (Herodot., 8, 1, and 9, 102.) They were the allies of Sparta during the Peloponnesian war (Thucyd., 1, 105, and 2, 56), and successfully resisted the Argives, who besieged their city after the battle of Amphipolis. (Thucyd., 5, 53, seqq.) During the Bæotian war they were still in alliance with Lacedæmon (Xen., Hist. Gr., 4, 2, 16—Id., 7, 2, 2), but in the time of Aratus we find them united with the Achæan league. (Polyb., 2, 5.) Epidaurus was still a flourishing city when Paulus Æmilius made the tour of Greece (Liv., 45, 28.—Polyb., 30, 15, 1.); and Pausanias informs us, that many of its buildings were in good preservation when he visited Argolis, more than three centuries later.—Epidaurus was famed for having been, in the mythological legends of Greece, the natal place of Æsculapius; and it derived its greatest celebrity from a neighbouring temple to that god, which was the resort of all who needed his assistance. The temple of Æsculapius was situate at the upper end of a valley, about five miles from the city. In 293 B.C., it was so celebrated that, during a pestilence at Rome, a deputation was sent from this city to implore the aid of the Epidaurian god. (Liv., 10, 47.) The temple was always crowded with invalids, and the priests, who were also physicians, contrived to keep up its reputation, for the walls were covered with tablets describing the cures which they had wrought, even in the time of Strabo. This sacred edifice had been raised on the spot where Æsculapius was supposed to have been born and educated. It was once richly decorated with offerings, but these had for the most part disappeared, either by open theft or secret plunder. The greatest depredator was Sylla, who appropriated the wealth deposited in this shrine to the purpose of defraying the expenses of his army in the war against Mithradates. (Plut., Vit. Syll.—Diod. Sic., Excerpt., 406.)—Chandler states, that the site of this ancient city is now called Epithauro; but the traces are indistinct, and it has probably long been deserted. (Travels, vol. 2, p. 272.) Dodwell observed “several masses of ruin at the foot of a promontory, which are covered by the sea; also some Doric remains and Roman fragments, on that side which is towards the plain.” (Class. Tour, vol. 2, p. 263.) The ruins of the temple of Æsculapius are to be seen on the spot now called Geræa, probably a corruption of Hieron. Near the temple was a remarkably beautiful theatre, built by Polyclitus. (Pausan., 2, 27, 5.) This is now in better preservation than any other theatre in Greece, except that at Tramezus, near Ioannina, and was capable of containing 12,000 spectators. (Leake's Morea, vol. 2, p. 423.—Cramer's Ancient Greece, vol. 3, p. 270.)—II. A town of Laconia, surnamed Limeria, on the eastern coast, about 200 stadia from Epidelium. It had been founded by the Argives, to whom, indeed, according to Herodotus, the whole of this coast, as far as the Malean promontory, once belonged. Apollodorus (ap. Strab., 368) pretended, that Limera was only a contraction for Limeria, by which allusion was made to the convenience of the harbour. The town was situate on an eminence near the sea, and contained, among other buildings, a celebrated temple of Æsculapius. The ruins of Epidaurus Limera are to be seen a little to the north of the modern Monembasia. (Itin. of Morea, p. 235.) Its site is now known by the name of Palæo Embasia. (Cramer's Ancient Greece, vol. 3, p. 201.)—III. A maritime city of Illyria, south of the river Naro. Mannert identifies it with the Arbona of Polybius (2, 11.—Mannert, Geogr., vol. 7, p. 350).

EPIDURIUM, I. one of the Ebudæ Insulæ, supposed by Mannert to be the same with the modern Ila. (Geogr., vol. 2, p. 231.)—II. A promontory of Caledonia, corresponding to the southern extremity of the peninsula of Cantyre. (Mannert, Geogr., vol. 2, p. 204.)

ΕΠΙΓΟΝΙ (Ἐπιγονοί, descendants), the sons of the Grecian heroes who were killed in the first Theban war. (Vid. Polynices.) The war of the Epigoni is famous in ancient history. It was undertaken ten years after the first. The sons of those who had perished in the first war resolved to avenge the death of their fathers. The god, when consulted, promised them victory, if led by Alcæmon, the son of Amphiaræus. Alcæmon accordingly took the command. Another account, however, given by Pausanias (9, 9, 2), makes Thersander, son of Polynices, to have been at the head of the expedition. The other leaders were Amphilocheus, brother of Alcæmon; Ægialeus, son of Adrastus; Diomedes, of Tydeus; Promachus, of Parthenopæus; Sthenelus, of Capaneus; and Eurypylus, of Mecisteus. The Argives were assisted by the Messenians, Arcadians, Corinthians, and Megarians. The Thebans obtained aid from the neighbouring states. The invaders ravaged the villages about Thebes. A battle ensued, in which Iadamas, the son of Eteocles, slew Ægialeus, and fell himself by the spear of Alcæmon. The Thebans then fled; and, by the advice of Tiresias, they secretly left their city, which was entered and plundered by the Argives, and Thersander was placed on the throne.—With the exception of the events of the Trojan war and the return of the Greeks, nothing was so closely connected with the Iliad and Odyssey as the war of the Argives against Thebes, since many of the principal heroes of Greece, particularly Diomedes and Sthenelus, were themselves among the conquerors of Thebes, and their fathers before them, a bolder and wilder race, had fought on the same spot, in a contest which, although unattended with victory, was still far from inglorious. Hence, also, reputed Homeric poems on the subject of this war were extant, which perhaps really bore a great affinity to the Homeric time and school. For we do not find, as in the other poems of the cycle, the name of one, or those of several later poets, placed in connexion with these compositions, but they are either attributed to Homer, as the earlier Greeks in general appear to have done; or if the authorship of Homer is doubted, they are usually attributed to no author at all. Thus the second part of the Thebais, which related to the exploits of the Epigoni, was, according to Pausanias (9, 9, 2), ascribed by some to Homer. The true reading in Pausanias, in the passage just referred to, is undoubtedly Καλλιῶς, and neither Καλαῖως (more correctly Κάλαυος), as the common text has it, nor Καλ-λίμαχος, as Ruhnken conjectures (ad Callin., vol. 1, p. 439, ed. Ernest.). This ancient elegiac poet, therefore, about the twentieth Olympiad, quoted the Thebaid as Homeric. The Epigoni was still commonly ascribed to Homer in the time of Herodotus (4, 32.—Müller, Hist. Lit. Gr., p. 70, seq.).

ΕΠΙΜΕΝΙΔΕΣ, a Cretan, contemporary with Solon, born in the year 659 B.C., at Phæstus, in the island of Crete, according to some accounts, or at Consus according to others. Many marvellous tales are related of him. It is said, that going, by his father's order, in search of a sheep, he laid himself down in a cave, where he fell asleep, and slept for fifty years. He then made his appearance among his fellow-citizens with long hair and a flowing beard, and with a knowledge of medicine and natural history which then appeared more than human. Another idle story told of this Cretan is, that he had a power of sending his soul out of his body and recalling it at pleasure. It is added, that he had familiar intercourse with the gods, and possessed the power of prophecy. The event of his life for which he is best known, was his visit to Athens at the request of the inhabitants, in order to pave the way for the legislation of Solon by purifications and propitiatory sacrifices. These rites were calculated, according to the spirit of the age, to allay the feuds and party dissensions which prevailed there; and, although what he enjoined was mostly of a religious nature (for instance, the sacrifice of a human victim, the consecration of a temple to the Eumenides, and of two altars to Hybris and Anaideia, the two evil powers which were exerting their influence on the Athenians), there can be little doubt but that his object was political, and that Solon's constitution would hardly have been accepted, had it not been recommended and sanctioned by some person, who, like Epimenides, claimed from men little less than the veneration due to a superior being. The Athenians wished to reward Epimenides with wealth and public honours, but he refused to accept any remuneration, and only demanded a branch of the sacred olive-tree, and a decree of perpetual friendship between Athens and his native city.—We probably owe most of the wonderful tales, relative to Epimenides, to the Cretans, who were, to a proverb, famous for their powers of invention. All that is credible concerning him is, that he was a man of superior talents, who pretended to have intercourse with the gods; and, to support his pretensions, lived in retirement upon the spontaneous productions of the earth, and practised various arts of imposture. Perhaps, in his hours of pretended inspiration, he had the art of appearing totally insensible and entranced, which would easily be mistaken, by ignorant spectators, for a power of dismissing and recalling his spirit. Epimenides is said to have lived, after his return to Crete, to the age of 157 years. Divine honours were paid him after his death by the superstitious Cretans. He has no other claims to be mentioned among philosophers, except that he composed a theogony, and other poems concerning religious mysteries. He wrote also a poem on the Argonautic expedition, and other works, which are entirely lost. His treatise on oracles and responses, mentioned by St. Jerome, is said to have been the work from which St. Paul quotes in the epistle to Titus (1, 12.—Consult Heinrich, Epimenides aus Kreta, Leipz., 1801.—Encycl. Us. Knowl., vol. 9, p. 476.—Dog. Laert., 1, 109.—Val. Max., 8, 13.—Plin., 7, 52.—Aristot., Rhet., 3, 9.—Enfield's History of Philosophy, vol. 1, p. 132, seqq.)

ΕΠΙΜΕΤΗΣ, a son of Iapetus and Clymene, one of the Oceanides. He inconsiderately married Pandora, by whom he had Pyrrha, the wife of Deucalion. The legend connected with his name will be found under the article Pandora.

ΕΠΙΜΕΤΗΣ, a patronymic of Pyrrha, the daughter of Epimetheus. (Ovid, Met., 1, 390.)

ΕΠΙΦΑΝΕΑ, I. a town of Cilicia Campestris, south-east of Anazarbus, and situate on the small river Caranus, near the range of Mount Amanus. It is now Surfendkar. (Plin., 5, 27.)—II. A city of Syria, on the Orontes, below Apamea. Its Oriental and true name was Hamath, and it was reckoned by the people of the East one of the most magnificent cities in the world, having been founded, as they imagined, by Hamath, one of the sons of Canaan. Allusion is frequently made to Hamath in the Old Testament. (Compare Genesis, 10, 18.—2 Samuel, 8, 9.—2 Kings, 48, 34.—Jerem., 49, 23.—Amos, 6, 2.) Its name was changed to Epiphane, in honour of Antiochus Epiphanes. It is now Hama, and was in modern times the seat of an Arabian dynasty, to which the geographer Abulfeda belonged. (Abulfeda, Tab. Syr., p. 108.—Poole, vol. 2, p. 210.—Mannert, vol. 6, pt. 1, p. 461.)

ΕΠΙΦΑΝΕΣ (illustrious), I. a surname of Antiochus IV., King of Syria.—II. A surname of Ptolemy V., King of Egypt.

ΕΠΙΦΑΝΙΟΣ, a bishop of Salamis in Cyprus, in the fourth century. He was born of Jewish parents, at a village called Besanducan, near Eleutheropolis, in Palestine, about A.D. 320, and appears to have been educated in Egypt, where he imbibed the principles of the Gnostics. At length he left those heretics, and, becoming an ascetic, returned to Palestine and adopted the discipline of St. Hilarion, the founder of monachism in that country. Epiphanius erected a monastery near the place of his birth, over which he presided till he was made bishop of Salamis in 367. Here he remained about 36 years, and composed most of his writings. In 391 he commenced a controversy with John, bishop of Jerusalem, relative to the Platonic doctrines of the learned and laborious Origen, against which he wrote and preached with implacable bitterness. John favoured Origen's views, but Epiphanius found in Theophilus, the violent bishop of Alexandria, a worthy coadjutor, who, in 399, convened a council, and condemned all the works of Origen. Epiphanius himself then called a council in Cyprus, A.D. 401, and reiterated this condemnation, after which he wrote to St. Chrysostom, then bishop of Constantinople, requesting him to do the same. On finding this prelate disinclined to sanction his violent proceedings, he forthwith repaired to Constantinople, for the purpose of exciting the bishops of that diocese to join in executing the decrees which his Cyprian council had issued; but, having entered a church in the city in order to repeat his anathemas, he was forewarned by Chrysostom of the illegality of his conduct, and was obliged to desist. Exasperated at this disappointment, he applied to the imperial court for assistance, where he soon embroiled himself with the Empress Eudoxia; for, on the occasion of her asking him to pray for the young Theodosius, who was dangerously ill, he replied that her son should not die, provided she would not patronise the defenders of Origen. To this presumptuous message the empress indignantly answered, that her son's life was not in the power of Epiphanius, whose prayers were unable to save that of his own archdeacon, who had recently died. After thus vainly endeavouring to gratify his sectarian animosity, he resolved to return to Cyprus; but he died at sea on the passage, A.D. 403. The principal works of Epiphanius are, 1. Ἡ ἀναρίστησις, or a Treatise on Heresies, that is, peculiar sects (αἵρεσεις). This is the most important of his writings. It treats of eighty sects, from the time of Adam to the latter part of the 4th century. 2. Ἀνακρίσεις, or an Epitome of the Panarion. 3. Ἀγκυρῶν, or a Discourse on the Faith, explaining the doctrine of the Trinity, Resurrection, &c. 4. A treatise on the ancient weights, measures, and coins of the Jews.—Epiphanius was an austere and superstitious ascetic, and, as a bitter controversialist, he often resorts to very false arguments for the refutation of heretics. That his inaccuracy and credulity were equal to his religious zeal, is apparent from his numerous mistakes in important historical facts, and his reliance on any false and foolish reports. Jerome, however, admires Epiphanius for his skill in the Hebrew, Syriac, Egyptian, Greek, and Latin languages, and accordingly styles him

"Pentaglottus" (Πεντάγλωττος), or the Five-tongued. But Scaliger calls him an ignorant man, who committed the greatest blunders, told the greatest falsehoods, and knew next to nothing about either Hebrew or Greek. Still his writings are of great value, as containing numerous citations from curious works which are no longer extant. The best edition of his works is that of Petavius, Paris, 2 vols. fol., 1622, and Col., 1682. (Du Pin, Bibl. Eccl., vol. 2.—Cave's Lit. Hist.—Bayle, Diet., s. v.—Clarke's Succession of Sacred Literature.—Encyc. Useful Knowledge, vol. 9, p. 477.)

ΕΠΙΡΩΛΕ, a piece of elevated and broken ground, sloping down towards the city of Syracuse, but precipitous on the other side. It received its name from the circumstance of its overlooking Syracuse. Hence Thucydides (6, 96) remarks, ἀνίσταται ὑπὸ τῶν Συρακοσίων, διὰ τὸ ἐπιρῶλες τοῦ ἄλλου εἶναι, Ἐπιρῶλαι. (Consult Güller, de Situ et Origine Syracusarum, p. 53, seqq.)

ΕΠΙΡΟΣ, a country to the west of Thessaly, lying along the Adriatic. The Greek term ἡπειρος, which answers to the English word mainland, appears to have been applied at a very early period to that northwestern portion of Greece which is situated between the chain of Pindus and the Ionian Gulf, and between the Ceraunian Mountains and the river Achelous; this name being probably used to distinguish it from the large, populous, and wealthy island of Corcyra, which lay opposite to the coast. It appears that, in very ancient times, Acarnania was also included in the term, and in that case the name must have been used in opposition to all the islands lying along the coast. (Strab., 453.—Hom., Od., 14, 100.) The ancient geography of Epirus was attended with great difficulties even in the time of Strabo. The country had not then recovered from the effects of the destruction caused by Paulus Æmilius in 167 B.C., who destroyed seventy towns, and reduced to slavery 150,000 of the inhabitants. (Polyb., ap. Strab., p. 322.—Liv., 45, 34.—Plut., Vit. Paul. Æmil., c. 29.) After this the greater part of the country remained in a state of absolute desolation, and, where there were any inhabitants, they had nothing but villages and ruins to dwell in. (Strab., 327.)—The inhabitants of Epirus were scarcely considered Hellenic. The population in early times had been Pelagic. (Strab., 221.)—The oracle at Dodona was always called Pelagic, and many names of places in Epirus were also borne by the Pelagic cities of the opposite coast of Italy. (Niebuhr, Hist. Rom., vol. 1, p. 34.) But irruptions of Illyrians had barbarized the whole nation; and though Herodotus speaks of Thesprotia as a part of Hellas, he refers rather to its old condition, when it was a celebrated seat of the Pelasgians, than to its state at the time when he wrote his history. In their mode of cutting the hair, in their costume, and in their language, the Epirotes resembled the Macedonians, who were an Illyrian race. (Strab., 327.) Theopompus (ap. Strab., 323) divided the inhabitants of Epirus into fourteen different tribes, of which the most renowned were the Chaonians and Molossians, who successively maintained a preponderance in this country. The Molossians claimed descent from Molossus, son of Neoptolemus and Andromache. Tradition reported, that the son of Achilles, Neoptolemus, or Pyrrhus, as he is also called, having crossed from Thessaly into Epirus on his return from the siege of Troy, was induced, by the advice of an oracle, to settle in the latter country, where, having subjugated a considerable extent of territory, he transmitted his newly-formed kingdom to Molossus, his son by Andromache, from whom his subjects derived the name of Molossi. (Pind., Nem., 7, 56.) Scymnus of Chios conceives Pyrrhus to have been the son of Neoptolemus (v. 446). The history of Molossia is involved in great obscurity until the period of the Persian invasion, when the name of Admetus, king of the Molossii, occurs from the circumstance of his having generously afforded shelter to Themistocles when in exile and pursued by his enemies, although the influence of that celebrated statesman had previously been exerted against him in some negotiations which he had carried on at Athens. The details of this interesting anecdote, as they are furnished by Thucydides, serve to prove the weakness as well as poverty of the Molossian chiefs compared with the leading powers of Greece at that time. (Thucyd., 1, 136.) Admetus was succeeded by his son Tharypas or Tharymbas, who appears to have been a minor towards the beginning of the Peloponnesian war, when we find his subjects assisting the Ambraciots in their invasion of Acarnania. Thucydides, on that occasion, reports, that Sabylinthus, prince of Atintania, was guardian to Tharybas (2, 80). Tharybas is represented by Plutarch (Vit. Pyrrh.) as a wise and able monarch, and as encouraging science and literature. His successor is not known; but some years after we hear of a prince called Alcetas, who was dethroned by his subjects, but restored by Dionysius of Syracuse. (Diod. Sic., 15, 13.—Pausan., 1, 11.) Neoptolemus, his son, reigned but for a short time, and left the crown to his brother Arybas, together with the care of his children. Alexander, the eldest of these, succeeded his uncle, and was the first sovereign of Epirus who raised the character and fame of that country among foreign nations by his talents and valour. His sister Olympias had been married to Philip of Macedon, before his accession to the throne of Epirus; and the friendship thus cemented between the two monarchs was still further strengthened by the union of Alexander with Cleopatra, the daughter of Philip. It was during the celebration of these nuptials at Edessa that the King of Macedon was assassinated. Alexander of Epirus seems to have been an ambitious prince, desirous of conquest and renown; and, though we have no certain information of the events which occurred during his reign, there is good reason for believing that he united the Chaonians, Thesprotians, and other Epirotic clans, together with the Molossians, under his sway; as we find the title of King of Epirus first assumed by him. (Diod. Sic., 16, 72.—Strabo, 280.) Having been applied to by the Tarentines to aid them against the attacks of the Lucani and Brutii, he eagerly seized this opportunity of adding to his fame and enlarging his dominions. He therefore crossed over into Italy with a considerable force, and, had he been properly seconded by the Tarentines and the other colonies of Magna Græcia, the barbarians, after being defeated in several engagements, must have been conquered. But Alexander, being left to his own resources and exertions, was at length surrounded by the enemy, and slain near the fated walls of Pandosia, in the Brutian territory. (Liv., 8, 24.—Strabo, 255.) On the death of Alexander the crown devolved on his cousin Æacides, the son of Arybas the former king, of whom little is known, except that, having raised an army to assist Olympias against Cassander, his soldiers mutinied and deposed him; not long after, however, he appears to have been reinstated. (Diod. Sic., 19, 36.) His brother Alcetas, who succeeded him, was engaged in a war with Cassander, which proved unfortunate; for, being defeated, his dominions were overrun by the forces of his victorious enemy, and he himself was put to death by his rebellious subjects. (Diod. Sic., 19, 36.) The name of Pyrrhus, who now ascended the throne, sheds a lustre on the annals of Epirus, and gives to its history an importance it never would otherwise have possessed. (Vid. Pyrrhus.) Alexander, the eldest son of Pyrrhus, succeeded his father, whom he sought to emulate by attempting a fresh conquest of Macedon. On this occasion Antigonus Gonatas was again vanquished and driven from his dominions. But Demetrius, his son, having raised another army, attacked Alexander, and presently compelled him to evacuate the Macedonian territory. (Justin., 26, 3.—Frontin., Strat., 3.) At the expiration of two other insignificant reigns, the royal line of the Æacidae becoming extinct, the Epirots determined to adopt a republican form of government, which prevailed until the subjugation of Macedon by the Romans. Having been accused of favouring Persens in the last Macedonian war, they became the objects of the bitterest vengeance of the Romans, who treated this unfortunate nation, as we have already remarked, with unexampled and detestable severity. Epirus, having lost its independence, was thenceforth annexed as a province to the Roman empire.—We may consider Epirus as bounded on the north by Illyria and part of Macedonia, from the Acroceraunian mountains to the central chain of Pindus. In this direction the river Aous would be the natural line of separation between these two countries. The Perævæi and Tymphæi, who occupied the upper valleys of that river, being generally looked upon as Epirotic tribes, while the Orestæ and Elymiotæ, contiguous to them on the north, were certainly included within the limits of Macedonia. On the side of Thessaly, Pindus formed another natural barrier, as far as the source of the river Arachthus, which served to part the Cassopæi and other Molossian clans from the country of the Athamæans. But as the republic of Ambracia, which occupied both banks of this river near its entrance into the Ambracian gulf, became a portion of Epirus after it ceased to enjoy a separate political existence, we must remove the southern boundary of this province to the vicinity of Argos and the territory of the Amphilocheians. Epirus, though in many respects wild and mountainous, was esteemed a rich and fertile country. Its pastures produced the finest oxen, and horses unrivalled for their speed. It was also famous for a large breed of dogs, thence called Molossi; and modern travellers have noticed the size and ferocity of these dogs at the present day. Epirus corresponds to the Lower Albania of modern times. The following is the account given of the present aspect of the country by Malte-Brun. "The climate of Lower Albania is colder than that of Greece; the spring does not set in before the middle of March, and the heat of summer is oppressive in July and August: in these months many streams and rivers are drained, the grass and plants are withered. The vintage begins in September, and the heavy rains during December are succeeded in January by some days of frosty weather. (Pouqueville, vol. 2, p. 263, seqq.) The oak-trees, and there is almost every kind of them, arrive at great perfection: the plane, the cypress, and manniferous ash appear near the seacoast, beside the laurel and the lentisk; but the forests on Pindus consist chiefly of cedars, pine, larch, and chestnut-trees. (Pouqueville, vol. 2, p. 186 and 274.—Id., vol. 4, p. 412.) Many of the mountains are arid and sterile, such as are sufficiently watered are verdant, or covered with the wild vine and thick groups of elders; in spring their sides are covered with flowers; the violet, the narcissus, and hyacinth appear in the same profusion as in the mild districts of Italy. The inhabitants cultivate cotton and silk; but the olive, for want of proper care, does not yield an abundant harvest; the Amphilocheian peach, the Arta nut, and the quince, grow in a wild state in the woods and uncultivated land. Epirus was once famous for its oxen; the breed was improved by King Pyrrhus (Plin., 7, 44.—Aristot., Hist. An., 3, 16): it has now degenerated; they are small, stunted, and ill-shaped. The horses of the same country are still excellent." (Malte-Brun, Geogr., vol. 6, p. 179, Am. ed.)

ΕΡΕΔΩΡΙΣ, I. a leading chieftain among the Ædui in Gaul. He commanded the forces of his countrymen in their war with the Sequani, before Cæsar's arrival in Gaul. (B. G., 7, 67.) He afterward went over to the side of Vercingetorix, in the great insurrection against the Roman power, but was taken prisoner by Cæsar. (B. G., 7, 55.—Id., 63.—Id., 67.)—II. Another Æduan leader, mentioned by Cæsar. (B. G., 7, 76.)

EPYRIDES, a patronymic given to Periphanthes, the son of Epytus, and the companion of Ascanius. (Virg., Æn., 5, 517.)

ECURIA, a festival established at Rome by Romulus in honour of Mars, when horse-races and games were exhibited in the Campus Martius. It took place on the 27th of February. (Varro, de L. L., 5, 3.—Ovid, Fast., 2, 859.)

EQUITES, the name of an order in the Roman state. Their origin, according to the old tradition, was this: Romulus, having divided his subjects into three tribes, chose from each 100 young men, whom he destined to serve on horseback, and act as his body-guard. This body of cavalry was called the Celeres, and afterward the Equites. (Dion. Hal., 2, 13.) Niebuhr supposes (Rom. Hist., vol. 1, p. 325), that whereas Patres and Patricii were titles of honour for individuals, Celeres was the name of the whole class as distinguished from the rest of the nation. The three centuries of the Celeres were called by the same names as the three tribes of the patricians, namely, Ramnes, Tities, and Luceres. Their tribes are spoken of as a college of priests (Dion. Hal., 2, 64), and it appears that the tribes of the patricians had also tribes. (Dion. Hal., 2, 7.) Moreover, when it is said that Tarquinius Priscus made three new centuries, which he added to the former three, and that the whole went under the name of the Sex Suffragia, or the Six Equestrian Centuries, we cannot doubt that the alteration which he introduced was a constitutional, and not merely a military one; that, in fact, the centuries which he formed were, like the original three, tribes of houses; that his innovation was nothing but an extension of the political division of Rome under Romulus. (Niebuhr, Rom. Hist., vol. 1, p. 391.) When Servius Tullius established the comitia of the centuries, he received the Sex Suffragia, which included all the patricians, into his first class, and to them he added twelve other equestrian centuries, made up of the richest of the plebeian order. (Niebuhr, vol. 1, p. 427.) The ancient writers appear to have laboured under some great confusion with regard to this arrangement. Livy (1, 43) makes a proper distinction between the twelve equestrian centuries created by Servius, and the six which existed before; but when he states (1, 36) that the cavalry in the reign of Tarquinius Priscus amounted to 1800, he appears to be antedating the origin of the eighteen equestrian centuries which formed part of the constitution of Servius. To the establishment of the Comitia Centuriata, the creation of a body of Equites, as a distinct order, seems to be due. The plan of Servius was, to a certain extent, identical with that of Solon. The object of both legislators was to break down the limits to which the old aristocracy was confined, and to set up an order of wealth by the side of the order of birth; not, however, that when a person could produce his 400,000 sesterces, he became ipso facto a knight, as was the case in after times. (Hor., Epist., 1, 1, 57.) According to the Servian constitution, good birth or the sanction of the censors was necessary for gaining a place in the equestrian order. (Polyb., 6, 20.—Zonaras, 7, 19.) When Cicero says (De Repub., 2, 20) that Tarquinius established the equestrian order on the same footing as that on which it stood in his time, and also attributes to the same king the assigning of money to the equites for the purchase and keep of their horses, he is evidently inconsistent. In Tarquin's time, that is, before there was any plebeian order, it was natural enough that the poorer patricians, who were obliged to serve on horseback (just as the Ἱππεῖς at Athens were a poorer class than the Ἰπτακοικημένοι, Plut., Vit. Sol., c. 18), should be furnished with the means for doing so. But the case was different with the equites, after the establishment of an order of wealth. A man might then be of equestrian rank, and yet have no horse assigned him. Thus, on the one hand, we find, at the time of the siege of Veii, a number of equites serving on horseback at their own expense (Liv., 5, 7); and, on the contrary, L. Tarquinius, who was a patrician, was obliged to serve on foot from his poverty. (Liv., 3, 27.) From this it appears probable that a certain sum was fixed, which it was not necessary for every equus to have, but the possessor of which was obliged to serve on horseback at his own expense if no horse could be given him by the public; and that those whose fortune fell short of this, were obliged to serve in the infantry under the same circumstances.—The lieutenant of the dictator was called "the chief of the equites" (magister equitum); and although in later times he was appointed to this office by the dictator himself, it is probable, as Niebuhr conjectures (vol. 1, p. 559), that he was originally elected by the 12 centuries of plebeian equites, just as the dictator or magister populi was chosen by the sex suffragia, or, in other words, by the populus or patricians.—With regard to the functions of the equites, besides their military duties, they had to act as judices or jurymen under the Sempronian law: under the Servilian law the judges were chosen from the senate as well as from the equites: by the Glauclian law, the equites alone performed the office; and so on, by alternate changes, till the law of Aurelius Cotta, B.C. 70, by which the judges were chosen from the senators, equites, and tribuni ærarii.—The equites also farmed the public revenues. Those who were engaged in this business were called the publicani; and though Cicero, who was himself of the equestrian order, speaks of these farmers as "the flower of the Roman equites, the ornament of the state, the safeguard of the republic" (pro Planc., 9), it appears that they were a set of detestable oppressors, who made themselves odious in all the provinces by their avarice and rapacity.—The equites, as may be inferred from what has been already said, gradually lost the marks of their distinctive origin, and became, as they were in the time of Cicero, for instance, an ordo or class of persons, as distinguished from the senate and the plebs. They had particular seats assigned them in the circus and theatre. The insignia of their rank, in addition to the horse, were a golden ring, and the angustus clavus, or narrow border of purple on their dress, as distinguished from the latus clavus, or broad band of the senators. The last two insignia seem to have remained after the former ceased to possess its original and distinctive character. (Encycl. Us. Knocl., vol. 9, p. 492.)

EQUUS TUTIENS, a town of Samnium, on the Apian Way, distant, according to the Itineraries, twenty-two ancient miles from Cluvia, which is itself ten miles northeast of Beneventum. (Romanelli, vol. 2, p. 331.) The term Tutiens is Oscan, equivalent to the Latin Magnus. (Lanzi, vol. 3, p. 608.) Much discussion has arisen among geographers as to the precise situation of this place. Cluverius was of opinion that it ought to be placed at Ariano (Ital. Ant., 2, 12); others near Ascoli (Pratilli, Via Appia, lib. 4, c. 10); D'Anville at Castel Franco (Annal. Geogr. de l'Ital., p. 218), which supposition is nearly correct; but the exact site, according to the report of local antiquaries, is occupied by the ancient church of St. Eleuterio, a martyr who is stated, in old ecclesiastical records, to have suffered at Equum. This place is about five miles distant from Ariano, in a northerly direction. The branch of the Apian Way on which Equus Tutiens stood, runs nearly parallel with that which Horace seems to have followed in his well-known journey to Brundisium. He informs us, that he passed the first night after having left Beneventum at a villa close to Trivicum, a place situated among the mountains separating Samnium from Apulia. Horace, in speaking of Equus Tuticus, pleasantly alludes to the unmanageable nature of the name in verse : "Mansuri oppidulo, quod versu dicere non est." (Sat., 1, 5, 87.)

ERASISTRATUS, a physician of Iulis, in the island of Ceos, and grandson of Aristotle by a daughter of this philosopher's. (Strabo, 486.—Steph. Byzan., s. v. Ἰουλίς.) After having frequented the schools of Chryseus, Metrodorus, and Theophrastus, he passed some time at the court of Seleucus Nicator, where he gained great reputation by his discovering the secret malady which preyed upon the young Antiochus, the son of the king, who was in love with his mother-in-law, Queen Stratonice. (Appian, Bell. Syr., c. 126.—Lucian, de Dea Syr., c. 17.) It was at Alexandria, however, that he principally practised. At last he refused altogether to visit the sick, and devoted himself entirely to the study of anatomy. The branches of this study which are indebted to him for new discoveries, are, among others, the doctrine of the functions of the brain, and that of the nervous system. He has immortalized himself by the discovery of the via lactea; and he would seem to have come very near that of the circulation of the blood. Comparative anatomy furnished him with the means of describing the brain much better than had ever been done before him. He also distinguished and gave names to the auricles of the heart. (Galen, de Dogm. Hipp. et Plat., lib. 7, p. 311, seqq.—Id., de Usu Part., lib. 8, p. 458.—Id., de Administr. Anat., lib. 7, p. 184.—Id., an Sanguis, &c., p. 223.) A singular doctrine of Erasistratus is that of the πνεῦμα (pneuma), or the spiritual substance which, according to him, fills the arteries, which we inhale in respiration, which from the lungs makes its way into the arteries, and then becomes the vital principle of the human system. As long as this spirit moves about in the arteries, and the blood in the veins, man enjoys health : but when, from some cause or other, the veins become contracted, the blood then spreads into the arteries and becomes the source of maladies : it produces fever when it enters into some noble part or into the great artery; and inflammations when it is found in the less noble parts or in the extremities of the arteries. (Galen, Comm., 1, in lib. de Nat. Hum., p. 3.) Erasistratus rejected entirely blood-letting, as well as cathartics : he supplied their place with dieting, tepid bathing, vomiting, and exercise. In general, he was attached to simple remedies : he recognised what was subsequently termed Idiosyncrasy, or the peculiar constitution of different individuals, which makes the same remedy act differently on different persons. A few fragments of the writings of Erasistratus have been preserved by Galen. (Schöll, Hist. Lit. Gr., vol. 3, p. 406, seqq.—Sprengel, Hist. Med., vol. 1, p. 439, seqq.)

ERĀTO, one of the Muses, who presided over lyric, tender, and amorous poetry. She is said to have invented also hymns to the gods, and to have presided likewise over pantomimic dancing. Hence Ausonius says, "Plectra gerens Erato saltat pede, carmine, vultu." (Idyl. ult., v. 6.) She is represented as crowned with roses and myrtle, holding a lyre in her hand. She appears with a thoughtful, and sometimes with a gay and animated, look. (Compare Müller, Archæol. der Kunst, p. 594, seqq.)

ERATOSTHENES, a distinguished contemporary of Archimedes, born at Cyrene, B.C. 276. He possessed a variety of talents seldom united in the same individual, but not all in the same eminent degree. His mathematical, astronomical, and geographical labours are those which have rescued his name from oblivion. The Alexandrian school of sciences, which flourished under the first Ptolemies, had already produced Timochares and Aristyllus, whose solstitial observations, made probably by the shadows of a gnomon, and by the armillary circles imitative of those of the celestial vault, retained considerable credit for centuries afterward, though, from these methods of observation, they must have been extremely rude and imperfect. Eratosthenes had not only the advantages arising from the instruments and observations of his predecessors, but the great Alexandrian library, which probably contained all the Phœnician, Chaldaic, Egyptian, and Greek learning of the time, was intrusted to his superintendence by the third Ptolemy (Evergetes) who invited him to Alexandria; and we have proof, in the scattered fragments which remain to us of this great man, that these advantages were duly cultivated to his own fame and the progress of infant astronomy. The only work attributed to Eratosthenes which has come down to us entire, is entitled Καταστερισμοί (Catasterismi), and is merely a catalogue of the names of forty-four constellations, and the situations in each constellation of the principal stars, of which he enumerates nearly five hundred, but without one reference to astronomical measurement. We find Hipparchus quoted in it, and mention made of the motion of the pole, that of the polar star having been recognised by Pytheas. These circumstances, taken in conjunction with the vagueness of the descriptions, render its genuineness extremely doubtful; at all events, it is a work of little value. If Eratosthenes be really the author of the "Catasterismi," it must have been composed merely as a vade mecum, for we find him engaged in astronomical researches far more exact and more worthy of his genius. By his observations he determined, that the distance between the tropics, that is, twice the obliquity of the ecliptic, was $\frac{1}{4}$ of an entire circumference, or $47^{\circ} 42' 39''$, which makes the obliquity to be $23^{\circ} 51' 19.5''$, nearly the same as that supposed by Hipparchus and Ptolemy. As the means of observation were at that time very imperfect, the instruments divided only to intervals of $10'$, and corrections for the greater refraction at the winter solstice, for the diameter of the solar disc, &c., were then unknown, we must regard this conclusion as highly creditable to Eratosthenes. His next achievement was to measure the circumference of the earth. He knew that at Syene (the modern Assuan) the sun was vertical at noon in the summer solstice; while at Alexandria, at the same moment, it was below the zenith by the fiftieth part of a circumference : the two places are nearly on the same meridian (error 2°). Neglecting the solar parallax, he concluded that the distance from Alexandria to Syene is the fiftieth part of the circumference of the earth; this distance he estimated at five thousand stadia, which gives two hundred and fifty thousand stadia for the circumference. Thus Eratosthenes has the merit of pointing out a method for finding the circumference of the earth. But his data were not sufficiently exact, nor had he the means of measuring the distance from Alexandria to Syene with sufficient precision.—Eratosthenes has been called a poet, and Scaliger, in his commentary on Manilius, gives some fragments of a poem attributed to him, entitled Ἑρμῆς (Hermes), one of which is a description of the terrestrial zones. It is not improbable that these are authentic.—That Eratosthenes was an excellent geometer we cannot doubt, from his still extant solution of the problem of two mean proportionals, preserved by Theon, and a lost treatise quoted by Pappus, "De Locis ad Medietates," on which Montucla has offered some conjectures. (Hist. des Math., an. 7, p. 280.)—Eratosthenes appears to have been one of the first who attempted to form a system of geography. His work on this subject, entitled Γεωγραφικά (Geographica), was divided into three books. The first contained a history of geography, a critical notice of the authorities used by him, and the elements of physical geography. The second book treated of mathematical geography. The third contained the political or historical geography of the then known world. The whole work was accompanied with a map. The geography of Eratosthenes is lost; the fragments which remain have been chiefly preserved by Strabo, who was doubtless much indebted to them.—Eratosthenes also busied himself with chronology. Some remarks on his Greek chronology will be found in Clinton's Fasti Hellenici (vol. 1, p. 3.—Ib., p. 408); and on his list of Theban kings in Rask's work on the Ancient Egyptian Chronology (Altona, 1830).—The properties of numbers attracted the attention of philosophers from the earliest period, and Eratosthenes also distinguished himself in this branch. He wrote a work on the "Duplication of the Cube," Κύβου διπλασιασμός, which we only know by a sketch that Eudoxus has given of it, in his treatise on the Sphere and Cylinder of Archimedes. Eratosthenes composed, also, another work in this department, entitled Κόκκινον, or "the Sieve," the object of which was to separate prime from composite numbers, a curious memoir on which was published by Horsey, in the "Philosophical Transactions," 1772.—Eratosthenes arrived at the age of eighty years, and then, becoming weary of life, died by voluntary starvation. (Suid., s. v.) Montucla, with his usual naïveté, says, it would have been more philosophical to have awaited death "de pied ferme."—The best editions of the Catasterismi are that of Schaubach, with notes by Heyne, Gött., 1795, and that of Matthiæ, in his Aratus, Francof., 1817, 8vo. The fragments of Eratosthenes have been collected by Bernhardt, Berol., 1822. (Montucla, Hist. des Math., p. 239.—Delambre, Hist. de l'Astron. Anc., p. 86.—Encycl. Us. Knovel., vol. 9, p. 497.)

ERBESSUS, a strongly-fortified town of Sicily, northeast of Agrigentum, which the Romans made their principal place of arms in the siege of the last-mentioned city. It was soon after destroyed. (Polyb., 1, 18.)—When mention is made, in other passages of the ancient writers, of Erbessa, we must, no doubt, refer it to the city of Herbessa, which lay nearer Syracuse. (Mannert, Geogr., vol. 9, pt. 2, p. 441.)

ERCHIA, one of the boroughs of Attica, and belonging to the tribe Ægeis. Its position has not been clearly ascertained. This was the native demus of Xenophon and Isocrates. (Diog. Laert., 2, 48.)

EREBUS, I. a deity of the lower world, sprung from Chaos. From him and his sister Nox (Night) came Æther and the Day. (Hesiod, Theog., 123, seqq.)—II. A dark and gloomy region in the lower world, where all is dreary and cheerless. According to the Homeric notion, Erebus lay between the earth and Hades, beneath the latter of which was Tartarus. It was therefore not an abode of the departed, but merely a passage from the upper to the lower world. (Heyne, ad. Iliad., 8, 368.—Passow, Lex. Gr., s. v.) This mode of explaining is opposed, however, by some, though on no sufficient grounds. (Keightley's Mythology, p. 90.) Oriental scholars derive the name Erebus from the Hebrew ereb, evening.

ERECHTHŒUS, the well of salt water in the Acropolis at Athens. (Vid. Erechtheus.)

ERECHTHEUS, one of the early Attic kings, said to have been the son of Pandion I., and the sixth in the series of monarchs of Attica. He was father of Cecrops II.—We have already given some remarks on the fabulous history of the Attic kings, under the article Cecrops. It may be added here, that Erechtheus in all probability was only a title of Neptune. This appears plainly, as far as such a point can be said to ac plain, both from the etymology of the name and the testimony of ancient writers. Thus we have in Hesychius, Ἐρεχθεύς, Ποσειδῶν ἐν Ἀθήναις, and in the scholia of Tzetzēs to Lycophron (v. 158), Ἐρεχθεύς, ὁ Ποσειδῶν ἢ ὁ Ζεὺς (παρὰ τὸ ἐρέχθω, τὸ κινῶ). Many other writers declare the identity of Neptune and Erechtheus. The Erechtheum of the Acropolis was contiguous to the temple of Minerva Polias, and its principal altar was dedicated to Neptune, "on which," Pausanias says (1, 26), "they also sacrificed to Erechtheus;" a very natural variation of the story, when it was forgotten that Neptune and Erechtheus were the same. Ἐρεχθεύς means "the shaker," and is equivalent to ἐνσείχθων or ἐννοσίγαιος, the most frequent epithets of the god of the sea. That Erechtheus was really Neptune is farther evident from the circumstance, that the well of salt water in the Acropolis, which was said to be the memorial of the contest of Neptune with Minerva for the honour of being the tutelary deity of Athens, was called θάλασσα Ἐρεχθίδης. (Philol. Museum, No. 5, p. 360.)

ERESSUS or ERĒSUS (on coins the name is always written with one Σ), a city of Lesbos, situate on a hill, at the distance of twenty-eight stadia from Cape Sigrium. It derives celebrity from having given birth to Theophrastus. Phanias, another disciple of the great Stagiritē, was likewise a native of this place. (Strab., 616.—Steph. Byz., s. v. Ἐρῆσος.) According to Archestratus, quoted by Athenæus, Eressus was famous for the excellence of its wheaten flour. The site yet preserves the name of Eresso. (Pococke, vol. 1, b. 3, c. 4.—Cramer's Asia Minor, vol. 1, p. 163.)

ERETRIA, I. a town of the island of Eubœa, situate on the coast of the Euripus, southeast of Chalcis. It was said by some to have been founded by a colony from Triphylia in Peloponnesus: by others its origin was ascribed to a party of Athenians belonging to the demus of Eretria. (Strabo, 447.) The latter opinion is far more probable, as this city was doubtless of Ionic origin. (Herodot., 8, 46.) We learn from Strabo, that Eretria was formerly called Melaneis and Arotria; and that, at an early period, it had attained to a considerable degree of prosperity and power. The Eretrians had conquered the islands of Ceos, Teos, Tenos, and others. And in their festival of Diana, which was celebrated with great pomp and splendour, three thousand soldiers on foot, with six hundred cavalry, and sixty chariots, were often employed to attend the procession. (Strabo, 448.—Compare Livy, 35, 38.) Eretria, at this period, was frequently engaged in war with Chalcis; and Thucydides reports (1, 15), that on one occasion most of the Grecian states took part in the contest. The assistance which Eretria then received from the Milesians induced that city to co-operate with the Athenians in sending a fleet and troops to the support of the Ionians, who had revolted from Persia at the instigation of Aristagoras (Herodot., 5, 99); by which measure it became exposed, in conjunction with Athens, to the vengeance of Darius. This monarch accordingly gave orders to his commanders, Datis and Artaphernes, to subdue both Eretria and Athens, and bring the inhabitants captive before him. Eretria was taken after six days' siege, and the captive inhabitants brought to Asia. They are said to have been in number only four hundred, among whom were ten women. The rest of the Eretrians escaped from the Persians among the rocks of the island. Darius treated the prisoners kindly, and settled them at Ardericca, in the district of Cissia. (Herodot., 6, 119.) According to Philostratus, they occupied the same spot at the beginning of the Christian era. Eretria recovered from the effects of this disaster, and was rebuilt soon after. We find it mentioned by Thucydides, towards the close of his history (8, 94), as revolting from Athens on the approach of a Spartan fleet under Hegesandridas, and mainly contributing to the success obtained by that commander. After the death of Alexander, this city surrendered to Ptolemy, a general in the service of Antigonus (Diod. Sic., 19, 78); and in the Macedonian war, to the combined fleets of the Romans, the Rhodians, and Atalus. (Liv., 32, 16.) It was subsequently declared free, by order of the Roman senate. (Polyb., 18, 28, seqq.) This place, as we learn from Athenæus, was noted for the excellence of its flour and bread. (Sopat., Com. ap. Athen., 4, 50.) At one time it possessed a distinguished school of philosophy and dialectic, as we learn from Strabo (444.—Compare Diog. Laert., Vit. Arces.—Plin., 4, 12—Steph. Byz., s. v. Ἐπίρρνα). The ruins of Eretria are still to be observed close to a headland which lies opposite to the mouth of the Asopus in Bœotia. D'Anville gives the modern name as Gravilinais. (Cramer's Anc. Greece, vol. 2, p. 136, seqq.)—II. A demus of Attica. (Strabo, 447.)—III. A town of Thessaly, near Pharsalus, and between that city and Phæræ. (Polyb., fragm., 18, 3.—Liv., 33, 6.)

ERETUM, a town of the Sabines, north of Nomentum and northeast of Fidenæ, and at no great distance from the Tiber. Its name frequently occurs in the Roman historians. The antiquity of the place is attested by Virgil (7, 711), who enumerates it in his list of the Sabine towns which sent aid to Turnus. It was subsequently the scene of many a contest between the Romans and Sabines, leagued with the Etruscans. (Liv., 3, 29.—Dion. Hal., 3, 59.) Hannibal, according to Cælius, the historian, when advancing by the Via Salaria towards Rome, to make a diversion in favour of Capua, turned off at Eretum to pillage the temple of Feronia. In Strabo's time Eretum appears to have been little more than a village. (Strab., 228.) The modern Rimane is supposed to occupy the site of the ancient Eretum, and not Monte Ritondo, as was generally believed until the Abbé Chaupy pointed out the error. (Desc. de la maison d'Horace, vol. 3, p. 85.—Nibby, delle Vie degli Antichi, p. 89.—Cramer's Anc. Italy, vol. 1, p. 308.)

ERICHTHONIUS, one of the early Attic kings, and the immediate successor of Amphictyon. He was fabled to have been the offspring of Vulcan and Minerva, a legend which we have explained under the article Cæcrops. (Vid. remarks at the close of that article.) Not inconsistent with this account is the other tradition, which ascribes to Erichthonius the honour of having been the first to yoke four horses to a car; a remarkable circumstance in the barren land of Attica, where the horse was reared with difficulty, and maintained at a considerable expense, and which was therefore the most expressive indication that could have been adopted, of the greater diffusion of wealth consequent on the successful cultivation of those arts and manufactures which began to flourish at this period. (Wordsworth's Greece, p. 95.)

ERIDANUS, a river of Italy, in Cisalpine Gaul, called also Padus, now the Po. D'Anville states, that the name Eridanus, though a term for the entire river, was specially applied to the Ostium Spineticum, or Spinetic mouth, which last received its name from a very ancient city in its vicinity, founded by the Greeks, and called Spina. Some writers consider the name Eridanus as coming, in fact, from a river in the north of Europe, the modern Kodan, which flows into the Vistula near Dantzic. Here the Phœnicians and Carthaginians traded for amber, and their fear of rivalry in this lucrative trade induced them to keep the source of their traffic involved in so much obscurity, that it became, in time, the subject of poetic embellishment. The Rhodanus, or Rhone, is thought by some to have received its ancient name from this circumstance, being confounded by the Greeks, in the infancy of their geographical knowledge, with the true stream. This probably arose from amber being found among the Gallic nations, to whom it may have come by an over-land trade. In like manner, amber being obtained afterward in large quantities among the Veneti on the Adriatic, induced the Greeks to remove the Eridanus to this quarter, and identify it with the Po, off the mouth of which stream they placed then imaginary amber-islands, the Electrides. The Veneti obtained their amber in a similar way with the Gallic nations. Thus the true Eridanus, and the fable of Phæthôn also, both refer to a northern origin; and a curious subject of discussion arises with regard to the earlier climate of the regions bordering on the Baltic, for remarks on which, vid. Phæthôn. (Cic. in Arat., 145.—Claudian, de Cons. Hon., 6, 175.—Ovid, Met., 2, 3.—Pausan., 1, 3.—Lucan, 2, 409.—Virg., G., 1, 482.)

ERIGONE, daughter of Icarus. Her father having been taught by Bacchus the culture of the grape, and having made wine, gave of it to some shepherds, who, thinking themselves poisoned by the draught, killed him. When they came to their senses, they buried him; and his daughter Erigone, being guided to the spot by her father's faithful hound Mæra, hung herself through grief. (Apollod., 3, 14, 7.—Hygin., fab., 130.) Jupiter translated the father and daughter, along with the faithful Mæra, to the skies: Icarus became Bœotes; and Erigone, Virgo; while the hound was changed, according to Hyginus (Poet. Astron., 2, 4), into Procyon; but, according to the scholiast on Germanicus (p. 128), into the Canis Major, which is therefore styled by Ovid (Fast., 4, 939), "Canis Icarinus." Propertius (2, 24, 24) calls the stars of the Greater Bear, "Boves Icarii." (Ideler, Sternnamen, p. 48.)

ERINNA, I. a poetess, and the friend of Sappho. She flourished about the year 595 B.C. All that is known of her is contained in the following words of Eustathius (ad Il., 2, p. 327). "Erinna was born in Lesbos, or in Rhodes, or in Teos, or in Telos, the little island near Cnidus. She was a poetess, and wrote a poem called 'the Distaff' (Ἡλεκάρη) in the Æolic and Doric dialect: it consisted of 300 hexameter lines. She was the friend of Sappho, and died unmarried. It was thought that her verses rivalled those of Homer. She was only 19 years of age when she died." Chained by her mother to the spinning-wheel, Erinna had as yet known the charm of existence in imagination alone. She probably expressed in her poem the restless and aspiring thoughts which crowded on her youthful mind, as she pursued her monotonous work. We possess at the present day no fragments of Erinna. (Müller, Hist. Græc. Lit., p. 180.)—II. A poetess mentioned by Eusebius under the year 354 B.C. This appears to be the same person who is spoken of by Pliny (34, 8), as having celebrated Myro in her poems. No fragments of her poetry remain. (Encycl. Us. Knowl., vol. 9, p. 508.)

ERINNYES, a name applied to the Furies, so that Erinnyes (Ἐρινύες) is equivalent to Dire, or Furie. Müller makes the Greek term ἐρινύς indicate "a feeling of deep offence, of bitter displeasure, at the impious violation of our sacred rights, by those most bound to respect them." (Müller, Eumen., p. 186.) This perfectly accords with the origin of the Erinnyes in the Theogony, and with those passages of the Homeric poems in which they are mentioned; for they are there invoked to avenge the breach of filial duty, and are named as the punishers of perjury. (Hom., Il., 9, 454, 568.—Id. ib., 19, 258.) Even beggars have their Erinnyes, that they may not be insulted with impunity (Od., 17, 475); and when a horse has spoken, in violation of the order of nature, the Erinnyes deprive him of the power of repeating the act. (Il., 19, 418.) The Erinnyes, these personified feelings, may therefore be regarded as the maintainers of order both in the moral and natural world. There is, however, an other view taken of these goddesses, in which they are only a form of Ceres and Proserpina, the great goddesses of the earth. For everything in nature having injurious as well as beneficial effects, the bounteous earth itself becomes grim, as it were, and displeased with mankind, and this is Ceres-Erinnyes. In the Arcadian legends of this goddess, and in the concluding choruses of the Eumenides of Æschylus, may be discerned ideas of this nature. (Müller, Eumen., p. 191, seqq.—Keightley's Mythology, p. 196, seqq.)

ERIPHYLE, a sister of Adrastus, king of Argos, who married Amphiaraus. She was daughter of Talaua and Lysimache. (For an account of the legend connected with her name, consult the article Amphiaraus.)

ERIS, the Greek name for the goddess of Discord. (Vid Discordia.)

ERISICTHON, a Thessalian, son of Triops, who derided Ceres, and cut down her sacred grove. This impiety irritated the goddess, who afflicted him with continual hunger. This infliction gave occasion for the exercise of the filial piety and power of self-transformation of the daughter of Erisichthon, who, by her assuming various forms, enabled her father to sell her over and over again, and thus obtain the means of living after all his property was gone. (Nicander, ap. Anton. Lib., 17.) He was driven at last by hunger to feed on his own limbs. (Ovid, Met., 8, 738, seqq.—Tzet. ad Lycophr., 1393.—Compare the account of Callimachus, H. in Cer., 32, seqq.)—This legend admits of a very simple explanation. Erisichthon is a name akin to Erusibe (ἐρυσίβη) or "mildew;" and Hellanicus (ap. Athen., 10, p. 416) said that he was also called Æthion (ἄϊθω) or "burning," from his insatiate hunger. The destructive mildew is therefore the enemy of Ceres, to whom, under the title of Erysibia, the Rhodians prayed to avert it. (Müller, Prolegom., 162.—Keightley's Mythology, p. 177.)

Eros, the god of Love, the same with the Cupido of the Latins. This deity is unnoticed by Homer. In the Theogony (v. 120) he is one of the first of beings, and produced without parents. In the Orphic hymns he is the son of Kronos. (Schol. ad Apoll. Rhod., 3, 26.) Sappho made him the offspring of Heaven and Earth (Id. ib.), while Simonides assigned him Venus and Mars for parents. (Id. ib.) In Olen's hymn to Ilithyia (Pausan., 9, 27, 2), this goddess was termed the mother of Love; and Alcæus said, that "well-sandaled Iris bore Love to Zephyrus of golden locks" (ap. Plut., Amat., 20).—The cosmogonic Eros of Hesiod is apparently a personification of the principle of attraction, on which the coherence of the material world depends. Nothing was more natural than to term Venus the mother of Love; but the reason for so calling Ilithyia, the goddess who presides over childbirth, is not equally apparent: it was possibly meant to express the increase of conjugal affection produced by the birth of children. The making Love the offspring of the Westwind and the Rainbow would seem to be only a poetic mode of expressing the well-known fact, that the Spring, the season in which they most prevail, is also that of Love. (Theognis, 1275.) In the bucolic and some of the Latin poets, the Loves are spoken of in the plural number, but no distinct offices are assigned them. (Theocrit., 7, 96.—Bion, 1, passim.—Horat., Od., 1, 19, 1.)—Thespie in Bœotia was the place in which Eros was most worshipped. The Thespians used to celebrate games in his honour on Mount Helicon. These were called Erotia. Eros had also altars at Athens and elsewhere. The god of love was usually represented as a plump-checked boy, rosy and naked, with light hair floating on his shoulders. He is always winged, and armed with a bow and arrows. Nonnus (7, 194) seems to represent his arrows as tipped with flowers. The arrows of Cama, the Hindu Eros, are thus pointed.—The adventures of Eros are not numerous. The most celebrated is that contained in the legend of Psyche. (Vid. Psyche. —Keightley's Mythology, p. 146, seqq.)

EROSTRATUS. Vid. Herostratus.

ERYCINA, a surname of Venus, from Mount Eryx in Sicily, where she had a temple. The Erycinian Venus appears to have been the same with the Phœnician Astarte, whose worship was brought over by the latter people, and a temple erected to her on Mount Eryx. In confirmation of this, we learn from Diodorus Siculus, that the Carthaginians revered the Erycinian Venus equally as much as the natives themselves. (Diod. Sic., 4, 83.)

ERYMANTHUS, I. a mountain-chain in the northwest angle of Arcadia, celebrated in fable as the haunt of the savage boar destroyed by Hercules. (Apollod., 2, 5, 3.—Pausan., 8, 24.—Homer, Od., 6, 102.) Apollonius places the Erymanthian monster in the wilds of Mount Lampia; but this mountain, as we learn from Pausanias (8, 24), was that part of the chain where the river Erymanthus took its rise. The modern name of Mount Erymanthus, one of the highest ridges in Greece, is Olonos. (Itin. of the Morea, p. 122.)—II. A river of Arcadia, descending from the mountain of the same name, and flowing near the town of Psopis. After receiving another small stream, called the Aroanius, it joins the Alpheus on the borders of Elis. The modern name of the Erymanthus is the Dogana. (Cramer's Ancient Greece, vol. 3, p. 320.)

ERYTHEA, an island off the coast of Iberia, in the Atlantic. It lay in the Sinus Gaditanus, or Bay of Cadiz, and was remarkable for its fertility. It was called by the inhabitants Junonis Insula; and by later writers, Aphrodisias. Here Geryon was said to have reigned; and the fertility of the island seems to have given rise to the fable of his oxen. Vid. Hercules and Geryon. (Plin., 4, 22.—Mela, 3, 6.) Many commentators have agreed to identify with Erythea the Isla de Leon. (Compare Classical Journal, vol. 3, p. 140.)—II. A daughter of Geryon. (Pausanias, 10, 37.)

ERYTHRÆ, one of the twelve cities of Ionia, situate near the coast, opposite Chios. (Herodot., 1, 142.) Its founder was said to have been Erythrus, the son of Rhadamanthus, who established himself here with a body of Cretans, Carians, and Lycians. At a later period came Cleopus, son of Codrus, with an Ionian colony. (Scylax, p. 37.) The city did not lie exactly on the coast, but some little distance inland: it had a harbour on the coast named Kissus. (Liv., 36, 43.) Erythræ was famous as the residence of one of the Sibyls at an early period, and in the time of Alexander we find another making her appearance here, with similar claims to prophetic inspiration. (Strabo, 643.) According to Pausanias (10, 12), the name of the elder Sibyl was Herophile. The same writer informs us, that there was at Erythræ a very ancient temple of Hercules (7, 5). Either this city had disappeared at the time Hierocles wrote, or else he means it under the name of Satrote (Σαρπώτη), which he places near Clazomenæ, and which is mentioned by no other writer. (Hierocles, p. 660.) According to Tavernier (vol. 2, lett. 22), the modern Gesme (Dschesme) occupies the site of the ancient city: Chandler, however, found the old wells some distance to the north of this, with the name of Rythre still remaining. (Mannert, Geogr., vol. 6, pt. 3, p. 321, seqq.)

ERYTHRÆUM MARE, a name applied by the Greeks to the whole ocean, extending from the coast of Ethiopia to the island of Taprobana, when their geographical knowledge of India was in its infancy. (Vincent's Periplus, p. 4.—Commerce and Navigation of the Ancients, vol. 2.) They derived the name from an ancient monarch who reigned along these coasts, by the name of Erythras, and believed that his grave was to be found in one of the adjacent islands. (Wahl, Asien, p. 316 and 636.—Agatharchidus, p. 4, Geogr.

Min., ed. Hudson.—Ctesias, ed. Bähr, p. 359.—Curtius, 8, 9, 14.) Afterward, when the Greeks learned the existence of an Indian Ocean, the term Erythræan Sea was applied merely to the sea below Arabia, and to the Arabian and Persian Gulfs. In this latter sense Strabo uses the name. Herodotus follows the old acceptance of the word, according to the opinion prevalent in his age. The appellation was probably derived from Edom (Esau), whose descendants were called Idumæans, and inhabited the northern parts of Arabia. (Wahl, Asien, p. 316.) They navigated upon the Red Sea and Persian Gulf, and also upon the Indian Ocean; and the Oriental name Idumæan signifying red, the sea of the Idumæans was called the Red Sea and the Erythræan Sea (Ἐρυθρὰ θάλασσα). Vid. Arabicus Sinus. ERYX, I. a son of Butes and Venus, who, relying upon his strength, challenged all strangers to fight with him in the combat of the cestus. Hercules accepted his challenge after many had yielded to his superior dexterity, and Eryx was killed in the combat, and buried on the mountain where he had built a temple to Venns. (Virg., Æn., 5, 402.)—II. A mountain of Sicily, at the western extremity of the island, and near the city of Drepanum. It was fabled to have received its name from Eryx, who was buried there. On its summit stood a famous temple of Venus Erycina (vid. Erycina), and on the western declivity was situated the town of Eryx, the approach to which from the plain was rocky and difficult. At the distance of 30 stadia stood the harbour of the same name. (Polyb., 1, 55.—Diod., 24, 1.—Cic. in Ver., 2, 8.) The Phœnicians most probably were the founders of the place, and also of the temple; and the Erycinian Venus appears to be identified with the Astarte of the latter people. (Compare Diod., 4, 83.) The native inhabitants in this quarter were called Elymi, and Eryx is said by some to have been their king. (Diod., 4, 83.—Virg., Æn., 5, 759.—Heyne, Excurs. 2, ad Æn., 5.—Apollod., 1, 9.—Id., 2, 5.—Hugyn. fab., 260.) Virgil makes Æneas to have founded the temple: in this, however, he is contradicted by other authorities. Æneas, in fact, never was in Sicily, and therefore the whole is a mere fable. The town was destroyed by the Carthaginians in the time of Pyrrhus, who a short time previous had taken it by storm, and the inhabitants were removed to Drepanum. (Diod., 22, 14.—Id., 23, 9.) It soon, however, revived, owing to the celebrity of the adjacent temple. In the first Punic war it fell into the hands of the Romans (Polyb., 1, 58.—Id., 2, 7), but was surprised by Barcas, the Carthaginian commander, and the inhabitants who escaped the slaughter were again removed to Drepanum. (Diod., 24, 2.) The place never recovered from this blow: the sanctity of the temple drew, indeed, new inhabitants around, but the city was never rebuilt. No traces of the temple remain at the present day. On the summit of the mountain, now called St. Giuliano, is an ancient castle, supposed to have been erected by the Saracens. (Mannert, Geogr., vol. 9, pt. 2, p. 383, seqq.)

ESQUILINUS and ESQUILINUS MONTES, one of the seven hills of Rome, added to the city by Servius Tullius, who enclosed the greater part of it within the circuit of his walls, and built his palace upon it, which he continued to inhabit till the day of his death. We are informed by Varro (L. L., 4, 8), that the Esquiline derived its name from the Latin word excultus; in proof of which he mentions, that Servius had planted on its summit several sacred groves, such as the Lucus Querquetulanus, Fagutalis, and Esquilinus. It was the most extensive of the seven hills, and was divided into two principal heights, which were called Cispius and Oppius. The Campus Esquilinus was granted by the senate as a burying-place for the poor, and stood without the Esquiline gate. As the vast number of bodies here deposited rendered the places adjoining very unhealthy, Augustus gave part of it to his favourite Mæcenas, who built there a magnificent residence, with extensive gardens, whence it became one of the most healthy situations of Rome. (Horat., Sat., 8, 10, seqq.—Id., Epod., 5, 100.) The Esquiline had the honour of giving birth to Julius Cæsar, who was born in that part of the Suburra which was situated on this hill. Here also were the residences of Virgil, of the younger Pliny; and here were situate a part of Nero's golden house, and the palace and baths of the Emperor Titus. The Esquiline, at the present day, is said to be the most covered with ruins, and the most deserted of the three eastern hills of Rome. (Rome in the 19th Century, vol. 1, p. 204, Am. ed.)

ESSEDONES, a people of Sarmatia Asiatica, to the east of the Palus Mæotis. Ptolemy, however, places them in Serica, and in Scythia extra Iamum; while Herodotus assigns them to the country of the Massagete, and Pliny to Sarmatia Europæa. (Herod., 1, 201.—Id., 4, 25.—Plin., 6, 7.) Some writers seek to identify them with the Cossacks of the Don. (Vid. Issedones, and consult Bischoff und Moller, Wörterb. der Geograph., p. 485.)

ESTIÆOTIS, according to Strabo (430), that portion of Thessaly which lies near Pindus, and between that mountain and Upper Macedonia. The same writer elsewhere informs us (p. 437), that, according to some authorities, this district was originally the country of the Dorians, who certainly are stated by Herodotus (1, 56) and others to have once occupied the regions of Pindus; but that afterward it took the name of Estiæotis, from a district in Eubœa, so called, the inhabitants of which were transplanted into Thessaly by the Perhæbi. (Cramer's Anc. Greece, vol. 1, p. 352.)

ETEOCLES, a son of Œdipus and Jocasta. After his father's death, it was agreed between him and his brother Polyneices that they should both share the kingdom, and reign alternately, each a year. Eteocles, by right of seniority, first ascended the throne; but, after the first year of his reign was expired, he refused to give up the crown to his brother according to their mutual agreement. Polyneices, resolving to punish so gross a violation of a solemn engagement, fled to the court of Adrastus, king of Argos, where he married Argia the daughter of that monarch; and, having prevailed upon Adrastus to espouse his cause, the latter undertook what was denominated the Theban war, twenty-seven years, as is said, before the Trojan one. Adrastus marched against Thebes with an army, of which he took the command, having with him seven celebrated chiefs, Tydeus, Amphiaraus, Capaneus, Parthenopæus, Hippomedon, Eteocles son of Iphis, and Polyneices. The Thebans who espoused the cause of Eteocles were, Melanippus and Ismarus, sons of Astacus, Polyphontes, Megareus, Lathenes, and Hyperbius. All the Argive leaders, with the exception of Adrastus, fell before Thebes, Eteocles also being slain in single combat with Polyneices. Ten years after the conclusion of this war arose that of the Epigoni, or the sons of the slain chieftains of Argos, who took up arms to avenge the death of their sires. (Vid. Epigoni.) Lists of the seven Argive commanders are given by Æschylus in his "Seven against Thebes;" by Euripides in his Phœnissæ and Supplices; and by Sophocles in his "Œdipus at Colonus." They all agree, except that in the Phœnissæ the name of Adrastus is substituted for that of Eteocles. The tragic poets vary also in other particulars from each other. Euripides, whom we have followed as to the age of Eteocles, makes him the elder of the two brothers; but Sophocles, on the contrary, calls him the younger. (Œd. Col., 1292.)

ETEOCLES, one of the seven chiefs of the army of Adrastus, in his expedition against Thebes. He was killed by Megareus, the son of Creon, under the walls of Thebes. (Apollod., 3, 6.)

ΕΤΗΣΙÆ (Ετησιαί), winds blowing every year (έτος) at a stated period, over the Ægean Sea. They came from the north, and are hence sometimes called Ετήσιοι βορέαι. The Etesian winds prevailed for forty days after the setting of the Dog-star. Arrian speaks of Etesian winds in the Indian Ocean, blowing from the south, by which he evidently means the monsoons. (Arrian, Exp. Alex., 6, 21.—Indic., 21.)

ΕΤΡΥΡΙΑ. Vid. Hetruria.

ΕΥΑΘΝΕ, a daughter of Iphis or Iphicles of Argos, who slighted the addresses of Apollo, and married Capaneus, one of the seven chiefs who went against Thebes. When her husband had been struck with thunder by Jupiter for his blasphemies and impiety, and his ashes had been separated from those of the rest of the Argives, she threw herself on his burning pile, and perished in the flames. (Virg., Æn., 6, 447.—Propert., 1, 15, 21.—Stat., Theb., 12, 800.)

ΕΥΑΓΟΡΑΣ, I. a king of Salamis in the island of Cyprus, and a descendant of Teucer son of Telamon, the founder of that city. When Evagoras saw the light, the throne of Salamis was occupied by a Phœnician ruler, who had obtained it by treachery. This Phœnician was afterward slain by one of the leading chieftains of the country, who thereupon usurped the supreme power, and endeavoured to seize Evagoras, whose right to the throne was an obstacle in the way of his ambition. Evagoras fled to Soli in Cilicia, assembled there a small band of followers, returned to Cyprus, and, deposing the tyrant, mounted the throne of his ancestors. All this took place while the enfeebled empire of Persia was scarcely able to withstand the attacks of the victorious Greeks prior to the Peloponnesian war, and had therefore no time to attend to the affairs of Cyprus. Evagoras showed himself a wise and politic prince, and raised the glory of his native island to a much higher pitch than it had ever attained before. He became the patron also of arts and literature, and entertained at his court distinguished men of all nations. It was in his dominions that Conon, the Athenian general, sought refuge after the fatal battle of Ægos Potamos, and by his aid was enabled to prepare a fleet, which restored the naval ascendancy of his country. (Isocr., Evag., p. 200.—Xen., Hist. Gr., 2, 1, 19.—Corn. Nep., Vit. Con.—Diod. Sic., 14, 39.) Judging from the splendid panegyric passed upon his character by Isocrates, Evagoras was certainly a prince of rare and distinguished virtue and merit; and his fortune for a time kept pace with his shining qualities. Unfortunately, however, he met with reverses towards the close of his reign. Artaxerxes Mnemon attacked his power, after the peace of Antalcidas had left the Asiatic Greeks at the mercy of the Persian king. Evagoras was aided in his resistance to the Persian arms by Amasis of Egypt, and also secretly by the Athenians; but his efforts were unsuccessful, and he saw himself eventually compelled to renounce his authority over the other cities of Cyprus, and confine himself to Salamis, paying besides an annual tribute to Persia. He was assassinated by a eunuch, B C. 374. His son Nicoteles succeeded him. (Diod. Sic., 15, 2, seqq.)—II. Grandson of the preceding. Being deprived of his possessions by his uncle Protogoras, he fled to Artaxerxes Ochus, by whose order he was put to death.

ΕΥΑΝΔΡΕ, a son of the prophetess Carmenta, and king of Arcadia. An accidental murder obliged him to leave his country, and he came to Italy, where he drove the aborigines from their ancient possessions, and reigned in that part of the country where Rome was afterward founded. (Vid. Italia.) He kindly received Hercules when he returned from the conquest of Geryon; and he was the first who raised him altars. He gave Æneas assistance against the Rutuli, and distinguished himself by his hospitality. It is said that he first brought the Greek alphabet into Italy, and introduced there the worship of the Greek deities. (Vid. Pelasgi.) He was honoured as a god after death, and his subjects raised him an altar on Mount Aventine. (Vid. Cacus.—Pausan., 8, 43.—Liv., 1, 7.—Sil. Ital., 7, 18.—Ovid, Fast., 1, 500, 91.—Virg., Æn., 8, 100.)

ΕΥΑΡΧΟΣ, a river of Asia Minor, flowing into the Euxine, to the southeast of Sinope. The name appears to have been changed in process of time to Euechus. It formed the ancient boundary between Paphlagonia and Cappadocia, or the White Syrians, who had spread themselves to the west of the Halys. (Man nert, Geogr., vol. 6, pt. 3, p. 11.)

ΕΥΒΕΑ, a large and celebrated island, lying along the coast of Locris, Bœotia, and Attica. Its most ancient name, as we learn from Strabo (444), was Macris, which it obtained, as he affirms, from its great length in comparison with its breadth. Besides this, it was known at different times by the various appellations of Oche, Ellopia, Asopia, and Abantia. (Strab., l. c.—Plin., 4, 12.) The latter, which frequently occurs in the poets, was either derived from the Thracians, who had founded Abæ in Phocis, and thence crossed over into the island, or from a hero named Abas. (Aristot., ap. Strab., l. c.) Homer, as Strabo observes, though he designates the island by the name of Eubœa, always employs the appellation of Abantes to denote the inhabitants. (Il., 2, 536.—Ibid., 540.) The name of Eubœa originated traditionally from the passage of Io, who was even said to have given birth to Epaphrus in this island. (Hesiod, ap. Steph. Byz., s. v. Ἀβάρης.) Its inhabitants were among the earliest navigators of Greece, a circumstance which seems to confirm the notion preserved by Strabo, of its having been occupied, in distant ages, by a Phœnician colony. We hear also of the Pelasgi and Dryopes being settled there. (Dion. Hal., 1, 25.—Diod. Sic., 4, 37.) Herodotus affirms (1, 146), that the greatest part of the Ionian cities in Asia Minor had been colonized by the Abantes of Eubœa, who were not other wise, however, connected with the Ionians. This people also founded settlements, at an early period, in Illyria, Sicily, and Campania. (Strabo, 449.—Pausan., 5, 22.) Eubœa, divided into a number of small independent republics, like the other states of Greece, presents no features for a common history. In fact, where each city requires a separate narrative, it is difficult to embody what belongs to them collectively in one general account. Its fertility and abundant resources appear at an early period to have attracted the attention of the Athenian people, and to have inspired them with the desire of acquiring a territory situated so near their own, and adequate to the supply of all their wants. After the expulsion of the Pisistratids, when the energy of the Athenian character had received a fresh impulse from the recovery of liberty, Athens readily availed itself of the pretence afforded by the Chalcidians, who occupied the principal city of the island, for invading Eubœa, these having assisted the Boeotians in the war then carrying on against that power. The Athenians, after defeating their nearest enemy, suddenly crossed the Euripus, and, having routed the forces of Chalcis, seized upon their territory, where they established four thousand of their own citizens as colonists. (Herodot., 5, 77.) They were obliged, however, to evacuate this new acquisition, in order to defend their own country against a threatened attack of the Persian armament commanded by Datis and Artaphernes: nevertheless, they did not lose sight of the important advantages attending the possession of Eubœa. When the alarm created by the Persian invasion had subsided, the maritime states of Greece united themselves into a confederacy, of which Athens took the lead, and thus acquired an ascendancy which proved so fatal to the liberties of those who had unguardedly cemented that impolitic union. This was occularly the case with the Eubœan cities, since we learn from Thucydides (1, 114), that the whole island acknowledged the supremacy and sway of Athens prior to the Peloponnesian war; but neither that historian nor Herodotus has informed us precisely when, and in what manner, their subjugation was effected. On the Athenians being compelled, after their defeat at Coronea, to evacuate Bœotia, of which they had been for some time masters, the Eubœans took advantage of that circumstance to attempt emancipating themselves from a foreign yoke. But success did not attend their efforts. As soon as the news of the revolt had reached Athens, Pericles was despatched at the head of a considerable force to quell the insurrection, in which he succeeded so effectually, notwithstanding the frequent diversions made by the Peloponnesians in favour of the islanders, that they were reduced to a more abject state of subjection than ever (Thucyd., 1, 114); and it was not till the unfortunate Sicilian expedition had compelled Athens to fight for existence rather than conquest, that the Eubœans ventured once more to assert their right to independence (Thucyd., 8, 5); but such was the want of zeal and energy displayed by the Lacedæmonian government, that they obtained no aid from that quarter until nearly the termination of the twenty-first year of the war, when at length Hegesandridas, a Spartan admiral, came to their support, and gained a victory over the Athenian fleet; the Eretrians then openly revolted, and their example being quickly followed by the other towns, the whole of Eubœa recovered its independence. This island, however, derived but little advantage from the change which then took place. Each city, being left to its own direction, soon became a prey to faction and civil broil, which ended in a more complete slavery under the dominion of tyrants. Towards the commencement of the war between the Bœotians and Spartans, we are told by Diodorus (15, 30), that the Eubœans manifested a desire to place themselves once more under the protection of Athens. Another party, however, having declared in favour of the Thebans, a civil war ensued, which equally exhausted both factions, and forced them to make peace (16, 7). By the ability and judgment of Timotheus, the Athenian general, a preponderance of opinion was decidedly created in favour of that state (Demosth., de Cor., p. 108. — Æsch. contr. Ctes., p. 479. — Milford's Greece, vol. 7, p. 384), which continued until overthrown by the arts and machinations of Philip. Phocion was empowered by the Macedonian government to take all the requisite measures for restoring tranquillity, and he obtained some important successes over the Eubœan forces; but it does not appear that much advantage was ultimately derived from his victory. After this period Eubœa became attached to the Macedonian interests, until it was once more restored to freedom by the Romans, who wrested it from Philip, the son of Demetrius. (Liv., 34, 51.)—This island, according to Strabo (444), extends from the Malic Gulf along the coast of Lœris, Bœotia, and Attica, a distance of about one thousand two hundred stadia; its greatest breadth nowhere exceeds one hundred and fifty stadia. (Compare Scylax, p. 23.) "Torn from the coast of Bœotia," says Pliny, "it is separated by the Euripus, the breadth of which is so insignificant as to allow a bridge to be thrown across. Of its two southern promontories, Geræstus looks towards Attica, Caphareus towards the Hellespont; Cœnæum fronts the north. In breadth this island never exceeds twenty miles, but it is nowhere less than two. Reaching from Attica to Thessaly, it extends for one hundred and twenty miles in length. Its circuit is three hundred and sixty-five. On the side of Caphareus it is two hundred and twenty-five miles from the Hellespont."—The abundance and fertility of this extensive island in ancient times are sufficiently attested by Herodotus, who compares it with Cyprus (5, 31), and also by Thucydides (7, 23, and 8, 96). Its opulence is also apparent from the designation and value affixed to the talent, so frequently referred to by classic writers under the name of Euboicum. From Strabo we learn that it was subject to frequent earthquakes, which he ascribes to the subterranean cavities with which the whole island abounds (447). The modern name of Eubœa is Negropont, formed, by a series of corruptions, from the word Euripus, which designated the narrow channel separating the island from the Bœotian coast. (Cramer's Ancient Greece, vol. 2, p. 121, seqq.)

EUBOICUS, belonging to Eubœa. The epithet is also applied to Cumæ, because that city was built by a colony from Chalcis, a town of Eubœa. (Ovid, Fast., 4, 257.—Virg., Æn., 6, 2; 9, 710.)

EUBUGLIDES, a native of Miletus, and successor of Euclid in the Megaric school. He was a strong opponent of Aristotle, and seized every opportunity of censuring his writings and calumniating his character. He introduced new subtleties into the art of disputation, several of which, though often mentioned as proof of great ingenuity, deserve only to be remembered as examples of egregious trifling. Of these sophistical modes of reasoning, called by Aristotle Eristic syllogisms, a few examples may suffice. 1. Of the sophism, called from the example, The Lying: if, when you speak the truth, you say, you lie, you lie: but you say you lie when you speak the truth; therefore, in speaking the truth, you lie. 2. The Occult. Do you know your father? Yes. Do you know this man who is veiled? No. Then you do not know your father, for it is your father who is veiled. 3. Electra. Electra, the daughter of Agamemnon, knew her brother and did not know him: she knew Orestes to be her brother, but she did not know that person to be her brother who was conversing with her. 4. Sorites. Is one grain a heap? No. Two grains? No. Three grains? No. Go on, adding one by one; and if one grain be not a heap, it will be impossible to say what number of grains make a heap. 5. The Horned. You have what you have not lost: you have not lost horns; therefore you have horns.—In such high repute were these silly inventions for perplexing plain truth, that Chrysippus wrote six books on the first of these sophisms; and Philctas, a Coan, died of a consumption, which he contracted by the close study which he bestowed upon it. (Diog. Laert., 7, § 196—Enfield's History of Philosophy, vol. 1, p. 199.)

EUBUGLUS, a comic poet of Athens, born in the borough of Atarneæ. He exhibited about B.C. 375. Eubulus, from his date, stood on the debateable ground between the first and second species of comedy; and to judge from the fragments in Athenæus, who quotes more than fifty of his comedies by name, he must have written plays of both sorts. He composed, in all, 104 comedies. (Theatre of the Greeks, p. 119, 4th ed.)

EUCURUS, I. a painter, related, as is said, to Dædalus, and who, according to Theophrastus (ap. Plin., 7, 56), introduced painting into Greece. The name, in truth, however, is merely a figurative one for a skillful artist generally. (Εὐκῦρ, "skillful," "dexterous.")—II. A modeller, styled also Eucirrus (Pausan., 6, 4, 2), and one of the most ancient. He and Eucgrimmus are said to have accompanied Demaratus in his flight from Corinth to Etruria. (Plin., 35, 12, 43.) Here again both names are figurative.—III. An Athenian sculptor. He made a statue of Mercury, which was placed at Pheneæ. (Pausanias, 8, 14, 7.) Pliny (34, 8, 19) places him among those artists who excelled in forming brazen statues of combatants at the public games, armed men, huntsmen, &c. On this account, Thiersch correctly infers that he flourished in a later age. (Epoëh. 11, Adnot., p. 33.)

garc or Eristic sect. Endowed by nature with a subtle and penetrating genius, he early applied himself to the study of philosophy. The writings of Parmenides first taught him the art of disputation. Hearing of the fame of Socrates, Euclid determined to attend upon his instructions, and for this purpose removed from Megara to Athens. Here he long remained a constant hearer and zealous disciple of the moral philosopher. And when, in consequence of the enmity which subsisted between the Athenians and Megareans, a decree was passed by the former, that any inhabitant of Megara who should be seen in Athens should forfeit his life, he frequently came to Athens by night, from the distance of about twenty miles, concealed in a long female cloak and veil, to visit his master. (Aul. Gell., 6, 10.) Not finding his natural propensity to disputation sufficiently gratified in the tranquil method of philosophizing adopted by Socrates, he frequently engaged in the business and disputes of the civil courts. Socrates, who despised forensic contests, expressed some dissatisfaction with his pupil for indulging a fondness for controversy. (Diog. Laert., 2, 30.) This circumstance probably proved the occasion of a separation between Euclid and his master; for we find him, after this time, at the head of a school in Megara (Diog. Laert., 3, 6), in which his chief employment was to teach the art of disputation. Debates were conducted with so much vehemence among his pupils, that Timon said of Euclid, that he had carried the madness of contention from Athens to Megara. (Diog. Laert., 6, 22.) That he was, however, capable of commanding his temper, appears from his reply to his brother, who, in a quarrel, had said, "Let me perish if I be not revenged on you:" "and let me perish," returned Euclid, "if I do not subdue your resentment by forbearance, and make you love me as much as ever."—In disputation, Euclid was averse to the analogical method of reasoning, and judged that legitimate argumentation consists in deducing fair conclusions from acknowledged premises. He held that there is one supreme good, which he called by the different names of Intelligence, Providence, God; and that evil, considered as an opposite principle to the sovereign good, has no existence. The supreme good, according to Cicero, he defined to be, that which is always the same. In this doctrine, in which he followed the subtlety of Parmenides rather than the simplicity of Socrates, he seems to have considered good abstractedly as residing in the Deity; and to have maintained, that all things which exist are good by their participation of the first good, and, consequently, that there is, in the nature of things, no real evil.—It is said, that when Euclid was asked his opinion concerning the gods, he replied, "I know nothing more of them than this, that they hate inquisitive persons." If this apophthegm be justly ascribed to Euclid, it may serve to prove, either that he had learned, from the precepts of Socrates, to think soberly and respectfully concerning the Divine Nature, or that the fate of that good man had taught him caution in declaring his opinions. (Enfield's History of Philosophy, vol. 1, p. 193, seqq.)—II. A celebrated mathematician of Alexandria, considered by some to have been a native of that city, though the more received opinion makes the place of his birth to have been unknown. He flourished B.C. 280, in the reign of Ptolemy Lagus, and was professor of mathematics in the capital of Egypt. His scholars were numerous, and among them was Ptolemy himself. It is related, that the monarch having inquired of Euclid if there was not some mode of learning mathematics less barbarous, and requiring less attention than the ordinary one, Euclid, though otherwise of an amiable character, dryly answered, that there was "no royal road to geometry." It is to this little incident that nearly all our knowledge of the particulars of his life is limited. Euclid was the first, in fact, who established a mathematical school at Alexandria, and it existed and maintained its reputation till the Mohammedan conquest of Egypt. Many of the fundamental principles of the pure mathematics had been discovered by Thales, Pythagoras, and other predecessors of Euclid; but to him is due the merit of having given a systematic form to the science, especially that part of it which relates to geometry. He likewise studied the cognate sciences of Astronomy and Optics; and, according to Proclus, he was the author of "Elements," "Data," "An introduction to Harmony," "Phænomena," "Optics," "Catoptrics," a treatise "On the division of Surfaces," "Porisms," &c. His most valuable work, "The Elements of Geometry," has been repeatedly published. All his works extant were published at Oxford, 1703, folio, by the Savilian professor of astronomy, David Gregory. The edition of Peyrard, however, is entitled to the praise of being the best. It appeared at Paris in 1814 and some of the following years, in 3 vols. 4to. This edition is accompanied with a double translation, one in Latin and the other in French. M. Peyrard consulted a manuscript of the latter part of the ninth century, which had belonged to the Vatican library, and was at that time in the French capital. By the aid of this he was enabled to fill various lacunæ, and to re-establish various passages which had been altered in all the other manuscripts, and in all the editions anterior to his own. Hence Peyrard is the only one that has given a complete text of the "Elements" and "Data;" for the "Phænomena," and the other works of Euclid, are rejected by him as spurious.—For some remarks on Euclid, consult Delambre, Hist. de l'Astron. Ancien., vol. 1, p. 49, seqq., and the preface to Peyrard's edition.

EUDAMIDAS, I. a son of Archidamus IV., brother to Agis IV. He succeeded to the Spartan throne, after his brother's death, B.C. 330. (Pausan., 3, 10.)—II. A son of Archidamus, king of Sparta, who succeeded B.C. 268.

EUDOCIA, I. a Roman empress, wife to Theodosius the Younger. Her original name was Athenais, and she was the daughter of Leontius, an Athenian philosopher; but on her marriage she embraced Christianity, and received the baptismal name of Eudocia. She was a female of beauty and talent. She put into verse several books of the Old Testament, and wrote several paraphrases on some of the Jewish prophets, but became suspected by her husband of conjugal infidelity, and, being degraded, was allowed to seek a refuge in the Holy Land. Here she devoted herself to religious studies, but the jealousy of her suspicious husband still pursued her; and having learned that two priests, whom she had chosen as the companions of her exile, were accustomed to pay her frequent visits, and were loaded by her with presents, Theodosius sent Saturninus, one of the officers of his court, to Jerusalem, who put to death the two priests without even the formality of a trial. Irritated at this new insult, Eudocia caused Saturninus to be slain, a deed more likely to darken than avenge her innocence. The emperor contented himself with depriving her of all the badges of her rank, and reducing her to the condition of a private individual. She lived twenty years after this event, in the bitterest penitence, endeavouring to efface, by acts of piety, the crime which outraged honour had led her to commit. She died at the age of 67 years. (Le Beau, Hist. du Bas-Empire, vol. 7, p. 149.) The principal work, ascribed by some to Eudocia, is Homocentra (Ὁμοκέντρα), or a life of our Saviour, in 2443 hexameters, formed from verses and hemistichs selected out of the poems of Homer. Others, however, make Pelagius, surnamed Patricius, who lived in the fifth century, its author. From a passage of Zonaras (Annal., vol. 3, p. 37), a clew may be obtained for solving this difficulty. Pelagius would seem, to have commenced the work in question, and Eudocia to have finished it. This princess has left, also, a poem on the martyrdom of Cyprian. The best edition of the Homeroecentra is that of Teucher, Lips., 1798, 8vo.—II. The Younger, daughter of the preceding and of Theodosius II., married Valentinian III. After the assassination of her husband by Petronius Maximus, she was obliged to marry the usurper. Eudocia, out of indignation and revenge, called in Genseric, king of the Vandals, who came to Italy, plundered Rome, and carried Eudocia with him to Africa. Some years afterward she was sent back to Constantinople, where she died, A.D. 462.—III. The widow of Constantine Ducas, married Romanus Diogenes, an officer of distinction, A.D. 1068, and associated him with her on the throne. Three years after, Michael, her son, by means of a revolt, was proclaimed emperor, and caused his mother to be shut up in a convent, where she spent the rest of her life. She left a treatise on the genealogies of the gods and heroes, which displays an extensive acquaintance with the subject. It is printed in Villotson's Anecdota Græca, Venet., 1781, 2 vols. 4to.

EUDOXUS, I. a celebrated astronomer and geometer, born at Cnidus, who flourished about 370 B.C. He studied geometry under Archytas, and afterward, in the course of his travels, went to Egypt, and was introduced to the notice of Nectanebis II., and by him to the Egyptian priests. He is highly celebrated for his skill in astronomy by the ancients, though none of his writings on this or any other branch of science are extant. The honour of bringing the celestial sphere and the regular astronomy from Egypt to Greece, belongs to him. After his return from Egypt, he taught astronomy and philosophy with great applause at Cyzicus, and afterward removed to Athens, where he opened a school, and was in such high repute as to be consulted on subjects of policy as well as science by deputies from all parts of Greece. Eudoxus is said, in fact, to have supported his school with so much reputation as to have excited the envy of even Plato himself. Proclus informs us, that Euclid very liberally borrowed from the elements of geometry composed by Eudoxus. Cicero calls him the greatest astronomer that ever lived; and we learn from Petronius, that he retired to the top of a very high mountain, that he might observe the celestial phenomena with more convenience than he could on a plain or in a crowded city. Strabo says, that the observatory of Eudoxus was at Cnidus. Vitruvius describes a sundial constructed by him. (Diog. Laert., 8, 86, seqq.—Cic., de Div., 2, 42.—Petron., Arb., 88, 4.—Strab., 119.—Vitruv., 9, 9.) He died B.C. 352. His works are lost, but they served as materials to Aratus for the composition of his poem entitled the Phænomena. (Schöll, Hist. Lit. Gr., vol. 3, p. 8)—II. A native of Cyzicus, sent by Ptolemy VII., Euergetes, on a voyage to India, and, some years after, on a second voyage by Cleopatra, widow of that prince. It appears that he subsequently attempted the circumnavigation of Africa. (For an account of his movements, consult remarks under the article Africa, page 79, col. 2.)

EUEMERUS. V. Id. Euhemerus.

EVÊNUS, I. a name common to several epigrammatic poets, for a name account of whom, consult Jacobs, Catal. Poet. Epig.—Anthol. Græc., vol. 13, p. 893.—II. A river of Ætolia, rising, as Strabo (451) reports, in the country of the Bomienenses, who occupied the northeast extremity of Ætolia. Ptolemy says (p. 87) that it flowed from Mount Callidromus, meaning the chain of Æta; which is sufficiently correct. Dicæarchus, with less truth, affirms that it rises in Mount Pindus. (Stat., Græc., v. 61.) According to Strabo, it does not flow at first through the ancient Curetis, which is the district of Pleuron, but more to the east, by Chalcis and Calydon, after which it turns to the west, towards the plains in which the ancient Pleuron was situated; and finally, proceeding in a southerly direction, falls into the sea. Its more ancient name was Lyconnas. (Strabo, l. c.—Compare Apollodorus, 1, 7, 8.) The Evenus is rendered celebrated in fable, from the story of Nessus, who was slain here by Hercules for offering violence to Deianira. The modern name of the river is the Fidari. Near its mouth stood Missolonghi. (Cramer's Anc. Greece, vol. 2, p. 75.)

EUERGÊTES, a people of Upper Asia, whose true name was Ariaspæ. The Greeks called them Euergetæ, or benefactors, translating the Persian appellation which was added to their name, and which Freinshemius suspects, from Herodotus (8, 85), to have been Orosungæ. This title they are said to have received in return for succours afforded to the army of Cyrus, when it was suffering, in these regions, from cold and hunger. (Curt., 7, 3.) They dwelt near the river Etymander, the modern Hindmend (Arrian, Exp. Alex., 4, 6, 12), between Drangiana and Arachosia, and in the vicinity of the modern city of Deraasp, in whose name traces of the ancient one appear. (Compare Schmieder, ad Curt., l. c.)

EUERGÊTES, a surname, signifying benefactor, given to Ptolemy III. and IV. of Egypt, as also to some kings of Syria, Pontus, &c.

EUGANÊI, an ancient nation of Italy, said to have once occupied all the country to which the Veneti, its subsequent possessors, communicated the name of Venetia. (Liv., 1, 1.) Driven from their ancient abodes, they appear to have retired across the Adige (Athesis), and to have settled on the shores of the lakes Benacus and Isæus, and in the adjacent valleys. Pliny (5, 20) says, on the authority of Cato, that they held at one time thirty-four towns: these were admitted to the rights of Latin cities under Augustus. (Cramer's Anc. Italy, vol. 1, p. 74.)

EUGENIUS, I. a general who opposed Dioclesian, A.D. 290; but was slain the very same day at the gates of Antioch, while attempting to make himself master of that city.—II. A usurper in the reign of Theodosius the Great, of Gallic extraction, A.D. 392. He was defeated, taken prisoner, and put to death, after having held power for two years. (Zosim., 4, 54, seqq.)

EUEMÉRUS, a native of Messene, as is generally supposed, though, according to Brucker and others, he was of the island of Sicily. Being sent on a voyage of discovery by Cassander, king of Macedon, he came, as he himself stated, to an island called Panchaia, in the capital of which, Panara, he found a temple of the Triphylian Jupiter, where stood a column inscribed with a register of the births and deaths of many of the gods. Among these he specified Uranus, his sons Pan and Saturn, and his daughters Rhea and Ceres; as also Jupiter, Juno, and Neptune, who were the offspring of Saturn. Accordingly, the design of Euhemerus was to show, by investigating their actions, and recording the places of their births and burials, that the mythological deities were mere mortal men, raised to the rank of gods on account of the benefits which they had conferred upon mankind. Ennius translated this celebrated work of Euhemerus, which was entitled ἱερὰ Πανάρχων. The translation, as well as the original work, excepting some fragments, is lost; but many particulars concerning Euhemerus, and the object of his history, are mentioned in a fragment of Diodorus Siculus, preserved by Eusebius. Some fragments have also been saved by St. Augustine; and long quotations have been made by Lactantius, in his treatise De Falsa Religione. This work was a covert attack on the established religion of the Greeks. Plutarch, who was associated with the priesthood, and all who were interested in the support of the popular creed, maintained that the whole work of Euhemerus, with the voyage to Panchaia, was an impudent fiction; and, in particular, it was urged, that no one except Euhemerus had ever seen or heard of the land of Panchaia (De Is. et Os.): that the Panchaia tellus had been described in a flowery and poetical style, both by Diodorus Siculus and Virgil (Georg., 2, 139), but not in such a manner as to determine its geographical position. The truth of the relation contained in the work of Euhemerus has been vindicated by modern writers, who have attempted to prove that Panchaia was an island of the Red Sea, which Euhemerus had actually visited in the course of his voyage. (Mem. de l'Acad. des Inscrip., vol. 15.) But whether Euhemerus merely recorded what he had seen, or whether the whole book was not rather a device and contrivance of his own, it seems highly probable that the translation of Ennius gave rise to the belief of many Roman philosophers, who maintained or insinuated their conviction of the mortality of the gods, and whose writings have been so frequently appealed to by Farmer, in his able disquisition on the prevalence of the Worship of Human Spirits. (Dunlop's Roman Literature, vol. 1, p. 133.)

EVIUS, a surname of Bacchus, given him, according to the poets, by Jupiter, whom he was aiding in the contest with the giants. Jupiter was so delighted with his valour, that he called out to him, ev vie, "Well done, oh son!" Others suppose it to have originated from a cry of the Bacchantes, Εὐοί. (Horat., Od., 1, 18, 9; 2, 11, 17.)

EULÆUS or CHAOSPES, a river of Persia, flowing near the city of Susa. The kings of Persia, according to Herodotus (1, 188), drank of no other; and, wherever they went, they were attended by a number of four-wheeled carriages, drawn by mules, in which the water of this river, being first boiled, was deposited in vessels of silver. Alian relates (V. H., 12, 40), that Xerxes, during his march into Greece, came to a desert place, and was exceedingly thirsty; his attendants with his baggage were at some distance, and proclamation was made, that whosoever had any of the water of the Chaospes should produce it for the use of the king. One person was found who possessed a small quantity, but it was quite putrid. Xerxes, however, drank it, and considered the person who supplied it as his friend and benefactor, since he must otherwise have perished with thirst.—Wahl (Asien, p. 736) derives the name Chaospes from the Persian Khooh asp, i. e., "strength of the mountain," "mountain-power," and considered it as applicable to all mountain-streams. The appellation of Eulæus, in Scripture Ulai (Daniel, 8, 2), is deduced by the same writer from the Pehlvi Av hulah, i. e., "clear, pure water." D'Anville supposes the Chaospes to be the modern Karoon; but it is more probably the Abzal, which flows by the ruins which both Major Rennel and Mr. Kinneir have determined to be those of Susa.

EUMÆUS, son of Ctesius, king of Syros. He was carried off when quite young by Phœnician pirates, and sold to Læertes, father of Ulysses, who brought him up carefully, and found in him a faithful follower and friend. Eumæus acted as the steward of Ulysses, and recognised his master, on the return of the latter, though after an absence of many years. (Od., 14, 5, seqq.)

EUMELUS, I. a son of Admetus, king of Phœæ in Thessaly, by Alcestis, daughter of Pelias, and who married Iphthime the sister of Penelope. He went to the Trojan war, and had the fleetest horses in the Grecian army. He distinguished himself in the funeral games of Patroclus. (Il., 2, 714.—Il., 763, seqq.) —II. Son of Amphilytus, and one of the Corinthian line termed Bacchiadæ. He was the author of a history of Corinth in heroic verse. (Pausan., 2, 1.) Eumelus joined Archias when the latter went to found Syracuse. (Clem. Alex., Strom., lib. 1, p. 398.) Eusebius makes him to have flourished in the third Olympiad. (Larcher, Chron. Herod., vol. 7, p. 448, 515.)

EUMÈNES, I. a native of Cardia, a town of the Thracian Chersonese, and, though of humble birth, yet an important actor in the troubled times which followed the death of Alexander the Great. Being early taken into the service of Philip of Macedon, he served him for seven, and Alexander for thirteen years, in the confidential office of secretary. He also displayed great talent for military affairs through the Persian campaigns, and was one of Alexander's favourite and most esteemed officers. After Alexander's death, in the general division of his conquests, Cappadocia, Paphlagonia, and the coast of the Euxine, as far east as Trapezus, fell to Eumenes' share. This was an expectancy rather than a provision, for the Macedonian army had passed south of these countries in the march to Persia, and as yet they were unsubdued. Perdiccas, however, took arms to establish Eumenes in his new government, and did so at the expense of a single battle. To Perdiccas as regent, and, after his death, to the royal family of Macedon, Eumenes was a faithful ally through good and evil; indeed, he is the only one of Alexander's officers in whose conduct any appearance of gratitude or disinterestedness can be traced. When war broke out between Ptolemy and Perdiccas, B.C. 321, he was appointed by the latter to the chief command in Asia Minor, between Mount Taurus and the Hellespont (Corn. Nep., Vit. Eum.), to resist the expected invasion of Antipater and Craterus. The latter he defeated; but the death of Perdiccas in Egypt threw the balance of power into Antipater's hands, who made a new allotment of the provinces, in which Eumenes was omitted, and Cappadocia given to another. The task of reducing him was assigned to Antigonus, about B.C. 320. The rest of his life was spent in open hostility to, or doubtful alliance with, Antigonus, by whom he was at last put to death, having been delivered up to the latter by a portion of his own army. Eumenes was an admirable partisan soldier, brave, full of resources, and of unbroken spirit. We have his life written by Plutarch and Cornelius Nepos. (Consult Droysen, Geschichte der Nachfolger Alexanders, Hamb., 1836.) Those parts of Diodorus Siculus (lib. 18) which relate to him, and Plutarch's Life, will be read with pleasure by all who are fond of military adventure. (Encycl. Us. Knowl., vol. 10, p. 68.)—II. A king of Pergamus, the first of his name. He succeeded his uncle Philetarus on the throne, B.C. 263, and added much to the territory which he inherited from the latter, having even gained a victory, near Sardis, over Antiochus, son of Seleucus. After a reign of twenty-two years, he was succeeded by his cousin Attalus, whose father Attalus was the younger brother of Philetarus. The death of Eumenes was occasioned by his intemperate habits.—III. The second of the name, was son of Attalus I. He ascended the throne on his father's death, which took place at an advanced age, after a prosperous reign of 43 or 44 years. The new sovereign continuing to tread in his father's steps, and adhering to his policy, remained the firm friend of the Romans during all their wars against Antigonus and the kings of Macedonia, and received from them, in recompense of his fidelity and valuable assistance, all the territory conquered from Antiochus on this side of Mount Taurus. Prior to this period the territory of Pergamus did not extend beyond the gulfs of Elæa and Adramyttium. Waylaid by the hired assassins of Perses, king of Macedonia, he had nearly perished at Delphi (Liv., 42, 14, seqq.), and yet he is represented by the Roman historian as subsequently favouring the cause of the man who sought to destroy him, and of having thereby incurred the ill-will and anger of the Roman people. (Liv., 41, 13.—Id., 46, 1, seqq.) With that arrogant nation past services were reckoned as nothing, if they were not accompanied by the most abject and slavish dependence. The King of Pergamus employed himself, during the leisure which a profound peace now afforded him, in embellishing his capital, and patron-sing the arts and sciences. The most lasting monument of his liberality in this respect was the great library which he founded, and which yielded only to that of Alexandria in extent and value. (Strab., 624.) It was from their being first used for writing in this library, that parchment skins were called "Pergamena Chartæ." (Varr., ap. Plin., 13, 11.) Plutarch informs us, that this vast collection, which consisted of no less than 200,000 volumes, was given by Antony to Cleopatra. (Vit. Anton., c. 25.) Eumenes reigned 49 years, leaving an infant son, under the care of his brother Attalus, who administered affairs as regent for 21 years, with great success and renown. (Vid. Pergamus.)

EUMENIA, a city of Phrygia, north of Peltæ, which probably derived its name from Eumenes, king of Pergamus. (Steph. Byz., s. v. Εὐμένης.)

EUMENIDES (the kind goddesses), a name given to the Erinyes or Furies, goddesses whose business it was to avenge murder upon earth. They were also called Sennæ (Σενναί) or "venerated goddesses." The name Eumenides is commonly thought to have been used through a superstitious motive. (Vid. Furiæ.)

EUMENIÆ, a festival in honour of the Eumenides or Furies. It was observed once a year with sacrifices and libations. At Athens none but freeborn citizens were allowed to participate in the solemnity, and of these, none but such as were of known virtue and integrity. (Vid. Eumenides.)

EUMOLPIDÆ, a sacerdotal family or house, to which the priests of Ceres at Eleusis belonged. They claimed descent from the mythic Eumolpus. The Eumolpidæ had charge of the mysteries by hereditary right, and to this same sacerdotal line was expressly intrusted the celebration of the Thesmophoria. (Vid. Eumolpus, and consult Creuzer, Symbolik, vol. 4, p. 355, 442, 482, seqq.)

EUMOLPUS, son of Neptune and Chione, daughter of Boreas and Orithyia. Chione, to conceal her weakness, threw the babe into the sea, to the protection of his father. Neptune took him to Æthiopia, and gave him to his daughter Benthescyeme to rear. When Eumolpus was grown up, the husband of Benthescyeme gave him one of his two daughters in marriage; but Eumolpus, attempting to offer violence to the sister of his wife, was forced to fly. He came with his son Ismarus to Tegyrus, a king of Thrace, who gave his daughter in marriage to Ismarus. But Eumolpus, being detected plotting against Tegyrus, was once more forced to fly, and came to Eleusis. Ismarus dying, Tegyrus became reconciled to Eumolpus, who returned to Thrace, and succeeded him in his kingdom. War breaking out between the Athenians and Eleusinians, the latter invoked the aid of their former guest. A contest ensued, and, according to the account given by Apollodorus (3, 15, 4), Eumolpus fell in battle against Erechtheus. Pausanias, however, states (1, 38, 3), that there fell in this conflict, on the one side Erechtheus, and on the other Immaradus, son of Eumolpus; and that the war was ended on the following terms: the Eleusinians were to acknowledge the power of Athens, but were to retain the rites of Ceres and Proserpina, and over these Eumolpus and the daughters of Celeus, king of Eleusis, were to preside. Other authorities, however, make the agreement to have been as follows: the descendants of Eumolpus were to enjoy the priestly office at Eleusis, while the descendants of Erechtheus were to occupy the Attic throne. (Schol. mscr. Aristid. ad Panathen., p. 118.—Creuzer, Symbolik, vol. 4, p. 344, not.)—Here we find a physical myth in unison with an historical legend. It was a tradition in Attica, that the sacred family of the Eumolpidæ belonged to the mythic Thracians, whom we find sometimes on Helicon, sometimes in Thrace. The present legend, by making Eumolpus a son of the sea-god, and grandson of the north wind, and giving him a son named Ismarus, plainly intended to deduce the Eumolpidæ from Thrace, while the name Tegyrus would seem to point to Bœotia, where there was a town named Tegyra. (Keightley's Mythology, p. 383.)

EUNAPIUS, a native of Sardis in Lydia. He flourished in the fourth century, and was a kinsman of the sophist Chrysanthus, at whose request he wrote the lives of the philosophers of his time. The work has been characterized by Brucker as a mass of extravagant tales, discovering a feeble understanding, and an imagination prone to superstition. Besides being a sophist, he was an historian, and practised physic. He wrote a history of the Cæsars from Claudius II. to Arcadius and Honorius, of which only a fragment remains. The lives of the philosophers was published with a Latin version by Junius, Ante., 1568, and by Commelinus in 1596.

EΥΠΑΤΟΡ, a surname given to many of the Asiatic princes, particularly to Mithradates VII. of Pontus, and Antiochus V. of Syria.

EUPATORIA, I. a town of Pontus, at the confluence of the Lycus and Iris. It was begun by Mithradates under the name Eupatoria, and received from Pompey, who finished it, the title of Magnopolis. (Strab., 556.) Its site appears to correspond with that of the modern Tchenikh. (Mannert, Geogr., vol. 6, pt. 2, p. 471.)—II. A town in the northwestern part of the Tauric Chersonese, on the Sinus Carcinites. It was founded by one of the generals of Mithradates, and is supposed to answer to the modern Koslof or Gosleve. (Mannert, Geogr., vol. 4, p. 294.)

EΥΦΗΛΕΣ, succeeded Androcles on the throne of Messenia, and in his reign the first Messenian war began. He died B.C. 730. (Pausan., 4, 5, 6.)

EUPHORBUS, a Trojan, son of Panthous, renowned for his valour; he wounded Patroclus, and was killed by Menelaus. (Il., 17, 60.) Pausanias relates (2, 17) that in the temple of Juno, near Mycenæ, a votive shield was shown, said to be that of Euphorbus, suspended there by Menelaus. Pythagoras, who maintained the transmigration of souls, affirmed, that, in the time of the Trojan war, his soul had animated the body of Euphorbus; and as a proof of the truth of his assertion, he is said to have gone into the temple where the shield was hanging, and to have recognised and taken it down. Maximus Tyrius (28, p. 288, ed. Dar.) speaks of an inscription on the shield, which proved it to have been offered by Menelaus to Minerva. Ovid (Met., 15, 160) lays the scene of the fable in the temple of Juno at Argos; while Tertullian (de Anima, p. 215) makes the shield to have been an offering at Delphi. Diogenes Laertius, finally, gives the temple of Apollo among the Branchidæ, near the city of Miletus, as the place where the wonder was worked (8, 4, seq.)

EUPHORIION, I. a tragic poet of Athens, son of Æschylus. He conquered four times with posthumous tragedies of his father's composition, and also wrote several dramas himself. One of his victories is commemorated in the argument to the Medea of Euripides, where we are told that Euphorion was first, Sophocles second, and Euripides third with the Medea. Olymp. 87, 2, B.C. 431. (Suid.—Theatre of the Greeks, p. 95, 4th ed.)—II. An epic and epigrammatic poet, born at Chalcis in Eubœa, B.C. 276, and who became librarian to Antiochus the Great. He wrote various poems, entitled "Hesiod," "Alexander," "Arius," "Apollodorus," &c. His "Mopsopia" or "Miscellanies" (Μοψοπία ἢ ἄρακτα) was a collection, in five books, of fables and histories relative to Attica, a very learned work, but rivalling in obscurity the Cassandra of Lycophron. The fifth book bore the title of "Chiliad" (Χιλιάς), either because it consisted of a thousand verses, or because it contained the ancient oracles that referred to a period of a thousand years. Perhaps, however, each of the five books con-ained a thousand verses, for the passage of Suidas respecting this writer is somewhat obscure and defective, and Eudoxia, in the "Garden of Violets," speaks of a fifth Chiliad, entitled Περὶ Χρησμών, "Of Oracles." Quintilian recommends the reading of this poet, and Virgil is said to have esteemed his productions very highly. A passage in the tenth Eclogue (v. 50, seqq.), and a remark made by Servius (ad Eclog., 6, 72), have led Heyne to suppose, that C. Cornelius Gallus, the friend of Virgil, had translated Euphorion into Latin verse. This poet was one of the favourite authors of the Emperor Tiberius, one of those whom he imitated, and whose bust he placed in his library. The fragments of Euphorion were collected and published by Meineke, in his work "De Euphorionis Chalc. vita et scriptis," Gedani, 1823, 8vo. (Schöll, Hist. Lit. Gr., vol. 3, p. 122.)

EUPHRANOR, an eminent statuary and painter of Corinth. He flourished about the 104th Olympiad, B.C. 362. Pliny gives an enumeration of his works. (Plin., 35, 8, 19.—Compare Pausan., 1, 3, 2, and the remarks of Fuseli, in his Lecture on Ancient Painting, p. 67.)

EUPHRATES, I. a native of Oreus in Eubœa, and a disciple of Plato. He quitted Athens for the court of Perdiccas, king of Macedonia, with whom he became a favourite. After the death of this monarch he returned to his country, and headed a party against Philip, the successor of Perdiccas and father of Alexander. Being shut up, however, within the walls of Oreus, he put an end to his own life. According to some, he was killed by order of Parmenio.—II. A Stoic philosopher, and native of Alexandria, who flourished in the second century. He was a friend of the philosopher Apollonius Tyaneus, who introduced him to Vespasian. Pliny the younger (Epist., 1, 10) gives a very high character of him. When he found his strength worn out by disease and old age, he voluntarily put a period to his life by drinking hemlock, having first, for some unknown reason, obtained permission from the Emperor Hadrian. (Enfield, Hist. Philos., vol. 2, p. 119, seqq.)—III. One of the most considerable and best known rivers of Asia. The Euphrates rises near Arze, the modern Erze-Roum. Its source is among mountains, which Strabo makes to be a part of the most northern branch of Taurus. At first it is a very inconceivable stream, and flows to the west, until, encountering the mountains of Cappadocia, it turns to the south, and, after flowing a short distance, receives its southern arm, a large river coming from the east, and rising in the southern declivity of the range of Mount Ararat. This southern arm of the Euphrates is the Arsanias, according to Mannert, and is the river D'Anville mentions as the Euphrates which the ten thousand crossed in their retreat (Anab., 4, 5), and of which mention is made by Pliny in reference to the campaigns of Corbulo. The Euphrates, upon this accession of waters, becoming a very considerable stream, descends rapidly, in a bending course, nearly W.S.W. to the vicinity of Samosata. The range of Amanus here preventing its farther progress in this direction, it turns off to the S.E., a course which it next pursues, with some little variation, until it reaches Ciresium. To the south of this place it enters the immense plains of Sennar; but, being repelled on the Arabian side by some sandy and calcareous heights, it is forced to run again to the S.E. and approach the Tigris. In proportion as these two rivers now approximate to one another, the intermediate land loses its elevation, and is occupied by meadows and morasses. Several artificial communications, perhaps two or three which are natural, form a prelude to the approaching junction of the rivers, which finally takes place near Coma. The river formed by their junction is called Shat-al-Arab, or the river of Arabia. It has three principal mouths, besides a small outlet; these occupy a space of thirty-six miles. The southernmost is the deepest, and freest in its current. Bars of sand, caused by the river, and which change in their form and situation, render the approach dangerous to the mariner. The tide, which rises above Bassora, and even beyond Coma, meeting with violence the downward course of the stream, raises its waters in the form of frothy billows.—Some of the ancients describe the Euphrates as losing itself in the lakes and marshes to the south of Babylon. (Arrian, 7, 7.—Mela, 3, 8.—Plin., 5, 26.) Others consider the river formed by the union of the two as entitled to a continuation of the name of Euphrates. (Strab., 2, p. 132; 15, p. 1060.) According to some, the Euphrates originally entered the sea as a separate river, the course of which the Arabs stopped up by a mound. (Plin., 6, 27.) This last opinion has been in some measure revived by Niebuhr, who supposes that the canal of Naar-Sares, proceeding from the Euphrates on the north of Babylon, is continued without interruption to the sea. But uncertainty must always prevail with regard to this and other points connected with the Euphrates, both from the inundations of the river, which render this flat and moveable ground continually liable to change, as well as from the works of human labour. The whole length of the Euphrates, including the Shat-al-Arab, is 1147 English miles. Its name is the Greek form of the original appellation Phrath, which signifies fruitful or fertilizing; the prefix eu, being corrupted from the Oriental article. The Oriental name is sometimes also written Perath, as in Gen., 2, 14, 15, 18, and Joshua, 1, 4. By the Arabians the river is called Forat. The epithet fertilis is applied to it by Lucan, Sallust, Solinus, and Cicero. The modern name of the Arsanias is Morad-Siai, or the waters of desire. (Malte-Brun, vol. 2, p. 100, seqq., Am. ed.)

EUPŒLIS, a writer of the old comedy, was born at Athens about the year 446 B.C. (Clinton, Fast. Hell., vol. 1, p. 63.) He was therefore a contemporary of Aristophanes, who, in all probability, was born a year or two after. Eupolis is supposed to have exhibited for the first time in B.C. 429. In B.C. 425 he was third with his Νοῦμνίαι, when Cratinus was second, and Aristophanes first. In B.C. 421 he brought out his Μαρικάς and his Κόλακες; one at the Dionysia ἐν Ἀθηναίοις, the other at those ἐν ὕψει; and in a similar way his Ἀντόλκκος and Ἀσπραγευτοί the following year. (Schol. in Aristoph., Nub., 552, 592.—Athen., 5, p. 216.—Schol. in Aristoph., Pac., 803.) The titles of more than twenty of his comedies have been collected by Meursius. A few fragments remain. Eupolis was a bold and severe satirist on the vices of his day and city. Persius (1, 124) terms him "iratum." (Compare Horat., Sat., 1, 4, 1, seqq.) In the Μαρικάς he attacked Hyperbolus. (Aristoph., Nubes, 551.) In the Ἀντόλκκος he ridiculed the handsome pancratiast of that name; in the Ἀσπραγευτοί, which was probably a pasquinade, he lashed the useless and cowardly citizens of Athens, and denounced Melanthus as an epicure. In the Βατραί he inveighed against the effeminacy of his countrymen. (Schol. in Aristoph., Pac., 808.) In his Λακεδαιμόνες he assailed Cimon, accusing him, among other charges, of an unpatriotic bias towards everything Spartan. (Compare Plutarch, Vit. Cim., c. 16, who says that this play had a great influence on the public feeling.) Aristophanes seems to have been on bad terms with Eupolis, whom he charges with having pillaged the materials for his Μαρικάς from the Ἰππῆς (Nubes, 551, seqq.), and with making scurrilous jokes on his premature baldness. (Schol. ad Nub., 532.) Eupolis appears to have been a warm admirer of Pericles as a statesman and as a man (Schol. ad Aristoph., Acharn., p. 794, Diindorf), as it was reasonable that such a comedian should be, if it be true that he owed his unrestrained license of speech to the patronage of that celebrated minister. His death was generally ascribed to the vengeance of Alcibiades, whom he had lampooned, probably in the Βεπται. (Cicero, ad Att., 6, 1.) By his orders, according to the common account, Eupolis was thrown overboard during the passage of the Athenian armament to Sicily (B.C. 415). Cicero, however, calls this story a vulgar error; since Eratosthenes, the Alexandrian librarian, had shown that several comedies were composed by Eupolis some time after the date assigned to this pseudo-assassination. His tomb, too, according to Pausanias, was erected on the banks of the Asopus by the Sicyonians, which makes it most probable that this was the place of his death. (Theatre of the Greeks, p. 102, seq., 4th ed.)

EURIPIDES, I. a celebrated Athenian tragic poet, son of Mnesarchus and Clito, of the borough Phylia, and the tribe Cecropis. (Diog. Laert., 2, 45.—Suidas, s. v. Εὐρίπ.—Compare the Life by Thom. Magister, and the anonymous Life published by Elmsley.) He was born Olymp. 75, 1, B.C. 480, in Salamis, on the very day of the Grecian victory near that island. (Plut., Symp., 8, 1.) His mother Clito had been sent over to Salamis, with the other Athenian women, when Attica was given up to the invading army of Xerxes; and the name of the poet, which is formed like a patronymic from the Euripus, the scene of the first successful resistance to the Persian navy, shows that the minds of his parents were full of the stirring events of that momentous crisis. Aristophanes repeatedly imputes meanness of extraction, by the mother's side, to Euripides. (Thesmoph., v. 386.—Ibid., v. 455.—Acharn., v. 478.—Equit., v. 17.—Rana, v. 840.) He asserts that she was an herb-seller; and, according to Aulus Gellius (15, 20), Theophrastus confirms the comedian's sarcastic insinuations. Philochorus, on the contrary, in a work no longer extant, endeavoured to prove that the mother of our poet was a lady of noble ancestry. (Suidas, s. v. Εὐρίπ.) Moschopolus also, in his life of Euripides, quotes this testimony of Philochorus. A presumptive argument in favour of the respectability of Euripides, in regard to birth, is given in Athenæus (10, p. 424), where he tells us Μινυόχουν τε παρά τοις ἀρχαίοις οὐ εὐνέστατοι παῖδες: a fact which he instances in the son of Menelaus and in Euripides, who, according to Theophrastus, officiated, when a boy, as cup-bearer to a chorus composed of the most distinguished Athenians in the festival of the Delian Apollo. Whatever one or both his parents might originally have been, the costly education which the young Euripides received intimates a certain degree of wealth and consequence as then at least possessed by his family. The pupil of Anaxagoras, Protagoras, and Prodicus (an instructor so notorious for the extravagant terms which he demanded for his lessons), could not have been the son of persons at that time very mean or poor. It is most probable, therefore, that his father was a man of property, and made a marriage of disparagement. In early life we are told that his father made Euripides direct his attention chiefly to gymnastic exercises, and that, in his seventeenth year, he was crowned in the Eleusinian and Thesean contests. (Aul. Gell., 15, 20.) The scholiast memoirs of Euripides ascribe this determination of the father to an oracle, which was given him when his wife was pregnant of the future dramatist, wherein he was assured that the child

—ἔς κλέος ἐσθλὸν ὕρουσι,

Καὶ στεφάνω ἱερῶν γλυκερὴν χάριν ἀμφιβαλεῖται.

This he interpreted of gymnastic glory and garlands. It does not appear, however, that Euripides was ever actually a candidate in the Olympic games.—The genius of the young poet was not dormant while he was occupied in these mere bodily accomplishments; and even at this early age he is said to have attempted dramatic composition. (Aul. Gell., 15, 20.) He seems to have also cultivated a natural taste for painting. (Thom. Mag. in Vit.—Vit. Anonym.—Vit. Moschop.) Some of his pictures were long afterward preserved at Megara. At length, quitting the gymnasium, he applied himself to philosophy and literature. Under the celebrated rhetorician Prodicus, one of the instructors of Pericles, he acquired that oratorical skill for which his dramas are so remarkably distinguished. It is on this account that Aristophanes tauntingly terms him ποιητὴν ῥημάτων δεκανικῶν (Pax., 534). He likewise repeatedly ridicules him for his ἀντιλογίαι, λογισμοί, and στροφαί (Rana, 775); his περιπατοί, σοφίσματα, &c. Quintilian, however, in comparing Sophocles with Euripides, strongly recommends the latter to the young pleader as an excellent instructor. Cicero, too, was a great admirer of Euripides, perhaps more particularly so for the oratorical excellence commended by Quintilian. He was no less a favourite with his brother Quintus. (Ep. ad Fam., 16, 8.)—From Anaxagoras he imbibed those philosophical notions which are occasionally found forward in his works. (Compare Valekenær, Diatrib., 4, 5, 6.—Bouterweck, de Philosophia Euripidea, published in Miscell. Græc. Dramat., p. 163, seqq., Grant, Cambridge.) Here, too, Pericles was his fellow-disciple. With Socrates, who had studied under the same master, Euripides was on terms of the closest intimacy, and from him he derived those moral gnomas so frequently interwoven into his speeches and narrations. Indeed, Socrates was even suspected of largely assisting the tragedian in the composition of his plays.—Euripides began his public career as a dramatic writer, Olymp. 81, 2, B.C. 455, in the twenty-fifth year of his age. On this occasion he was the third with a play called the Pleiades. In Olymp. 84, 4, B.C. 441, he won the prize. In Olymp. 87, 2, B.C. 431, he was third with the Medea, the Philoctetes, the Dictys, and the Theriste, a satyric drama. His competitors were Euphorion and Sophocles. He was first with the Hippolytus, Olymp. 88, 1, B.C. 428, the year of his master's (Anaxagoras's) death: second, Olymp. 91, 2, B.C. 415, with the Alexander (or Paris), the Palamedes, the Troades, and the Sisyphus, a satyric drama. It was in this contest that Xenocles was first. (Ælian., V. H., 2, 8.) Two years after this the Athenians sustained the total loss of their armament before Syracuse. In his narration of this disaster, Plutarch gives an anecdote (Vit. Nic.), which, if true, bears a splendid testimony to the high reputation which Euripides then enjoyed. Those among the captives, he tells us, who could repeat any portion of that poet's works, were treated with kindness, and even set at liberty. The same author also informs us, that Euripides honoured the soldiers who had fallen in that siege with a funeral poem, two lines of which he has preserved. The Andromeda was exhibited Olymp. 92, 1, B.C. 412; the Orestes, Olymp. 93, 1, B.C. 408. Soon after this time the poet retired into Magnesia, and from thence into Macedonia, to the court of Archelaus. As in the case of Æschylus, the motives for this self-exile are obscure and uncertain. We know, indeed, that Athens was by no means the most favourable residence for distinguished literary merit. The virulence of rivalry raged unchecked in a licentious democracy, and the caprice of a petulant multitude would not afford the most satisfactory patronage to a high-minded and talented man. Report, too, insinuates that Euripides was unhappy in his own family. His first wife, Melito, he divorced for adultery; and in his second, Clorilia, he was not more fortunate on the same score. To the poet's unhappiness in his matrimonial connexions Aristophanes refers in his Rana (v. 1045, seqq.). Envy and enmity among his fellow-citizens, infidelity and domestic vexations at home, would prove no small inducements to the poet to accept the invitations of Archelaüs. Perhaps, too, a prosecution in which he became involved, on a charge of impiety, grounded upon a line in the Hippolytus (Aristot., Rhet., 3, 15), might have had some share in producing this determination to quit Athens; nor ought we to omit, that, in all likelihood, his political sentiments may have exposed him to continual danger. In Macedonia he is said to have written a play in honour of Archelaüs, and to have inscribed it with his patron's name, who was so much pleased with the manners and abilities of his guest as to appoint him one of his ministers. He composed in this same country also some other dramatic pieces, in one of which (the Bacchæ) he seems to have been inspired by the wild scenery of the land to which he had come. No farther particulars are recorded of Euripides, except a few apocryphal anecdotes and apophthegms. His death is said to have been, like that of Æschylus, in its nature extraordinary. Either from chance or malice, the aged dramatist was exposed, according to the common account, to the attack of some ferocious hounds, and by them so dreadfully mangled as to expire soon afterward, in his seventy-fifth year. This story, however, is clearly a fabrication, for Aristophanes in the Frogs would certainly have alluded to the manner of his death, had there been anything remarkable in it. He died B.C. 406, on the same day on which Dionysius assumed the tyranny. (Clinton, Fast. Hellen., vol. 1, p. 81.) The Athenians entreated Archelaüs to send the body to the poet's native city for interment. The request was refused, and, with every demonstration of grief and respect, Euripides was buried at Pella. A cenotaph, however, was erected to his memory at Athens.—“If we consider Euripides by himself,” observes Schlegel (vol. 1, p. 198, seqq.), “without any comparison with his predecessors; if we select many of his best pieces, and some single passages of others, we must bestow extraordinary praise upon him. On the other hand, if we view him in connexion with the history of his art; if in his pieces we always regard the whole, and particularly his object, as generally displayed in those which have come down to us, we cannot forbear blanning him strongly, and on many accounts. There are few writers of whom so much good and so much ill may be said with truth. His mind, to whose ingenuity there were no bounds, was exercised in every intellectual art; but this profusion of brilliant and amiable qualities was not governed in him by that elevated seriousness of disposition, or that vigorous and artist-like moderation, which we revere in Æschylus and Sophocles. He always strives to please alone, careless by what means. Hence he is so unequal to himself. He sometimes has passages overpoweringly beautiful, and at other times sinks into real lowness of style. With all his faults, he possesses astonishing ease, and a sort of fascinating charm.—We have some cutting sayings of Sophocles concerning Euripides, although the former was so void of all the jealousy of an artist that he mourned over the death of the latter; and, in a piece which he shortly after brought upon the stage, did not allow his actors the ornament of a garland. I hold myself justified in applying to Euripides particularly, those accusations of Plato against the tragic poets, that they gave up men too much to the power of the passions, and made them effeminate by putting immoderate lamentations into the mouths of their heroes, because their groundlessness would be too clear if referred to his predecessors. The jeering attacks of Aristophanes are well known, but have not always been properly estimated and understood. Aristotle brings forward many important causes for blame; and when he calls Euripides ‘the most tragic of poets’ (Poet., 13, 10), he by no means ascribes to him the greatest perfection in the tragic art generally; but he means, by this phrase, the effect which is produced by unhappy catastrophes; since he immediately subjoins ‘al though he does not arrange the rest well.’ Lastly, the scholiast on Euripides contains many short and solid critiques on single plays, among which may possibly be preserved the judgments of the Alexandrian critics, of whom Aristarchus, by his soundness and acuteness, deserved that his name should be proverbially used to signify a genuine critic. In Euripides we no longer find the essence of ancient tragedy pure and unmixed; its characteristic features are already partly effaced. These consist principally in the idea of destiny which reigns in them, in ideal representation, and the importance of the chorus. The idea of destiny had, indeed, come down to him from his predecessors as his inheritance, and a belief in it is inculcated by him, according to the custom of the tragedians; but still, in Euripides, destiny is seldom considered as the invisible spirit of all poetry, the fundamental thought of the tragic world. It will be found that this idea may be taken in a severe or mild point of view; and that the gloomy fearfulness of destiny, in the course of a whole trilogy, clears up, till it indicates a wise and good providence. Euripides, on the other hand, drew it from the regions of infinity, and, in his writings, inevitable necessity often degenerates into the caprice of chance. Hence he can no longer direct it to its proper aim, namely, that of elevating, by its contrast, the moral free-will of man. Very few of his pieces depend on a constant combat against the dictates of destiny, or an equally heroic subjection to them. His men, in general, suffer, because they must, and not because they are willing. The contrasted subordination of ideal loftiness of character and passion, which in Sophocles, as well as in the graphic art of the Greeks, we find observed in this order, are in him exactly reversed. In his plays passion is the most powerful; his secondary care is for character; and if these endeavours leave him sufficient room, he seeks now and then to bring in greatness and dignity, but more frequently amiability. The dramatis personæ of a tragedy cannot be all alike free from faults, as otherwise hardly any strife could take place among them, and consequently there could be no complication of plot. But Euripides has, according to the doctrine of Aristotle (Poet., 15, 7.—Ibid., 26, 31), frequently represented his personages as bad without any necessity; for example, Menelaus in the Orestes. Tradition, hallowed by popular belief, reported great crimes of many ancient heroes; but Euripides, from his own free choice, falsely imputes to them traits at once mean and malicious. More especially, it is by no means his object to represent the race of heroes as pre-eminent above the present one by their mighty stature, but he rather takes pains to fill up or to arch over the chasm between his contemporaries and that wondrous olden time, and secretly to espy the gods and heroes of the other side in their underd; against which sort of observation, as the saying goes, no man, however great, can be proof. His manner of representation, as it were, presumes to be intimate with them: it does not draw the supernatural and the fabulous into the circle of humanity, but into the limits of an imperfect individual. This is what Sophocles meant when he said that he himself represented men as they should be, Euripides as they were. Not as if his own characters could always be held up as patterns of irreproachable behaviour: his saying referred to their ideal loftiness of character and manners. It seems to be a design of Euripides always to remind his spectators, ‘See, those beings were men; they had just such weaknesses, and acted from exactly the same motives that you do, that the meanest among you does.’ Hence he paints with great delight the weak sides and moral failings of his personages; nay, more, he even makes them exhibit them in frank self-confessions. They frequently are not only mean, but boast of it as if it must be so.—In his dramas the chorus is generally an unessential ornament; its songs are often altogether episodical, without reference to the action; more glittering than energetic or really inspired. 'The chorus,' says Aristotle (Poet., 18, 21), 'must be considered as one of the actors, and as a part of the whole; it must endeavour to assist the others; not as Euripides, but as Sophocles, employs it.' The ancient comic writers enjoyed the privilege of sometimes making the chorus address the audience in their own name; this was called a Parabasis. Although it by no means belongs to tragedy, yet Euripides, according to the testimony of Julius Pollux, often employed it, and so far forgot himself in it, that, in the piece called 'The Daughters of Danaus,' he made the chorus, consisting of women, use grammatical forms which belonged to the masculine gender alone. Thus our poet took away the internal essence of tragedy, and injured the beautiful symmetry of its exterior structure. He generally sacrifices the whole to parts, and in these, again, he rather seeks after extraneous attractions than genuine poetic beauty. In the music of the accompaniments he adopted all the innovations of which Timotheus was the author, and selected those measures which are most suitable to the effeminacy of his poetry. He acted in a similar way as regarded prosody; the construction of his verses is luxuriant, and approaches irregularity. This melting and unmanly turn would indubitably, on a close examination, show itself in the rhythm of his choruses. He everywhere superfluously brings in those merely corporeal charms, which Winckelmann calls a flattery of the coarse outward sense; everything which is stimulating or striking, or, in a word, which has a lively effect, without any real intrinsic value for the mind and the feelings. He strives after effect in a degree which cannot be conceded even to a dramatic poet. Thus, for example, he seldom lets any opportunity escape of having his personages seized with sudden and groundless terror; his old men always complain of the infirmities of old age, and are particularly given to mount, with tottering knees, the ascent from the orchestra to the stage, which frequently, too, represented the declivity of a mountain, while they lament their wretchedness. His object throughout is emotion, for the sake of which he not only offends against decorum, but sacrifices the connexion of his pieces. He is forcible in his delineations of misfortune; but he often lays claim to our pity, not for some internal pain of the soul, a pain too retiring in its nature, and borne in a manly manner, but for mere corporeal suffering. He likes to reduce his heroes to a state of beggary; makes them suffer hunger and want, and brings them on the stage with all the exterior signs of indigence, covered with rags, as Aristophanes so humorously throws in his teeth in the Acharnians (v. 410-448).—Euripides had visited the schools of the philosophers, and takes a pride in alluding to all sorts of philosophical theories; in my opinion, in a very imperfect manner, so that one cannot understand these instructions unless one knows them beforehand. He thinks it too vulgar to believe in the gods in the simple way of the common people, and therefore takes care, on every opportunity, to insinuate something of an allegorical meaning, and to give the world to understand what an equivocal sort of creed he has to boast of. We can distinguish in him a twofold personage: the poet, whose productions were dedicated to a religious solemnity, who stood under the protection of religion, and must therefore honour it on that account likewise, and the sophist, with philosophical pretensions, who, in the midst of the fabulous miracles connected with religion, from which he drew the subjects of his pieces, endeavoured to bring out his sceptical opinions and doubts. While on the one hand he shakes the foundations of religion, on the other hand he plays the part of a moralist; in order to become popular, he applies to the heroic ages what would hold
